One might have expected such a scheme to sound disjointed or bitty, but Dyson's response to each section of his text gives a seamless quality to each movement, with ecstatic choral climaxes designed to exploit the all-embracing acoustics of a great cathedral. The warm but well-defined Chandos recording helps to heighten the impact of the singing of the Welsh choristers, and this disc amply compensates for the years of neglect. All four soloists are in superb voice, each of them strong, firm and characterful; and both choruses sing with fresh, incandescent tone. Dyson's idiom may not be as distinctive as that of those other 'agnostics at prayer', but with its lyrical warmth and fine control of texture, with emotions often heightened by striking key-changes, the result will delight all devotees of the English choral tradition.

Edward Elgar

British 1857-1934

GROVE Elgar had violin lessons in Worcester and London but was essentially self-taught, learning much in his father's music shop. From the age of 16 he worked locally as a violinist, organist, bassoonist, conductor and teacher, also composing abundantly though not yet very individually: the accepted corpus of his works belongs almost entirely to the period after his 40th birthday.

His first attempt to establish himself in London was premature. He moved there with his wife Alice in 1889, but in 1891 they returned to Malvern, and he began to make a reputation more steadily with choral works: The Black Knight, The Light of Life, King Olaf and Caractacus. These were written within a specifically English tradition, but they were influenced also by German music from Weber, Schumann and Mendelssohn to Brahms and Wagner. The orchestral Enigma Variations (1899), in which each variation portrays a different friend of Elgar's, then proclaimed the belated arrival of a fully formed original style, taken further in the oratorio The Dream of Gerontius (1900), where the anxious chromaticism of a post- Parsifal manner is answered by the assurances of the Newman text: Elgar was himself a Roman Catholic, which may have been one cause of his personal insecurity.

Cello Concerto

Cello Concerto. Sea Pictures, Op 37
Jacqueline du Pré vc Janet Baker mez
London Symphony Orchestra / Sir John Barbirolli
EMI 556219-2 (54 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded1965 ●●●

Issued in 1965 and one of EMI's best-sellers ever since, these Elgar recordings make the most cherishable of couplings. Though both Jacqueline du Pré and Janet Baker were already well established and widely appreciated in 1965, this disc marked a turning point for both of them in their recording careers. With Barbirolli so warm-hearted and understanding an accompanist to each, these are both in every sense classic performances that can never be replaced. Jacqueline du Pré's Elgar has been all the more appreciated since her tragic illness took her away. In principle her espressivo may be too freely Romantic, but the slow movement and epilogue remain supreme in their intensity, conveying in whispered pianissimos of daring delicacy an inner communion, while the bravura of the brilliant passages remains astonishing from an artist who was still only 20.

The coupling is another classic, the young Janet Baker translating the work into something greater than had been appreciated before (and is reviewed in full under 'Sea Pictures').

The CD transfer is valuable for clarifying the sound, but it adds little to the original LP. The sound in the Cello Concerto exactly matches the LP sound, and the precise placing makes the soloist all the more vivid. The precision of CD makes more apparent the slight discrepancy between the sides, with Sea Pictures a degree fresher and fuller and with more bloom on the sound. The slight sibilant emphasis is not the fault of the transfer, but also comes on the LP.

Elgar Cello Concerto[a] Bloch Schelomo[a]
Kabalevsky Cello Concerto No 2 in G, Op 77[b]
Tchaikovsky Variations on a Rococo Theme, Op 33[c]. Nocturne, Op 19 No 4[c]. Pezzo capriccioso, Op 62[c]. Andante cantabile, Op 11[c] R Strauss Don Quixote[d]
Steven Isserlis vc [a]London Symphony Orchestra / Richard Hickox; [b]London Philharmonic Orchestra / Andrew Litton; [c]Chamber Orchestra of Europe / Sir John Eliot Gardiner; [d]Minnesota Orchestra / Edo de Waart
Virgin Classics 561490-2 (51 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1988 ●

Cellists are apt to 'come of age' in recordings of the Elgar. Isserlis was no exception. This is a wonderful account of the Concerto – brave, imaginative, individual – indeed, quite the most personal in its perception of the piece since the treasurable Du Pré on EMI. And that, you will appreciate, is saying something though not, we hasten to add, that the two readings are in any outward sense similar. Far from it. With Isserlis, the emotional tug is considerably less overt, the emphasis more on shadow and subtext than open heartache. Yet the inner-light is no less intense, the phrasing no less rhapsodic in manner than Du Pré. On the contrary. This is free-range Elgar all right, and like Du Pré it comes totally without affectation. Both Isserlis and Du Pré take an appropriately generous line on the first movement's sorrowful song, with Isserlis the more reposeful, the more inclined to open out and savour key cadences. The Scherzo itself is quite simply better played than on any previous recording; the articulation and definition of the semiquaver 'fours' would, we are sure, have astonished even the composer himself. From a technical point of view Isserlis is easily the equal, and more, of any player currently before us. And if you still feel that Du Pré really did have the last word where the epilogue is concerned, then listen to Isserlis sinking with heavy heart into those pages preceding the return of the opening declamation. He achieves a mesmerising fragility in the bars marked lento – one last backward glance, as it were – and the inwardness of the final diminuendo is something to be heard and remembered. Hickox and the LSO prove model collaborators. Don't on any account miss these performances.

Elgar Cello Concerto Dvořák Cello Concerto in B minor, B191
Maria Kliegel vc Royal Philharmonic Orchestra / Michael Halász Ⓢ
Naxos 8 550503 (73 minutes: DDD)

The technical accomplishment of Kliegel's playing is balanced by a richness of musical insight which will not disappoint. The boldness of the opening soliloquy recalls Du Pré at her finest, and yet Kliegel shares a yet deeper cup of grief in the world-weariness of the main first subject, carried with noble conviction. She takes a more improvisatory view in the lilting second group than Du Pré, though Schiff (Philips) is the most convincing of all in the transition back to the 9/8 at the close of the movement. The Scherzo is brilliantly done, and at a very fast tempo, but the conductor Michael Halász overlooks Elgar's precisely noted A tempo indication in response to the soloist's cantabile largamente statements at the end of each main section. The effect is not only tedious, but is quite the reverse of the composer's intention, clearly stated in the score. The Adagio is thoughtfully played, avoiding unwelcome posturing or empty affectation, though Kliegel is, if anything, a little too cool and dispassionate here. The finale is superbly paced, with the rumbustious militarism of the orchestration never allowed to dominate. The recording was made at Henry Wood Hall, and is full bodied and emphatic in major tuttis, yet one might have wished the overall balance to favour the soloist more than it does.

Elgar Cello Concerto in E minor, Op 85[a] Ⓗ
Bruch Kol nidrei, Op 47[b] Dvořák Cello Concerto[c]
Pablo Casals vc [a]BBC Symphony Orchestra / Sir Adrian Boult; [b]London Symphony Orchestra / Sir Landon Ronald; [c]Czech Philharmonic Orchestra / George Szell
EMI Références mono 763498-2 Ⓜ
(75 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1936-45 ●●

It scarcely seems necessary to write anything further about Casals's famous recordings of the Dvořák and Elgar concertos, which have long been recognised as classics of the recorded repertoire. The former, destined to mark a standard for generations, and seemingly played with a sword rather than a bow, still exercises a powerful effect: the incandescent solo playing is so mesmeric that one can accept the rather harsh and dry orchestral sound which betrays its age (from 1937). Some of Casals's passionate quality may have been due to his decision to break out of his self-imposed restricted activities caused by the Spanish civil war: the astute Fred Gaisberg, hearing that he had consented to appear with Szell in Prague, talked them into making a recording the day after the concert. About Casals's Elgar there has always been controversy: his reading was heavily criticised as over-emotional ('un-English') when he first played it in London before the war, but when he returned in 1945 and performed it, according to Boult, in exactly the same way, it was said that 'in the deeply meditative sections...it reached an Elgarian mood of wistfulness that few artists understand.' In the light of subsequent performances by other famous cellists this raises an interesting point for discussion, from which we here excuse ourselves.

Additional recommendation
Coupling: Lutosławski Cello Concerto
Wispelwey vc Netherlands Radio Philharmonic Orchestra / Van Steen
Channel Classics CCS12998 Ⓕ
(54 minutes: DDD: 7/99)

His utterly sympathetic performance of the Elgar displays both elasticity and plentiful re-creative fantasy. A notable achievement in every way.

Violin Concerto in B minor

Elgar Violin Concerto
Vaughan Williams The Lark Ascending
Kennedy vn City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra / Sir Simon Rattle
EMI 556413-2 (72 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997 ●

Astonishingly, in the case of the first two movements at least, this release, recorded during the week following a live concert at Birmingham's Symphony Hall in July 1997, fully re-creates the heady excitement of that memorable event. From every conceivable point of view – authority, panache, intelligence, intuitive poetry, tonal beauty and emotional maturity – Kennedy surpasses his 1985 Gramophone Award-winning EMI Eminence recording (now on HMV Classics). The first movement is a magnificent achievement all round, with tension levels extraordinarily high for a studio project. Rattle launches the proceedings in exemplary fashion, his direction passionate, ideally flexible and texturally lucid (the antiphonally divided violins help). The CBSO, too, is on top form. But it's Kennedy who rivets the attention from his commanding initial entry onwards. There's no hiding in this of all scores and Kennedy penetrates to the very essence of 'the soul enshrined within' in his melting presentation of the 'Windflower' theme – Elgar's dolce semplice realized to tear-spilling perfection. The slow movement is almost as fine. Only the finale oddly dissatisfies. Not in terms of technical address or co-ordination (both of which are stunning); rather, for all the supreme accomplishment on show, the results are not terribly moving. Despite any lingering doubts about this last movement we are still left with an enormously stimulating and well-engineered display. The fill-up is a provocative account of The Lark Ascending, which Kennedy (whose tone is ravishing) and Rattle spin out to a (surely unprecedented?) 17-and-a-half minutes.

Violin Concerto[a]. Cello Concerto[b] 🄷
[a]Yehudi Menuhin vn [b]Beatrice Harrison vc [a]London Symphony Orchestra, [b]New Symphony Orchestra / Sir Edward Elgar
EMI Great Recordings of the Century mono
566979-2 (75 minutes: AAD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1932 and 1928 ○○○

Elgar's conducting for Menuhin in the Violin Concerto's opening orchestral tutti is quite magnificent, as is his solicitous, attentive accompaniment throughout the work. Menuhin's youthful, wonderfully intuitive musicianship in fact needed little 'instruction', as is well known, and the success of the recording may be judged from the fact that there have been few periods in the years since it was first issued when it has not been available in some shape or form. Beatrice Harrison first studied the Cello Concerto for an abridged, pre-electric recording with Elgar conducting. So impressed was the composer then that he insisted that Harrison should be the soloist whenever he conducted the work again. Their authoritative performance is deeply felt and highly expressive, but it has a quality of nobility and stoicism which comes as a refreshing change from some overindulgent modern performances.

Since the original matrices were destroyed, EMI's engineers had to return to the 1957 tape for this transfer; although the 1957 engineers did not quite capture all the body of the originals there is an impressive clarity in the transfer, now brightened a little more for CD. The 1970s transfer of the Harrison/Elgar Cello Concerto was impressively managed, and this reissue has given still more presence to the sound without any sense of falsification.

Elgar Violin Concerto in B minor, Op 61[b] 🄷
Delius Violin Concerto[a]
Albert Sammons vn [a]Liverpool Philharmonic Orchestra / Malcolm Sargent; [b]New Queen's Hall Orchestra / Henry Wood
Naxos Historical mono 8 110951 Ⓢ
(67 minutes: ADD). Recorded [b]1929
and [a]1944 ○○○

Albert Sammons' 1929 account of Elgar's Violin Concerto with Sir Henry Wood and the New Queen's Hall Orchestra remains the finest version ever made, outstripping even the legendary Menuhin/Elgar collaboration from three years later in terms of authoritative grip, intuitive poetry and emotional candour. Previous transfers to CD have varied from satisfactory to merely tolerable and unacceptably botched. So it is a pleasure to encounter Mark Obert-Thorn's judicious restoration for Naxos. Obert-Thorn extracts plenty of body and bloom from his chosen laminated British pressings.

Delius heard Sammons perform the Elgar in May 1915 and was so bowled over that he set about writing a concerto for the formidable virtuoso. Sammons premièred the work with Boult in January 1919 but had to wait a full quarter of a century before committing it to disc. Here is another irreplaceable document: Sammons was an assiduous champion of this glorious music, and although the solo playing has not quite the effortless technical mastery of its companion here (within a couple of years, Sammons contracted Parkinson's disease and was forced to retire from the concert platform), his wise and unforced interpretation penetrates to the very core of Delius's lovely vision.

An admirable introduction to a truly great fiddler, irresistible at the price.

Additional recommendation
Violin Concerto
Kennedy vn London Philharmonic Orchestra / Handley
Classics for Pleasure 575 139-2 (54 minutes: DDD: 12/84^{R}) Ⓑ

Kennedy's superb first recording of the Elgar Violin Concerto won the Gramophone Record of the Year in 1985 and is now at bargain price.

'Enigma' Variations

Variations on an Original Theme, 'Enigma', Op 36. Cockaigne Overture, Op 40. Introduction and Allegro, Op 47. Serenade for Strings
BBC Symphony Orchestra / Sir Andrew Davis
Warner Apex 0927-41371-2 (74 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1991

These are four of the best Elgar performances on disc available. First, the recording is superb, with near-perfect balance and a really natural sound. Second, the playing of the BBC Symphony Orchestra is first-rate. Andrew Davis's conducting of all four works is inspired, as if he had forgotten all preconceived notions and other interpretations, gone back to the scores and given us what he found there. In Cockaigne, for example, the subtle use of ritardando, sanctioned in the score, gives the music that elasticity which Elgar considered to be an ideal requisite for interpreting his works. The poetry and wit of this masterpiece emerge with renewed freshness. As for the Enigma Variations, instead of wondering why another recording was thought necessary, you will find yourself rejoicing that such a fine performance has been preserved to be set alongside other treasured versions. Each of the 'friends pictured within' is strongly characterised by Davis, but without exaggeration or interpretative quirks. Tempos are just right and the orchestral playing captures the authentic Elgarian sound in a manner Boult would have recognized. Similarly, in the Introduction and Allegro, how beautifully the string quartet is recorded, how magical are the gentle and so eloquent pizzicatos which punctuate the flow of the great melody. The fugue is played with real zest and enjoyment. This is music on a large scale and is played and conducted in that way, whereas the early Serenade is intimate and dewy-eyed and that is how it sounds here.

Elgar 'Enigma' Variations[e] Three Bavarian Dances, Op 27 – Lullaby[d]. Barbirolli An Elizabethan Suite[a] Bax The Garden of Fand[b] Butterworth A Shropshire Lad[c] Ireland The Forgotten Rite[f]. Mai-Dun[g]. These Things Shall Be[h] Purcell Suite for Strings[i] Vaughan Williams Fantasia on 'Greensleeves'[j]. Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis[k]
[h]Parry Jones ten Hallé [h]Choir and Orchestra / Sir John Barbirolli
Dutton Laboratories mono ② CDSJB1022 Ⓑ
(140 minutes: ADD). Recorded at Houldsworth Hall, Manchester in [k]1946, [e]1947, [ih]1948, [d]Kingsway Hall, London in 1947, [fg]Abbey Road Studio, London in 1949, Free Trade Hall, Manchester in [a]1954, [bci]1956 ●

The long-buried treasure here is Barbirolli's very first recording of Elgar's Enigma Variations, never previously issued. It was recorded in Manchester in May 1947, only months before Barbirolli made his first published recording at EMI's St John's Wood studio. This newly unearthed version narrowly becomes the favourite rather than the later one. Both versions are perfectly satisfying in terms of sound, but interpretatively this unpublished version brings added advantages. The opening statement of the theme is lighter, more flowing and less emphatic, while even more important, 'Nimrod' is more warmly emotional, more spontaneous in expression, and the 'EDU' finale, taken at a marginally slower tempo, has no hint of the breathlessness which slightly mars the October performance at the end, again more warmly spontaneous-sounding. Significantly Barbirolli's later stereo version of Enigma also adopts the slightly broader, less hectic speed.

The two Vaughan Williams items have never appeared before on CD, and both are very welcome. They may be less weighty than Barbirolli's stereo remakes, but the Tallis Fantasia, featuring a vintage quartet of Hallé principals, separates the quartet more clearly from the main body than the version with the Sinfonia of London, and again is more warmly expressive. The extra lightness of Greensleeves, too, sounds more spontaneous. Disc one contains the shorter works of Bax, Butterworth and Ireland. The performances all have a passionate thrust typical of Barbirolli, with the tenor, Parry Jones, and the Hallé Chorus matching the orchestra in their commitment.

'Enigma' Variations[a]. Pomp and Circumstance Marches, Op 39[b]
[a]London Symphony Orchestra, [b]London Philharmonic Orchestra / Sir Adrian Boult
EMI 764015-2 (55 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1970 and 1976 ●●

Adrian Boult's 1970 recording of the Enigma Variations offers similar riches to those of Barbirolli with the additional bonus of a slightly superior recorded sound. Boult's account has authority, freshness and a beautiful sense of spontaneity so that each variation emerges from the preceding one with a natural feeling of flow and progression. There is warmth and affection too coupled with an air of nobility and poise, and at all times the listener is acutely aware that this is a performance by a great conductor who has lived a lifetime with the music. One need only sample the passionate stirrings of Variation 1 (the composer's wife), the athletic and boisterous 'Troyte' variation, or the autumnal, elegiac glow that Boult brings to the famous 'Nimrod' variation to realise that this is a very special document indeed. The LSO, on top form, plays with superlative skill and poetry and the excellent recording has been exceptionally well transferred to CD. The Pomp and Circumstance Marches, recorded six years later with the London Philharmonic Orchestra, are invigoratingly fresh and direct – indeed the performances are so full of energy and good humour that it is hard to believe that Boult was in his late eighties at the time of recording! A classic.

Additional recommendations

'Enigma' Variations
Couplings: Cockaigne. Serenade. Salut d'amor
Baltimore Symphony Orchestra / Zinman
Telarc CD80192 (62 minutes: DDD: 10/90) Ⓕ

An impressive performance. Zinman has the feel for the ebb and flow, the elasticity of the music, and he obtains idiomatic playing from the excellent Baltimore SO.

'Enigma' Variations[a]
Coupling: Serenade in E minor, Op 20[a]. Vaughan Williams The Lark Ascending[a]. 'Tallis' Fantasia[b]. Fantasia on 'Greensleeves'[b]
[a]London Philharmonic Orchestra; [b]Royal Liverpool Philharmonic Orchestra / Handley
Classics for Pleasure 574 880-2 (76 minutes: DDD: 8/83, 12/85 and 12/91) Ⓑ

The LPO have an ease with the Variations and the freshness of the Serenade that reveal deep acquaintance. The depth of understanding in the VW recordings is just as acute, with Handley bringing control and intensity to the Tallis Fantasia.

Reger Four Symphonic Poems after Arnold Böcklin
Coupling:Variations and Fugue on a Theme of JA Hiller, Op 100
Royal Concergebouw Orchestra / Järvi
Chandos CHAN8794 (67 minutes: DDD: 3/90) Ⓕ

Strongly recommended, especially to those who think they don't like Reger; how could anyone not like 'The Hermit playing the violin' from the Poems, or not respond to the Variations?

Falstaff

Falstaff. 'Enigma' Variations. Grania and Diarmid – Incidental Music; Funeral March
City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra / Sir Simon Rattle
EMI British Composers 555001-2 Ⓕ
(79 minutes:DDD). Recorded 1992-93

Rattle gives us perhaps the most meticulously prepared and subtly blended Falstaff ever committed to disc. This conductor's keen intellect and almost fanatical fidelity to the letter of the score team up to produce the most invigorating, wittily observant results. It is, however, a bit like viewing a pristinely restored portrait of Shakespeare's fat knight, whereas Barbirolli presents us with the lovable, vulnerable creature of flesh and blood himself – his epilogue really does touch to the marrow every time. In Enigma the results are always enjoyable and refreshing, with myriad details in Elgar's lovingly-woven, orchestral canvas adroitly pinpointed. A fine, deeply-felt performance. The most completely successful item here is the glorious Grania and Diarmid incidental music: the magnificent 'Funeral March' is one of Elgar's most inspired creations and Rattle gauges its brooding melancholy most eloquently. Balance is impeccable (and the transfer level comparatively low) in all three works, although the quality in Falstaff isn't quite as rich and glowing as it is elsewhere. Overall, this is an exceedingly stimulating release.

Pomp and Circumstance

Pomp and Circumstance, Op 39 – No 1 in D[a]; Ⓗ
No 2 in A minor[a]; No 3 in C minor[b]; No 4 in G[a];
No 5 in C[b]. The Dream of Gerontius, Op 38 – Prelude[c]. Serenade in E minor, Op 20[d].
Improvisation No 4[f]. Salut d'amour, Op 12[e].
Chanson de nuit,
Op 15 No 1[e]. Chanson de matin, Op 15 No 2[b].
Land of Hope and Glory[b]. Cockaigne, Op 40[a]
[a]BBC Symphony Orchestra, [b]London Symphony Orchestra, [c]Royal Albert Hall Orchestra, [d]London Philharmonic Orchestra, [e]New Symphony Orchestra / Sir Edward Elgar[f] pf
HMV Classics mono HMV5 74001-2 Ⓑ
(77 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1926-33 ●

The five Pomp and Circumstance marches are taken from recordings of different vintages. The earliest, No 3, made in 1927, is thinner in sound than No 5, recorded in 1930 when it was new, and Nos 1, 2 and 4. Those are among Elgar's last recordings, made with the BBC Symphony Orchestra in 1932 and 1933. As with the Cockaigne Overture, also performed by the then recently founded BBC Symphony Orchestra, the sound as transferred is splendidly full-bodied, the Elgarian trombones rasping out wonderfully well. As for the performances, one can almost see Elgar's great moustache bristling at the panache of the playing, and the delightful lilt he gives to such a motif as the Dvořákian theme in No 3.

Broadly, as ever, Elgar favours speeds on the fast side, here and elsewhere, but then allows ripely romantic expansion in big expressive moments, as in the dedicated account of the Gerontius Prelude. Recorded live in 1927 at the Royal Albert Hall, that comes in limited but wonderfully atmospheric sound, leading on to the tenor's first entry. Setting the seal on this issue are two of the shortest and most moving items – one of the strangely intense piano improvisations he recorded for HMV with uninhibitedly splashy playing, and the brief account of Land of Hope and Glory he recorded with the LSO for a Pathé newsreel at the opening of the EMI Studios in Abbey Road in 1931. That brings a gruff but moving speech from Elgar: 'Gentlemen, please play this tune as though you've never heard it before.' That alone is worth the money.

Symphonies

No 1 in A flat, Op 55; No 2 in E flat, Op 63;
No 3 in C minor, Op 88

Symphony No 1[a]. Falstaff, Op 68[b] Ⓗ
London Symphony Orchestra / Sir Edward Elgar
EMI 567296-2 (80 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded [a]1930 and [b]1931 ●●

Symphony No 2 Ⓗ
London Symphony Orchestra / Sir Edward Elgar
EMI 567297-2 (57 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1927 ●●

Cello Concerto in E minor, Op 85[a]. Cockaigne, Ⓗ
Op 40[b]. Falstaff, Op 68[c] – Interludes. Froissart,
Op 19[d]. In the South, Op 50[e]
[a]Beatrice Harrison vc [d]London Philharmonic Orchestra; [b]Royal Albert Hall Orchestra; [e]London Symphony Orchestra; [ac]New Symphony Orchestra / Sir Edward Elgar
EMI 567298-2 (75 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded [b]1926, [a]1928, [c]1929, [e]1930 and [d]1933 ●●

The blockbuster coupling here (clocking in at nearly 80 minutes to boot) has to be that of the First Symphony and Falstaff, both of which receive readings that leave you gasping in wonder at the astonishing vitality, entrancing poetry and (above all) daring flexibility of Elgar's conducting. Certainly, this is a Falstaff brimful of humanity, irresistible narrative flair and (at the close) heart-rending poignancy. As for the symphony, never was there a more wistful treatment of the Scherzo's enchanting trio section, while the work's thrilling closing pages have surely never resounded with greater cumulative swagger.

Similarly, the composer's 1927 version of the Second Symphony enshrines another inspirational display, its huge expressive fervour and blistering intensity shining like a beacon across the decades. First-timers should listen out for the generous use of portamento, to say nothing of the staggering reserves of sostenuto tone Elgar draws from the LSO strings (hardly a top-ranking group at the time). Recorded over just one day, this rapt performance was rush-released in time for Elgar's 70th birthday on June 2. Six weeks later, Elgar re-made the first side of the Rondo third movement (producer Fred Gaisberg having in the meantime noticed 'foreign noises' in the original take), and it was from those July 1927 sessions that the tantalising five-minute rehearsal sequence derives (the unique shellac pressing of which Elgar was extremely fond of playing to visitors at his home).

The third disc kicks off with a rivetingly characterful Froissart from February 1933, followed by an astoundingly charismatic Cockaigne with the Royal Albert Hall Orchestra (Elgar's very first recording for the electric microphone, set down in April 1926). Exhilarating is the only word to describe the 1930 account of In the South with the LSO, the music's thrusting grandeur and intimacy of feeling seamlessly integrated into a searingly cogent whole. We also get an agreeably bluff, aptly rustic rendering of the two 'Dream Interludes' from Falstaff, and the anthology concludes with Beatrice Harrison's big-hearted, wonderfully touching 1928 performance of the Cello Concerto.

The First Symphony's scherzo still sounds pretty uncongenial (though at least someone at EMI has taken the opportunity to tidy up that horrendous side-join at 4'20" that defaced its full-price predecessor). Otherwise, the sound is often remarkably vivid, with a commendable truthfulness of timbre on the third disc not quite matched by the first two (containing the symphonies and Falstaff).

Symphony No 1

Awards 1997

Symphony No 1. Serenade for Strings. Chanson de nuit, Op 15 No 1. Chanson de matin, Op 15 No 2
London Philharmonic Orchestra / Sir Adrian Boult
EMI 764013-2 (70 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1968-76 ●●●

Boult in Elgar on CD: the combination is irresistible, particularly when in addition to the symphony it comes with substantial and valuable makeweights. The 1976 recording of the symphony is among the last that Boult made of Elgar, a noble, unforced reading with no hint of extreme speeds in either direction. In Boult's view the flow of the music is kept free and direct, with rallentandos and tenutos reduced to the minimum in the links between sections. The sound in this digital transfer is first-rate, every bit as fine as the original LP. The brass is gloriously full, which with Elgar is one of the main necessities.

On the fill-ups, more than in the symphony, the analogue original is revealed in the degree of tape-hiss, noticeable but not distracting, and if anything the 1973 recording of the Serenade brings sound even more vivid in its sense of presence than that of the bigger ensemble. Boult so naturally conveys the tenderness and delicacy of the inspiration, and so it is too in the two shorter pieces from 1968 with violin tone noticeably less full and rounded but still sweet enough. The couplings will for many be irresistible.

Symphony No 1 in A flat, Op 55. Introduction and Allegro, Op 47
Hallé Orchestra / Sir John Barbirolli
BBC Legends/IMG Artists BBCL4106-2 Ⓕ
(67 minutes: ADD). Recorded live in 1970 ●

On July 24, 1970 Sir John Barbirolli conducted (and recorded) this inspired Hallé performance of Elgar's First Symphony in St Nicholas's Chapel, as his major contribution to the King's Lynn Festival. Four days later he suffered a fatal heart attack. There could be no finer memorial, for the acoustic of the chapel provides a wonderfully warm glow and the richest amplitude for the Hallé brass and strings, without blunting the fortissimi. The depth of feeling and power in the performance has the genuine thrill of live music-making. There is, for instance, an extraordinary central climax in the first movement, with (as Michael Kennedy comments in the notes) the brass outbursts given a 'terrifying intensity', and the apotheosis of the finale has similar emotional strength. Barbirolli invests the symphony's slow sad motto theme with a poignant nostalgia each time it appears; but most memorable of all is the sheer richness of the opening of the Adagio, sustained throughout with Barbirolli's characteristic warmth of feeling, while the impassioned Hallé string playing is as rich in tone as it is heartfelt.

Fascinatingly, the interpretation, looks back to his first 1956 Pye recording with his own orchestra (available on Dutton Laboratories). Both performances play for a little over 52 minutes, and throughout the timings of each movement and the flexible inner relationships of tempi are remarkably close. But this final version matches and even surpasses that first venture in its surging forward momentum, and of course the sound is far richer, obviously more modern. Everyone has their favourite version among the six, but no Elgarian will be disappointed with this account, which still has the Hallé strings sitting on the edge of their seats responding to the ardour of 'Glorous John'. Here is Elgarian treasure trove indeed!

Symphony No 1 in A flat, Op 55
London Symphony Orchestra / Sir Colin Davis 🏆
LSO Live LSO0017 (55 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded live in 2001 ●●

This thrillingly combustible LSO Live account easily holds its own in the most exalted company.

Davis's is a patient, noble conception, yet lacking absolutely nothing in thrusting drama, fresh-faced character and tender poetry. Certainly, Sir Colin steers a marvellously confident course through the epic first movement, the music-making always comprehensive in its emotional scope and hitting genuine heights in the development. The Scherzo is another great success, the glinting, defiant swagger of the outer portions counterbalanced by the delectable grace and point these eloquent players lavish on the Trio. Just one small interpretative quibble: Davis's inorganic slackening of tempo during the sublime transition into the slow movement (listen to Barbirolli's unforgettable 1956 Hallé account to hear how it should be done). As for the great Adagio itself, Davis's intensely devotional approach works beautifully. The finale positively surges with purposeful bite, fire and sinew, while the glorious closing pages really do raise the roof.

Tony Faulkner's expertly balanced sound doesn't have quite the bloom that EMI and Decca achieved for Boult and Solti on their classic analogue versions, but it amply conveys the tingling electricity and physical impact of a special event. At this price, this is one to snap up.

Symphony No 1[a]. In the South, 'Alassio', Op 50[b] Ⓗ
London Philharmonic Orchestra /
Sir Adrian Boult
Testament mono SBT1229 (69 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded [a]1949 and [b]1955 ●●●

The first wonder of this very welcome transfer from Testament is the astonishing quality of the sound, mono only but full-bodied and finely detailed to give a keener sense of presence than the rather disappointing CD transfer of the 1976 stereo version (reviewed above), with a surprisingly wide dynamic range for a 1949 recording. When Boult recorded that final stereo version, he was already 87, and though as ever the reading is a noble one, beautifully paced, it has nothing like the same thrust and tension as this recording of nearly three decades earlier. In particular the heavenly Adagio has an extra meditative intensity in the way that Boult presents each of the great lyrical themes. The finale in particular has a bite and thrust far beyond that of the later account.

Boult's recording of In the South, made in 1955, brings out his thrustful side even more strikingly, with urgent speeds giving way in the lovely Canto popolare section to a honeyed beauty before an urgent yet finely controlled account of the coda. Sadly, the 1955 sound is shallower than that of six years earlier for the symphony, though there is ample weight for the brass theme of the second section. A splendid addition to Boult's legacy on disc.

Additional recommendation
Symphony No 1[a]
Coupling: Pomp and Circumstance Marches Nos 1-5
London Philharmonic Orchestra / Handley
Classics for Pleasure 575 305-2
(DDD: [a]recorded 1979) Ⓑ

Handley conducts the Symphony with exactly the right feeling for its sweep, with passion and total commitment. The recording is warm, yet vivid.

Symphony No 2

Symphony No 2. In the South
BBC Symphony Orchestra / Sir Andrew Davis
Warner Apex 0927-49586-2 (78 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1992 ●●

In what is his finest achievement on record to date, Andrew Davis penetrates right to the dark inner core of this great symphony. In the opening Allegro vivace e nobilmente, for example, how well he and his acutely responsive players gauge the varying moods of Elgar's glorious inspiration: be it in the exhilarating surge of that leaping introductory paragraph or the spectral, twilight world at the heart of this wonderful movement, no one is found wanting. In fact, Davis's unerring structural sense never once deserts him, and the BBC Symphony Orchestra simply plays its heart out. Above all, though, it's in the many more reflective moments that Davis proves himself an outstandingly perceptive Elgarian, uncovering a vein of intimate anguish that touches to the very marrow; in this respect, his account of the slow movement is quite heartrendingly poignant – undoubtedly the finest since Boult's incomparable 1944 performance with this very same orchestra – while the radiant sunset of the symphony's coda glows with luminous beauty. Prefaced by an equally idiomatic, stirring In the South (and aided throughout by some sumptuously natural engineering), this is an Elgar Second to set beside the very greatest. In every way a treasurable release.

Symphony No 2
BBC Philharmonic Orchestra / Sir Edward Downes
Naxos 8 550635 (56 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1993 ●

Here is further proof that Edward Downes is an Elgarian to be reckoned with. This account of the Second Symphony is up there with the very best. In the first movement, Downes steers a gloriously clear-sighted course: here is the same unexaggerated, splendidly authoritative conception heard from this conductor in the concert hall. Unlike some rivals on record, Downes resists the temptation to give too much too soon, and this feeling of power in reserve lends an extra cumulative intensity to the proceedings; indeed, the coda here is absolutely thrilling. The ensuing Larghetto sees Downes striking a near-perfect balance between introspection and heart-warming passion. Both the Rondo and finale are ideally paced – the former not too hectic, the latter flowing to perfection, culminating in an epilogue of rare delicacy. Throughout, the BBC Philharmonic plays outstandingly for its former chief: the orchestra's golden-toned cello section must be singled out for special praise.

Just a touch more clarity in tuttis, and the recording would have been ideal. In sum, a deeply sympathetic Elgar Second, definitely the preferred budget version, possessing qualities to match any rival. At Naxos price, it's surely a must for all Elgarians.

Additional recommendations
Symphony No 2
Couplings: Sospiri. Elegy
Hallé Orchestra; New Philharmonia / Barbirolli
EMI British Composers 764724-2 Ⓜ
(66 minutes: ADD: 2/94)

Barbirolli's superb second recording of the Second Symphony. No one conveys the welling emotion of the second movement quite so candidly: tears spill from those violin glissandos at the climax.

Couplings: Symphony No 1. Pomp and Circumstance March No 5
Philharmonia / Haitink
EMI Double Forte ② 569761-2 Ⓜ
(118 minutes: DDD: 10/97)

The cumulative intensity of Haitink's interpretation is overwhelming in its clear-sightedness and emotional impact.

Coupling: Sea Pictures
Greevy mez
London Philharmonic Orchestra / Handley
Classics for Pleasure 575 306-2
(DDD: [a]recorded 1980) Ⓑ

Another superb account. An unerringly paced reading, this is plainly a version which all Elgarians will want.

Coupling: Serenade
Hallé Orchestra / Loughran; Academy of St Martin in the Fields / Marriner
ASV Quicksilva CDQS6087 (70 minutes: DDD: 8/93) Ⓢ

This super-budget Second is well worth anyone's money. The Hallé respond with sure-footed discipline and their playing lacks nothing in whole-hearted application or fervour.

Further listening
Parry Symphony No 5
London Philharmonic Orchestra / Bamert
Chandos CHAN8955 (57 minutes: DDD: 9/91) Ⓕ

Bamert's treatment of the symphony is broad and particularly impressive in the slow movement. The orchestra plays with thrilling conviction.

Symphony No 3

Bournemouth Symphony Orchestra / Paul Daniel
Naxos 8 554719 (55 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1999 ●●

How thrillingly urgent Elgar's unforgettably gaunt introductory bars sound here – a magnificent launch-pad for an interpretation of unswerving dedication, plentiful character and intelligence. Audibly galvanised by Paul Daniel's direction, the Bournemouth orchestra responds with infectious eagerness, polish and, most important, all the freshness of new discovery. In these newcomers' hands there's a rhythmic snap and athletic drive about the mighty opening movement that genuinely exhilarate. Where Davis perhaps scores over Daniel is in the spiritual, 'inner' dimension he brings to those ineffably beautiful bars at the start of the development section. Come the succeeding Allegretto, and Daniel's approach is more urgent, less evocative. By the way, in this same movement (4'34") the solo viola's G sharp crotchet is now trilled – just one of a clutch of subtle emendations Payne has since incorporated into the score since Sir Andrew Davis's première recording on NMC. The anguished slow movement welds a penetrating textural and harmonic clarity to a noble strength that is very moving. Best of all is the finale, which now emerges in a rather less piecemeal fashion than it does under Davis. Particularly good is the dark swagger that Daniel locates in both those nobilmente paragraphs beginning at bars 68 and 253 (2'36" and 10'01" respectively), while the closing bars are magical, the final soft tam-tam stroke disappearing into the ether like some vast unanswered question. Tony Faulkner's sound is excellent in every respect. In sum, another jewel in the Naxos crown: absolutely not to be missed.

Additional recommendation
Symphony No 3
BBC Symphony Orchestra / A Davis
NMC NMCD053 (56 minutes: DDD: 3/98) Ⓕ

An eloquent, profoundly involving performance with demonstration-worthy sound.

Piano Quintet

Piano Quintet in A minor, Op 84. String Quartet in E minor, Op 82. In Moonlight (for viola and piano)
Piers Lane pf; James Boyd va; Vellinger Quartet
Classics for Pleasure 575980-2 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓑ
Recorded 1994 ●

This set represents an outstanding bargain. When it first appeared on EMI Eminence, the Vellinger Quartet's coupling fairly bowled this critic over. These are performances to which you will return again and again, for their ardour, spontaneity and impeccable address – though just a fraction more wistful intimacy would not have gone amiss. Sandwiched between the two main items here, the miniature for viola and piano, In Moonlight, leaves a haunting impression. Vividly engineered and at bargain price, this is an issue to treasure.

Violin and Piano Works

Romance in C minor, Op 1. Pieces, Op 4 – No 1, Idylle; No 3, Virelai. Mazurka in C minor, Op 10 No 1. Salut d'amour. Bizarrerie in G minor, Op 13 No 2. Chanson de nuit. Chanson de matin. La capricieuse, Op 17. Gavotte in A. Etude-Caprice (cpted Reed). Serenade. May Song. In Hammersbach. Carissima.

Adieu. Etudes characteristiques
Marat Bisengaliev vn Benjamin Frith pf
Black Box BBM1016 (67 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1998

Born in 1962, Marat Bisengaliev is a prize-winning graduate from the Moscow Conservatory. On the evidence of this most enjoyable disc he is a violinist of great technical accomplishment and communicative warmth, and he generates a really fine rapport with Benjamin Frith. As the opening Romance immediately reveals, these artists bring an affectingly uncloying, totally unforced naturalness of expression to this charming repertoire. Even such well-worn nuggets as the two Chansons and Salut d'amour emerge with a new-minted freshness. Only in La capricieuse do you feel that the rubato lacks the last ounce of spontaneity. Elsewhere, the programme usefully plugs a number of gaps in the Elgar discography, not least the delectable Bizarrerie, Op 13 No 2, Virelai (1884) and a cheeky Gavotte from the following year. The winsome In Hammersbach will be more familiar as the second of the Three Bavarian Dances. Eagle-eyed enthusiasts will also have spotted two world-première recordings in the contents listed above: it was left to violinist W H Reed to complete the Etude-Caprice that Elgar first sketched as long ago as 1877, while the ferocious difficulty of the five solo Etudes characteristiques of 1878 has long put off any potential champions on disc (and Bisengaliev rises to the challenge with fearless aplomb). Piano tone seems a touch metallic at the outset, but the ear soon adjusts, and balance within is generally excellent.

Elgar Violin Sonata in E minor, Op 82
Finzi Elegy in F, Op 22 Walton Violin Sonata
Daniel Hope vn Simon Mulligan pf
Nimbus NI5666 (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 2000 ○○○

The coupling of the violin sonatas by Elgar and Walton is a most satisfying one, not unique on disc, and one which provides fascinating parallels. The Finzi Elegy is a very apt makeweight, the only surviving movement from a projected Violin Sonata written in a hectic period for the composer at the beginning of the World War II.

The Elgar elicits a performance of high contrasts both in dynamic range – with Hope using daringly extreme pianissimos – and in flexibility of tempo. So in the first movement the opening at an urgent speed gives way to a very broad reading of the second subject, hushed and musingly introspective. Yet such freedom of expression goes with deep concentration, so that the structure is still firmly held together. In the finale, Hope conveys an improvisational quality, again using the widest dynamic range, finely matched by Simon Mulligan.

With Hope's sweet, finely focused violin tone beautifully caught in the Nimbus recording – full and warm but less reverberant than some – and well-balanced against the piano, this set makes an outstanding recommendation.

Organ Sonatas

Organ Sonatas – No 1 in G, Op 28; No 2 in B flat, Op 87a (arr Atkins). Vesper Voluntaries, Op 14. Cantique in C, Op 3 No 1. Loughborough Memorial Chime
John Butt org
Harmonia Mundi Ⓕ HMU90 7281
(67 minutes: DDD). Played on the organ of King's College Chapel, Cambridge

These five works represent Elgar's complete output for solo organ. Indeed, in the case of the Sonata in B flat, the music is as much the work of Elgar's close friend, Ivor Atkins, as of Elgar himself, but in spite – maybe because – of that, it is probably the most successful of all the works here. Having been largely overlooked on disc, it is good to report that John Butt's suitably self-confident if, at times, slightly idiosyncratic performance, makes truly riveting listening.

Strongly redolent in style (and title) of the period (1890), the nine tiny Vesper Voluntaries have all but disappeared from the repertory in recent years. They are, nevertheless, full of Elgar hallmarks and Butt's sensitive handling of both the music and, more especially, the organ, breathes new life into these miniature gems.

The Sonata in G is Elgar's largest and best-known organ work, and Butt's authoritative performance, at times magisterial, occasionally deliciously sentimental and frequently breathtakingly virtuoso, has no equal in the current catalogue. The unusually clear and focused recording of the famous King's instrument is the ideal partner to Butt's playing. Elgar's music for organ has never been served so well on record as it is here.

The Black Knight

The Black Knight, Op 25. Scenes from the Bavarian Highlands, Op 27
London Symphony Chorus and Orchestra / Richard Hickox
Chandos CHAN9436 (61 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts included. Recorded 1995

Elgar completed The Black Knight in 1893 and it provided him with his first big success. The text tells of a sinister, unnamed 'Prince of mighty sway', whose appearance at the King's court during the feast of Pentecost has disastrous consequences. Elgar's score boasts much attractive invention, some of it strikingly eloquent and prescient of greater offerings to come. The choral writing is always effective, the orchestration already vivid and assured. Richard Hickox and his forces are dab hands at this kind of fare and their performance has great bloom and spaciousness. Similarly, in the tuneful, vernally fresh Scenes from the Bavarian Highlands, Hickox and his colleagues respond with commendable spirit and pleasing polish. Typical of Chandos, the recording is bright and clear, tonally beyond reproach and with just the right balance between choir and orchestra.

The Kingdom

The Kingdom, Op 51[a]. Coronation Ode, Op 44[b]
[a]Margaret Price, [b]Felicity Lott sops [a]Yvonne Minton mez [b]Alfreda Hodgson contr [a]Alexander Young, [b]Richard Morton tens [a]John Shirley-Quirk, [b]Stephen Roberts bars [a]London Philharmonic Choir and Orchestra / Sir Adrian Boult; [b]Cambridge University Musical Society Chorus; [b]Choir of King's College Cambridge; [b]New Philharmonia Orchestra / Philip Ledger
EMI British Composers ② 764209-2 Ⓜ
(130 minutes: ADD) ●

Boult was a passionate admirer of The Kingdom and, as ever, the unaffected devotion and sheer authority of his advocacy is hard to resist. The two formidable contenders in the work are Leonard Slatkin and Richard Hickox. All three performers have much going for them. In short, Boult enjoys the strongest team of soloists, Hickox obtains the most disciplined and full-bodied choral work, and Slatkin secures the finest orchestral playing – indeed, the LPO are on inspired form, responding with an exemplary sensitivity, commitment and concentration which also marked out Slatkin's magnificent account of the Symphony No 2 set down with this same group some 17 months later. Slatkin also benefits from perhaps the best engineering, with Boult's Kingsway Hall production now sounding just a little pale and hard-edged in comparison. Where the EMI release really comes up trumps, though, is in the shape of its generous fill-up, Philip Ledger's superb, swaggering reading of the Coronation Ode. Ultimately, then, the Boult, must take the palm, especially at mid price, though no devoted Elgarian should miss hearing Slatkin's gloriously lucid conception either.

Additional recommendation
The Kingdom
Couplings: Sospiri. Sursum corda
Marshall, Palmer sops Davies ten Wilson-Johnson bar London Symphony Chorus and Orch / Hickox
Chandos ② CHAN8788/9 (108 minutes: DDD: 2/90)Ⓕ
Particularly impressive and moving 'Breaking of the Bread'; the orchestra play with fire and sensitivity.

The Light of Life

Judith Howarth sop Linda Finnie mez Arthur Davies ten John Shirley-Quirk bar London Symphony Chorus and Orchestra / Richard Hickox
Chandos CHAN9208 (63 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text included. Recorded 1993

In the glorious orchestral 'Meditation' Hickox's conducting demonstrates a noble flexibility, sensitivity to dynamic nuance and feeling for climax. Equally the engineering, sumptuous yet detailed, comes close to the ideal. The LSO and Chorus contribute to proceedings in exemplary, disciplined fashion. As The Blind Man, Arthur Davies could hardly be more ardent, but his slightly tremulous timbre will not be to all tastes. John Shirley-Quirk, so eloquent and firm-toned a Jesus for Groves (on EMI) back in 1980, now shows signs of unsteadiness in the same part. On the other hand, Linda Finnie and Judith Howarth make a creditable showing. Hickox's reading excels in precisely the areas where the Groves was deficient, and vice versa. If you already have the Groves reissue, hang on to it, for it is by no means outclassed by the Hickox. However, for anyone coming to this underrated score for the first time, Hickox's must now be the preferred version.

Sea Pictures

Sea Pictures, Op 37. Cello Concerto.
Janet Baker mez Jacqueline du Pré vc
London Symphony Orchestra / Sir John Barbirolli
EMI 556219-2 (54 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded1965 ●●●

Until this recording, Sea Pictures had tended to be underprized even among Elgarians; but the passion, intensity and sheer beauty of this performance with each of the five songs sharply distinct rebutted any idea that – in reflection of verse of varying quality – it had anything of substandard Elgar in it. It is a work which you will probably never be able to listen to again without hearing in your mind Janet Baker's deeply individual phrasing on this disc. What strikes you more than anything else is the central relevance to Baker's whole career of the last stanza in 'Sabbath morning at sea', a radiant climax. 'He shall assist me to look higher' says the Barrett Browning poem, and the thrust of meaning as she sings it invariably conveys a frisson such as you rarely get on record. It's coupled of course with du Pré's outstanding Cello Concerto (see page 351 for review). What more could you want?

Sea Pictures, Op 37. The Music Makers
Felicity Palmer mez London Symphony Chorus and Orchestra / Richard Hickox
EMI British Composers 565126-2 Ⓜ
(62 minutes: DDD). Texts included. Recorded 1986

These idiomatic Elgar performances from Richard Hickox well merit their mid-price resuscitation within EMI's British Composers series. Hickox's admirable London Symphony Chorus impresses in matters of intonation and diction. Felicity Palmer sings commandingly, though her contribution in The Music Makers doesn't always generate the tear-laden intensity the part requires. However, Hickox doesn't quite match Sir Andrew Davis's Teldec account – he evinces a personal identification with Elgar's inspiration that is rather special. In the Sea Pictures, however, Hickox and Palmer form an intelligent, distinctive partnership, less endearing, perhaps, than many would like in 'In Haven' and 'Where corals lie', yet tough and dramatic in 'Sabbath morning at sea' and 'The swimmer'. It is a thrusting, unsentimental view which is most refreshing. The orchestral playing is excellent.

The Dream of Gerontius

The Dream of Gerontius, Op 38
Janet Baker mez Richard Lewis ten Kim Borg bass
Hallé Choir; Sheffield Philharmonic Chorus; Ambrosian Singers; Hallé Orchestra, London Symphony Orchestra / Sir John Barbirolli
EMI British Composers ② 573579-2 (122 minutes: ADD). Texts included Ⓜ
Recorded 1964-65 ●●

This Gerontius very much belongs to the Angel of Janet Baker and the conducting of Barbirolli here giving another example of that instinctive rapport which filled the few precious recordings they made together. Barbirolli penetrated to the core of the work's spirituality. In showing his affection for it, he was liable to embark on slow tempos and unmarked ritardandos. Whether one accepts these or finds them self-indulgent rather depends on one's mood. The Prelude at once announces the intensity of feeling Barbirolli brings to the whole work. He is superb with his choir. Though it may not be as impressive a body as that on some other sets, it sings with perhaps the greatest character and conviction of all. Thank goodness it's given a forward recording. The Hallé is a superb instrument in Barbirolli's hands and Janet Baker is superb. We hear all the tenderness and eloquence one expects from an Angel, and a radiance balanced by other-worldliness. Her skill with the text is unrivalled. The farewell is the very epitome of serene consolation. Richard Lewis declaims 'Take me away' with the proper terror and utters a quite beautiful 'Novissima hora est' but elsewhere is less communicative and shows less spontaneity than for Sargent 10 years earlier. If Kim Borg's Priest and Angel of the Agony are an acquired taste because of his peculiar accenting of the English language it's one worth acquiring. He has all the authority for the first role, the supple expression for the second. Many, many years ago this set found its way into many people's hearts, as it deserves, and they will be delighted to have it so arrestingly refurbished. Like so many other accounts of this piece, it is its own justification because everyone concerned was obviously inspired by the glorious music to give of his and her very best.

The Dream of Gerontius[a]. Cello Concerto[b] Ⓗ
Gladys Ripley contr Heddle Nash ten Dennis Noble bar Norman Walker bass Paul Tortelier vc
Huddersfield Choral Society; [b]BBC Symphony Orchestra; [a]Liverpool Philharmonic Orchestra / Sir Malcolm Sargent
Testament mono ② SBT2025 (120 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Text included. Recorded 1945-53 ●

This pioneering set of Gerontius has come up newly minted in these superbly engineered transfers taken from 78rpm masters. That only enhances the incandescence and fervour of the reading itself, in virtually all respects the most convincing the work has received. Sargent's conducting, influenced by Elgar's, is direct, vital and urgently crafted with an inborn feeling for the work's ebb and flow and an overall picture that comprehends the piece's spiritual meaning while realizing its dramatic leanness and force. Heddle Nash's Gerontius is unrivalled in its conviction and inwardness. He'd been singing the part since 1930 and by 1945 the work was in Nash's being; he sang it from memory and had mastered every facet. 'Take me away' is like a searing cry of pain from the depth of the singer's soul. Gladys Ripley is a natural and communicative Angel throughout, her flexible and appealing tone always a pleasure to hear. The Liverpool Philharmonic lives up to its reputation at the time as the country's leading orchestra (in particular the sonorous string section) and the members of the Huddersfield Choral Society sing as if their lives depended on it.

Tortelier's Cello Concerto presents the Classical approach as compared with the Romantic one of du Pré, and is the best of Tortelier's readings of the work on disc, with his tone and phrasing at their firmest and most telling. A considered and unaffected reading among the best ever committed to disc.

Elgar The Dream of Gerontius Parry Ode at a Solemn Music, 'Blest Pair of Sirens'. I was glad Felicity Palmer sop Arthur Davies ten
Gwynne Howell bass
London Symphony Orchestra and Chorus / Richard Hickox
Chandos CHAN8641/2 (114 minutes : DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1988

Of one of Hickox's London readings of Gerontius David Cairns wrote in The Sunday Times: 'It was one of those rare moments when a great work rises, at the outset, to the highest level of emotional intensity and remains there.' Well, much of that sense of dedication to Elgar's masterpiece, with its sense of coming, as Cairns in the same notice put it, 'from deep and ancient wells of experience', is conveyed on this set.

Throughout Hickox gives us a peculiarly immediate and urgent interpretation – not dissimilar from Rattle's on EMI – that has us thinking more than ever that this is an opera in everything but name or at least a dramatic cantata, not an oratorio. His speeds tend to be quick but only once, in 'Sanctus fortis', does the tempo feel hurried. Being a choral trainer of many years' standing, he naturally enough persuades them to sing with an impressive unanimity of purpose and with perhaps a wider range of dynamics than any other conductor. Perhaps an element of dignity and grandeur such as you find in Boult's and Barbirolli's EMI readings, both appreciably more measured, is missing, but little else. The sound of the chorus and excellent orchestra surpasses that on the Rattle version, Watford Town Hall proving as ever a good venue for the recording of large forces.

Arthur Davies has a stronger, more secure voice than any other tenor who has recorded Gerontius and, unlike several of them, he is in his prime as a singer. 'Mary, pray for me' and 'Novissima hora est' are sung with the appropriate sweet sadness, the duet with the Angel tenderly, and of course he has no difficulty entering with terrified power at 'Take me away'. He doesn't have the individuality of utterance or special affinity with the text, as for instance at 'How still it is!' that you get with Heddle Nash (for Sargent – reviewed above) and Sir Peter Pears (Britten) or even quite the agony of the soul projected by Mitchinson for Rattle, but it is an appreciable performance, firmly projected.

Felicity Palmer's Angel is less successful. The intentions are right, the understanding is there, but the means to carry them forward are faulty: her singing, once she puts pressure on the tone, is to say the least uncomfortable to hear. Gwynne Howell is just about the best Priest and Angel of the Agony in any version. His warm, firm bass-baritone easily encompasses the different tessituras of the two 'parts'.

This is a fine modern version, better than the Rattle for all its élan, and with the bonus of the Parry works. But probably the greatest conducting in this work comes from Sargent, Barbirolli and Britten.

The Spirit of England

The Spirit of England, Op 80. Give unto the Lord, Op 74. O hearken thou, Op 64. The Snow, Op 26 No 1. Land of Hope and Glory (arr Fagge)
Dame Felicity Lott sop London Symphony Chorus; Northern Sinfonia / Richard Hickox
EMI British Composers 565586-2 Ⓜ
(52 minutes: DDD). Texts included. Recorded 1987

Hickox adopts a purposeful approach to the great wartime cantata, The Spirit of England. Many collectors got to know this compassionate and moving score through Sir Alexander Gibson's extremely fine 1976 recording (originally made for RCA, now reissued at mid-price on Chandos). Gibson's spacious and eloquent interpretation enshrined one of his very finest achievements in the studio, and possibly this EMI rival doesn't match it in sheer depth of feeling. That said, Hickox draws magnificent singing from the London Symphony Chorus, and his mobile reading compensates with a fervour to which many will positively respond. The fillers are all worth having, especially the sublime coronation Offertory from 1911, O hearken thou. The production lacks nothing in transparency and amplitude, though in The Spirit of England one craves a more expansive acoustic.

'Elgar's Interpreters on Record'

Crown of India – March of the Mogul Emperors[a]. 🄷
The Dream of Gerontius[b] – My work is done[bc] (2 recordings); It is because then thou didst fear[c]; I see not those false spirits[b]; We now have passed the gate[b]; Softly and gently[b]. The Saga of King Olaf, Op 30 – And King Olaf heard the cry![d]. The Apostles, Op 49 – By the Wayside[e]. Caractacus, Op 35[f] – Leap, leap to light; O my warriors. O hearken thou, Op 64[g]. The Starlight Express[h] – O children, open your arms to me; There is a fairy hides in the beautiful eyes; I'm everywhere; My Old Tunes; Dustman, Laugher's Song. Songs (arr. Haydn Wood)[i] – Like to the damask rose; Queen Mary's song; Shepherd's Song, Op 16 No 1; Rondel, Op 16 No 3. The shower, Op 71 No 1[j]
[e]Dora Labbette, [h]Alice Moxon sops [b]Dame Clara Butt, [c]Kathleen Ferrier contrs [b]Maurice d'Oisly, [d]Tudor Davies, [e]Hubert Eisdell tens [e]Dennis Noble, [e]Harold Williams, [h]Stuart Robertson bars [f]Peter Dawson bass-bar [e]Robert Easton bass [c]Gerald Moore pf [a]Black Diamonds Band; [b]New Queen's Hall Orchestra / Sir Henry Wood; [d]Symphony Orchestra / Sir Eugene Goossens; [e]Hallé Orchestra / Sir Hamilton Harty; [f]orchestra / Sir John Barbirolli; [g]St George's Chapel Choir, Windsor / Sir Walford Davies; [i]Light Symphony Orchestra / Haydn Wood; [j]Glasgow Orpheus Choir / Sir Hugh Roberton
Dutton Laboratories Elgar Society mono
CDAX8019 (76 minutes: ADD) Ⓑ
Recorded 1912-48

This wonderful collection of recordings, made for the most part in Elgar's own lifetime, has not only authenticity of period; for those born into that time it is something to be played and savoured where no absurdity of unmeasured response will be wondered at, or, ever so kindly, derided. The voices of the soloists, for instance. A snigger at Dame Clara Butt's Angel in The Dream of Gerontius would incite thoughts of murder. Those five who sing the Beatitudes and commentary in The Apostles, they too are so wonderfully of their period, and fine singers too. Tudor Davies, fiery as a Welsh Martinelli in his declamation of Olaf's saga, or Peter Dawson, exponent of 'singing that was singing' in Caractacus: these also are part of the sacred book. Kathleen Ferrier's test recording is movingly lovely to hear again, as is the Glasgow Orpheus Choir. In fact, not forgetting some of the less likely contents, this is an anthological treasure. Wondrously clean transfers have been mastered by Dutton. Just hear that first track, the Crown of India March, and make a guess at the date. Everything is for congratulations here, including John Knowles's fine booklet-notes.

George Enescu   Romanian 1881-1955

GROVE Enescu studied at the Vienna Conservatory (1888-94) and at the Paris Conservatoire (1895-9). Paris remained the centre of his professional life, though he spent much time in Romania as a teacher and conductor. He is regarded as the greatest and most versatile Romanian musician and was widely admired as a violinist. Apart from the two Lisztian Rhapsodies roumains for orchestra (1901) his music has been neglected, perhaps partly because of the complexity and diversity of his stylistic allegiances: Romanian folk music is a recurrent influence, but so too are Wagner and Reger and early Schoenberg. His output includes the opera Oedipe (1936), five symphonies (1905, 1914, 1921, 1934, 1941) and much chamber music.

Poème roumain

Poème roumain, Op 1. Vox maris, Op 31[a] 💰
Vox de la nature, Op posth
[a]Florin Diaconescu ten George Enescu Bucharest Philharmonic [a]Choir and Orchestra / Cristian Mandeal
Arte Nova Classics 74321 65425-2 Ⓢ
(62 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1997

If all you know of Enescu are his First Romanian Rhapsody and Third Violin Sonata, then the 26-minute symphonic poem Vox maris – which preoccupied its composer for some 20 years – will likely come as a profound shock. Even Scriabin would have drowned in these waters with their pungent harmonic cross-currents, exotic colours and densely crowded textures. Enescu's orchestra is huge, involving quadruple woodwinds, six horns, percussion (five players), two harps, piano and off-stage chorus. The opening recalls the Romanticised antiquity of Pfitzner's Palestrina, but the overwhelming impression is of vast, tonal tidal waves that ultimately defeat the sailor of the story (a death at sea) and draw cries of 'Miserere, Domine' from the soprano.

Enescu's expansive Romanian Poem is an outrageously precocious essay for a teenager, redolent of Saint-Saëns in its slow first section and with elements of Romanian dance in the second. Viewed purely as music, one thinks of Liszt (primarily) and that upcoming First Romanian Rhapsody. Of the available versions this release packs the weightiest wallop and is certainly the best recorded. Voix de la nature emerges as a close-knit tapestry of sound that has an air of ancient legend about it.

The interpretation is convincing (though the playing isn't front-rank), the sound excellent and the musical journey well worth making. At a fiver, you won't find a cheaper ticket to a more interesting destination.

String Quartets, Op 22

String Quartets, Op 22 – No 1 in E flat; No 2 in G
Ad Libitum Quartet (Adrian Berescu, Serban Mereuta vns Bogdan Bisoc va Filip Papa vc) 💰
Naxos 8 554721 (74 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1999 ●

Enescu's 1920 First Quartet crams so much into 45-odd minutes that even two or three hearings barely scratch its surface. It's a veritable forest of invention, fairly Brahmsian in texture, organic in its thinking and frequently dramatic. The second movement incorporates sundry embellishments and effects (including the use of sul ponticello), and the finale features variations on a march-like theme. It will make wonderful if challenging listening for anyone who values quality ideas above economical structuring.

Although the two quartets share the single opus number (22), they're years apart chronologically, aeons if you consider their contrasting styles. The Second Quartet was Enescu's penultimate work and breathes the heady aroma of Romanian folk music, especially in the slow movement and finale, which recall the world of the far better-known Third Violin Sonata. Shorter than the First Quartet by almost half, the Second feels tighter and more agile.

The Ad Libitum Quartet do a fabulous job. They attend to Enescu's endless technical demands with a devotion that translates to apparent effortlessness. That in itself is a real achievement, and their generally soft-spoken, conversational mode of playing is in marked contrast to the tougher-grained Voces Quartet on Olympia, another good group, but hardly flattered by a hard analogue recording.

In sum, Naxos's superior production is a secure top recommendation and unbeatable value too. You simply have to try it.

Violin Sonatas

Violin Sonatas[a] – No 2 in F minor, Op 6; No 3 in A minor, 'dans le caractère populaire roumain', Op 25. Caprice roumain[b]. Impressions d'enfance, Op 28[a]
Sherban Lupu vn [a]Valentin Gheorghiu pf [b]George Enescu Philharmonic Orchestra / Cristian Mandeal
Electrecord ② EDC324/5 (93 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Listening to Sherban Lupu is like confronting a composite violinistic genius made up of Enescu himself (elegance, tonal allure, recreative flare), Dinicu (fire, seduction) and Isaac Stern (intellectual fibre, toughness of attack). Lupu's timing is immaculate. Try the opening of Impressions d'enfance, or the many instances in the Third Sonata where Enescu leaps to his feet, kicks sadness aside and starts to dance. Lupu's quietly sighing bow is like the breathy frame favoured by certain jazz saxophonists, and his mastery of gypsy-style devices is quite unique.

Pianist-composer Valentin Gheorghiu proves himself an ideal collaborator. His subtle negotiation of colour, dynamics and rhythm mirror Lupu's controlled rhapsodising to perfection.

The relatively early Second Sonata recalls César Franck, picking up folk-like speed only towards the end of the piece, where it makes an unexpected move in the direction of its successor. Again, the performance is superb: ardent, well judged and imaginative.

Cristian Mandeal and his Bucharest players cope well with the lavish demands that Enescu and Taranu make on them, and Lupu's handling of the solo part has all the temperament and colour that inform his performances of the chamber works. Good sound.

Einar Englund

Finnish 1916-1999

GROVE Englund studied with Palmgren and Carlsson at the Helsinki Academy (1933-41), with Copland at Tanglewood, and in Russia, where he was impressed by Prokofiev and Shostakovich. His works include five symphonies (1946-77), concertos and piano pieces.

Symphonies

Symphonies – No 2, 'Blackbird'; No 4, 'Nostalgic'. Piano Concerto No 1[a]
[a]Niklas Sivelöv pf Turku Philharmonic Orchestra / Jorma Panula
Naxos 8 553758 (76 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1996 ●

The late Einar Englund is the finest Finnish symphonist between Sibelius and Kokkonen, and the Blackbird Symphony is one of his best. One can hear why he so named it from the woodwind writing, particularly the solos for flute, although he grew wary of emphasising the title in later life. One of the most attractive features of all his music is its orchestration. Panula's account is superbly played, with excellent sound. The Fourth (1976), written in memory of Shostakovich, is less epic, though no less inventive. A chamber symphony for strings and percussion, its most effective movement is the sparkling but macabre Scherzo, 'Tempus fugit', haunted by the chiming of bells and the manic ticking of some outlandish clock. Here, as well as in the darkly poetic third span, 'Nostalgia', and concluding 'Epilogue', Panula finds great poetry. Naxos's centrepiece, though, is the first of Englund's two piano concertos. Englund's own recording disappeared from the catalogue long ago, but Niklas Sivelöv proves a fine advocate.

Symphonies – No 4, 'Dedicated to the Memory of a Great Artist'; No 5, 'To the Memory of JK Paasikivi'. The Great Wall of China
Tampere Philharmonic Orchestra / Eri Klas
Ondine ODE961-2 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

The first cycle of Englund's seven symphonies is finally completed here with the Fourth and Fifth and an exuberantly parodistic theatre suite. Paavo Pohjola set the pace in the Fourth Symphony (1976) in the 1980s (Finlandia – nla); not until 1993 did a second appear, from Geza Szilvay's fine youth orchestra.

The Fifth Symphony (1977) was recorded on LP by Jukka-Pekka Saraste; Englund once said this was too fast, so he would probably have approved of Klas's better-judged version. Although titled Sinfonia Fennica ('Finnish' Symphony), the composer claimed it contained more of his wartime experiences than his famous War Symphony (No 1, 1946). In a bold, riveting single span, its full orchestration pairs very effectively with the strings-and-percussion of No 4.

The suite from the incidental music to Max Frisch's The Great Wall of China (1949) is great fun. 'The Green Table Tango' and 'Rumba' reveal what an adept light/jazz composer he also was (under the pseudonym, Marcus Eje).

The Tampere band are really put through their paces here and come through very well. If Panula's Naxos disc is still perhaps the best introduction to Englund's music, this disc should certainly be the next stop.

Manuel de Falla

Spanish 1876-1946

GROVE Falla studied in Cádiz. and from the late 1890s in Madrid, where he was a pupil of Tragó for the piano and Pedrell for composition. In 1901-3 he composed five zarzuelas in the hope of making money; then in 1905 came his first important work, the one-act opera La vida breve, which he revised before its first performance, in Paris in 1913. He had moved to Paris in 1907 and become acquainted with Dukas, Debussy, Ravel, Stravinsky and Albéniz, all of whom influenced his development of a style using the primitive song of Andalusia, the cante jondo, and a modern richness of harmony and colour. This was not an immediate achievement: he wrote little before returning to Madrid in 1914, but then came the piano concerto Noches en los jardines de España (1915) and the ballets El amor brujo (1915) and El sombrero de tres picos (1919), the latter presented by Dyagilev and designed by Picasso.

Like Stravinsky a few years before, he turned to a much sparer style and to the format of touring theatre in El retablo de maese Pedro (1923). He also began to concern himself with the medieval, Renaissance and Baroque musical traditions of Spain, reflected in his Concerto for harpsichord and quintet (1926). Most of the rest of his life he devoted to a vast oratorio, Atlántida, on which he worked in Granada (where he had settled in 1919) and after 1939 in Argentina. With Albéniz and Granados he was one of the first Spanish composers to win international renown and the most gifted of the three.

Harpsichord Concerto

Harpsichord Concerto. El sombrero de tres picos
Maria Lluisa Muntada sop Tony Millan hpd Jaime Martin fl Manuel Angulo ob Joan-Enric Lluna cl Santiago Juan vn Jorge Pozas vc Spanish National Youth Orchestra / Edmon Colomer
Astrée Naïve V4642 (56 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1989

Falla's El sombrero de tres picos ('The three-cornered hat') started life as a 'mimed farce', but Diaghilev then persuaded the composer to revise and enlarge it as a one-act ballet for his company which had its première in London in 1919. Besides the orchestra, it features a soprano solo warning wives to resist temptation and cries of 'Olé' from men's voices representing a bull-ring crowd. Much of the score consists of dances such as the fandango and seguidilla, while the finale is a jota. This performance by Maria Lluisa Muntada and the Spanish National Youth Orchestra, playing under the direction of its founder Edmon Colomer, brings to us all the vivid colours, intense melodies and vigorous rhythms that together evoke that southernmost province of Spain which is Andalusia. These artists clearly love and understand this music and they bring tremendous gusto to the famous 'Miller's Dance' (the longest single number) with its chunky chords getting louder and faster. The Harpsichord Concerto shows us another side of Falla and was among the first 20th-century compositions for the instrument. It is less obviously Spanish in style and instead more neoclassical – indeed, Stravinsky was probably the chief model – although we may detect an Iberian element in its directness and even toughness. With just five instruments playing alongside the soloist, it is really a chamber work, but the writing is so powerful that the composer's title is doubtless justified. Here, too, the playing is fine and the recording of both these works is full-blooded and atmospheric.

Noches en los jardines de España

Falla El amor brujo – ballet (complete)[a]. Noches en los jardines de España[b] Rodrigo Concierto de Aranjuez[c]
[a]Huguette Tourangeau mez [c]Carlos Bonnell gtr [b]Alicia de Larrocha pf [ac]Montreal Symphony Orchestra / Charles Dutoit; [b]London Philharmonic Orchestra / Rafael Frühbeck de Burgos
Decca Ovation 430 703-2DM (71 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1980-83 ●

Decca's hugely enjoyable disc of Spanish music includes Rodrigo's most famous work, the Concierto de Aranjuez which has never lost its popularity since its Barcelona première in 1940. Here Carlos Bonnell imparts a wistful, intimate feeling to the work, aided by a thoughtful accompaniment from Charles Dutoit's stylish Montreal Orchestra. The famous string tune in the Adagio enjoys a fulsome rendition. Dutoit's beautifully played interpretation of El amor brujo captures the wide range of emotions that this fiery, mysterious piece requires and his performance of the famous 'Ritual Fire Dance' must be among the best in the catalogue. A cooler mood is captured in Nights in the gardens of Spain with Alicia de Larrocha as the distinguished soloist. Her smooth, effortless playing matches the mood of the piece exactly and de Burgos's accompaniment with the London Philharmonic is equally sympathetic, with ripe tone colour and careful dynamics. Those unfamiliar with these great Spanish works will be hard pressed to find a better introduction than this superbly recorded disc.

Albéniz (orch Halffter). Rapsodia española, Op 70 Falla Noches en los jardines de España Turina Rapsodia sinfónica, Op 66
Alicia de Larrocha pf London Philharmonic Orchestra / Rafael Frühbeck de Burgos
Decca 410 289-2DH (52 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1983

The three magically beautiful nocturnes which make up Falla's Nights in the gardens of Spain express the feelings and emotions evoked by contrasted surroundings, while Albéniz's enjoyably colourful Rapsodia española is a loosely assembled sequence of Spanish dances such as the jota and the malagueña. Like Falla's Nights the work was conceived as a piano solo, but this disc contains a version with orchestra arranged by Cristóbal Halffter. The disc is completed by Turina's short, two-part work for piano and strings. All three pieces are excellently performed, but it is the Falla work which brings out the quality of Larrocha's artistry; her ability to evoke the colour of the Spanish atmosphere is remarkable. Frühbeck de Burgos supports her magnificently and persuades the LPO to produce some very Latin-sounding playing. The recording is suitably atmospheric.

Noches en los jardines de España[a]
El sombrero de tres picos[b]
[b]Jennifer Larmore mez Chicago Symphony [b]Chorus and Orchestra / [a]Plácido Domingo, [b]Daniel Barenboim [a]pf
Teldec 0630-17145-2 (63 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Text and translation included. Recorded live 1997

Barenboim and Domingo make a wonderfully understanding partnership, wafting the great Chicago orchestra into the Spanish night with its balmy warmth, and glittering background of flamenco dance rhythms. The rustling opening of the evocation of the 'Generalife' is beautifully managed by Domingo, and Barenboim's crystal-clear entry somehow suggests the water flowing in those astonishing centuries-old Moorish fountains. The orchestral detail is full of subtle colouring, and the ebb and flow of tempo and tension seem totally spontaneous. The central 'Danza lejana' glimmers and glitters and leads into the final sequence with sparkling pianistic dash and a most volatile response from the Chicago players. The languorous closing pages create a richly sensuous sunset-like apotheosis, Domingo's expansive rallentando boldly underlined by the piano.

Daniel Barenboim conducts The Three Cornered Hat which opens with a fierce, brash briskness from trumpet and timpani, and Jennifer Larmore is a vibrant if not especially individual soloist. Again this superb orchestra revels in the vivid colouring and flashing rhythms, and no less so in the gentler moments. The live recording is full-blooded, yet has plenty of transparency. Strongly recommended.

El sombrero de tres picos

El sombrero de tres picos[b]. El amor brujo[a] Ⓗ
La vida breve – Interlude and Dance
[b]Teresa Berganza sop [a]Marina de Gabarain mezzo

Suisse Romande Orchestra / Ernest Ansermet
Decca Legends 466 991-2DM (69 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded [a]1955 and 1961 ●●●

Ansermet's vintage 1961 recording of El sombrero de tres picos with the Suisse Romande Orchestra is an electrifyingly great performance and the sound remains in the top demonstration class – four decades after it was made!

Ansermet's opening with hard-sticked timpani, extrovert trumpeting and fervently spirited 'Olés' creates an altogether different sound world of dramatic primary colours and rhythmic pungency. He has the advantage of the characterful Teresa Berganza as his soloist, and the ballet swings along spontaneously, with infectious zest, the Swiss orchestra on its toes and clearly enjoying every minute. Every detail of Falla's superb score is sharply and richly focused, the colours lighting up radiantly. The finale just grabs the listener, and carrries the music along with thrilling impetus to make a thrillingly expansive climax. This is a truly marvellous performance, and the spectacular Victoria Hall recording could hardly be better had it been made yesterday.

Ansermet's El amor brujo is very early stereo (1955) and not as opulent as El sombrero, but it still sounds remarkably lustrous. The performance is not quite as distinctive as its companion, but is still brightly etched, 'El círculo mágico' being quite bewitching; and the strings as well as the horns bring splendid bite to the 'Fire Dance'. The finale does expose the weakness of the Suisse Romande Orchestra in the middle strings, but it's none the less passionately played. A reissue worthy of its legendary status.

La vida breve

La vida breve[a]. Canciones populares españolas[b]. El sombrero de tres picos[c]. El amor brujo[d] Soneto a Córdoba[e]. Psyché[f]
Victoria de los Angeles sop Salud; [a]Ana Maria Higueras sop Carmela/Street Vendor I & III; [a]Inès Rivadeneyra mez Grandmother, Street Vendor II; [a]Carlo Cossutta ten Paco; [a]Victor de Narké bass Uncle Salvador; [a]Gabriel Moreno bar Singer; [a]Luis Villarejo bar Manuel; [a]José Maria Higuero ten Voice in smithy/Voice in distance; [a]Juan de Andia ten Voice of a hawker [b]Gonzaleo Soriano pf [ef]Annie Challan hp [f]Jean-Claude Gérard fl [f]French String Trio (Gérard Jarry vn Serge Collot va Michel Tournus vc) [a]Orfeón Donostiarra; [a]Spanish National Orchestra / Rafael Frühbeck de Burgos; Philharmonia Orchestra / [c]Raphael Frühbeck de Burgos; [d]Carlo Maria Giulini
EMI Great Recordings of the Century ②
567587-2 (150 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1962-71 ●●

It was a broadcast of La vida breve that began Victoria de los Angeles' international career, and although her 1952 recording is worth treasuring for its pitifully vulnerable portrayal of youthful heartbreak, this successor is in every other way preferable. Her portrayal has deepened, the supporting cast has no weak links, the recording is spacious and brilliant; above all, in Frühbeck de Burgos it has a conductor in perfect sympathy with Falla's maturing, mordantly original genius. He shows this even more in El sombrero, with its vivid detail and pungent timbres. Even Giulini is slightly cast into the shade: his El amor brujo is powerful but not quite idiomatic by Frühbeck's standards. But here also we have several treasurable passages of los Angeles's dark, gypsyish mezzo register. In the Canciones populares and the other songs close recording brightens her tone, but how fearlessly she launches the proud phrases of the Soneto a Córdoba! And the Canciones populares, perhaps too often projected with peasant vehemence, are here sung as by one of Goya's majas. For its indication of her vocal and expressive range and Frühbeck's stature this is an indispensable reissue.

Gabriel Fauré

French 1845-1924

GROVE Fauré was trained at the Ecole Niedermeyer (1854-65) as organist and choirmaster, coming under the influence of Saint-Saëns and his circle while working as a church musician (at Rennes, 1866-70; St Sulpice, 1871-3; the Madeleine, from 1874) and giving lessons. Though he met Liszt and was fascinated by Wagner, he sought a distinctive style in his piano pieces and numerous songs, which had to be composed during summer holidays. Recognition came slowly owing to the modernity of his music. In 1892 he became national inspector of the provincial conservatories, and in 1896 chief organist at the Madeleine and composition teacher at the Conservatoire, where his pupils included Ravel, Koechlin, Roger-Ducasse, Enescu and Nadia Boulanger; from 1905 to 1920 he was the Conservatoire's resolute and influential director, becoming celebrated for the vocal and chamber master-pieces he produced until his death.

Fauré's stylistic development can be traced from the sprightly or melancholy song settings of his youth to the bold, forceful late instrumental works, traits including a delicate combination of expanded tonality and modality, rapid modulations to remote keys and continuously unfolding melody. Widely regarded as the greatest master of French song, he produced six important cycles (notably the novel La bonne chanson op.61) and three collections each of 20 pieces (1879, 1897, 1908). In chamber music he enriched all the genres he attempted, while his works for piano (chiefly nocturnes, barcarolles and impromptus) embody the full scope of his stylistic evolution. Among his few large-scale works, the popular and delicately written Requiem op.48 and the 'song opera' Pénélope (1913) are noteworthy.

Ballade, Op 19

Fauré Ballade, Op 19 Franck Symphonic Variations, Op 46 d'Indy Symphonie sur un chant montagnard français in G, Op 25

François-Joël Thiollier pf National Symphony Orchestra of Ireland / Antonio de Almeida
Naxos 8 550754 (55 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1993

The renamed RTE Symphony Orchestra, a match for its more recorded counterpart in Ulster, taped this programme in their Dublin concert hall (acoustically clean, bright and airy, but warm, if this disc's sound is representative). François-Joël Thiollier's playing is individual, often impulsive but always idiomatic, helped by the sensitive, guiding hand of a conductor well acquainted with the music. A more high-profile production would probably have retaken those passages where piano and orchestra co-ordination is occasionally fractionally awry, such as in the last variation of the Franck, but it might also have seemed less spontaneous. Thiollier's rubato is always distinctive and attractive; the style, particularly and crucially in the Fauré, properly fluid. Both the piano and the orchestra's woodwind are discreetly prominent, but internal balances are generally excellent.

Fauré Ballade, Op 19[a] Leigh Concertino for Piano and Strings[b] Mozart Piano Concertos – No 15 in B flat, K450[c]; No 24 in C minor, K491[d]
Kathleen Long pf [ac]National Symphony Orchestra; [b]Boyd Neel String Orchestra / Boyd Neel; [d]Concertgebouw Orch / Eduard van Beinum
Dutton Laboratories CDBP9714 (75 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1940s Ⓢ ●●

A richly experienced chamber musician, Kathleen Long (1896-1968) was partnered and praised by Casals, played Ravel's 'Ondine' to the composer and gave over 60 National Gallery concerts during the Second World War.

Though her playing may initially seem too restrained, you find yourself wondering why you have never enjoyed music so much or been made so aware, however unobtrusively, of its innermost spirit. It is in Fauré's Ballade that Long makes her finest impression. Indeed it is difficult to imagine this magical work played more serenely or inwardly. Even French critics – wary of foreign interpreters – marvelled over this recording. Her affection is evident in every caressing bar and makes for a perfect conclusion to a delectable disc.

Long was a born aristocrat of the keyboard and you will look in vain for any overt or disfiguring drama in her lucid and stylish performance of Mozart's C minor Concerto. The recordings have come up well and the inclusion in the booklet of a 1950 Gramophone interview dating is an illuminating bonus.

Orchestral Works

Pelléas et Mélisande, Op 80 (with Chanson de Mélisande – orch Koechlin). Three Songs, Op 7 – Après un rêve (arr vc/orch Dubenskij). Pavane, Op 50. Elégie, Op 24. Dolly Suite, Op 56 (orch Rabaud)
Lorraine Hunt sop Jules Eskin vc Tanglewood Festival Chorus; Boston Symphony Orchestra / Seiji Ozawa
DG 423 089-2GH (56 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1986

Fauré's music for Maeterlinck's play Pelléas et Mélisande was commissioned by Mrs Patrick Campbell and to the usual four-movement suite Ozawa has added the 'Chanson de Mélisande', superbly sung here by Lorraine Hunt. Ozawa conducts a sensitive, sympathetic account of the score, and Jules Eskin plays beautifully in both the arrangement of the early song, Après un rêve, and the Elégie, which survived from an abandoned cello sonata. The grave Pavane is performed here in the choral version of 1901. Dolly began life as a piano duet, but was later orchestrated by the composer and conductor Henri Rabaud. Ozawa provides us with a pleasing account of this delightful score and the recording is excellent.

Masques et bergamasques, Op 112. Ballade, Op 19. Pavane, Op 50. Fantaisie, Op 79. Pénélope – Overture. Elégie, Op 24. Dolly Suite (orch Rabaud)
Richard Davis fl Peter Dixon vc Kathryn Stott pf BBC Philharmonic Orchestra / Yan Pascal Tortelier
Chandos CHAN9416 (72 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995

Masques et bergamasques, which takes its title from Verlaine's sad, mysterious poem Clair de lune, is a late stage work that the composer himself described as melancholy and nostalgic, but it is hardly romantic, being instead pointedly neoclassical in character and shape, recalling Bizet's youthful C major Symphony and Grieg's Holberg Suite. The playing here under Yan Pascal Tortelier is very satisfying, as are the elegant flute solos of the exquisitely delicate Pavane, performed here without the optional chorus, and in Dolly. The rarely heard Overture to the opera Pénélope is also effectively presented here.

The biggest concertante work here, the Ballade of 1881, is Fauré's orchestration of his piano piece of the same name; it is gentle music that persuades and cajoles in a very Gallic way. Though not an overtly virtuoso utterance, it makes its own exacting technical demands on the soloist, among them being complete control of touch and pedalling. The highly-regarded Fauréan Kathryn Stott meets these with consistent success.

There's little rhetoric and no bombast in Fauré's art, but how civilized he was, and what sympathetic interpreters serve him here! The recording is warm yet also delicate.

Piano Quintets

Awards 1995

Piano Quintets – No 1 in D minor, Op 89; No 2 in C minor, Op 115
Domus (Krysia Osostowicz vn Timothy Boulton va Richard Lester vc Susan Tomes pf); Anthony Marwood vn
Hyperion CDA66766 (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1994 ●●●

This is not music that yields up its secrets easily. Indeed, despite pages pulsing with all of Fauré's sustained radiance and energy the abiding impression is of music of such profound introspection that the listener often feels like an interloper stumbling into an essentially private conversation. But perseverance reaps the richest rewards, and moments like the opening of the D minor Quintet where Fauré achieves what is referred to in the insert-notes as a 'rapt weightlessness', or the closing pages of the C minor Quintet's Andante moderato send out resonances that finally embrace the entire work. The otherworldly dance commencing the finale of the First Quintet, the wild catch-as-catch-can opening and elfin close of the C minor Quintet's Allegro vivo or the grave serenity of the following Andante moderato; all these are surely at the heart of Fauré's simultaneously conservative and radical genius. Simply as a person Fauré remained conscious of an elusiveness that baffled and tantalized even his closest friends, companions who felt themselves gently but firmly excluded from his complex interior world. Domus fully suggests this enigma yet plays with such ardour and élan that the composer himself would surely have been delighted ('people play me as if the blinds were down'). The recordings are superb.

Additional recommendation
Piano Quintet No 2
Coupling: Violin Sonata No 1. Dolly, Op 56
The Nash Ensemble
CRD CRD3505 (73 minutes: DDD: 9/01) Ⓜ

An excellent selection of Fauré's chamber music, early, middle and late. The Nash give it all impetus and brilliance in a performance that is just as fine as Domus's on Hyperion. It's simply a question of which coupling you prefer.

Piano Quartets

Awards 1986

Piano Quartets – No 1 in C minor, Op 15; No 2 in G minor, Op 45
Domus (Krysia Osostowicz vn Robin Ireland va Timothy Hugh vc Susan Tomes pf)
Hyperion CDA66166 Ⓕ
(62 minutes: DDD) ●●●

The First Piano Quartet reveals Fauré's debt to an earlier generation of composers, particularly Mendelssohn. Yet already it has the refined sensuality, the elegance and the craftsmanship which were always to be hallmarks of his style and it is a thoroughly assured, highly enjoyable work which could come from no other composer's pen. The Second Quartet is a more complex, darker work, but much less ready to yield its secrets. The comparatively agitated, quicksilver Scherzo impresses at once, however, and repeated hearings of the complete work reveal it to possess considerable poetry and stature. Just occasionally one could wish that the members of Domus had a slightly more aristocratic, commanding approach to these scores, but overall the achievement is highly impressive, for their playing is both idiomatic and technically impeccable. The recording is faithful and well balanced.

Works for Cello

Romance in A, Op 69[b]. Elégie, Op 24[b]. Cello Sonatas[b] – No 1 in D minor, Op 109; No 2 in G minor, Op 117. Allegretto moderato[a]. Sérénade, Op 98[b]. Sicilienne, Op 78[b]. Papillon, Op 77[b]. Andante[c]
Steven Isserlis, [a]David Waterman vcs [b]Pascal Devoyon pf [c]Francis Grier org
RCA Victor Red Seal 09026 68049-2 Ⓕ
(62 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1993-94

This, surely, is the most 'complete' of Fauré's complete works for cello yet to appear. Isserlis has unearthed the original version of the Romance, Op 69 (entitled Andante), with a sustained, chordal accompaniment for organ in place of the piano's broken chordal semiquavers, and a gracious flourish from the cello by way of adieu. Mystically accompanied by Francis Grier at the organ of Eton College Chapel, the cello's song, restored to the church, seems to acquire more depth.

But let it be said at once that in the familiar version of this work, as throughout the disc, Pascal Devoyon is a partner in a thousand, keenly aware of Isserlis's respect for the 'discretion, reticence and restraint' once hailed as the hallmarks of Fauré's style. In fact only in the noble Elégie do we discover the full breadth and richness of this cello's (a 1745 Guadagnini) tonal range.

A world war, plus the private trauma of incipient deafness, helps to explain the yawning gulf between the miniatures and the two sonatas of 1918 and 1922. Skipping through the score of the First you notice that only once does Fauré use a dynamic marking above a forte, relying on the word espressivo to elicit just that little extra intensity at moments of climax. This is appreciated by both artists, most movingly in the central Andante. In the first movement, however, it is Devoyon's piquant accentuation that brings home the music's menace. The urgency and Elégie-evoking heart-throb of the G minor work again benefit from the immediacy of keyboard characterisation, and the variety of keyboard colour, underpinning this poetically introspective cellist's fine-spun line.

Additional recommendation
Cello Sonatas
Couplings: Elégie. Debussy Cello Sonata
Tortelier vc Hubeau pf
Warner Elatus 0927-49012-2 (55 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ

Tortelier's tone can express true grandeur (in the Elégie and in the Second Sonata's sombre Andante); in the outer movements of this Sonata his lighter but still intense sound soars aloft to create an atmosphere of elation. Hubeau's beautifully clear, alert playing provides an irresistible momentum.

Violin Sonatas

No 1 in A, Op 13; No 2 in E minor, Op 108

Fauré Violin Sonatas Nos 1 and 2[a]
Franck Violin Sonata in A[b]
Arthur Grumiaux vn [a]Paul Crossley, [b]György Sebok pfs
Philips Musica da Camera 426 384-2PC Ⓜ
(73 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1979 ●●

Those Fauré-lovers who long prayed for a CD reissue of the two sonatas from Grumiaux and Paul Crossley won't be disappointed. The sound itself is pleasing – better, even, than it was on LP. And there is a radiance in the playing suggesting an unerring understanding of structure and style that somehow goes hand in hand with the joyous spontaneity of new discovery. The hyper-sensitive suppleness of Grumiaux's shading and phrasing is a particular delight, as is his awareness that just as much of the musical message comes from the piano – particularly in the Second Sonata. As for Crossley, not for nothing has he come to be recognized as one of this country's most dedicated Fauré specialists. It would certainly be difficult to over-praise the subtlety of the two artists' interplay in both works. Incidentally, their immediacy of response often finds outlet in a slightly faster tempo than most of their rivals, not least in both slow movements, where they rise more urgently to moments of heightened excitement (perhaps even too urgently in the Andante of the Second Sonata). Despite the slightly plummier-sounding reproduction of György Sebok's piano, there is also much pleasure to be found in the open-hearted warmth brought by both artists to the Franck Sonata, where you have the impression that Grumiaux himself might have put aside a silken Strad in favour of a throatier Guarnerius.

Complete Works for Piano

Five Impromptus. Impromptu, Op 86. Thème et Variations in C sharp minor, Op 73. Romances sans paroles, Op 17. Quatre valses-caprices.
13 Barcarolles. Ballade in F sharp, Op 19.
13 Nocturnes. Souvenirs de Bayreuth[a]. Pièces brèves, Op 84. Dolly, Op 56[a]. Nine Préludes, Op 103. Mazurka in B flat, Op 32
Kathryn Stott, [a]Martin Roscoe pfs
Hyperion ④ CDA66911/4 (297 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1994 ●●

Fauré's piano works are among the most subtly daunting in all keyboard literature. Encompassing Fauré's entire creative life, they range through an early, finely wrought eroticism via sporting with an aerial virtuosity as teasing and light as the elements themselves (the Valses-caprices) to the final desolation of his last years. There, in his most powerful works (Barcarolles Nos 7-11, Nocturnes Nos 11-13), he faithfully mirrors a pain that 'scintillates in full consciousness', a romantic agony prompted by increasing deafness and a lack of recognition that often seemed close to oblivion. Few compositions have reflected a darker night of the soul, and Fauré's anguish, expressed in both numbing resignation and unbridled anger, could surely only be exorcised by the articulation of such profound and disturbing emotional complexity. The task for the pianist, then, is immense, but in Kathryn Stott Fauré has a subtle and fearless champion. How thrilled Fauré would have been by the sheer immediacy of Stott's responses. Time and again she throws convention to the winds, and although it would be surprising if all her performances were consistent successes, disappointments are rare. Sometimes her rubato and luxuriant pedalling soften the outlines of Fauré's starkest, most austere utterances. But such quibbles remain quibbles. The Fourth Nocturne is gloriously supple, and the 13 Barcarolles show Stott acutely responsive to passion and finesse alike. The Pièces brèves, too, are played with rare affection. Stott proves herself a stylish and intriguing pianist.

Solo piano works

Awards 2002

13 Barcarolles Ⓗ
Germaine Thyssens-Valentin pf
Testament mono SBT1215
(72 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ

13 Nocturnes Ⓗ
Germaine Thyssens-Valentin pf
Testament mono SBT1262 (80 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ

4 Valses caprices. 6 Impromptus Ⓗ
Pièces brèves, Op 84
Germaine Thyssens-Valentin pf
Testament mono SBT1263 (73 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
All recorded 1956-59. (All three disc won a 2002 Gramophone Award.) ●●●

Germaine Thyssens-Valentin (1902-87) was a great and inspired pianist; occasionally one hears Fauré playing that approaches, or even occasionally equals hers, but none that surpasses it. One could fill this review with a catalogue of her qualities, but her intimacy of expression demands first place. Fauré's music has a confiding quality to it, as though it were a message intended for an audience of one, and Thyssens-Valentin is in perfect accord with this. Those messages, however, especially in the later Nocturnes and Barcarolles, are often of great profundity, and she has both the heart and the technique to convey them.

Why is Thyssens-Valentin not better known? Perhaps being a superlative interpreter of Fauré was not a reliable passport to international fame in the middle years of the 20th century; she also retired from the concert platform for a lengthy period, in order to bring up a family of five children. And she seems to have recorded mainly for the Ducretet-Thomson company, whose decline coincided with the arrival of stereo. The recordings here, by the way, are admirably clean and the remastering is beyond praise. Her sound, first of all, is wonderfully beautiful, a combination of the subtlest colour and great delicacy of touch ensuring that contrapuntal voices are in perfect balance. She is a mistress of the most refined rubato, extreme finesse of articulation and smooth, singing line. Although she excels in quiet delicacy, her strength when required is formidable but even in the strongest fortissimo she never makes an ugly sound. She is, blessedly, aware that Fauré had a sense of humour, and not only in the frank exuberance of the Valses caprices. Nor is she one of those artists that it takes a while to get used to. On each of these discs the first track is immediately characteristic of her. The first Nocturne has immaculate voice-leading and the most light-fingered leggierissimo playing imaginable; the first Barcarolle is wonderfully tender, its second idea poised and liquid; the first Valse caprice has rich fantasy, dazzling brilliance and adorable wit.

The exploration of Fauré's emotional and technical range through the Barcarolles, and especially the Nocturnes, has never seemed so absorbing, the companion on that voyage never so prodigal with insight. Truly, a great pianist.

La naissance de Vénus

L'absent, Op 5 No 3. Après un rêve, Op 7 No 1. Au cimetière, Op 51 No 2. Les berceaux, Op 23 No 1. Cantique de Jean Racine, Op 11. La chanson du pêcheur, Op 4 No 1. Les Djinns, Op 12. Madrigal, Op 35. La naissance de Vénus, Op 29. Pavane, Op 50. Pleurs d'or, Op 72. Puisqu'ici-bas, Op 10 No 1. Le ruisseau, Op 22. Le secret, Op 23 No 3. Sérénade toscane, Op 3 No 2. Tarentelle, Op 10 No 2
Isabelle Eschenbrenner, Brigitte Lafon, Sylvie Pons sops Anna Holroyd contr Adrian Brand, Bruno Ranc tens Jacques Bona bass Bo Yuan db Jean-Claude Pennetier pf Louis Robilliard org Ravel Quartet (Giovanni Battista Fabris, Reiko Kitahama vns Zoltán Tóth va Jean-Michel Fonteneau vc) Solistes de Lyon-Bernard Tétu / Bernard Tétu
EMI 556728-2 (74 minutes: DDD). Texts and translations included. Recorded 1998 Ⓕ

La naissance de Vénus, the 'scène mythologique' that gives this CD its title, was composed by Fauré for an amateur choral society. The piece is in one movement lasting nearly 23 minutes, including parts for soprano, alto, tenor and bass soloists. The opening immediately reminds you of Fauré's piano writing at its finest, a beautiful slow melody that acts as a prelude to the first choral section. In this the scene is set with a glowing dawn which seems to onlookers to herald some divine occurrence. Another piano interlude, in a barcarolle rhythm, precedes the appearance of Venus from the waves. The bass announces that Jupiter himself is there to greet his daughter. It's a surprise to find Jupiter cast as a tenor – perhaps the original group dictated who should be assigned which role. Jupiter's catalogue of all the delights Venus will bestow on the world forms the centre of the cantata.

This is a real discovery and Bernard Tétu and his chorus with Jean-Claude Pennetier at the piano give a reading which suggests all the lost charm of private small-scale choral singing. Bruno Ranc, who is Jupiter, also sings four of Fauré's best-known mélodies in the ensuing recital. There is a freshness and simplicity about this whole CD, juxtaposing choral items with duets and solo numbers. La naissance de Vénus, which has never before been recorded, is a must for Fauré collectors, and others will find this a charming, gentle and haunting disc.

Requiem

Awards 1985

Requiem (original version – ed Rutter). Motets – Ave verum corpus; Tantum ergo; Ave Maria; Maria, Mater gratiae. Cantique de Jean Racine, Op 11 (orch. Rutter). Messe basse
Caroline Ashton, Ruth Holton sops Stephen Varcoe bar Simon Standage vn John Scott org Cambridge Singers; City of London Sinfonia / John Rutter
Collegium COLCD109 (63 minutes: ADD/DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included
Recorded 1984 ●●●

Fauré began his Requiem in 1885, under the impact of the death of his father, but the work did not take on the form in which we now know it until 15 years later. The familiar 1900 score, therefore, cannot really be regarded as 'definitive'; it is a compromise, rather, between Fauré's original conception and what his publisher no doubt saw as the practicalities of concert performance. It is Fauré uncompromised that John Rutter has sought to restore in his edition of the seven-movement 1892 version, and his performance of it, using a chamber orchestra, a small choir and, in the 'Pie Jesu', a soprano who could easily be mistaken for a treble (Fauré's own early performances used a boy soloist) is a most convincing argument for accepting this score as more 'authentic' than the customary 1900 version.

The differences are audibly obvious, and most are no less obviously improvements. The almost omnipresent organ now sounds more like a continuo instrument than (as can easily happen with the 1900 score) an unwelcome thickening of an already dark orchestra. Above all, one is more aware than in any other recording that the sound in Fauré's head when he conceived the work was not that of a conventional orchestra but the rich, dark graininess of divided violas and cellos, the radiant luminosity of the work provided not by violins or woodwind but by the voices. It is thus more unified than the later revision as well as being more intimate. Rutter's chorus is a fine one, immaculate of diction and pure of line; Stephen Varcoe's light and unforced baritone could well be just what Fauré had in mind and Caroline Ashton's absolute purity in her brief solo is most moving. The recording is excellent.

Requiem[a]. Pavane, Op 50
[a]Robert Chilcott treb [a]John Carol Case bar
[a]King's College Choir Cambridge; New Philharmonia Orchestra / Sir David Willcocks
EMI 764715-2 (42 minutes: ADD). Text and translation included. Recorded 1967 Ⓜ ●●

This is the Fauré Requiem to come home to. It is tempting to describe it as a recording as near as can be to absolute perfection from start to finish. The textual dimension of course is new since then, and if an earlier version of the score is wanted, the smaller orchestra being in some ways preferable, then the recording by the Cambridge Singers under the text's editor, John Rutter, might be tried instead. But for what we used to mean by the Fauré Requiem in days when ignorance (of textual complications) was bliss, then this is still the best. Willcocks neither sentimentalizes nor hurries; the choir (especially in respect of its tenors) is on top form; Robert Chilcott sings the Pie Jesu with the most touchingly beautiful purity and control, and John Carol Case brings to his solos a style that exactly matches that of the famous choir. If anything, time has enhanced appreciation, for the recorded sound compares so favourably, giving due prominence to the choir and obtaining an immediacy of sound that these days is exceptional. The only matter for regret is that the Pavane was not performed in its choral version, but as it is such an exquisite composition in either form the regret is short-lived.

Fauré Requiem, Op 48 (1901 version)[a] 🅿
Franck Symphony in D minor
[a]Collegium Vocale; [a]La Chapelle Royale; Champs Elysées Orchestra, Paris / Philippe Herreweghe
Harmonia Mundi HMC90 1771 Ⓕ
(76 minutes: DDD)
Notes, texts and translations included ●

Philippe Herreweghe's earlier recording of the Fauré Requiem (also Harmonia Mundi) used Jean-Michel Nectoux's edition of the original 1891 'chamber' score. Here we have the familiar 1901 version, with its full if curious orchestration, but in other respects this is a more 'authentic' reading than the earlier one. Period instruments are used, gut strings giving the sound a gentle luminescence, and instead of an organ Fauré's permitted alternative, a large harmonium, adds a reedy quality to the wind scoring. A shade more controversially, the work is sung in 'Gallican' Latin – 'Pié Zhesü' instead of 'Pie Yesou', 'Lüx perpétüa', and so on. Together with the other period details it makes the work sound distinctly Gallic: an admirable antidote to the Anglicised or even Anglicanised Fauré presented by the archetypally English cathedral and college choirs that have so often recorded it. Both soloists are excellent, Herreweghe's tempos are a little more alert than before and the recording is splendidly ample.

Alongside gut strings the most conspicuous advantage of a period orchestra in Franck is the beautifully smooth sound of the horns. The overall sound is more transparent than usual, and Franck's reputation for dense over-scoring seems more than ever unjustified. It is a fine and idiomatic performance and hugely enjoyable. A fascinating coupling, strongly recommended.

Robert Fayrfax British 1464-1521

GROVE Fayrfax was a Gentleman of the Chapel Royal by 1497, graduated MusB (1501) and MusD (1504) at Cambridge and was incorporated DMus at Oxford (1511). From 1509 until his death he was senior lay clerk there, and received many payments from Henry VIII for music MSS. 29 compositions by him survive (more than by any other English composer of his generation), including two Magnificats, ten votive antiphons and secular pieces. He is important for his cultivation of the cyclic mass, of which six of his are known, all except one are based on a plainsong cantus firmus in the tenor of the full sections. His music is less elaborate than that of Cornysh and Taverner and uses restrained, carefully wrought melodic lines.

Magnificat, 'O Bone Ihesu'

Magnificat, 'O Bone Ihesu'. Missa, O Bone Ihesu . Salve regina. Most clere of colour. I love, loved and loved wolde I be. Benedicite! What dreamed I? (all ed Skinner)
The Cardinall's Musick / Andrew Carwood
ASV Gaudeamus CDGAU184 (76 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1996 ●

The Cardinall's Musick put the focus here around Fayrfax's Mass O bone Ihesu. Tragically, only a single voice survives of the antiphon that was probably its model, so in that respect their recording cannot be complete, unless David Skinner is prepared to indulge in the massive and quixotic task of reconstruction for this and other fragmentary survivals. But fascinatingly we do have a glorious Magnificat built on the same materials, one of the most widely distributed of all early Tudor works. By far the most commanding performance here is of that Magnificat: wonderfully controlled and perfectly tuned. The group is slightly rougher in the Mass and in the Salve regina – a work that, as David Skinner's useful note points out, stands rather apart from the style we otherwise know from Fayrfax and which may be one of his earliest surviving works. Intriguingly, this is the piece that seems to show the strongest debts to composers from the continental mainland (especially Brumel), giving important insights into the evolution of his music. Similarly, the three songs presented here, in performances that are skilled but slightly wooden, show a remarkable affinity with other mainland music, particularly that of Alexander Agricola. These little three-voice works, with their beautifully evocative texts, can without any doubt be counted among the glories of early Tudor music.

Missa Regali ex Progenie

(Ed Skinner). Antiphona Regali ex Progenie.
Missa Regali ex Progenie. Lauda Vivi Alpha et O.
Magnificat Regali. Alas, for lak of her presens.
That was my woe
The Cardinall's Musick / Andrew Carwood
ASV Gaudeamus CDGAU185 (78 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1997

Fayrfax's Missa Regali ex Progenie and Magnificat Regali are both early works, written before 1504, perhaps to impress his royal patron, and both, particularly the Mass, show signs that the composer had yet to settle into his stride. The longer, wordy movements of the Mass (the Gloria and Credo) seem elusive, as though he were note-spinning rather than weaving the contrapuntal texture, even if the hallmarks of greatness are all there. The Cardinall's Musick, with its by now almost instinctive understanding of his music, gives as convincing a performance as anyone could, or likely will, for some considerable time to come.

The votive antiphon Lauda Vivi Alpha et O, with its coda in praise of Henry VIII, probably dates from the time of or shortly after his coronation in 1509. This extended homage to the Virgin is rich in textural resonances, and a double meaning of 'O rosa gratie redolentissima' ('Most sweetly-scented rose') was surely intended. Here the long-drawn-out vocal lines, shifts in scoring, intellectual transitions of harmony of Fayrfax's mature style are much in evidence and the work's richness is given its full due by The Cardinall's Musick. The contrast between this fully-blown rose of a piece and the closed, but equally perfectly formed rosebud that is the duo 'That was my woe' is striking: it was a long way from ceremonial homage to semi-private entertainment in Tudor London. It is sung with perfection by Robin Blaze and Steven Harrold.

All in all, a definite success story, and credit must go to ASV for having the courage (given the commercial pressures of today's CD market) to see this project through. Projects such as this enrich our lives.

Morton Feldman

American 1926-1987

Feldman studied with Riegger and Wolpe and from 1950 was closely associated with Cage; he also gained much from contact with New York painters. In 1972 he joined the faculty of the State University of New York, Buffalo. His consistent concern was with quiet, pure and open-textured music, sometimes elastically notated (as in the Projection series of 1950-51) but more often fully written out. The Viola in my life series (1970-71) and Rothko Chapel (1971) are the best known of his works. Several later pieces are extremely long, for example the First String Quartet (1979) which lasts c 100 minutes and the Second (1983), intended to last six hours.

Piano and Orchestra

Coptic Light. Cello and Orchestra
Piano and Orchestra
Robert Cohen vc Alan Feinberg pf New World Symphony Orchestra / Michael Tilson Thomas
Argo 448 513-2ZH (74 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995

Tilson Thomas has been quoted as saying he thought Feldman's music was still greatly underestimated given it was so beautiful and important. Piano and Orchestra (1975) is a single contemplative span, a kind of anti-concerto, with just one brief aggressive outburst somewhat anticipated by menacing crescendos to which the piano remains impervious. It is all poetically executed – with luscious orchestral sound too.

Cello and Orchestra (1972) uncannily anticipates Tavener's hit The Protecting Veil with its high sustained writing for the cello. A not entirely dissimilar spiritual atmosphere pervades the work and we are reminded that Feldman himself at this time said that he regarded his music as elegiac, symbolising a state of mourning – for the Holocaust, civilisation or Western culture.

Coptic Light (1986) owes its title to the composer's fascination with the patterning of oriental carpets. Listening to the work, you can imagine this multicoloured source and so this late piece is more static: the patterns barely vary for long stretches. With these scrupulous and well-recorded performances Tilson Thomas helps to ensure that Feldman is no longer underestimated.

Palais de Mari

Feldman Palais de Mari
Wuorinen Piano Sonata No 3. Bagatelle. Capriccio
Alan Feinberg pf
Koch International Classics 37308-2 Ⓕ
(65 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1994

Alan Feinberg is an exemplary type of late 20th-century, usually American, pianist who can swing the best Kitten on the Keys in the business. This very late Feldman piece forms a relentlessly quiet oasis in the midst here of such a welter of hyperactivity. Palais de Mari was commissioned by Bunita Marcus, but it is only a third the length of For Bunita Marcus written in the previous year. Feinberg's performance of Palais has every detail of the score in place and he brings his unique qualities to this mesmerisingly rapt meditation, where events take the form of the occasional dry chord in a liquid landscape.

The Wuorinen works, all from the 1980s, are in the tough New York dialect of the post-Webern school but, with playing like this from Alan Feinberg, and so vividly recorded, they provide some scintillating listening. Whatever the music, Feinberg brings his own kind of commitment and panache to bear – a winning combination. You can imagine his fans wanting to buy anything he records because of this powerful impact. This disc comes strongly recommended to Feldman enthusiasts.

Rothko Chapel

Piano and Orchestra[a]. Durations II[b]. Rothko Chapel[c]
[c]Julie Moffat sop [c]Ulrich Koch va [b]Rohan de Saram vc [a]Roger Woodward, [b]Yvar Mikashoff pfs [c]Klangforum Wien; [a]Saarbrücken Radio Symphony [c]Chorus and Orchestra / [a]Hans Zender, [c]Beat Furrer
Col Legno Collage WWE1CD 20506 Ⓜ
(60 minutes: ADD). Recorded live in [a]1975, [b]1986 and [c]1994 ●●

Routine Investigations. The Viola in my Life – I and II. For Frank O'Hara. I met Heine on the Rue Fürstenberg
Ensemble Recherche
Naïve Montaigne MO782126 (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1991-3 ●●

Recordings of Morton Feldman continue to appear, with both these discs worth attention from newcomers to his unique idiom.

In Durations II, the poise of De Saram's and Mikashoff's account is cancelled out by offstage interference. This 1960 piece typifies the calm abstraction of earlier Feldman: the remaining works date from the first half of the 1970s, when a new emotional ambience, intuition if you will, infuses the compositional process. The first two The Viola in my Life works are masterpieces of discreet characterisation; to which the wordless mezzo in I met Heine on the Rue Fürstenberg adds a wry twist, as if evoking that imagined encounter. Vocalise plays a more complex role in Rothko Chapel, perhaps the masterwork of Feldman's middle phase, its rapt contemplation enhanced by the introduction of a soprano melisma and a pastoral viola melody from the composer's past. The sometimes threatening choral dynamics aptly evoke the brooding introspection of Rothko's canvases. As with late Nono, this is spiritual music without religious connotations.

For Frank O'Hara brings an emphasis on instrumental unisons, and punctuating silences. It could be said that while Cage conceptualised silence, Feldman personalised it. The formal demarcation in Piano and Orchestra is that between sound and silence, the 'soloist' more a pacifier of the orchestra's fleeting gestures of aggression. This is the bleakest of these works, anticipating the Beckett-inspired pieces of Feldman's last years. Routine Investigations is its emotional pendant, the sudden crescendoing tones having an emotive quality rare in his music.

There can be little but praise for Ensemble Recherche's immaculate performances. The Woodward/Zender première of Piano and Orchestra must yield in expressive subtlety to Feinberg and Tilson Thomas, but the Col Legno release is still essential for the well-nigh perfect account of Rothko Chapel. As Kyle Gann aptly comments in the Montaigne notes, '...the amazing quality of his aural balance in these middle works makes them uniquely precious for the Feldman fan.' And one day, one hopes, for many others too.

John Field

Irish 1782-1837

GROVE Field's early musical training came from his father and from Tommaso Giordani in Dublin, after which he was apprenticed to Muzio Clementi in London. He probably studied with Salomon. By 1801 he had established a reputation as a concert pianist and published his first important works, the piano sonatas Op 1. As a result of a successful continental tour with Clementi (1802-3) he remained in St Petersburg, becoming an idol of fashionable society there and in Moscow, teaching, giving concerts and composing until 1823, when illness overwhelmed him; he died in Moscow, having made one return visit to London and to other European cities.

During his lifetime Field was known chiefly for the sensitivity of his playing, especially his expressive touch, singing phrases and extreme delicacy, a striking contrast to the fashion for virtuoso display. This legendary playing style was supported by the publication of his 17 nocturnes, each a self-sufficient piece evoking a dreamy mood of sadness consoled; song-like in manner and texture, they anticipated Chopin's pieces of the same type by nearly 20 years and influenced Liszt and Mendelssohn. Among Field's other, more numerous works, the most important are the rondos and fantaisies for piano, the Kamarinskaya variations (1809) and the Air russe varié for piano duet (1808), and the seven piano concertos. At his best, he was the equal of any of the Romantic pianist-composers.

Piano Concertos

No 1 in E flat, H27; No 3 in E flat, H32
Benjamin Frith pf Northern Sinfonia / David Haslam 🏵
Naxos 8 553770 (52 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1996 ●

Benjamin Frith presents a very formidable challenge to rival versions, at super-budget price. Both works are played with effortless fluency, plus all the immediacy and freshness of new discovery. In No 1 Frith is acutely responsive to the delicate charm of the Scottish-inspired ('Twas within a mile of Edinboro' Town) slow movement. He makes one aware of Field's teasing delight in the unexpected in the smiling outer movements, to which he brings a wide range of tone, and piquant accentuation in the last. There is warm, sympathetic support from the Northern Sinfonia under David Haslam. The performers revel in the composer's surprises of modulation, rhythm and orchestral colouring, while from the soloist there is not a trace of the perfunctory in passagework. The recording (in a resonant venue) might be thought overforward and full, but it remains a true bargain.

Piano Concertos – No 2 in A flat, H31; No 3 in E flat, H32 🅿
Andreas Staier fp
Concerto Köln / David Stern
Warner Elatus 0927-49610-2 (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1998 ●

For those who love the sound and capabilities of the modern piano, the fortepiano's thinner tone, distinctive timbre and more intimate dynamic scope (or, put another way, the lack of power) take some adjusting to. But once one is attuned to its tonal and colouristic possibilities, the daring nature of the piano writing emerges with striking force. Take the soloist's first entry in the Second Concerto, where the virtuosic power and originality delivers its full intended frisson and physicality when heard on an instrument being pushed to its limit. Andreas Staier is a brilliant pianist who allies dazzling technical élan to his acute musical insight and imagination. In the outer movements, his fingerwork is as precise and crystalline as his musical intelligence, with passagework assuming a quasi-melodic purpose, elevated to the level of what Gerald Abraham called 'significant line'.

The slow movement of the A flat Concerto, a brief contrasting molto espressivo song without words, is played with unaffected simplicity and clarity of line, while in the E flat major Concerto, Staier follows Field's own practice of interpolating one of his nocturnes as a slow movement by playing the well-known work in C minor. Staier is a most poetic and inspiring advocate, yet the success of these performances is as much due to the extraordinary clarity and impact of the Concerto Köln's orchestral playing. There is such an infectious generosity of spirit, such vivid character and crispness, with beautifully poised wind playing and a real bite from the brass and timpani. Try the opening of the finale of the Second Concerto, where, after the lilting melody is presented by the soloist, the full orchestra respond with invigorating gusto and rusticity, never losing their tonal blend or refinement. The recorded sound, too, is wonderfully clear and detailed.

Piano Concertos – No 5 in C, 'L'incendie par l'orage'; No 6 in C
Benjamin Frith pf Northern Sinfonia / David Haslam
Naxos 8 554221 (57 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1996 ●

Benjamin Frith proves an ideal soloist in these attractive, decorative pieces. Like his close contemporary, Hummel, Field is much more adept at embroidering the themes which bubble from him than at developing them in a conventional way. The passagework which can seem just trivial needs both the virtuosity and the artistry of a pianist of charm such as Frith if it is to come fully alive and compel attention, as it does here.

Frith's articulation is sparklingly clear throughout with rapid scales and decorations pearly and wonderfully even, helped by the relatively intimate acoustic of the theatre in Gosforth where the recordings were made.

The title of the Fifth Concerto, L'incendie par l'orage ('Fire from the Storm'), is inspired by the passage of storm music towards the end of the central development section in the first movement. Surprisingly Field, the inventor of the nocturne and inspirer of Chopin, here avoids a full slow movement, contenting himself instead with a slow introduction to the jaunty finale. At least he makes amends in the Sixth Concerto, where the central Larghetto slow movement is a nocturne in everything but name, with soaring cantilena for the piano which might well have inspired Bellini. The finale is a sparkling polka-like movement, with passagework breathtakingly elaborate, which Frith rightly treats as fun music, a fine pay-off. Haslam and the Northern Sinfonia are well recorded, too, in the relatively small-scale acoustic.

Gerald Finzi

British 1901-1956

GROVE Finzi studied privately with Farrar (1914-16) and Bairstow (1917-22) and lived most of his life in the country. Influenced by Elgar and Vaughan Williams as well as his teachers, he developed an intimate style and concentrated on songs, particularly settings of Hardy. Other works include a clarinet concerto (1949) and Dies natalis for high voice and strings (1939).

Cello Concerto

Finzi Cello Concerto, Op 40[a]
Leighton Cello Concerto, Op 31[b]
Raphael Wallfisch vc [a]Royal Liverpool Philharmonic Orchestra / Vernon Handley; [b]Royal Scottish National Orchestra / Bryden Thomson
Chandos CHAN9949 (72 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1986 and 1989

The Cello Concerto is arguably Finzi's finest work, written at the very end of his life under the stress of knowing he was terminally ill. At just under 40 minutes it is planned on a massive scale. The first movement brings the darkest music, an extended tutti establishing a brooding tone of voice. The slow movement finds Finzi more characteristically in tender pastoral vein with a poignant tinge of melancholy, music originally conceived many years before its actual completion in 1951.

This disc is a recoupling at full price of Raphael Wallfisch's powerful, deeply emotional reading of the Finzi Cello Concerto, with Leighton's almost equally ambitious Cello Concerto. The Finzi receives a performance bigger and bolder than Tim Hugh's on Naxos, helped by full, warm Chandos sound. With a good balance for the soloist, the panache of Wallfisch's playing comes over the more forcefully, and the tenderness of the slow movement is reinforced too at a more spacious speed. He is even more compelling than Tim Hugh, but no one is likely to be disappointed with that fine bargain issue.

Clarinet Concerto

Clarinet Concerto in C minor, Op 31.
Five Bagatelles, Op 23 (orch Ashmore).
Love's Labour's Lost – Soliloquies Nos 1-3. A Severn Rhapsody in D minor, Op 3. Romance in E flat, Op 11. Introit in F, Op 6
Robert Plane cl Lesley Hatfield vn
Northern Sinfonia / Howard Griffiths 🏵
Naxos 8 553566 (71 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1995 ●

This is a highly commanding performance of Finzi's gorgeous Clarinet Concerto from Northern Sinfonia principal, Robert Plane. With his bright, singing tone and effortless technical mastery, there's no shortage of intuitive poetry from Plane in the sublime central Adagio. Howard Griffiths's conducting is exemplary. We also get an atmospheric account of Lawrence Ashmore's idiomatic orchestration of the Five Bagatelles (with the poignant 'Romance' a highlight), as well as exquisitely drawn renderings of both the Romance for strings and 'Three Soliloquies' from Finzi's incidental music for a 1946 BBC production of Love's Labour's Lost.

The fragrant, very early Severn Rhapsody (1923) makes a welcome return to the catalogue under Griffiths's deeply felt advocacy, and Lesley Hatfield makes a touching soloist in the radiant Introit (the slow movement of a withdrawn Violin Concerto). The sound and balance are extremely truthful, though the acoustic may be a little over-resonant for some tastes. All in all, a remarkable bargain.

Clarinet Concerto in C minor, Op 31. Love's Labour's Lost – Suite, Op 28. Prelude in F minor, Op 25. Romance in E flat, Op 11. Eclogue for piano and orchestra, Op 10
Alan Hacker cl Martin Jones pf
English String Orchestra / William Boughton
Nimbus NI5665 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1987

There are several other Finzi issues available which include the Clarinet Concerto. Alan Hacker, however, encompasses all his colleagues' virtues, providing special insights and revelling in the brilliant writing. He also adds something extra – an almost mystical realization of the music's poetic vision which is deeply moving. This is in spite of the fact that the string-playing sometimes lacks polish and precision. Finzi wrote incidental music for a BBC production of Love's Labour's Lost and expanded it for a later open-air production. It is tuneful, graceful music, but one cannot feel that the stage was Finzi's world.

The disc is completed by two interesting early pieces for strings, the Prelude and Romance, both wholly characteristic of the composer and very well played.

Additional recommendation
Clarinet Concerto
Coupling: Stanford Clarinet Concerto
T King cl Philharmonia Orchestra / Francis
Hyperion Helios CDH55101 (DDD; recorded 1980) Ⓑ
A definitive and highly praised recording now at budget price.

Violin Concerto

Violin Concerto[b]. Romance in E flat, Op 11[b]. Prelude in F minor, Op 25[b]. In Years Defaced[a] – To a Poet a Thousand Years Hence (orch C Matthews); When I Set Out for Lyonnesse (orch cpsr); In Years Defaced (orch Roberts); Tall Nettles (orch Alexander); At a Lunar Eclipse (orch Weir); Proud Songsters (orch Payne)
[a]John Mark Ainsley ten [b]Tasmin Little vn
City of London Sinfonia / Richard Hickox
Chandos CHAN9888 (55 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts included. Recorded [b]1999 and [a]2000 ●●

Finzi began work on his Concerto for small orchestra and solo violin in 1925, dedicating it to Sybil Eaton (a talented young violinist and the object of the 24-year-old composer's unrequited love). He harboured considerable doubts about the opening movement, however, and when Eaton eventually premièred the piece in May 1927 under Sargent, the Queen's Hall audience heard only the second and third movements. When Vaughan Williams confirmed that he would programme the concerto at a Bach Choir concert the following year, Finzi penned another first movement. Neither he nor the critics found much to please them, though, and the concerto was not heard again in its entirety until the present artists' revival in 1999 in Southampton's Turner Sims Concert Hall.

The work's highlight undoubtedly remains the central, characteristically rapt Molto sereno that Finzi later recast as his Op 6 Introit. Of the two vigorous flanking movements the finale leaves the stronger impression, but the concerto thoroughly deserves its new lease of life, and Little and Hickox's sparkling and stylish advocacy will win it many new friends.

There's another first recording in the guise of the song-cycle, In Years Defaced. Only one number, the 1928-32 setting of Hardy's 'When I set out for Lyonnesse', was actually orchestrated by Finzi, and, in an effort to place it in a more programme-friendly context, the Finzi Trust commissioned five contemporary composers to choose a song that might benefit from the extra colour an orchestral palette can provide. The resulting sequence is a joy from start to finish.

Ainsley is a potent, irreproachably sensitive presence throughout this imaginative and rewarding creation which, as Jeremy Dale Roberts observes in the booklet, enshrines 'a coherent work of touching intensity'.

Again, Hickox and the City of London Sinfonia accompany to the manner born. Lovely, airy sound further enhances the appeal of this disc.

Choral Works

All this night, Op 33. Let us now praise famous men, Op 35. Lo, the full, final sacrifice, Op 26. Magnificat, Op 36. Seven Part-songs, Op 17. Though did'st delight my eyes, Op 32. Three Anthems, Op 27. Three Short Elegies, Op 5. White-flowering days, Op 37
Finzi Singers / Paul Spicer with Harry Bicket org
Chandos CHAN8936 (79 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts included
Recorded 1990

To the listener who seeks music in which the fastidious limitation of its means is itself some guarantee of the depth of its purposes, Finzi will always be rewarding. This is true of all the works collected here. Some, such as the first and last, God is gone up and Lo, the full, final sacrifice, are relatively well known, though not necessarily the most satisfying. There are some fine shorter pieces including the unaccompanied Seven Poems of Bridges and the Three Drummond Elegies that delight as word-settings. 'White-flowering days', to words by Edmund Blunden, comes from A Garland for the Queen, the Coronation gift of 10 composers in 1953, none happier than this in catching the fresh hopefulness of the time. Best of all perhaps is the Magnificat. It is heard here in its original version with organ, beautifully played on this disc and providing a more spiritual association than the orchestral accompaniment added later.

The Finzi Singers are sensitive, assured and accurate; their tone is uniformly good, and they convey a sense of personal involvement in the music. The sound and presentation are well up to the rest.

Dies natalis

Dies natalis, Op 8. Intimations of Immortality, Op 29
John Mark Ainsley ten
Corydon Singers and Orchestra / Matthew Best
Hyperion CDA66876 (67 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts included
Recorded 1996 ●●

What is central, and essential, is the capacity of Finzi's music to grow in the listener's mind over long years, deepening in appeal, strengthening in the conviction of its purpose. Moreover, these performances are marvellously good at clarifying the strengths. Rather more than their predecessors, they clarify structure and texture. The soloist is more distinctly focused in the recording-balance, and this makes an important difference when the poet's words are such a vital element. Ainsley sings with grace and clarity. The small choir conveys a restrained presence in the Intimations; but for much of the time this kind of halo over the sound is appropriate, and in certain important passages the fewer numbers help to compensate with clearer definition. Highly recommended.

Songs

To a Poet, Op 13. Earth and Air and Rain, Op 15. Before and after Summer, Op 16 – The Self-unseeing; Channel firing; Overlooking the river; The too short time; Amabel; He abjures love
David Wilson-Johnson bass-bar
David Owen Norris pf
Global Music Network GMNC0116 Ⓕ
(74 minutes: DDD). Recorded 2001

If you have come to Finzi by way of works such as the Eclogue, the Clarinet Concerto and Dies natalis you may feel, hearing these songs, that you have not really known him at all. There is not much comfort in them, or if some is found then it may be in the spirit of Thomas Hardy, the poet to whom he returned most often.

The Davids, Wilson-Johnson and Owen Norris, present a darker sky than did their predecessors, the Stephens, Roberts and Varcoe, both with Clifford Benson as pianist (for Hyperion). The timbre of the voices themselves may be decisive. Wilson-Johnson is here designated bass-baritone, and certainly sounds so by comparison with Roberts and Varcoe, who are younger, lighter and higher though singing at the same pitch. More fundamental, though, is that one senses here a more passionate approach. This collaboration of singer and pianist is a distinguished one. They relax and intensify, probe and 'take off' always as one. They catch the moment of inspiration. Wilson-Johnson's voice, which has always been resonant, has now the vibrations loosening a little, but the control is still admirable, and he holds the attention. Strongly recommended, even to those who already have the recordings on Hyperion.

César Franck Belgian/French 1822-1890

Franck, French composer, teacher and GROVE organist of Belgian birth, was intended by his ambitious father for a career as a piano virtuoso. He studied at the Liège (1830-35) and Paris (1837-42) conservatories but found his true vocation only later through organist's appointments in Paris, chiefly that of Ste Clotilde (from 1858) and part-time teaching. His improvisatory skill attracted notice and led to his first major work, the remarkable Six pièces (1862), though another decade passed before he was appointed organ professor at the Conservatoire. From the mid-1870s until his death his creative powers lasted unabated. He wrote large-scale sacred works, notably the oratorio Les béatitudes (1879), and several symphonic poems such as Le chausseur maudit (1882) and Psyché (1888). But his achievements are evident especially in the symphonic, chamber and keyboard works in which he made one of the most distinguished contributions to the field by any French musician. Here, in the Piano Quintet (1879), the Prélude, choral et fugue for piano (1884), the Violin Sonata (1886), the Symphony in D minor (1888) and the String Quartet (1889), his inherent emotionalism and a preoccupation with counterpoint and traditional forms found a balance, in turn decisively impressing his band of disciples, from Duparc, d'Indy and Chausson to Lekeu, Vierne, Dukas and Guilmant. Features of his mature style, indebted alike to Beethoven, Liszt and Wagner, are his complex, mosaic-like phrase structures, variants of one or two motifs; his rich chromaticism, often put to structural use in the 'chord pair'; and his fondness for cyclic, tripartite forms.

Symphony in D minor

Symphony in D minor. Symphonic Variations[a].
Les Eolides
[a]Louis Lortie pf
BBC Philharmonic Orchestra /
Yan Pascal Tortelier
Chandos CHAN9875 (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 2000 ●

With so many versions of the Symphony and the Symphonic Variations available, it is surprising that these two favourite orchestral works are not coupled together more often. Here Tortelier adds an attractive bonus in the evocative tone-poem Les Eolides.

Tortelier's reading of the Symphony is no less than five minutes shorter than both the Karajan and Chailly versions. The result is not a reading in any way perfunctory, rushed or trivial, but one made fresher, eliminating any suspicion of the glutinous or sentimental, helped by a cleanly defined yet atmospheric recording.

The Symphony's slow introduction, promptly repeated, is all the more effective for being taken at a flowing speed, with no feeling of haste, and the main Allegro is fresh and alert, less smooth than with either Karajan or Chailly. However, Monteux's account, which has a very different coupling (Petrushka), still strikes one as the most idiomatic performance of all, bitingly dramatic, too, with the 1959 sound astonishingly full and vivid.

Tortelier is far closer to Monteux in his feeling for the idiom than either Karajan or Chailly, both taking a weighty view. In tempo Tortelier is very similar to Karajan and Monteux in the central Allegretto, with fine gradations of dynamic and a slightly raw-sounding cor anglais adding to the freshness. It is in the finale that Tortelier is most distinctive, his fast, urgent speed for the Allegro non troppo challenging the players of the BBC Philharmonic to produce exciting rather than genial results.

Louis Lortie is the excellent soloist in the Symphonic Variations, spontaneously poetic in the slow sections, sparkling and light in the scherzando finale. Tortelier is again at his most warmly understanding in Les Eolides, a work that can seem wayward, but which here is made light and fanciful in its luminously scored evocation of the breezes of heaven. Again Tortelier reinforces his outstanding claims as an interpreter of the French romantic repertory.

Franck Symphony in D minor[a]
Mendelssohn Symphony No 5 in D, 'Reformation', Op 107[b]
[a]Berlin Radio Symphony Orchestra, [b]Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Lorin Maazel
DG The Originals 449 720-2GOR Ⓜ
(64 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1961

This CD preserves a phenomenon: a living Legend in the making. Appreciative insert-notes describe features of Maazel's work of the period – freshness of vision and youthful vitality tempered by a feeling for line and a classical poise – to which might be added a more timeless Maazel characteristic: a sensational command of the orchestra. Both orchestras were at their then (1961) finest, and there are countless examples of expressive shaping, pointing (the Mendelssohn second movement) and shading (the shadowed mystery at the start and centre of the Franck). Just occasionally, you are aware of command over-exercised: the finale of the Franck has one or two radical swells and drastic diminuendos and pianissimos. And some of Maazel's more racy tempos are questionable. But the very mobile Allegretto central movement of the Franck works like a dream (it is seraphic rather than sentimental). The finale of the Mendelssohn is admittedly a 'problem' movement and inclined to sound foursquare if not dispatched with a certain dash. Maazel's quick march here solves the problem, but leaves little room for airy celebration and final elation.

The recordings contribute to the lean-and-hungry impression of the performances: always superbly clear, but wanting warmth and space in fortissimo tuttis (those of the Franck are often strident and hectoring).

Piano Quintet

Franck Piano Quintet in F minor[a] Mozart Clarinet Quintet in A, K581[b] R Strauss Capriccio – Prelude[c]
Amadeus Quartet (Norbert Brainin, Siegmund Nissel vns Peter Schidlof va Martin Lovett vc)
[b]Gervase de Peyer cl [a]Clifford Curzon pf [c]Cecil Aronowitz va [c]William Pleeth vc
BBC Legends/IMG Artists amono BBCL4061-2 Ⓜ
(77 minutes: ADD). Recorded live in
[a]1960, [b]1966 and [c]1971 ●●●

Rarely can a case for live rather than studio performances have been made more persuasively than by the present disc, a study in contrasts if ever there was one. The Amadeus Quartet was celebrated for its homogeneity (accusations from critics of a plush or de luxe style were rare), yet this superb ensemble could easily accommodate other radically different players, and here Curzon's legendary nervous intensity is accentuated by the Amadeus, who join him in a performance of the Franck Quintet so super-charged it virtually tears itself apart. Taken from a 1960 Aldeburgh Festival concert it eclipses all others (even Curzon's revelatory Decca disc). Curzon and his colleagues hurl themselves at music which clearly they see as hardly needing a cooling agent. How free and rhapsodic is Curzon's reply to the Amadeus's opening dramatico, and what a savage explosion of pent-up energy from all the players at 7'22"! Intonation may suffer at 3'12" in the finale's equestrian nightmare, but the concluding pages are overwhelming, and Curzon's darting *crescendo*s at 3'56" and 58" are like snarls of defiance.

At the opposite end of the spectrum is Mozart's Clarinet Quintet, that assuaging and elusive glory of the repertoire, played with all Gervase de Peyer's serenity and elegance. Yet again, the performance is essentially live, and has the sort of vitality and imaginative subtlety less easy to achieve or even countenance in the studio. And the same could be said of Cecil Aronowitz and William Pleeth, who join the Amadeus for Strauss's Prelude to Capriccio, aptly described in the notes as 'a sumptuous effusion of very late romanticism'. The recordings (1960-71) are vivid and immediate, and odd noises off only add to the sense of occasion. Finally, a word of warning; this performance of the Franck is not for late-night listening: you'll sleep more peacefully after the Mozart.

Cello Sonata

Franck Cello Sonata in A Lekeu Cello Sonata in G
Ysaÿe Solo Cello Sonata, Op 28.
Rêve d'enfant, Op 14
Raphael Wallfisch vc John York pf
Cello Classics CC1009 (78 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded c2002 ●●

Raphael Wallfisch's and John York's playing in the Franck has an air of spontaneity and enjoyment which exudes a very natural ebb and flow, while the ample ambience allows them to make the most of the 'big' moments, such as the central climax in the finale.

The disc also scores through its imaginative programming, placing the two Franco- Belgian sonatas alongside music by the great violinist who inspired them. Ysaÿe's unaccompanied Cello Sonata is an impressive, sombre work; as in the more familiar violin sonatas, echoes of the Baroque are placed within an impressionistic context. Wallfisch's account is magnificent – full-blooded, yet very clear and precise.

The Lekeu, with its opulent, passionate piano part and predominately lyrical string writing, transcribes just as effectively for the cello as does the Franck. And its grand emotions inspire a very wholehearted response. Thoroughly recommended.

Violin Sonata

Debussy Violin Sonata. Sonata for Flute, Viola and Harp Franck Violin Sonata in A
Ravel Introduction and Allegro
Kyung-Wha Chung vn Osian Ellis hp Radu Lupu pf
Melos Ensemble
Decca 421 154-2DM (67 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1962-77 ●●●

Here we have masterpieces from the French tradition in excellent performances that have won the status of recording classics. Kyung-Wha Chung and Radu Lupu are a fine duo who capture and convey the delicacy and poetry of the Franck Sonata as well as its rapturous grandeur, and never can the strict canonic treatment of the great tune in the finale have sounded more spontaneous and joyful. They are no less successful in the different world of the elusive Sonata which was Debussy's last work, with its smiles through tears and, in the finale, its echoes of a Neapolitan tarantella. The 1977 recording is beautifully balanced, with a natural sound given to both the violin and piano. The Melos Ensemble recorded the Ravel Introduction and Allegro 15 years before, but here too the recording is a fine one for which no allowances have to be made even by ears accustomed to good digital sound; as for the work itself, this has an ethereal beauty that is nothing short of magical and Osian Ellis and his colleagues give it the most skilful and loving performance. A wonderful disc and a must buy.

Prélude, choral et fugue

Prélude, choral et fugue. Prélude, aria et final. Grand caprice. Les plaintes d'une poupée. Danse lente.
Choral No 3 in A minor (arr Hough)
Stephen Hough pf
Hyperion CDA66918 (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996 ●

Hough has a dream-ticket combination of virtues – astonishing agility, a faultless ear for texture, fine-tuned stylistic sensibility and an exceptional understanding of harmonic and structural tensions. He acknowledges all Franck's nuances, notated and implied, without ever disturbing the broader flow; he gives full rein to the heroic Lisztian cascades, without ever tipping over into melodrama. The only hint of a nit to be picked would be that the fortissimo arpeggiations in the 'Choral' don't ring as resonantly as they might. One can't imagine the calm at the end of the 'Aria' being better judged. In their very different ways the almost comical bravura of the Grand caprice and the salon charm of the Danse lente and Les plaintes d'une poupée are extremely difficult to bring off with success. Yet anyone who has followed Hough's recording career will know that this sort of thing is meat and drink to him. As for his own transcription of the A minor Chorale, the unavoidable adjective is 'awesome'.

Organ Works

Pièce héroïque in B minor. Cantabile in B. Fantaisie in A. Grande pièce symphonique in F sharp minor, Op 17. Pastorale in E, Op 19. Fantaisie in C, Op 16.

Prélude, fugue et variation in B minor, Op 18. Trois chorales – No 1 in E; No 2 in B minor; No 3 in A minor. Prière in C sharp minor, Op 20.
Final in B flat, Op 21
Marie-Claire Alain org
Erato ② 0630-12706-2 (152 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded on the Cavaillé-Coll organ, Saint-Etienne, Caen, France in 1995

Alain is a completely involved communicator. More than anyone else she delves into the very soul of these works. Thus we have an intensely prayerful Prière, a majestically statuesque Grande pièce symphonique while the Chorales are delivered with an unexpected degree of fervour; perhaps the Third is a shade overfervent since some of the semiquaver figurations lack absolute clarity – something which after one or two hearings serves to heighten the excitement but which might, after repeated listening, become irritating. This is a highly authoritative release not just in terms of playing but also in Alain's accompanying notes. The Caen organ is a particularly fine specimen of a Cavaillé-Coll, dating from 1884 – 25 years after the St Clotilde organ for which Franck wrote much of this music. The recording captures it, and the church's atmosphere, effectively.

Harold Fraser-Simon British 1872-1944

After an early career in shipping, Fraser-Simon became known as a songwriter. Then, beginnng with Bonita (1911) he composed a series of stage shows, the most successful of which was The Maid of the Mountains, running for 1352 performances. He also wrote A Southern Maid (1917) and Our Peg (1919) and collaborated with Ivor Novello in Our Nell (1924) but none were as successful. Fraser-Simon also wrote the ballets A Venetian Wedding (1926) and The Nightingale and the Rose (1927); he subsequently set children's texts, including incidental music for Kenneth Grahame's Toad of Toad Hall, settings from Alice in Wonderland, six volumes of songs from AA Milne's When We Were Very Young and the most popular, Christopher Robin is Saying his Prayers and Christopher Robin at Buckingham Palace.

The Maid of the Mountains

Janis Kelly sop Teresa; Christopher Maltman bar Beppo; Michael George bass Baldassare; Richard Suart bass Tonio; Sally Burgess mez Vittoria; Donald Maxwell bar General Malona; Joanna Gamble mez Angela; Jeanette Ager sop Gianetta; Michael Bundy bar Pietro; Tom Taylor voc Mayor of Santo; New London Light Opera Chorus; New London Orchestra / Ronald Corp
Hyperion CDA67190 (80 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text included. Recorded 2000 00

Let's confess that this is at times a somewhat odd score, with a curiously perfunctory Act 1 finale and a leading man (Baldassare) who merely recites his musical numbers. An absolutely complete performance will expose such weaknesses as much as the strengths. But the strengths of a work that set a London long-running record are considerable.

The principal numbers go to the Maid and the brigand Beppo, parts created by José Collins and Thorpe Bates, who were both fine singers. Janis Kelly and Christopher Maltman give their numbers full value, most obviously the hit number 'Love Will Find a Way', quite gloriously sung here by Kelly. They also share three interpolated hit numbers by James W Tate, among them the lovely 'Paradise for Two'. Hearing the score at leisure, one can also relish lesser numbers such as the splendidly catchy duet 'Dirty Work' or the lovely Act 3 Barcarolle.

What particularly distinguishes this recording is its use of full chorus and orchestra, playing the original orchestrations. In the way Ronald Corp lets the music breathe, one really senses the opulence of the original production and the full flavour of what can only struggle through the acoustic sound of 83 years ago. Altogether this is a quite outstandingly successful re-creation of the work. Sceptics will carp, but it is a hugely important contribution to preserving our British musical theatre heritage. One can envisage the romantic hit numbers providing rich material on the air-waves for some time to come.

Girolamo Frescobaldi
Italian 1583-1643

GROVE Frescobaldi studied with Luzzaschi at Ferrara, where he also came under Gesualdo's influence. Soon after 1600 he went to Rome where in 1607 he became organist of S Maria in Trastevere. The same year he travelled with his patron, Guido Bentivoglio, to Brussels, but his experience of this centre of keyboard music left little imprint on him, except perhaps in the fantasias of 1608. In July 1608 Frescobaldi was elected organist of St Peter's, Rome; during the following years he was employed also by Cardinal Pietro Aldobrandini and other patrons.

In 1615 Frescobaldi secured a position with Duke Ferdinando Gonzaga at Mantua, but after three months he returned to Rome, remaining there until 1628 when he became organist at the Medici court in Florence. By the time he returned once more to Rome, in 1634, his fame was international and he was moving in the highest circles of patronage. In 1637 Froberger came from Vienna to study with him. Little is known of his other pupils, but his influence on keyboard playing and composition remained important for a century or more.

Frescobaldi is remembered chiefly for his keyboard music, much of which was published in 12 volumes (1608-14) with toccatas, canzonas, ricercares, dances and variations. The most famous is Fiori musicali (1635), with pieces for use in the Mass: the Kyrie-Christe unit from the Ordinary, toccatas to be played during the Elevation and other pieces corresponding to items of the Proper (introit, gradual, offertory, communion). Bach owned a copy and learnt from it.

Frescobaldi's vocal music is of relatively small importance. His sacred works, including c40 motets, mostly for one to three voices and continuo, show none of the complexity and expressive intensity of the keyboard works. Perhaps his most characteristic vocal music is in an early volume of madrigals (1608), but two volumes of Arie musicali published during his years in Florence (1630) are also of interest.

Keyboard Works

Il Primo libro di Ricercari et Canzoni francese 🅿
Il Primo libro delle fantasie
Sergio Vartolo hpd/org
Naxos ② 8 553547/8 (132 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded c2002 ●

The Fantasie (1608) and Ricercari (1615) are the earliest of Frescobaldi's keyboard publications, and as neither has been issued complete before; to get both together, and at super-budget price, is treasure-trove indeed. Frescobaldi fanatics need read no further.

Vartolo's tendency to spin out the music at twice the length of most other interpreters can be rather off-putting, and does not always help the listener to grasp the overall design of formally complex pieces like the Toccatas. But these Fantasias and Ricercars are imitative, fugal pieces, more abstract in conception than the exuberant toccatas; recognising this, Vartolo avoids extreme tempi, and instead gives measured performances that gain in clarity what they have lost in eccentricity. These are (and this is not intended to damn with faint praise) sensible performances, that give both composer and audience their due. Vartolo loosens up a bit in the playful Canzoni Francesi that conclude the book of Ricercars, but in this he follows the composer's lead, and demonstrates his own sensitivity to style.

Vartolo mostly performs on a modern copy of an Italian harpsichord, and on the organ of the Chiesa del Spirito Santo, Pistoia (built a few years after Frescobaldi's death). Suffice it to say that this recording would be a must-have at full price; as it is, you won't find better value anywhere.

Il primo libro di madrigali

Concerto Italiano / Rinaldo Alessandrini
Opus 111 OPS30-133 (53 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1995

This story, which has a happy ending, is a curious one. Frescobaldi, in Antwerp with his Roman patron in 1608, was commissioned by a local printer to produce his first and indeed only book of madrigals. The collection seems to have little impact on contemporaries. It was never reprinted either North or South of the Alps, and in our own times its existence gradually became submerged under the weight of Frescobaldi's reputation as a composer for the keyboard. Those interested in pursuing the matter discovered that the only known surviving copy lacks one of its voice-parts. Frescobaldi's Primo libro seemed set fair to remain a footnote in the textbooks rather than a musical reality.

All that changed with the discovery of a complete set of partbooks, then in a private library, a challenge that Rinaldo Alessandrini has now taken up by both editing and recording the music. The distinctive sound and approach of his Concerto Italiano will be familiar to all enthusiasts for Italian music of the Monteverdi period (and above all for the music of Monteverdi himself), and their many admirers will not be disappointed with the result. Their instinctive feel for the diction, sound and sense of the Italian language married to a sophisticated and dynamic interpretational approach brings out all the rhetorical subtleties of Frescobaldi's extraordinary music, with its obvious parentage in the madrigals of Gesualdo and Monteverdi.

This is virtuoso madrigal singing at its most exhilarating, all the more effective for being sometimes (but not on all tracks) imaginatively underpinned by continuo instruments. The real revelation here is not so much the Concerto Italiano, whose powerfully moving performances we have come to expect, but Frescobaldi's madrigals; no one with a soul should miss them.

Giovanni Gabrieli Italian c1553/6-1612

GROVE Giovanni Gabrieli, like his uncle Andrea Gabrieli, with whom he studied, worked briefly at the Munich court (c 1575-8) and in 1585 he became organist of St Mark's, Venice, and of the confraternity of S Rocco, posts he held for the rest of his life. After Andrea's death, he edited many of his works for publication. His own fame and influence were widespread and crucial, notably in northern Europe – Schütz was among his many pupils – and he represents the highest point of the High Renaissance Venetian school. He composed motets and mass movements (Symphoniae sacrae, 1597, 1615, MSS), instrumental ensemble music (1597, 1615, MSS) and organ works (1593, MSS), as well as a few madrigals (1587 and anthologies). Much of his sacred ceremonial music exploits the architecture of St Mark's, using contrasting groups of singers and players to create cori spezzati effects, but often in a more intense and dissonant style than his uncle's. His music for wind ensemble is lively and colourful and includes up-to-date concertato writing; the organ ricercares are in a well-developed and specific keyboard style.

Canzonas

Sacrae symphoniae (1597) – Canzon a 8: primi toni, septemi toni (2), noni toni, duodecimi toni; Canzon a 10: primi toni, duodecimi toni, echo duodecimi toni; Sonata octavi toni, a 12.Canzoni (1608) – Canzon seconda a 4. Canzoni et Sonate (1615) – Canzon a 7: V, VI. Canzon a 8: VIII, X-XII; 🅿

Canzon XIV, a 10; Canzon XVI, a 12.
Ricercar del primo tono
Concerto Palatino / Bruce Dickey, Charles Toet
Harmonia Mundi HMC90 1688 (76 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1998 ●●

Gabrieli's instrumental music is as evocative of the sonorous interior spaces of St Mark's Basilica and the grandeur of the Venetian Renaissance as his better-known large-scale motets, yet they are not so often performed except as 'fillers'. This single-minded recording, which above all provides an opportunity to re-evaluate the canzonas, will bring a number of surprises to many. One is the sheer variety of styles and techniques which Gabrieli deploys, even among the early pieces which might be thought to be written in a comparatively limited idiom. Not so, for this early group ranges from the sparkling Canzon septimi toni, which achieves its effect by adopting all the characteristics of the double-choir motet, to the far more serious Canzon noni toni, which plays with chromatic inflection, another vocal device, as a way of making its effect. Although the double-choir technique and quasi-counterpoint are still the mainstay of the pieces from the 1615 collection, there are also intrusions of idiomatic writing, as with the exuberant passagework for cornetts in the Canzon VIII.

As might be expected, Concerto Palatino are well up to the challenges. These readings are characterised by just the kind of sensitive articulation and modulated phrasing that is often absent in performances of this repertory. Above all there is a sense of kaleidoscopic colour, a subtlety of interpretation based on exploration of the variety of texture in Gabrieli's writing, which stands in contrast to the more usual 'blockbuster' performances relying on sudden dynamic shifts and full brilliance. Highly recommended for specialists and newcomers alike.

Sacrae Symphoniae

The 16 Sonatas and Canzonas from Sacrae symphoniae. Toccata quinti toni. Three Toccatas. Intonatione del noni toni Ⓟ
His Majesties Sagbutts and Cornetts / Timothy Roberts org
Hyperion CDA66908 (75 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997

Giovanni Gabrieli is arguably the earliest composer to write a significant body of instrumental music to a formula which can be said to be truly idiomatic and timelessly palatable. The Sacrae symphoniae publication of 1597 is a mixed set of vocal and instrumental pieces and, in its grand design, preserves a glorious heyday of textural opulence, intimate and playful dialogue between galleries and unashamedly ostentatious virtuosity. His Majesties Sagbutts and Cornetts have augmented their chamber consort to form, as cornettist David Staff proudly proclaims, 'the largest group of cornett and sagbutt players to have been assembled from one city since the 17th century'. These wonderful 16 canzonas and sonatas make up the complete instrumental music of the 1597 collection. In essence it is the extensive juxtaposition between sombre blocks and glittering small-scale exchanges which gives the music its seminal quality of moving both inevitably and eventfully towards a self-assured resolution, befitting its aristocratic gait. Having a 'moderator' (in this case the fine keyboardist, Timothy Roberts), as opposed to an artistic director, is pragmatic and democratic but there is the odd moment where a strong artistic presence at the helm would have, ironically perhaps, empowered the musicians towards a more flexible and varied approach to articulation and colour. That said, there are some glorious and majestic sounds here: you can fly to the buzzing Canzon duodecimi toni a 10, bathe in the fragrant harmonic mosaic of the three-choir Canzon quarti toni a 15 and relish elsewhere the peculiarly delicate and sweet sounds of this ensemble. Overall, a notable and distinctive achievement. Recommended to a broad listenership.

'A Venetian Coronation, 1595'

Awards 1990

G Gabrieli Intonazioni – ottavo tono; terzo e quarto toni; quinto tono alla quarta bassa[a]. Canzonas – XIII a 12; XVI a 15; IX a 10. Sonata VI a 8 pian e forte. Deus qui beatum Marcum a 10[c]. Omnes gentes a 16[c] A Gabrieli Intonazioni – primo tono[a]; settimo tono[b]. Mass Movements[c] – Kyrie a 5-12; Gloria a 16; Sanctus a 12; Benedictus a 12. O sacrum convivium a 5[c]. Benedictus Dominus Deus sabbaoth[ab] (arr Roberts) Bendinelli Sonata CCCXXXIII. Sarasinetta[a] M Thomsen Toccata I Ⓟ
[a]James O'Donnell, [b]Timothy Roberts orgs Gabrieli [c]Consort and Players / Paul McCreesh
HMV Classics HMV575606-2 (71 minutes: DDD). Texts and translations included Ⓑ ●●●

The coronation of a new Doge of Venice was always a special occasion, and never more so than when Marino Grimani (1532-1605) was elected to that office. We do not know what music was played then, but the whole ceremony is notionally and credibly reconstructed in this recording by Paul McCreesh and his cohorts. The recording was made in Brinkburn Priory, a church whose acoustic (aided by deft manipulation of the recording controls) is spacious enough to evoke that of the Basilica of St Mark, the site of the original event. Space per se is vital to the music of the Gabrielis, who excelled in using it by placing instrumental and vocal groups in different parts of the building – which thereby became an integral part of the music. A fine selection of music that could have been played then is enhanced by the opening tolling of a bell, a crescendo marking the leisurely approach of the ducal procession, and the impression of architectural space created by changing stereo focus. It would be difficult to speak too highly of the performances, supplemented by first-class annotation, in this memorable recording. A trip to Venice would cost a lot more than this disc but, though you could visit the real St Mark's, it would not buy you this superb musical experience.

'Music for San Rocco'

G Gabrieli Symphoniae sacrae (1615) – Jubilate Deo a 10; Misericordia tua a 12; Suscipe clementissime a 12; In ecclesiis a 14; Buccinate in neomenia a 19. Intonazioni – del nono tono; duodecimo tono. Canzoni et Sonate – Canzon XIV a 10; Sonata XVIII a 14; Sonata XIX a 15; Sonata XX a 22; Sonata XXI per tre violini. Timor et tremor a 6. Magnificat a 33 (arr Keyte). Domine Deus meus a 6 Barbarino Audi, dulcis amica mea. Ardens est cor meum
Timothy Roberts org Gabrieli Consort and Players / Paul McCreesh
Archiv Produktion 449 180-2AH (78 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1995

The words 'Venice' and 'splendour' were simply made to go together and are certainly brought together in this recording entitled 'Music for San Rocco'. Paul McCreesh and his team of advisers have taken Thomas Coryat's description, Coryats Crudities, of the 1608 festivities in honour of St Roch as the starting-point for this concert programme, which was performed in the magnificent Scuola Grande di San Rocco, famous for its sequence of paintings by Tintoretto. The programme explores a wide range of works by Gabrieli, from the more intimate motets with organ accompaniment right through the spectrum to the extraordinary 33-part Magnificat reconstructed for the occasion by Hugh Keyte. The sheer magnificence of the sound of massed cornetts and sackbuts, blending so harmoniously with the voices, clearly struck Coryat, and is equally irresistible the best part of four centuries later. This is where the Gabrieli Consort and Players came in some years ago when one could only wonder at McCreesh's logistical abilities in bringing together the required number of chamber organs and so on. The group has, of course, gone from strength to strength, exploring a wide range of repertory, but they clearly retain a strong affinity with Gabrieli's music. The singing and playing are quite superb, securely and compellingly flamboyant. It's difficult to single out individuals but one must mention David Hurley who sings the remarkable solo motets by Barbarino with great poise. For the sheer splendour of the music, and the excellence of the performances, this recording is a must.

Niels Gade

Danish 1817-1890

GROVE Danish composer, the most important figure in 19th-century Danish music. He trained as a violinist and played in the Royal Orchestra, Copenhagen, producing his official op.1, the prize-winning concert overture Efterklange af Ossian in 1840. Encouraged by Mendelssohn, who was enthusiastic about his First Symphony (1841-2), he went to Leipzig as an assistant conductor of the Gewandhaus Orchestra, also meeting Schumann and composing the Mendelssohnian Third Symphony (1847) and String Octet (1848). In Copenhagen he reorganized the Musical Society, establishing a permanent orchestra and choir which gave the premières of his Symphonies nos. 4-8 and his large choral works ('Koncertstykke'), notably Comala (1846), and serving as co-director of the Copenhagen Academy of Music. Although the personal, Scandinavian colouring of his early works gave way to the German Romantic influence in his music after c 1850, he had an immense influence on the next generation of Danish composers.

Symphonies

Symphonies – No 1 in C minor, 'On Zealand's fair plains', Op 5; No 5 in D minor, Op 25[a]
[a]Ronald Brautigam pf
Danish National Symphony Orchestra / Christopher Hogwood
Chandos CHAN10026 (58 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded c2002

Symphonies – No 3 in A minor, Op 15;
No 6 in G minor, Op 32. Andante (Discarded First Movement from Symphony No 3).
Echoes from Ossian, Op 1
Danish National Radio Symphony Orchestra / Christopher Hogwood
Chandos CHAN9795 (77 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded c2002

If not the most adventurous of composers, and in his later years overly conservative, Gade in his youth certainly had his moments. Gade's inventiveness is evident in all four symphonies presented here, albeit in very different ways.

The Sixth (1856-57) is perhaps the most perfect, Classical in design although with a minatory feel suggestive at times of middle-period Haydn. If it stays within its own clearly defined harmonic and stylistic limits, the First, Third and Fifth do not. No 1 (1842), based on an old ballad and incorporating his own earlier setting of it, is bright and full of life: no wonder Mendelssohn and the Leipzig audience were enchanted. The Third (1846-47) is a different proposition, more Romantic in tone, its first movement too much so causing the composer to replace it with a less radical opening span (the Presto tempo marking of which must still have raised a few eyebrows). The original Andante – Allegro energico is included here in its first recording, proving a fine if turbulent sonata Allegro. The Fifth (1852) has a Mendelssohnian poise and grace plus one startling – if ultimately still-born – innovation: the piano as an orchestral instrument (over half a century before Stravinsky's Petrushka or Shostakovich's First Symphony). The Fifth is very definitely not a concerto, but a true symphony with an extended keyboard part, sometimes as soloist, sometimes as colouristic device.

The performances are all very nicely drawn, the First and Fifth particularly so (Brautigam being just about ideal). As before, Hogwood's accounts have more energy than Schønwandt's on Dacapo, and much livelier sound; honours may be more even with Järvi's cycle, but overall Hogwood now has the edge; Kitaenko's version of No 1 and Ossian (on Chandos), however, remain unsurpassed.

Symphony No 1 in C minor, Op 5. Hamlet Overture, Op 37. Echoes from Ossian, Op 1
Danish National Radio Symphony Orchestra / Dmitri Kitaienko
Chandos CHAN9422 (61 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded early-mid 1990s ●

Gade's First Symphony, championed in Leipzig by Mendelssohn, launched him on his long and successful career. Its subtitle, On Sjøland's fair plains, alludes to one of the folk-songs collected and published by his teacher Andreas Peter Berggreen, though it is not the only folk-song to figure in the score. Kitaienko's reading is to be preferred to either of his rivals – the performance is both vital and sensitive and the recording is splendidly natural, with a good perspective and no want of detail.

The Echoes from Ossian Overture is Gade's first opus, which he composed two years earlier in 1840. Like the symphony it is one of his most recorded pieces, and its second group has a charm that is difficult to resist. Readers beginning a Gade collection would do well to start here. Recommended.

Symphonies – No 4, Op 20; No 7, Op 45
Concert Overture No 3, Op 14
Danish National Radio Symphony Orchestra / Christopher Hogwood
Chandos CHAN9957 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Both symphonies on this second volume in Hogwood's Gade cycle are fine examples of the Dane's mastery of Classical balance, with perhaps less overt Romanticism than their dates of composition (respectively 1850 and 1864) might suggest – consider what Wagner was writing in those years. Hogwood's general approach is bright and lively, the rhythmic precision caught beautifully by Chandos's recording. Comparing this account with its rivals in, for instance, the major item here – No 7 – one can hear how the sound serves the music better than either Järvi (for BIS) or Schønwandt (Dacapo) manage. Schønwandt in particular suffers in this respect, made to sound pedestrian at times when in fact he is not. The Danish National Radio players for Hogwood are more characterful in the lovely Andante than either rival band, though in the scherzo and finale honours are even between Hogwood and Schønwandt.

Much the same holds good for the versions of the more lightweight Fourth – dedicated to Louis Spohr – though here Hogwood is just that much more captivating. If the Seventh is the main priority, Schønwandt's coupling of Gade's Eighth and last may prove tempting (Järvi has No 2), though Hogwood's inclusion of the third concert overture is decisive. A real rarity, reputedly inspired by the figure of Achilles, its character is broadly heroic. Järvi's and Schønwandt's cycles are still worth getting to know, but at this half-way stage Hogwood's is clearly now – unless things go very awry in Volumes 3 and 4 – the clear recommendation.

Francesco Geminiani

Italian 1687-1762

GROVE Geminiani studied in Rome with Corelli and A Scarlatti, and in 1711 became leader of the opera orchestra in Naples. Settling in London in 1714, he earned instant success as a violin virtuoso and became one of the most influential teachers (of the violin and composition). He published a series of instrumental works, starting with the highly acclaimed violin sonatas Op 1 (1716). In the 1730s he made two lengthy visits to Ireland, and later spent time in the Netherlands and Paris. He settled in Dublin in 1759, giving his last known concert in 1760.

Geminiani's principal works are solo sonatas and concerti grossi. His model was Corelli, but he composed with originality, writing for a wider range of solo instruments and using a more sonorous and chromatic idiom; his music is more expressive and dramatic than Corelli's (though still contrapuntal). Most works have the traditional four-movement plan still popular in England. The violin sonatas Op 1 and Op 4 (1739) are especially difficult to play, and include cadenzas. Geminiani revised the former set as trio sonatas (c1757), and also made arrangements of others of his works. His 45 concerti grossi have a concertino of two violins, viola and cello; they include arrangements of sonatas by Corelli.

Concerti grossi

Geminiani Concerti grossi (after Corelli, Op 5)[a]. Ⓟ
Cello Sonata in D minor, Op 5 No 2[b]
Corelli/Geminiani Sonata for Violin and Cello in A, Op 5 No 9a[c]
[bc]David Watkin vc [b]Alison McGillivray vc [b]Richard Egarr hpd [a]Academy of Ancient Music / Andrew Manze [c]vn
Harmonia Mundi ② HMU907261/2 Ⓕ
(144 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1998-99 ●●

Eighteenth-century English music lovers, it seems, were obsessed with the music of Corelli, in particular his concerti grossi; Manze's notes quote a lovely account of how, when the Op 6 concertos were first published in 1714, one London orchestra of gentlemen amateurs, led by a Mr Needler, could not stop themselves from playing through all 12 at one sitting. They remained Corelli's only published concertos, however, so it is not hard to see what a welcome sight the works presented on this disc must have been when they first appeared in the mid-1720s; immensely skilful arrangements by Corelli's London-based pupil Francesco Geminiani of the master's 12 violin sonatas, Op 5, they were to all intents a new set of Corelli concertos.

Well, what held for Londoners back then should hold equally well for Baroque enthusiasts today; these ingeniously crafted concerti grossi are a true delight, their musical effectiveness in no way compromised by their origins. Listeners familiar with Corelli's Op 5 will doubtless have fun spotting what Geminiani has done with them (which goes well beyond straightforward orchestration, while keeping the results utterly true to Corelli's spirit); those who do not know the originals can just sit back and enjoy the music for what it is, which is to say bright, tuneful and invigorating.

Where Manze's particular success lies is in conjuring the atmosphere of the past and in the sheer joyousness and freshness which these performances convey. It is as if Mr Needler and his friends were before us, revelling in an unexpected Corellian bonus. Listen to the Academy of Ancient Music lustily laying into the thick chords in the final movement of Concerto No 4, dragging back the tempo and then charging off again, and you can almost see the complicit grins on their faces; or the way in which the ending of the well-known La folia (Concerto No 12) sweeps them up into a fit of orchestral scrubbing, to be capped by an excited ornamental whinny from Manze's violin.

Manze is as free with his embellishments elsewhere in the set, throwing in double-stops, blue notes and all manner of flourishes with an abandon which will not be to everyone's taste (recalling more than ever the oft-quoted description of him as 'the Gidon Kremer of the Baroque violin'), but which one cannot help feeling contributes hugely to the enthusiastic tenor of the music-making as a whole. The orchestra itself is in fine form, offering up a full sound whose occasional slight rawness is no bad thing in performances of such strength, directness and honesty.

Roberto Gerhard

Spanish/British 1896-1970

GROVE Gerhard studied in Barcelona with Granados and Pedrell and in Vienna and Berlin with Schoenberg (1923-8), returning to Barcelona to take an active part in musical life. His compositions from this period are few: they include the Schoenbergian Wind Quintet (1928), the cantata L'alta naixença del rei en jaume (1932) and the ballet Ariel (1934). In 1939 he left Spain and eventually settled in England, where he became much more productive, in a distinctly Spanish style. There were three more ballets (Don Quixote, 1941; Alegrias, 1942; Pandora, 1944), an opera (The Duenna, 1947), the symphony Homenaje a Pedrell (1941) and songs, besides the Violin Concerto (1943), which looks back to the early atonal works and forward to the dynamic, boldly colourful, serial compositions of his last two decades. This late development was rapid, from the Schoenbergian style of the First Quartet (1955) to the athematic, block-form, effect-filled Second (1962). It can be seen too in the cycle of four symphonies (1953, 1959, 1960, 1967) and the Concerto for Orchestra (1965), which move towards a Varèsian sound-drama (the Third Symphony has the sub-title 'Collages' and includes tape). Other late works include electronic pieces, much incidental music and pieces for ensemble (Concert for Eight, 1962; Hymnody, 1963; Libra, 1968; Leo, 1969).

Symphony No 2

Symphony No 2. Concerto for Orchestra
BBC Symphony Orchestra / Matthias Bamert
Chandos CHAN9694 (55 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997

Although the avowed purpose of Gerhard's Concerto for Orchestra (1965) was to highlight the orchestra as an entity rather than its constituent sections or instruments, and while it may not have the immediate universal appeal of, say, Kodály's or Bartók's works with the same title (written in a very different idiom some 20 or so years earlier), it has never been surpassed for its imaginative handling of instrumental sonorities or for its virtuoso demands on the players. It has to be said right away that this is a stunning performance: not merely does the BBC SO rise spectacularly to the work's demands, but Bamert shows himself exceptionally skilful at securing internal balances. It is worth quoting Gerhard's own words: 'My favourite listener is one who does not read explanatory programme notes … I stand by the sound of my music, and it is the sound that must make the sense...a work of music takes shape only in the mind of the listener.' Gerhard's Second Symphony has been represented on disc only by the revised version (Metamorphosis) which had had to be completed by Alan Boustead (available on Auvidis Montaigne); although Gerhard may have felt the original too cerebral, it was at least all his, and tough going as it undoubtedly is, it is very welcome to all interested in the mental processes of this quite exceptional musician. The opening of the work's second section, with its clicking percussion, is hauntingly mysterious, and the final nightmare palindrome Scherzo (of which only a fraction exists in the Boustead version) is one of his most astonishing creations. With first-class recording throughout, this must be regarded as an essential disc for all admirers of Gerhard.

Symphony No 4, 'New York'

Symphony No 4, 'New York'. Pandora Suite
BBC Symphony Orchestra / Matthias Bamert
Chandos CHAN9651 (54 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997 ●

Roberto Gerhard attached New York to the title of his Fourth Symphony (1967) because it was commissioned for performance there. Thirty years on, the music's frequent recourse to imposing brass clusters suggests common ground with Varèse's Déserts (1954), and its subtext of urban menace and decay. Varèse would probably have scorned the way Gerhard introduces allusions to Catalan folk music as a way of humanising his bleak landscape, and the two kinds of material do indeed seem distinctly uneasy associates. But that might have been Gerhard's point; not to integrate atonal symphonism and nostalgic folklorism, but to let them stand side by side as symbols of a fractured culture and an uprooted life. Bamert and the BBCSO provoke such thoughts through the clarity with which they project the symphony's constant shifts of mood: and the sound has rather greater range and presence than that of Víctor Pablo Pérez's reading for Auvidis Montaigne. The Chandos coupling, the suite from the ballet Pandora, was written a quarter of a century before the symphony, and here folklorism is at the heart of music which has nothing to do with mere exoticism. This wartime score is as redolent of deep, dark feelings as anything Gerhard ever wrote. Good though the Auvidis Montaigne version of Pandora is, this one is better recorded, and lingers even more potently in the mind's ear.

Piano Trio

Piano Trio. Cello Sonata. Chaconne. Gemini
Cantamen (Caroline Balding vn Jo Cole vc Timothy Lissimore pf)
Metier MSVCD92012 (77 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995

Between Gerhard's Piano Trio, written in 1918 at the age of 22, and Gemini, composed nearly half a century later, yawns a stylistic gulf that almost defies credence; but of the genuineness of his convictions in each case there is no question. The sensuous warmth of the Trio demonstrates the influence of Ravel, with clear reminiscences of the Frenchman's String Quartet in the finale. The second movement is exquisitely seductive, and Cantamen plays the whole work with tenderness and sympathy. Five years later, everything was to change when Gerhard went to study in Vienna with Schoenberg; but his perpetually enquiring mind and ultra-sensitive ear, along with his strong sense of Catalan identity, led him to temper the dodecaphonic system, so that later works broke free of serial dogma and frequently incorporated references to Spanish turns of phrase. This is so in the 1956 Cello Sonata which, for all the trenchant energy of its outer movements, is never less than euphonious: its deeply lyrical slow movement is beautifully shaped by Jo Cole. The Chaconne for solo violin is more uncompromising in idiom but Caroline Balding fulfils its virtuosic demands with distinction. Gemini, with its plucked piano strings and keyboard clusters, its violin scurries and its frenetic outbursts, shows Gerhard's love of experimentation in sonorities and the two instruments are presented as antagonists rather than partners. The performance has real fire and conviction.

George Gershwin American 1898-1937

GROVE Gershwin was essentially self-taught. He was first a song plugger in Tin Pan Alley and an accompanist. In his teens he began to compose popular songs and produced a succession of musicals from 1919 to 1933 (Lady, be Good!, 1924; Oh, Kay!, 1926; Strike up the Band, 1927; Funny Face, 1927; Girl Crazy, 1930); the lyrics were generally by his brother Ira (1896-1983). In 1924 he became famous: he wrote Rhapsody in Blue as a concerto for piano and Paul Whiteman's jazz band. Its success led him to devote increasing energy to 'serious' composition. His more ambitious works include the Piano Concerto in F (1925) and the tone poem An American in Paris (1928). But he continued composing for the musical theatre, and some of his most successful musicals (Strike up the Band, Girl Crazy, Of Thee I Sing) date from this period. In 1934-5 he wrote his 'American folk opera' Porgy and Bess, which draws on African-American idioms; given on Broadway, it was only a limited success. Gershwin went to Hollywood in 1936 and wrote songs for films. He was a sensitive songwriter of great melodic gifts and did much to create syntheses between jazz and classical traditions in his concert music and black folk music and opera in Porgy and Bess.

Piano Concerto in F

Piano Concerto in F. Second Rhapsody
Rhapsody in Blue. Variations on 'I got rhythm'
Aalborg Symphony Orchestra / Wayne Marshall pf
Virgin Classics 561478-2 (DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1995

Wayne Marshall makes his first entry in the Piano Concerto and, in the space of a bar or two, you hear a quick wit and a cool head, the ability to convey (just as Gershwin strove to do) the jazzman's freewheeling, rhapsodic manner alongside a concert pianist's formality. Where Gershwin sits back in the wee small hours spinning yet another of his blue tunes, Marshall is in no hurry to go anywhere. And yet there's a very real sense of the imperative, too, a 'something's coming' kind of feeling. When it comes, it's a special moment. So, too, is Gershwin's grandiose recapitulation (and Marshall goes all the way with that). Generally, the Aalborg Symphony is well up on the style – no mean achievement when the orchestra can so easily sound like a dead-weight in this piece. But then, Marshall's 'Jack-be-nimble' approach is plainly infectious, encouraging reflexes from his band that are as quick and sparky as his own. The pulse of the Roaring Twenties was racy and capricious. But there was always time to dream. That's the tenor of Marshall's performance. The same is true of his dashing account of the Second Rhapsody. Again the contrasts are strong, the manner spontaneous – impulsive, Manhattan-brash to a degree – though Marshall never lets us forget that these are luxury goods. Gershwin's shot-silk climaxes (Hollywood dreams indeed), with all their audacious modulations and fruity horn counterpoints (nobody played with wrong-note harmonies like Gershwin), are played for all they're worth.

Rhapsody in Blue

Gershwin Rhapsody in Blue. An American in Paris 🄷
Grofé Grande Canyon Suite
New York Philharmonic Orchestra / Leonard Bernstein pf
Sony Classical SMK63086 (64 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1958-59 ◉

Bernstein conducted and played the music of Gershwin with the same naturalness as he brought to his own music. Here, An American in Paris swings by with an instinctive sense of its origins in popular and film music; no stilted rhythms or four-squareness delay the work's progress, and where ripe schmaltz is wanted, ripe schmaltz is what we get, devoid of all embarrassment. Rhapsody in Blue is playful and teasing, constantly daring us to try to categorize its style, and then confounding our conclusions. Although the solo passages from individual players are beautifully taken, the orchestra captures the authentic flavour of Gershwin's and Bernstein's idiom, and Bernstein pushes them to transcend the printed scores. His own playing in the Rhapsody is tantalizingly unpredictable. The recording is clear and bright, perhaps a touch hard-edged, and a little of the richness of the original LP issue might have been preferred by some, especially as the editing is now made more obvious.

Additional recommendation
Rhapsody in Blue[a] 🄷
Coupling: An American in Paris. Piano Concerto in F[a]. Variations on 'I got rhythm'[a]
[a]Wild pf; Boston Pops Orchestra / Fiedler
RCA Red Seal 74321 68019-2 (70 minutes: ADD: recorded 1959-61) Ⓢ

Wild's pianism is often scintillating and he generates an infectiously sparky rapport with Fiedler and the Bostonians, whose exuberant, gently affectionate American in Paris is a treat. RCA's sound is astonishingly undated.

'Gershwin Fantasy'

Fantasy on Porgy and Bess (arr Courage). Three Preludes (arr Heifetz). A Damsel in Distress – Nice work if you can get it. Girl Crazy – But not for me (both arr Tunick); Embraceable you; I got rhythm. Show Girl – Liza. Tip-Toes – Sweet and low-downa. Goldwyn Follies – Love is here to stay (all arr Brohn)
Joshua Bell vn George Gershwin pf London Symphony Orchestra / John Williams pf
Sony Classical SK60659 (55 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997. Item marked [a] incorporates composer's 1926 piano roll

In the 1920s George Gershwin used to encounter Jascha Heifetz at smart New York parties, and the two sometimes improvised violin-piano duets. Heifetz urged Gershwin to compose a major concert work for him, but Gershwin never got around to it. After the composer's death, Heifetz himself arranged five songs from Porgy and Bess as well as Gershwin's three Preludes for piano. These transcriptions and arrangements are the springboard for this CD.

John Williams has arranged eight songs from Porgy into a 20-minute Fantasy, somewhat in the manner of Sarasate's assaults on Carmen and other 19th-century operas. It comes as something of a surprise to hear 'Bess, you is my woman now' in such a high key, but Joshua Bell takes on the wailing 'My man's gone now' and of course 'Summertime' to very convincing virtuoso effect. Heifetz's transcriptions of the Preludes sound so natural that one would believe that Gershwin had composed them that way, whereas Williams's arrangements of some other show- and film-tunes seem to look forward more to the style of Grappelli. This is a light-hearted, sunny disc, which makes huge demands on Bell as soloist but none at all on the listener – it's sheer pleasure.

Gershwin Piano Rolls

Akst Jaz-o-mine[a] Berlin For Your Country and My Country[ac] Conrad Singin' the Blues ('till My Daddy Comes Home)[a] Frey Havanola[a] O Gardner Chinese Blues[d] Gershwin La La Lucille – From Now On[a]. Rialto Ripples[a] B Grant Arrah Go On I'm Gonna Go Back to Oregon[a]Kern Zip Goes a Million – Whip-Poor-Will[a] Matthews Pastime Rag No 3[e] M Morris Kangaroo Hop[a] Pinkard Waitin' for Me[a] Schonberg Darling[ab] Schonberger Whispering[a] Various Greenwich Village Follies of 1920 – Just Snap Your Fingers at Care[a] P Wendling Buzzin' the Bee[a]
[a]George Gershwin, [b]Cliff Hess, [c]Rudy Erlebach, [d]Bert Wynn, [e]Fred Murtha pfs
Nonesuch 7559-79370-2 (42 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Derived from piano rolls cut between 1916 and 1921
Recorded 1992-93

There are some curiosities here but only two numbers are by Gershwin himself. The first of these is Rialto Ripples, a catchy rag Gershwin wrote in collaboration with Will Donaldson and put on to a roll in September 1916. It is fascinating to compare Gershwin's own 1916 performance with the sheet music published a year later. The roll has much more of the ragtime idiom in oom-pah left-hand chords and even reveals a few misprints in the score. Another ragtime connection is the 1916 roll, under one of Gershwin's pseudonyms (Fred Murtha), of Pastime Rag No 3, one of only five polished rags in different styles by black composer Artie Matthews. Again there are interesting differences between the sheet music published in the same year and Gershwin's roll – he doesn't play repeats but he returns to the A strain at the end.

The rest of the song arrangements, which sometimes employ two players, show the ragtime background of this piano style, especially in the earlier rolls. These are also good examples of the techniques of the roll arrangers, who hyped it all up by adding notes to create the effect of a whole team of pianists.

Solo piano works

Of Thee I Sing – Prelude[a]; Jilted. Second Rhapsody[a]. The Shocking Miss Pilgrim – For you, for me, for evermore. Cuban Overture[a]. Pardon My English – Isn't it a pity? Variations on 'I got rhythm'[a]. Catfish Row[a]. Shall we dance? – Let's call the whole thing off[a]; They can't take that away from me[a]. Goldwyn Follies – Our love is here to stay
Jack Gibbons pf
ASV White Line CDWHL2082 (77 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Items marked [a] arr Gibbons. Recorded 1992-93

This disc is mostly comprised of Gibbons's own arrangements, based on Gershwin's film music, two-piano pieces, and in the case of the 'Catfish Row' Porgy and Bess suite, his orchestrations. The longest work is the Second Rhapsody, composed for a scene in the Gershwins' first Hollywood movie, Delicious. The film starred Janet Gaynor and Charles Farrell, and in this sequence the heroine wanders frightened through Manhattan – it might be rechristened A Scotswoman in New York. George Gershwin referred to the main tune as his 'Brahmsian theme' but today no one would mistake it for anything but Gershwin.

The solo version of the Cuban Overture is Gibbons's own adaptation of Gershwin's four-hand arrangement; like the 'Catfish Row' suite it makes formidable demands on the pianist and Gibbons gives them both virtuoso performances. The recital ends with three of the standards Gershwin wrote in Hollywood during the last months of his life. 'They can't take that away from me' must be a strong contender for the greatest songs of the 20th century, and no one hearing 'Our love is here to stay' can doubt that a premonition of death lingered somewhere in the composer's heart in the autumn of 1936.

Porgy and Bess

Awards 1989

Willard White bass Porgy; Cynthia Haymon sop Bess; Harolyn Blackwell sop Clara; Cynthia Clarey sop Serena; Damon Evans bar Sportin' Life; Marietta Simpson mez Maria; Gregg Baker bar Crown
Glyndebourne Chorus; London Philharmonic Orchestra / Sir Simon Rattle
EMI ③ 556220-2 (189 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes and text included. Recorded 1988 ●●●

The company, orchestra and conductor from the outstanding 1986 Glyndebourne production re-create a very real sense of Gershwin's 'Catfish Row' community on this complete recording. Such is its atmosphere and theatricality, we might easily be back on the Glyndebourne stage. From the very first bar it's clear just how instinctively attuned Rattle and this orchestra are to every aspect of a multi-faceted score. The cast, too, are so right, so much a part of their roles, and so well integrated into the whole, that one almost takes the excellence of their contributions for granted. Here is one beautiful voice after another, beginning in style with Harolyn Blackwell's radiant 'Summertime', which at Rattle's gorgeously lazy tempo, is just about as beguiling as one could wish. Willard White conveys both the simple honesty and inner-strength of Porgy without milking the sentiment and Haymon's passionately sung Bess will go wherever a little flattery and encouragement take her. As Sportin' Life, Damon Evans not only relishes the burlesque elements of the role but he really sings what's written a lot more than is customary. But the entire cast deliver throughout with all the unstinting fervour of a Sunday revivalist meeting. Sample the final moments of the piece – 'Oh Lawd, I'm on my way' – if that doesn't stir you, nothing will.

Carlo Gesualdo

Italian c1561-1613

GROVE A nobleman and amateur musician, Gesualdo is notorious for having his first wife and her lover murdered in 1590; he married Leonora d'Este of Ferrara three years later. While at the Ferrarese court (1594-6) he played the lute and showed a passion for music and came to be accepted as a serious composer. He eventually retired to his castle at Gesualdo, sunk into a deep melancholy from which music alone could provide relief. His music was strongly influenced by Luzzaschi and Nenna, particularly the former in his use of serious, expressive, richly worked music even for quite light texts. He took great pains over word setting, allowing texts to be clearly heard and strongly expressed. Much of the music in his six madrigal books (1594-1611) and three sacred books (1603-11) uses unexpected harmonies and changes of key, dissonances and striking chromaticism in a highly original way, usually prompted by the emotions of the texts. Stravinsky made arrangements of some of his madrigals.

Madrigals

Awards 2001

Il quarto libro di madrigali
La Venexiana (Rossana Bertini, Emanuela Galli sops Lucia Sciannimanico mez Giuseppe Maletto, Sandro Naglia tens Daniele Carnovich bass Franco Pavan, Gabriele Palomba ltes Fabio Bonizzoni hpd) / Claudio Cavina counterten
Glossa GCD920907 (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included. Recorded 2000 ●●●

These performances brilliantly advocate Gesualdo as a voice of lasting substance, not just originality. This exquisitely modulated Italian ensemble is wonderfully discriminating, extracting the eloquence of the mercurial lines and unobtrusively seeking architectural sense behind the text. The internalised 'Sparge la morte' could so easily degenerate into a series of arcane indulgences and yet one is gracefully invited by La Venexiana to inhabit the intense fabric of the finely wrought melodic contours.

Book 4 is heady stuff, indeed, if less peculiarly other-worldly and intense than some from the more established Fifth Book, but stuffed full of delectable passages. Subtle inflections of timbre and balance abound here, be it the warm immediacy of 'Mentre gira' or the softly radiant and reflective beauty of 'Ecco, morirò'. Thoroughly recommended.

Ahi, disperata vita. Sospirava il mio cor. O malnati messaggi. Non t'amo, o voce ingrata. Luci serene e chiare. Sparge la morte al mio Signor nel viso. Arde il mio cor. Occhi del mio cor vita. Mercè grido piangendo. Asciugate i begli ochi. Se la mia morte brami. Io parto. Ardita Zanzaretta. Ardo per te, mio bene. Instrumental items – Canzon francese. Io tacerò. Corrente, amanti
Les Arts Florissants / William Christie
Harmonia Mundi HMC90 1268 (55 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included

To many, Gesualdo is known above all for the crime passionnel which left his wife and her lover impaled on the same sword, but the notion that his highly-charged music is the product of a tortured and unstable mind is, no doubt, over-romanticized. For this foray into the schizophrenic world of Gesualdo's five-voice madrigals, Les Arts Florissants have selected their programme from the last three books, pieces in which the highly-mannered and exaggerated aspects of the composer's style reach their most extreme expression. Nevertheless, we should not think of all these works being undifferentiated in style, and one of the fascinations of this disc, which has been very carefully planned, is the insight it offers into the gradual emergence and sharpening of the features which characterise Gesualdo's late madrigalian manner.

Some of those elements can already be heard in Sospirava il mio cor from the Third Book, and by the last tracks they are present, with all their compositional distortions in full dress. William Christie and Les Arts Florissants are no strangers to the aesthetic of the Italian madrigal in its last decades. This recording, like so many of their productions, is full of surprises on both the large and small scales. The first, of a general kind, is the decision to add continuo accompaniments avant la lettre. This is justifiable on historical grounds, though less certain is the precise way it has been done with some passages within a piece still left a cappella. What is less justifiable, if only on artistic grounds, is the performance of two madrigals on instruments alone (Io tacerò and Corrente, amanti); it makes little sense to attempt such highly charged word-driven music in this way. What may also surprise is the rather understated, almost classically-pure character of the interpretations, though it is a relief that the calculatedly neurotic and deliberately out-of-tune manner so often turned out for Gesualdo has here been eschewed. These are technically very fine and dramatically convincing and coherent readings which are certainly preferable to any other recordings of Gesualdo's madrigals currently available.

Gesualdo Asciugate i begli occhi. Beltà, poiché t'assenti. Canzone del Principe. Gioite voi col canto. Languisce al fin. Mercè grido piangendo. Moro, lasso, al mio duolo. Se la mia morte brami. Se vi duol il mio duolo. S'io non miro non moro. Tu m'uccidi, o crudele Luzzaschi Madrigals, Book 5 – Lungi da te cor mio; Ahi cruda sorte mia; Itene mie querele Monte Di mie dogliose note Montella Se lontana voi sete Nenna Occhi miei che vedeste Ⓟ
Concerto Italiano (Elisa Franzetti, Monica Piccinini, Elisabetta Tiso sops Rosa Domínguez mez Alessandro Carmignani conterten Gianluca Ferrarini, Paolo Fanciullacci tens Sergio Foresti bass Mara Galassi hp Andrea Damiani theorb) / Rinaldo Alessandrini
Opus 111 OPS30-238 (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1999 ●●

The first impression is that Rinaldo Alessandrini's Gesualdo lacks the burnished warmth of his Monteverdi. The acoustic is less resonant, and the exactitude of the singers' tuning makes it cold, at times almost claustrophobic; in other words the tone has been judged just about perfectly. We begin with perhaps the most famous madrigal of them all, Moro, lasso, al mio duolo, and the tendency to downplay the dramatic potential of those famous chromatic audacities sets the tone from the start. Indeed, some may find the understatement surprising. However, these interpretations have real staying power, a narrative persuasiveness that unfolds with repeated listening.

Concerto Italiano's approach does Gesualdo more favours than the histrionics that his music can so readily invite. It is true that similar strategies recur from work to work: for example the sensuous settings of words addressed to the beloved – 'dolcissimo cor mio', 'Dolce del cor tesoro', both rendered as sensually as possible – and the contrasts with harsher sentiments that immediately follow. It would be absurd to claim for Gesualdo a range to which he probably never aspired. As it is, could anyone guess how the penultimate syllable of the phrase 'potessi dirti pria ch'io mora' (in Mercè grido piangendo) resolves? That a major chord can be so jarring sums up Gesualdo's art very neatly, and here as elsewhere the singers find unsuspected poignancy in a pause or a breath.

The disc begins and ends with madrigals from composers whom Gesualdo admired. However, these performances are not quite so convincing: they are weighed down by the continuo (harp and theorbo), which is absent from the performances of Gesualdo. But his Gesualdo really is indispensable.

Tenebrae responses

Responsoria et alia ad Officium Hebdonadae Sanctae spectantia
Taverner Choir / Andrew Parrott
Sony Classical SK62977 (67 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included. Recorded 1996

Gesualdo's Tenebrae have a distinguished discography – the Hilliard Ensemble's recording of all three days of the Triduum sacrum for ECM achieved considerable popularity. This recording from the Taverner Choir is no less compelling, and it includes the plainsong which ought to frame Gesualdo's polyphony, an essential detail which the Hilliards left out.

The composer's tough vision comes across all the more forcefully, betraying not a hint of complacency. Liturgical reconstruction is a rock on which many fine performances have foundered, but can be very effective when the plainchant is interpreted as consciously as the polyphony. There is no suggestion of auto-pilot in the way the plainsong is delivered: no lush, rounded cadences, but carefully chosen voices whose pleasing edge keeps the music firmly anchored to earth. Listening to the polyphony, one is struck by the care with which Parrott has chosen his singers. The countertenors in particular seem to rise out of the chest-tone of the lower voices: a 'bottom-up' approach to timbre more typical of continental ensembles than of English ones. It has always been a great strength of Parrott's that he ensures that the stable core of singers comprising the Taverner Choir can adapt its sound to the music under consideration. And right from the first polyphonic entry, the acerbic quality of Gesualdo's chordal progressions have a dynamism that is deeply involving.

Those who treasure the Hilliards' recording need not fear duplication, and for the first-time buyer one can recommend either version.

Orlando Gibbons British 1583-1625

GROVE Gibbons came from a musical family and was a chorister (1596-8) and student (1599-1603) at King's College, Cambridge. He joined the Chapel Royal in c 1603 and was one of its organists by 1615 (senior organist, 1625). In 1619 he became a virginal player at court and in 1623 organist at Westminster Abbey. He took the MusB at Cambridge (1606) and the DMus at Oxford (1622). One of the most important English composers of sacred music in the early 17th century, he wrote several Anglican services, popular in their day, and over 30 anthems, some imposing and dramatic (e.g. O clap your hands), others colourful and most expressive (See, the word is incarnate; This is the record of John). His instrumental music, also important, includes over 30 elaborate contrapuntal viol fantasias and over 40 masterly keyboard pieces. His madrigals (1612) are generally serious in tone (eg The Silver Swanne).

Keyboard Works

'The Woods So Wild' P
Fantasias – in D minor, MBXX/5; in G, MBXX/6; in D minor, MBXX/7 (for double organ); in D minor, MBXX/8; in G minor, MBXX/9; in A minor, MBXX/10; in A minor, MBXX/11; in A minor, MBXX/12; in C, MBXX/13; in C, MBXX/14; Ground, MBXX/26. Italian Ground, MBXX/27. Pavan and Galliard in A minor, 'Lord Salisbury', MBXX/18-19. The Fairest Nymph, MBXX/43. Preludes – in A minor, MBXX/1; G, MBXX/2; in D minor, MBXX/3; in A minor, MBXX/4; The Woods So Wild, MBXX/29. Galliard, MBXX/23. Pavans – MBXX/16; MBXX/17. Coranto, MBXX/39
John Toll org/hpd
Linn Records CKD125 (73 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

John Toll succumbed to cancer in his early fifties, thus depriving the world of a supreme continuo player, in many ways unchallenged in his generation. This disc's quality deepens the sense of loss. The choice of Gibbons is itself intriguing for a man whose main career was in Baroque music. But it is clear from every note that this was a composer very close to Toll's heart, that he acknowledged the quiet poet who has perhaps the most distinctive voice of all composers from the age of Shakespeare.

Toll has focused on the most substantial works. All the Fantasias are here, as well as most of the Pavans; but most of the smaller dances are omitted. So we have a Gibbons of considerable seriousness, which Toll underlines by controlled playing that has not the slightest trace of self-indulgence. What we hear in Toll is the composer who was not just the 'best finger of that age' but also one of the finest contrapuntists and a man of marvellous musical imagination. Toll divides the music between two instruments. The late 17th-century organ at Adlington Hall sounds absolutely glorious, beautifully caught by the engineers, and played with sympathetic mastery; it is used not just for Fantasias but also for some of the music that one would more instinctively have thought intended for a harpsichord – with fascinating results. A modern Flemish-style harpsichord by Michael Johnson serves for the rest, but again not just for the dances. This is top-quality playing.

Vocal Works

O clap your hands. Great Lord of Lords. Hosanna to the Son of David. Prelude in G[a]. Out of the deep. See, see, the Word is incarnate. Preludes – No 3 in D minor, MBXX/3[a]. Lift up your heads. Almighty and everlasting God. First (Short) Service – No 6, Magnificat; No 7, Nunc dimittis. Second Service – No 3, Magnificat; No 4, Nunc dimittis. Fantazia of four parts[a]. O God, the king of glory. O Lord, in Thy wrath rebuke me not Oxford Camerata / Jeremy Summerly with [a]Laurence Cummings org
Naxos 8 553130 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Texts included
Recorded 1994

The Oxford Camerata provides a representative selection of choral works by Gibbons, together with three of his organ pieces. The programme is introduced by a bright and busy performance of the eight-part O clap your hands, followed by the noble verse anthem Great Lord of Lords – and it is pleasing to hear in this piece, and in the other verse-anthems, the rich timbre of the countertenor Robin Blaze, a welcome acquisition for the Camerata, which has a great deal of vocal talent in its make-up. They tackle the gently moving See, see, the Word is incarnate with great confidence, together with the First and Second Services and the quiet collects with all the knowledge and aplomb of cathedral lay clerks or choral scholars from Oxford and Cambridge. Laurence Cummings plays two short preludes, the one in G major – a real test of agility – from Parthenia and that in D minor from Benjamin Cosyn's Virginal Book. The Fantazia of four parts is a most extraordinary work, quite hard to steady and control. Nevertheless, it is a welcome addition to the programme.

Pavan and Galliard a 6. Fantasia a 2 No 1. Go from my window. Fantasias a 6 – Nos 3 and 5. Fantasia a 4 No 1 'for the great double bass'. Galliard a 3. In Nomine a 4. Pavan and Galliard in A minor, 'Lord Salisbury'. Prelude in G. Masks – Lincoln's Inn mask; The Fairest Nymph. Alman in G. Behold, thou hast made my days. Glorious and powerful God. The First Set of Madrigals and Mottets – Daintie fine bird; Faire is the rose; I weigh not fortune's frown; I see ambition never pleased; I feign not friendship where I hate; The silver swanne
Tessa Bonner sop Timothy Roberts keybds Red Byrd; Rose Consort of Viols
Naxos 8 550603 (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1992

Beautifully performed and finely recorded, this selection of Gibbons's music is especially attractive for its variety. At its richest it presents writing for voice and viols combined, five parts to each, or for viols alone, sometimes in six parts. In lightest, most transparent texture there is a charming piece for two viols. Three keyboard instruments are used for solos: virginals, harpsichord and organ. A soprano also sings solos to viol accompaniment. Moods and styles vary correspondingly. The Masks and Alman for virginals have a high-spirited, almost popular manner; the Fifth Fantasia includes some unusual chromaticism and harmonic developments that for a while almost anticipate Purcell. Tessa Bonner sings with unvibrant purity; but most striking here is the pronunciation. It is one of the distinguishing marks of this curiously named group, Red Byrd, that they sing such music with vowel-sounds modified to fit theories about the English in which it would originally have been sung. Thus the 'daintie fine bird' tells 'oi sing and doy', and the 'u' acquires a sort of umlaut in I weigh not fortune's frown, 'weigh' and 'frown' also having a measure of rusticity. Perhaps it is a good idea, but it does increase the desirability of printed texts in the booklet. The instrumental music is finely played, the viols avoiding any imputation of belonging to the squeeze-and-scrape school, and Timothy Roberts's keyboard solos are particularly skilful, in legato and fluency.

Eugène Gigout French 1844-1925

GROVE Gigout studied with Saint-Saëns at the Ecole Niedermeyer and associated with Fauré and Franck. In 1863 he became organist of St Augustin, Paris, and in 1911 began teaching at the Conservatoire. Most of his music is for organ.

Organ Works

'The Complete Organ Works, Volume 1'
Rhapsodie sur des airs catalans.
Suite de six pièces. Trois pièces
Gerard Brooks org
Priory PRCD761 (77 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Played on the organ of Perpignan Cathedral, France

For lovers of organ sound this disc is an absolute treasure. Perpignan's sumptuous Cavaillé-Coll is not an organ of memorable solo stops but of deliciously blended, exquisitely balanced choruses. Full organ is warm and robust while its plentiful soft-stops have a subtlety and charm which, even in the face of the omnipresent action clatter, this recording captures with almost magical delicacy. The fourth of the Suite de six pièces, an Andantino in E minor, is lent distinction by the utter charm of the contrasting soft flute and string choruses, while the first of the Trois pièces dances across the manuals revealing tantalising glimpses of colour richly enhanced by the atmospheric acoustic of Perpignan's cathedral. All this is superbly captured in Priory's rich, mellow recording.

In his deft handling of the instrument and his keen sense of colour, Brooks proves that there is much more to organ playing than big virtuoso gestures. Which may be as well since there is little scope for such things here. Not only do all 10 pieces on this disc completely avoid the virtuoso and emotional excesses of Liszt, Widor and Vierne, but none stretches much over 10 minutes in duration. With the exception of the captivating Rhapsodie sur des airs catalans, all are relatively youthful works revealing a composer with a keen sense of structure and a penchant for contrapuntal argument. A most attractive release.

Umberto Giordano Italian 1867-1948

GROVE Giordano studied with Serrao at the Naples Conservatory between 1880 and 1890 and was commissioned, after showing promise in a competition, to write an opera: this was Mala vita, a verismo opera of some violence and crudity, given at Rome in 1892. After another failure (an old-fashioned romantic melodrama), he moved to Milan, where his Andrea Chenier was given, at La Scala, in 1896; with its French Revolutionary subject and its fervent, assertive style, it was an immediate success and has remained popular in Italy and beyond. Comparable success, at least in Italy, was met by Fedora (1898, Milan), but of his seven later operas only the comic Il re (1929, Milan), which was taken up by coloratura sopranos, enjoyed any real success although he remained a master of the intense, vehement, Massenet-influenced, theatrically effective style that gives Andrea Chenier its appeal.

Andrea Chénier

Luciano Pavarotti ten Andrea Chénier; Leo Nucci bar Gerard; Montserrat Caballé sop Maddalena; Kathleen Kuhlmann mez Bersi; Astrid Varnay sop Countess di Coigny; Christa Ludwig mez Madelon; Tom Krause bar Roucher; Hugues Cuénod ten Fleville; Neil Howlett bar Fouquier-Tinville, Majordomo; Giorgio Tadeo bass Mathieu; Piero De Palma ten Incredible; Florindo Andreolli ten Abate; Giuseppe Morresi bass Schmidt; Ralph Hamer bass Dumas Welsh National Opera Chorus; National Philharmonic Orchestra / Riccardo Chailly
Decca ② 410 117-2DH2 (107 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, text and translation included
Recorded 1982-84 ●

Whatever else, this is undoubtedly the best-recorded and probably the best-conducted Chénier yet. Chailly overconducts the score, drawing attention to himself rather than to Giordano, but by and large he is sympathetic to both the score and his singers. Chénier isn't easy to interpret; it bustles along busily all the time, but not always with much distinction or to any very strong purpose. For the many and important small roles, Decca has assembled half a dozen old faithfuls in various states of vocal health. Varnay goes rather over the top as the old Countess in Act 1. The three comprimario tenors, whose combined ages must be more than 200, all make the mark with Piero De Palma the most potent as the spy Incredible, an object-lesson in acting with the voice. Giorgio Tadeo, a buffo bass of distinction, here turns himself into the nasty Mathieu. Krause is an honourable Roucher. But Christa Ludwig is better than any, making old Madelon's brief appearance into a moving vignette. Of the younger singers, Kathleen Kuhlmann is a rather anonymous Bersi, while Neil Howlett is a snarling Fouquier-Tinville.

But Chénier stands or falls by its three principals. All three here perform eloquently. Pavarotti tends to rasp his way through the Improvviso, but improves no end in his first love duet with Maddalena, and defies the court in Act 3 with real heroism. But it is in the final act that his tone recaptures its old refulgence in his poetic musings and death-going duet. Again and again a phrase will set Caballé apart as a uniquely subtle artist. There are occasionally those self-regarding mannerisms that she indulges in, also a want of sheer tonal weight, but you will warm to her portrayal. Nucci's Gérard is excellent, a nice balance between line and punch. Pavarotti and Caballé enthusiasts will need to have this set; others should perhaps endeavour to hear the pros and cons of Levine.

Andrea Chénier
Plácido Domingo ten Andrea Chénier; Renata Scotto sop Maddalena; Sherrill Milnes bar Carlo Gérard; Michael Sénéchal ten Incredible; Maria Ewing mez Bersi; Gwendolyn Killebrew mez Madelon; Jean Kraft mez Countess; Allan Monk bar Roucher; Terence Sharpe bar Fléville; Stuart Harling bass Fouquier-Tinville; Isser Bushkin bass Schmidt; Malcolm King bass Dumas; Piero De Palma ten Abate; Nigel Beavan bass-bar Maestro di casa; Enzo Dara bar Mathieu John Alldis Choir; National Philharmonic Orchestra / James Levine
RCA ② 74321 39499-2 (114 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Notes, text and translation included
Recorded 1976

Choosing between these two recordings, it might seem sensible to start with the tenor in the title-role, and here a strong inclination would be to plump for RCA and Domingo: he is in splendid voice, with a touch of nobility to his manner that makes for a convincing portrayal of a poet. Pavarotti (Chailly) begins with a rather leather-lunged Improvviso, but he later finds poetry in the role as well, especially when responding to his soprano, Caballé, who is rather stretched by the more exhausting reaches of her role and sounds audibly grateful for the occasional opportunities he gives her to float rather than belt a high-lying phrase. However, Pavarotti is an Italian tenor, and his Italianate sense of line adds one per cent or so of elegance to some phrases that even Domingo cannot match. Caballé does many things beautifully, and her fine-spun pianissimos and subtle shadings only occasionally sound mannered, but the role is undeniably half-a-size too big for her. So it is for Scotto, you might say, and a hint of strain is audible once or twice, in her timbre rather than her phrasing. It is her phrasing, indeed, that tips the balance back to RCA: Scotto is as subtle a vocalist as Caballé, but she gives meaning and eloquence to every phrase without ever breaking the long line, which one cannot always say of the Spanish soprano. Matters are about even as far as the baritones are concerned: Milnes acts admirably, but refrains from over-acting, and the voice is rich and characterful. In the supporting cast, but RCA's striking Bersi, vividly characterised Incredible, and their Roucher, too, are not outmatched (only their Madelon, both fruity and acid – a grapefruit of a voice – is disappointing).

A lot of people will enjoy the huge energy and bustle of Levine's direction. It is vividly characterful, but a shade exhausting and overassertive. The flow of the music seems more natural in Chailly's hands, and orchestral detail is clearer. The Decca recording, too, is warmer.

Fedora

Magda Olivero sop Fedora; Mario del Monaco ten Loris; Tito Gobbi bar de Siriex; Leonardo Monreale bass Lorek, Nicola; Lucia Cappellino sop Olga; Virgilio Carbonari bass Borov; Silvio Maionica bass Grech; Piero de Palma ten Rouvel; Peter Binder bar Kiril; Dame Kiri Te Kanawa sop Dmitri; Riccardo Cassinelli ten Desire; Athos Cesarini ten Sergio; Pascal Rogé pf Boleslao Lazinski Monte-Carlo Opera Chorus and Orchestra / Lamberto Gardelli
Zandonai Francesca da Rimini: Act 2 – E ancora sgombro il campo del comune? … Date il segno, Paolo, date … Un'erba io m'avea, per sanare … Onta et orrore sopra[abde]. Act 3 – No, Smadragedi, no! … Paolo, datemi pace! … Ah la parola chi i miei occhi incontrano[ab]. Act 4 – Ora andate … E così, vada s'è pur mio destino[abc]
[a]Magda Oliviero sop Francesca; [b]Mario del Monaco ten Paolo; [c]Annamaria Gasparini mez Biancofiore; [d]Virgilio Carbonari bass Man-at-arms; [e]Athos Cesarini ten Archer Monte-Carlo Opera Orchestra / Nicola Rescigno
Decca Grand Opera ② 433 033-2DM2 Ⓜ
(132 minutes: ADD). Notes, texts and translations included. Recorded 1969

The music in Fedora is richly textured orchestrally and finely written for the voices, and this recording made in 1969 is notable for the singing of both Magda Olivero and Mario del Monaco, who, despite being in their mid-fifties, bring tremendous verve, vocal resource and dramatic skill to their roles. Tito Gobbi has less to do as the diplomat de Siriex, but gives him character, and another plus is the playing of Pascal Rogé, who performs the non-singing role of the Polish pianist and spy Boleslao Lazinski in Act 2 who, while performing, eavesdrops on a dialogue between Loris and Fedora. This exchange is a marvellous example of verismo writing and singing, and so is their final scene with her death. The set opens with excerpts from another opera, Zandonai's Francesca da Rimini with the same two excellent principals. The recordings are clear and and fresh-sounding .

Madame Sans-Gêne

Mirella Freni sop Caterina; Giorgio Merighi ten Lefebvre; Mauro Buda bar Napoleone; Andrea Zese bar Fouche; Valter Borin ten Neipperg; Antonio Feltracco ten Vinaigre, Despreaux; Marzia Giaccaia sop Toniotta, Carolina; Muriel Tomeo sop Giulia; Federica Bragaglia sop Principessa Elisa, La Rossa; Valerio Marletta bar De Brigole; Riccardo Ristori bar Gelsomino, Roustan; Alfio Grasso bar Leroy; Muriel Tomao sop Madame Bulow Modeno Teatro Comunale Chorus; Emilia Romagna 'Toscanini' Symphony Orchestra / Stefano Ranzani
Dynamic CDS247 (123 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, text and translation included
Recorded live in 1999

In the not-so-distant past most 'serious' musicians thought Giordano beneath notice while opera-goers of a certain kind felt he was everything they stood for. He was passionate and melodious; he gave his singers something to sing, and, under the right circumstances, genuine thrills were to be had. He was also considered to be out of the common run: the aristocrat of verismo, with Chenier's 'Improvviso' as the thinking-man's 'Nessun dorma'.

This opinion was usually based on Andrea Chenier and (with slightly less conviction) Fedora. Otherwise a few excerpts from one or two lesser-known operas were gratefully heard but did not allay suspicions that a wider acquaintance might prove disheartening. Meanwhile, this set from the Italian-based company, Dynamic, invites us all to think again. The plot of Madame Sans-Gene is a rather charming variant on the theme of the Emperor's clothes; it is also about a star-struck girl who learns sense and returns to home and boyfriend. The première at La Scala in 1929 failed to impress, though Toscanini conducted and Toti Dal Monte sang the leading role; apparently Giordano was almost found guilty of modernism. To us now, the score is elegantly lyrical and lively, modern in relation to Chenier as (say) Gianni Schicchi is in relation to Manon Lescaut; and, as far as its position in the body of his work is concerned, Gianni Schicchi might be a fair analogy.

Madame Sans-Gene is also a comedy. The story takes a serious turn in Act 3, which for a while seems about to topple over into tragedy. Napoleon, previously a figure in the background, appears in person and in a bad mood, but is charmed and shamed into a talk about old times with the genial heroine and all ends well. At first Madame Sans-Gene, so-called, seems to be one of those tireless life-and-soul-of-the-party people who can be so wearing, but she develops into less of a turn and more of a character, while her chirpy vocal line eventually settles for a more rewarding warmth and lyricism. She even has a kind of 'Improvviso' herself, a spirited solo in which instead of playing the gracious hostess to a lot of stuck-up women she tells them their fortune in no uncertain terms.

It is understandable that the role should be attractive to a star soprano who late in her career looks for something out of the way in which much is accomplished by personality. Mirella Freni's voice is still full-bodied and to a large extent pure in quality, but for many years now has forfeited the firm evenness of its prime. She gives a genuine performance – and (not far off her 64th birthday) a remarkable one.

The best singing, however, is that of the tenor, Giorgio Merighi. Martinelli sang the role at the premiere in 1915, and something of that incisive tone and ardent address are recaptured here. Mauro Buda as Napoleon shows an almost tenorial baritone which it would be good to hear in a part with more opportunities.

Maestro Ranzani conducts with spirit. As a recording this is a great deal more satisfactory than the currently available alternative, taken from an Italian radio transmission in 1957.

Mauro Giuliani

Italian 1781-1829

In Vienna from 1806, Giuliani became famous as the greatest living guitarist, teaching, performing and composing a rich repertory for the guitar. He was also a cellist, playing in the première of Beethoven's Symphony no.7 (1813). In 1814 he became honorary chamber musician to Napoleon's second wife. He returned to Italy in 1819 and was patronized by the nobility. His works include three guitar concertos, sonatas, studies and variations for solo guitar, quartets and many duos (with flute or violin) for guitar and songs.

Guitar Concerto No 1

Giuliani Guitar Concerto No 1 in A, Op 30
Schubert Sonata for Arpeggione and Piano in A minor, D821 (arr Williams)
John Williams gtr Australian Chamber Orchestra
Sony Classical SK63385 (52 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1998

The guitar has played a part in several adaptations of the Schubert A minor Sonata, substituting for either the arpeggione or the piano, but never before with a string orchestra in the supporting role, reversing the bowed/percussive relationship. Good arranging does not consist of literal adherence to the original score but, as here, in making small changes to take advantage of the new instrumentation. Rarely has such a transmutation been accomplished with greater conviction. Put any doubts or prejudices you may have on the back burner and prepare to enjoy familiar beauty in new clothing. The Giuliani is familiar in every respect – except that of interpretation. What we have in this recording is the recognition of the relationship between instrumental and vocal music in Giuliani's work; it is apparent in his (and others') frequent adaptation of operatic music for the guitar, but has more or less escaped the attention of guitarists on record. The vocal quality of the writing is fully realised here, producing what might even be regarded as the first stylistically faithful recording of the First Concerto. The performances from both John Williams and the Australian Chamber Orchestra are exemplary and praise should also extend to the engineers who recorded them with such clarity and ideal balance. If you already have these works, don't let it deter you from adding this revelatory one to your collection.

Philip Glass

American 1937

Glass studied at the Juilliard School and with Boulanger in Paris (1964-66) and worked with the Indian musicians Ravi Shankar and Alla Rakha. His minimalist works of 1965-68 (eg Two Pages) are 'experimental and exploratory' but later ones, for his own amplified ensemble, are more complicated (eg Music in Fifths). Since 1975 his works have nearly all been for the theatre. When Einstein on the Beach was given at the Met (1976) he became famous; further full-scale operas, Satyagraha (1980), Akhnaten (1984), The Making of the Representative for Planet 8 (1988) and The Voyage (1992), chamber operas and music theatre works followed. One of the most popular serious composers in the USA, he has also performed in rock and jazz.

Symphony No 2

Symphony No 2. Orphée – Interlude. Concerto for Saxophone Quartet and Orchestra
Raschèr Saxophone Quartet (Carina Raschèr sop sax Harry Kinross White alto sax Bruce Weinberger ten sax Kenneth Coon bass sax) Vienna Radio Symphony Orchestra, Stuttgart Chamber Orchestra / Dennis Russell Davies
Nonesuch 7559-79496-2 (69 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996

Glass is not a symphonist in the conventional sense, but then nor was Messiaen. Glass himself has indicated that his large-scale orchestral works are conceived with their probable role in the conventions of concert programming (and, presumably, recording) in mind. This sounds outrageously manipulative when stated explicitly, but it is of course nothing more than a description of the context of the symphonic form since its inception, which conveniently returns us to square one. Glass has also said that he devoted his earlier career to subtracting elements from his music and is now deciding what to put back in. In the case of this symphony, the specified element is polytonality, the presence of which in much 20th-century music (Glass cites Honegger, Milhaud and Villa-Lobos in his booklet-note) is perhaps taken for granted. However, when it is added into this stripped-down and austere idiom, the results are certainly quite striking. The opening movement recalls the prelude to Akhnaten, the third and final movement reprises the chattering arpeggios of the composer's earlier works, closing with an exciting – and, indeed, viscera-loosening – crescendo.

After recovering during the snippet from Orphée, we come to the marvellous Concerto. Conceived for performance either as a quartet or in this quartet-plus-orchestra version, this is a gloriously animated work, almost Coplandesque in many respects, yet remaining true to Glass's own vision. Despite being presented as the secondary work on this disc, its presence makes the whole recommendable.

Symphony No 3

Symphony No 3[a]. The CIVIL WarS – Interludes Nos 1 and 2[a]. The Voyage – Mechanical Ballet[b]. The Light[b]
[a]Stuttgart Radio Symphony Orchestra,

[b]Vienna Radio Symphony Orchestra / Dennis Russell Davies
Nonesuch 7559-79581-2 (61 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1999

Comparing Glass's Third Symphony with his Second finds the forces reduced from full orchestra to strings, the overall timing reduced by virtually half and the number of movements increased from three to four. Glass No 2 is long-breathed, atmospheric and occasionally suggestive of Brucknerian vistas, whereas Glass No 3 is texturally lean and harmonically more adventurous than much of the composer's previous work. It also seems to have taken in influences from some fairly unexpected sources.

The first movement is sombre and march-like while the second, which is built on compound meters, kicks out in all directions, switching to a gutsy staccato at 2'59". Of course, the pulse is constant (Glass wouldn't be Glass if that had changed) but the tone has altered, sometimes sidling nearer to Sibelius, sometimes a stone's throw from Shostakovich. At the start of the brief finale, there's even a hint of Kurt Weill ('Anger' from the Seven Deadly Sins), but one thing is for sure: if you play the Symphony blind, you might never guess that it's by Glass.

The stylistic shift from mellow, arpeggiated dreamscape (a familiar Glassian aura that holds sway for most of The Light) to a sort of ecstatic acerbity, follows through to the rest of the work. But there's another presence – less of a surprise, perhaps – later in the long third movement when the Arvo Pärt of Cantus seems to join the fray (try from around 8'03").

The idea of external influence extends to the interludes from The CIVIL WarS, where, as annotator David Wright tells us, Tchaikovsky's Nutcracker gets a look in, particularly in the Second Interlude with its pas-de-deux-like downward scales. 'Mechanical Ballet' (from The Voyage) and the expansive The Light are rather more what you'd expect from Glass: haunting narratives, always on the move yet tinged with melancholy. But even if you don't care for Glass's more familiar 'arpeggiated' style, do try the Third Symphony. It's certainly different, and the performance is excellent.

The Hours

The Hours – original soundtrack
Michael Riesman pf Lyric Quartet
(Rolf Wilson, Edmund Coxon vns Nicholas Barr va David Daniels vc); Chris Laurence db orchestra / Nick Ingham
Nonesuch 7559-79693-2 (58 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded c2002 ●

'I love Glass's music,' writes Michael Cunningham in the note included with this recording, 'almost as much as I love [Virginia] Woolf's Mrs Dalloway, and for some of the same reasons. Glass, like Woolf, is more interested in that which continues than he is in that which begins, climaxes and ends; he insists, as did Woolf, that beauty often resides more squarely in the present than it does in the present's relationship to past or future.'

Seldom has there been such a concisely eloquent description of Glass's work. And the analogy with Woolf is in this case quintessentially correct, for The Hours is a film with deals with Mrs Woolf, her creation Mrs Dalloway and, as we eventually learn, a Los Angeles housewife, Mrs Brown. The present-ness of their situations is what connects these three women, eternally containing the potential to leap into the future or regress into the past… Was there ever a more perfect film for Glass's current lyrical manner? He himself refers to his own past, quoting from his 'Glassworks' and 'Solo Piano' collections, and from as far back as his opera Satyagraha, but the way in which the material is treated here, clothed in nostalgic colours by piano, string quartet and orchestra, transforms it inevitably into that eternal present. This album of music has a feeling of fragile beauty which never lapses into mere sentimentality – a rare achievement.

Itaipú

The Canyon. Itaipú[a]
Atlanta Symphony [a]Chorus and Orchestra / Robert Shaw
Sony Classical SK46352 (56 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1990 ●

The idea of spacious natural vistas has always been central to the work of Glass. Itaipú and The Canyon are the second and third of his 'portraits of nature', the former being a commission from the Atlanta Symphony Orchestra and Chorus, while the latter was composed specifically for the Rotterdam Philharmonic. Itaipú is located on the Paraná River, which in turn forms the border between Brazil and Paraguay. It is the location of a massive hydro-electric dam with individual generators large enough to house a full symphony orchestra. So it's little wonder that Itaipú provided Glass with instant inspiration. The score itself is divided into four separate sections and calls on substantial orchestral and choral forces. Although consistent with Glass's other work, Itaipú has an especially dark, rugged tonal profile. The hub of the work – 'The Dam' itself – is in the third movement, where brass and winds abet a pounding ostinato and a series of modulations redolent of such scenically aware late-romantics as Sibelius, Bruckner and Roy Harris. It's one of the most arresting passages in Glass's output and gives a vivid impression of the dam's overwhelming physical presence.

The Canyon is purely orchestral; it's built around two basic ideas, with a jagged middle section that heats up for a powerful climax. Less heavily scored than Itaipú, The Canyon utilises a large array of percussion, which Glass exploits with his usual ear for nuance. But Itaipú is the disc's main 'event' – a patient, cumulatively powerful essay, easily assimilated and well enough crafted to repay repeated listening. Those who find certain other of Glass's works monotonous and uneventful would do well to sample it. The recordings are cleanly balanced, the performances neat. Recommended, especially to those not normally 'behind Glass'.

Music in similar motion

'Music in the shape of a square'
Music in similar motion[a]. Strung Out[d].
Piece in the shape of a square[b]. Gradus[c].
Music in contrary motion[a]
[a]Alter Ego ([b]Manuel Zurria fl [c]Paolo Ravaglia cl [d]Francesco Peverini vn Francesco Dillon vc Oscar Pizzo kybd Gianluca Ruggeri mari) Ⓕ
Stradivarius STR33602 (78 minutes: DDD) ●●

Alter Ego's disc, all of music written by Glass between 1967 and 1969, is quite stunning. They kick off with a tremendous performance, powerful and sensitive in equal measure, of Music in similar motion, undoubtedly one of Glass's most powerful and enduring works. This is followed by violinist Francesco Peverini's dazzling rendition of the solo Strung Out, which is such a tour de force that one is left quite out of breath just by listening. Piece in the shape of a square, for two flutes, was recorded using overdubbing. It's a literal tongue-twister, with its exhilarating quick-fire exchanges between the two lines receiving a transcendent performance from Manuel Zurria (who, one presumes, must have breathed at some stage, though one would be hard put to say exactly where).

The disc closes with another blazing ensemble piece, Music in contrary motion. Their beautiful performance, while evincing a tremendous rhythmic precision, also flows in the most extraordinary way. An essential disc for anyone interested in Glass's work.

Naqoyqatsi

Naqoyqatsi – Original Film Soundtrack
Yo-Yo Ma vc Members of the Philip Glass Ensemble (Lisa Bielawa sop Jon Gibson, Richard Peck saxs Andrew Sterman fl, picc, cl Michael Riesman kbd) orchestra / Michael Riesman
Sony Classical SK87709 (77 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded c2002 ●

This is another colourful, barnstorming film score from Glass, and one that contains enough material of substance that it can stand quite successfully on its own. There are the expected Glass fingerprints – the powerful, pulsing, dark-hued 'heartbeat' opening, the rippling arpeggios of 'Religion', the clangorous vocal and orchestral writing in 'Intensive Time' and 'Point Blank', both of which recall parts of his opera Akhnaten – but there are also moments when Glass creates something quite new.

In 'Massman' he explores the higher regions of the solo cello in some hauntingly lyrical music; and lyricism, of a non-western kind, also characterises two remarkable sections for solo cello and percussion, 'New World' and 'Old World'. A more purely romantic sensibility is at work in 'Media Weather', as in other sections in passing, but it seems all of a piece with this interesting mixture of the familiar pulsing, glowing Glass and the less familiar, introspective lyrical composer. The performance is superb, and beautifully recorded. Nobody with an interest in Glass should hesitate.

La Belle et la Bête

Janice Felty mez La Belle; Gregory Purnhagen bar La Bête, Avenant, Ardent, Port Official; John Kuether bass Father, Usurer; Ana Maria Martinez sop Felicie; Hallie Neill sop Adelaide; Zheng Zhou bar Ludovic
Philip Glass Ensemble / Michael Riesman
Nonesuch ② 7559-79347-2 (89 minutes: DDD)
Notes, text and translation included. Ⓕ
Recorded 1994 ●

This is one of Glass's most innovative and impressive works. It isn't exactly an opera, but nor is it film music; cantata is the nearest term, yet even that won't really convey the idea. What Glass has done is to make a setting of the script for Jean Cocteau's 1946 film La Belle et la Bête, using every word as it is spoken in the film, but having it sung, the whole thing designed to be performed in concert, with a print of the film being projected silently. Of all Cocteau's movies, La Belle et la Bête is visually the most stylised, with its images of the Beast's castle, and the Vermeeresque settings for the family home of the merchant whose search for a rose to give to his youngest daughter sets off the nightmarish story. Cocteau described his film as 'the illustration of the border that separates one world from the other'. For all its surreal photography and extravagant décor by Christian Bérard (the arms-bearing candelabra, poking out from the wall, have influenced hundreds of interior decorators), the dialogue in the film is delivered in a naturalistic way. The words are sung in an ethereal way, and the music itself trembles with characteristic Glass motifs.

La Belle et la Bête hovers somewhere between genteel beat music and Messiaen-influenced mélodie and defies categorisation. As Beauty, Janice Felty's voice matches the image of Josette Day in the film, but Gregory Purnhagen's light baritone would never suggest Jean Marais, whose smoky tones were such an inspiration to Cocteau. Most people prefer the Beast with his hairy face and claws to the rather effete-looking Prince Charming who emerges at the end, and Glass's music seems to make an ironic commentary on this transformation. Well worth investigating.

Alexander Glazunov

Russian/USSR 1865-1936

GROVE Glazunov studied privately with Rimsky-Korsakov (1879-81) and had his First Symphony performed when he was 16. He became a member of the circle around the patron Belyayev, who took him to meet Liszt in Weimar, and in 1899 was appointed to the St Petersburg Conservatory, which he directed from 1905 until leaving the Soviet Union in 1928. During these later years he composed relatively little: the bulk of his output, which includes nine symphonies, much else for orchestra, the ballet Raymonda (1897) and seven quartets, dates from before World War I. He has a significant place in Russian music in that he reconciled Russianism and Europeanism. He absorbed Balakirev's nationalism, Rimsky-Korsakov's orchestral virtuosity, Tchaikovsky's lyricism, Borodin's epic grandeur and Taneyev's contrapuntal skill.

Violin Concerto in A minor, Op 82

Violin Concerto. Meditation, Op 32[a]
The Seasons, Op 67
[a]Aaron Rosand vn Malaysian Philharmonic Orchestra / Kees Bakels
Vox Classics VXP7907 (61 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded c2001/02 ●

Aaron Rosand began recording for Vox in the late 1950s. Now in his seventies, his timbre and technique are as sure as ever. Moreover Rosand's very stylish playing of the delightful Glazunov Concerto brings a sense of having lived with this music over the decades, yet returning to it as to an old friend, with no possible hint of staleness. The beguiling opening theme floats off the bow with the most engaging warmth and an easy, natural rubato, which the conductor follows admirably. The richly shaped melody of the Andante, too, goes straight to the heart of the music: again Rosand's timbre is warm, his phrasing ravishingly lyrical. The finale dances away jauntily, its spirited rhythmic charisma echoed by the orchestra.

In short, this performance is very good indeed, worthy of comparison with the finest on disc (including Vengerov, Shaham, Mutter) and, in its security of the solo line, even approaches Heifetz. The gentle, rhapsodic Meditation makes a splendid encore while the recording is admirable, with a completely natural balance.

Glazunov Violin Concerto[a] Prokofiev Violin Concertos Nos 1 and 2[b]
Maxim Vengerov vn [a]Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Claudio Abbado; [b]London Symphony Orchestra / Mstislav Rostropovich
Warner Elatus 0927-49567-2 (DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded [a]1995, [b]1994 ●
Prokofiev Conc No 1 won a 1995 Gramophone Award

Vengerov turns Glazunov's war-horse concerto from a display piece into a work of far wider-ranging emotions. It's a remarkable account, with Vengerov making you appreciate afresh what a wonderful and varied sequence of melodies Glazunov offers. It is characteristic of Vengerov how he shades and contrasts his tone colours. He reserves his big, Romantic tone for the third theme, where most rivals let loose sooner with less subtle results. His rubato is free but always spontaneous-sounding, and the lolloping fourth section brings some delicious portamento. Predictably the dashing final section is spectacular in its brilliance, with orchestral textures fresh and clean.

Vengerov and Rostropovich take an unashamedly epic, wide-open-steppes view of Prokofiev's First Concerto rather than the pseudo-Ravelian one posited by Chung/Previn and Mintz/Abbado, but it works at least as well. His tone is gloriously rich, every note hit dead centre. No 2 is slightly less successful. The balance is partly to blame – the soloist rather too closely scrutinised – but there is also a lack of intimacy in the interpretation itself. Nevertheless, this is an extremely fine disc and comes thoroughly recommended.

Suite caractéristique

Suite caractéristique in D, Op 9. Le chant du destin, Op 84. Deux Préludes, Op 85
Moscow Symphony Orchestra / Igor Golovschin
Naxos 8 553857 (75 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1996 ●

The eight-movement Suite caractéristique is vintage Glazunov, an orchestral transcription of piano pieces. Slavic melancholy characterises the 'Introduction', which serves to usher in an engaging 'Danse rustique'. The central, delicately scored 'Pastorale' is particularly charming and the following 'Danse orientale' is at first piquant, in the best Russian pseudo-oriental manner, but reaches an expansive climax, and the gentle beginning of the 'Elégie' is followed by a passionate interjection (in a surprisingly Tchaikovskian manner). The grand closing 'Cortège' makes a resplendent, very Russian ending. The two Préludes date from 1906 and 1908 respectively. One remembers, in a grave, valedictory mood, Vladimir Stassoff; the second (much more extended) opens surprisingly like Tchaikovsky's Francesca da Rimini and this curious leitmotif dominates the early part of the piece, which later produces a gentle, disconsolate chorale and a sonorously Wagnerian coda. It is played most impressively, as indeed is the Suite. The recording is good too.

The Seasons

Glazunov The Seasons – ballet, Op 67
Tchaikovsky The Nutcracker – ballet, Op 71[a]
[a]Finchley Children's Music Group;

Royal Phiharmonic Orchestra / Vladimir Ashkenazy
Decca ② 433 000-2DH2 (131 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1989-90 ●

It's difficult to think of a happier coupling than Glazunov's complete Seasons – perhaps his finest and most successful score – with Tchaikovsky's Nutcracker. Glazunov's delightful ballet, with even the winter's 'Frost', 'Hail', 'Ice' and 'Snow', glamorously presented, and the bitterness of a Russian winter quite forgotten are, like the scenario of the Nutcracker, part of a child's fantasy world. Glazunov's twinklingly dainty scoring of the snowy characters is contrasted with the glowing summer warmth of the 'Waltz of the cornflowers and poppies', and the vigorously thrusting tune (perhaps the most memorable theme he ever wrote) of the Autumn 'Bacchanale'. Tchaikovsky's ballet is beautifully played by the RPO; there is much finesse and sparkle, and the lightest and most graceful rhythmic touch from Ashkenazy. The conductor's affection for the score and his feeling for Tchaikovsky's multi-hued orchestral palette is a constant delight to the ear. Yet the big Pas de deux brings a climax of Russian fervour. The recording is properly expansive, setting everything within a glowing acoustic ambience. Thoroughly recommended.

Piano Works

Four Preludes and Fugues, Op 101. Prelude and Fugue in D minor, Op 62. Prelude and Fugue in E minor (1926)
Stephen Coombs pf
Hyperion CDA66855 (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995

Piano Sonata No 2 in E minor, Op 75. Prelude and Two Mazurkas, Op 25. Two Impromptus, Op 54. Idylle, Op 103. Barcarolle sur les touches noires. Song of the Volga Boatmen, Op 97 (arr Siloti). In modo religioso, Op 38. Triumphal March, Op 40[a]. Pas de caractère, Op 68 (all arr cpsr) Stephen Coombs pf [a]Holst Singers / Stephen Layton
Hyperion CDA66866 (70 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995

The third disc in Stephen Coombs's series is devoted to Glazunov's six essays in the form of the prelude and fugue. It begins and ends with intricately wrought homages to Bach – the first, of 1899, darker and much more chromatic than the last, a wholesome specimen revealing none of the problems of the composer's declining years. Taken as a whole, it seems to be Glazunov's towering achievement in any field, whose challenges Coombs meets unflinchingly.

The fugue at the heart of the Second Sonata's finale does give the listener an extra taste of his contrapuntal genius, and it's all the more welcome in a sea of Romantic rodomontade. That, though, is clearly what Glazunov felt the piano sonata was all about – and he does it with style: the E major transformation of the scherzo theme towards the end of this exhaustingly busy Second Sonata is a fine stroke. The rest of Vol 4 either ties up loose ends, following Glazunov along the road of whimsical, radiant Chopin stylisation, or throws in some enjoyable novelties. Coombs's orchestral thunder comes in useful for the weighty transcription of a Triumphal March for the Chicago Columbian Exposition; when the Holst Singers enter with their 'Slava, Columbus's', it's probably just as well that the recording presents them as a solid backdrop to the busy piano part, not a wall in front of it. This disc includes some wonderful moments and will surely raise this composer's status immeasurably.

Reyngol'd Glière

Ukraine/USSR 1875-1956

GROVE Glière studied at the Moscow Conservatory, where he became professor of composition (1920-41). His works, in the Russian epic tradition of Borodin and Glazunov, include three symphonies (the third subtitled 'Il'ya Muromets', 1911), concertos (one for coloratura soprano, 1943) and ballets (notably The Red Flower), as well as operas on central Asian themes using indigenous musical traditions, and chamber and piano music.

Symphony No 2

Symphony No 2 in C minor, Op 25. The Red Poppy – Ballet Suite, Op 70
New Jersey Symphony Orchestra / Zdenek Macal
Delos DE3178 Ⓕ
(73 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1995

This performance of Glière's colourful late-Romantic Second Symphony is extremely satisfying, with a fine blend of transparency and warmth. Glière never puts a foot wrong, but that's because he's going along trails blazed for him by others long before 1908. Although the Romantic parts of Firebird are audibly just round the corner, here the magic is tamed and the amount of repetition can even become slightly irksome. The New Jersey cor anglais plays with peerless refinement in the slow movement, and Macal coaxes suave phrasing from his musicians. For newcomers to Glière Delos's filler, the Red Poppy Suite, is a useful choice. Delos makes a big pitch about the 'Virtual Reality' recording quality. Ultimately destined for Surround Sound Home Theatre reproduction, it involves, amongst other things, a careful choice of venue, slightly more than usual spatial separation of players in the hall, and a pragmatic approach to multi-miking.

Symphony No 3

Symphony No 3, 'Il'ya Mouromets', Op 42
London Symphony Orchestra /

Leon Botstein
Telarc CD80609 (72 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded c2001 ●

Recognisably breathing the same air as Stravinsky's Firebird, Scriabin's Poem of Ecstasy and Suk's Asrael Symphony, Glière's Il'ya Mourometz makes up in lusciousness and sweep what it slightly lacks in individuality, offering a superb vehicle for the modern orchestra and, indeed, for state-of-the-art hi-fi systems. The LSO and Leon Botstein have the edge in almost every respect over rival performances.

Comparable to Downes in his tempi, albeit with a rather fleeter-footed finale, Botstein is less insistent in his accentuation and more emotionally generous with his phrasing, so that the overall effect is less strenuous, more sensuously appealing, with the climaxes standing in higher relief. The LSO, on terrific form here, command a slighter wider range of nuance, and Telarc's recording is a degree or two more spacious, without ever feeling overblown. Altogether, a very collectable disc.

Concerto for Coloratura Soprano

Ginastera Harp Concerto, Op 25 Glière Harp Concerto, Op 74. Concerto for Coloratura Soprano and Orchestra, Op 82
Eileen Hulse sop Rachel Masters hp City of London Sinfonia / Richard Hickox
Chandos CHAN9094 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1992

Glière was among the comparatively few front-rank Russian composers who stayed on in their homeland after the 1917 Revolution. The music he composed there adopted a middle-of-the-road conservative style which helped him to steer clear of the more viscous controversies of the 1920s and 1930s.

The Concertos for harp and coloratura soprano are unashamedly ingratiating, high-grade mood-music, here played and recorded in a manner that those with a sweet tooth should find irresistible. Ginastera's Harp Concerto is made of sterner stuff, but only slightly – it's Bartókian acerbities are tempered by an engaging Latin American swing. Again the performance is crisp and bouncy, though the reverberant recording takes some of the edge off the rhythmic bite.

Mikhail Glinka

Russian 1804-1857

GROVE Having come to know rural folk music in its purer forms, and receiving an unsystematic musical education in St Petersburg and on his sojourn in Italy (1830-33), Glinka neither inherited a tradition of sophisticated composition nor developed a distinctive and consistent personal style. But he exerted a profound and freely acknowledged influence on Balakirev, Rimsky-Korsakov, Mussorgsky, Borodin and Tchaikovsky, as well as on Prokofiev and Stravinsky. His first important compositions, written in Berlin (1834), where he studied briefly with Siegfried Dehn, were a Capriccio for piano duet and an unfinished symphony, both applying variation technique to Russian themes.

It was his opera A Life for the Tsar (1836; originally Ivan Susanin) that established him overnight as Russia's leading composer. Though its national character derives from melodic content alone (mostly merely quasi-Russian), it is nevertheless significant for its novel, expressive Russian recitative and for its use of the leitmotif. His next opera, Ruslan and Lyudmila (1842), based on Pushkin's fantastic, ironic fairy-tale, was less well received, being structurally unsuited to the stage and musically haphazard, yet it contains elements of striking originality, including Chernomor's grotesque little march, pungent touches of chromatic colour, exuberant rhythms, the use of the whole-tone scale and the 'changing background' technique for folktune presentation. Inspiring the oriental and 'magic' idioms of later Russian composers, this opera proved to be seminal in the history of Russian music. At Paris (1844-5) Glinka enjoyed Berlioz's music and in Spain (1845-47) folk music and fresh visual impressions; two Spanish Overtures resulted, exceeded in inventiveness however by the kaleidoscopic orchestral variations Kamarinskaya (1848). Among the rich legacy of his songs, the Pushkin settings Where is our rose?, I recall a wonderful moment, Adèle and The toasting cup are particularly fine.

Orchestral Works

Capriccio brillante on the 'Jota aragonesa'. Souvenir d'une nuit d'été à Madrid. Symphony on Two Russian Themes. Overture in D. Kamarinskaya. Valse-fantaisie. Ruslan and Lyudmila – Overture; Dance; Chernomor's March
BBC Philharmonic Orchestra / Vassily Sinaisky
Chandos CHAN9861 (71 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 2000

This is a more comprehensive survey than that available on ASV with the Armenian Philharmonic under Loris Tjeknavorian. Both conductors include the two 'Spanish Overtures', the Valse-fantaisie and Kamarinskaya in closely matched performances. Sinaisky is rather faster and brighter in the first 'Spanish Overture', Capriccio on the jota aragonesa, and in the second, Souvenir d'une nuit d'été, he reflects more subtly the French grace that also lies within the music. Both conductors give good, vivid performances of the Valse-fantaisie and Kamarinskaya, with recordings that do justice to Glinka's brilliant orchestration.

Thereafter the repertoire parts company. While Tjeknavorian gives the rest of his record up to a suite of six pieces from A Life for the Tsar, Sinaisky prefers Ruslan and Lyudmila, with a lively performance of the overture and then the Act 3 dances and the dwarf Chernomor's grotesque little march. This gives him room for the early Overture in D minor, which does not often feature on records, and for the Symphony on Two Russian Themes. The work survives in only a single movement, but fascinatingly anticipates Kamarinskaya. For a highly enjoyable introduction to Glinka's orchestral music, indeed to his whole original way of thinking, this Chandos disc is the one to go for.

Ruslan and Lyudmila

Vladimir Ognovienko bass-bar Ruslan; Anna Netrebko sop Lyudmila; Mikhail Kit bar Svetozar; Larissa Diadkova mez Ratmir; Gennadi Bezzubenkov bass Farlaf; Galina Gorchakova sop Gorislava; Konstantin Pluzhnikov ten Finn; Irina Bogachova mez Naina; Yuri Marusin ten Bayan; Chorus and Orchestra of the Kirov Theatre / Valery Gergiev
Philips ③ 446 746-2PH3 (202 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes,text and translation included
Recorded live in 1995 ●●

With Gergiev, the playing rises well above the reliability of long-practised routine; indeed, the Overture, always a winner, has quite exceptional brilliance and exhilaration. Later, the performance is just as remarkable for its refinement of detail and for sensitivity in the meditative, tender passages which enrich the musical score as they do the humanity of this operatic fairy-tale. The principals act with the professionalism of those brought up in a rigid school; they know their job and proceed accordingly.

The Ruslan (Ognovienko) is an ample bass-baritone, the Farlaf (Bezzubenkov) a sturdy bass with a neat capacity for patter, Bayan (Marusin) a tenor with tense tone, slightly flat intonation, especially memorable as the bardic figure who holds in thrall an audience with a longer attention-span than might be counted on today. Larissa Diadkova's Ratmir made a strong impression in the 1995 Edinburgh Festival and it is good to hear her here. Gorchakova brings glamour of voice to Gorislava, and Netrebko is outstanding.

Christoph Gluck

Bohemian 1714-1787

GROVE Gluck's father was a forester in the Upper Palatinate (now the western extreme of Czechoslovakia); Czech was his native tongue. At about 14 he left home to study in Prague, where he worked as an organist. He soon moved to Vienna and then to Milan, where his first opera was given in 1741. Others followed, elsewhere in Italy and during 1745-46 in London, where he met Handel's music. After further travel (Dresden, Copenhagen, Naples, Prague) he settled in Vienna in 1752 as Konzertmeister of the Prince of Saxe-Hildburghausen's orchestra, then as Kapellmeister. He also became involved in performances at the court theatre of French opéras comiques, as arranger and composer, and he wrote Italian dramatic works for court entertainments. His friends tried, at first unsuccessfully, to procure a court post for him; but by 1759 he had a salaried position at the court theatre and soon after was granted a royal pension.

He met the poet Calzabigi and the choreographer Angiolini, and with them wrote a ballet-pantomime Don Juan (1761) embodying a new degree of artistic unity. The next year they wrote the opera Orfeo ed Euridice, the first of Gluck's so-called 'reform operas'. In 1764 he composed an opéra comique, La rencontre imprévue, and the next year two ballets; he followed up the artistic success of Orfeo with a further collaboration with Calzabigi, Alceste (1767), this time choreographed by Noverre; a third, Paride ed Elena (1770), was less well received.

Gluck now decided to apply his new ideals to French opera, and in 1774 gave Iphigénie en Aulide (as well as Orphée, a French revision of Orfeo) in Paris; it was a triumph, but also set the ground for a controversy between Gluck and Italian music (as represented by Piccinni) which flared up in 1777 when his Armide was given, following a French version of Alceste (1776). Iphigénie en Tauride followed in 1779 – his greatest success, along with his greatest failure, Echo et Narcisse. He now acknowledged that his career was over; he revised Iphigénie en Tauride for German performance, and composed some songs, but abandoned plans for a journey to London to give his operas and died in autumn 1787, widely recognised as the doyen of Viennese composers and the man who had carried through important reforms to the art of opera.

Gluck's opera reforms - they are not exclusively his own, for several other composers (notably Jommelli and Traetta) had been working along similar lines – are outlined in the preface he wrote, probably with Calzabigi's help, to the published score of Alceste. He aimed to make the music serve the poetry through its expression of the situations of the story, without interrupting it for conventional orchestral ritornellos or, particularly, florid and ornamental singing; to make the overture relevant to the drama and the orchestration apt to the words; to break down the sharp contrast between recitative and aria: 'in short to abolish all the abuses against which good sense and reason have long cried out in vain'. Orfeo exemplifies most of these principles, with its abandonment of simple recitative in favour of a more continuous texture (with orchestral recitative, arioso and aria running into one another) and its broad musical-dramatic spans in which different types of solo singing, dance and choral music are fully integrated. It also has a simple, direct plot, based on straightforward human emotions, which could appeal to an audience as the complicated stories used in opera seria, with their intrigues, disguises and subplots, could not.

He had a limited compositional technique, but one that was sufficient for the aims he set himself. His music can have driving energy, but also a serenity reaching to the sublime. His historical importance rests on his establishment of a new equilibrium between music and drama, and his greatness on the power and clarity with which he projected that vision; he dissolved the drama in music instead of merely illustrating it.

Opera Arias

'Italian Arias' 🅿
Antigono – Berenice, che fai?. La clemenza di Tito – Tremo fra' dubbi miei; Ah, taci, barbaro…Come potesti, oh Dio!; Se mai senti spirarti sul volto. La corona – Quel chiaro rio. Ezio – Misera, dove son!…Ah! non son io che parlo. Il Parnaso confuso – Di questa cetra in seno. La Semiramide riconosciuta – Ciascun siegua il suo stile…Maggior follia.
Cecilia Bartoli mez
Akademie für Alte Musik Berlin / Bernhard Forck
Decca 467 248-2DH (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, texts and translations included
Recorded 2001 ●●●

This is something very much out of the ordinary. These eight arias, taken variously from Gluck's early operas (that is, those preceding his 'reforms' that began with Orfeo in 1762) or his non-reform later ones, are almost wholly unfamiliar, but they are music of great power and character; and they are sung with an extraordinary emotional force and technical skill, not to say a sheer beauty of tone, that cannot be matched by any other singer today.

Cecilia Bartoli's range is formidable. In the first aria, from La clemenza di Tito, she sings with trumpet-like tone and brilliance of attack, throwing off wide-spanning arpeggios with evident abandon and dispatching coloratura with fluency and precision, each note articulated and perfectly tuned. The second, an elegantly pathetic little piece from the later Il Parnaso confuso, is a tour de force of delicate, tender pianissimo singing. The third, from Ezio, begins with an orchestral recitative of thrilling dramatic urgency and goes on to an aria of great passion. Bartoli is described as a mezzo-soprano here, and her voice does indeed chiefly lie in that range; but most of these are soprano arias, and she happily goes well above the stave – there is one slightly squally high C sharp in the first aria but she is usually pretty comfortable in her top register. The accompaniments are splendidly sensitive and alert. A quite outstanding disc that no one who loves fine singing can miss.

Gluck Paride ed Elena – O del mio dolce ardor. Orfeo ed Euridice – Che puro ciel!; Che farò senza Euridice. Alceste – Non vi turbate Haydn Il mondo della luna – Una donna come me. Orlando Paladino – Ad un sguardo, a un cenno solo. La fedeltà premiata – Deh soccorri un'infelice Mozart Le nozze di Figaro – Voi che sapete. Don Giovanni – Batti, batti; Vedrai, carino; In quali eccessi…Mi tradì quell'alma ingrata. Lucio Silla – Dunque sperar…Il tenero momento. La finta giardiniera – Dolce d'amor compagna. La clemenza di Tito – Ecco il punto, oh Vitellia…Non più di fiori 🅿
Anne Sofie von Otter mez The English Concert / Trevor Pinnock hpd
Archiv Produktion 449 206-2AH (71 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included
Recorded 1995 ⦿

For the sake of both vocal and family well-being, Anne Sofie von Otter has always followed the wise course of self-rationing in opera. This disc, an entirely personal selection of arias from the Viennese Classical period, means all the more to her including, as it does, arias sung by dramatic and passionate women 'most of whom', von Otter admits in the accompanying notes, 'I have never performed on stage and, alas, probably never will'. They include La clemenza di Tito's Vitellia whom von Otter has irresistibly observed in her own role as Sesto: here she at last voices her guilt at implicating Sesto in her crime of passion, and expresses that unique fusion of sadness and desperation of 'Non più di fiori' in the eloquent company of Colin Lawson's basset-horn, followed by Gluck's Alceste, again keenly observed by von Otter in a comprimario role. Gluck's Orfeo is, of course, familiar to von Otter at first hand, and here The English Concert's introduction to the recitative which precedes 'Che farò' creates exquisitely the 'nuova serena luce' of the Elysian fields against which von Otter's grief is the darker, the more plangent. The Mozart arias evoke memorable stage and concert performances by von Otter: a Cherubino whose phrasing combines with that of the wind soloists to create the warm breath of burgeoning sensuality in 'Voi che sapete'; a Cecilio (Lucio Silla) whose coloratura captures the thrilled anticipation of that 'tenero momento'; and a moustachioed Ramiro (La finta giardiniera) who pays ecstatic cantabile tribute to the power of love.

Alceste

Teresa Ringholz sop Alcestis; Justin Lavender ten Admetus; Jonas Degerfelt ten Evander; Miriam Treichl sop Ismene; Lars Martinsson bar Herald; Voice of Apollo; Adam Giertz treb Eumelo; Emilie Clausen treb Aspasia; Johan Lilja bass High Priest; Hercules; God of the Underworld; Mattias Nilsson bar Bandit Drottningholm Court Theatre Chorus and Orchestra / Arnold Östman 🅿
Naxos ③ 8 660066/8 (147 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Notes, text and translation included. Recorded 1998

Almost all critics of Gluck's two versions of Alceste – the Italian original, first given in Vienna in 1767, and the French revision or recomposition given in Paris in 1776 – regard the latter as superior: musically richer, more flexible, dramatically more persuasive, deeper in its treatment of the emotions and the humanity of the two central characters. But this performance of the Italian version treats the 1767 text on its own terms. Like the original Orfeo, the original Alceste is an opera pared down, in accordance with Gluck's and his librettist Calzabigi's reform principles, to deal with just a single issue: it is concerned exclusively with Alceste's sacrifice of her life to save that of her husband, Admeto, King of Thessaly, and the emotions that each of them and those around them feel. The performance here is deftly paced and transparent in its textures. There is no portentousness about Östman's direction, and the Drottningholm orchestra ensures that the detail of accompanying textures is clearly heard, playing gently and lightly in the dances.

Teresa Ringholz has a voice of modest dimensions, which she uses in a natural way, with little vibrato, firm, surely tuned, clear and well focused. She catches Alceste's increasingly passionate determination, at the close of Act 1, as her resolution to die to save her husband hardens, with its magnificent climax in 'Ombre, larve'. Her controlled manner – there is no outburst of grief when she bids her children farewell at the end of the act, for example – catches well the stylised nature of Gluck's expression. Justin Lavender, as Admeto, is slightly less successful. He has a generous tenor – fuller and weightier than that of the other tenor, Jonas Degerfelt, who sings gracefully and also with vitality – and he brings to the music a good deal of passion that occasionally threatens to go beyond the scale of the performance as a whole. The smaller roles are very adequately done. This recording conveys effectively the intensity and the integrity of Gluck's vision.

Armide

Mireille Delunsch sop Armide; Charles Workman ten Renaud; Laurent Naouri bar Hidraot; Ewa Podles mez Hate; Françoise Masset sop Phénice, Mélisse; Nicole Heaston sop Sidonie, Shepherdess, Lucinde; Yann Beuron ten Artémidore, Danish Knight; Brett Polegato bar Ubalde; Vincent le Texier bar Aronte; Magdalena Kožená mez Pleasure; Valérie Gabail sop Naiad Choeur des Musiciens du Louvre; Les Musiciens du Louvre / Marc Minkowski 🅿

Archiv Produktion ② 459 616-2AH2 (139 minutes: DDD). Notes, text and translation included Ⓕ

Recorded live in 1996 ●

'Perhaps the best of all my works', said Gluck of his Armide. But this, the fifth of his seven 'reform operas', has never quite captured the public interest as have Orfeo, Alceste, the two Iphigénies and even Paride ed Elena. Its plot is thinnish, concerned only with the love of the pagan sorceress Armide, princess of Damascus, for the Christian knight and hero Renaud, and his enchantment, disenchantment and finally his abandonment of her. But Armide has two features that set it apart. One is the extraordinary soft, sensuous tone of the music; Gluck said that it was meant 'to produce a voluptuous sensation', and that if he were to suffer damnation it would be for the passionate love duet in Act 5. Certainly his orchestral writing here has a warmth, a colour and a richness going far beyond anything in his other reform operas (apart from parts of Paride ed Elena). Secondly, there are several great solo dramatic scenes, two of them for Armide.

The success of Armide, then, depends critically on the Armide herself. Here it goes to Mireille Delunsch, who brings to it a good deal of intensity but does not have command of a wide range of tone, and does not seem to make much use of her words. There is some graceful singing in the softer music and the scene where she cannot bring herself to kill Renaud is finely done, though ultimately perhaps her singing lacks real emotional tension.

Renaud is sung by Charles Workman, in a strong tenor, sounding almost baritonal at times, but then singing the sleep song, 'Plus j'observe ces lieux', with soft, sweet tone and much delicacy. The lovers' duet in Act 5 is sung gently and with much charm. Among the other singers, Ewa Podles of course makes a strong impression as Hate with her large and steady voice – and some remarkable music to sing. And Laurent Naouri shows a pleasant, firm baritone as Hidraot.

Minkowski makes much of the score's colour and flow. He uses a substantial orchestra, which plays lightly and flexibly and with rhythmic spring. He has a tendency towards quickish tempos here and there but is always attentive to the characterisation of individual numbers.

Iphigénie en Aulide

Lynne Dawson sop Iphigénie; José van Dam bass Agamemnon; Anne Sofie von Otter mez Clytemnestre; John Aler ten Achille; Bernard Deletré bass Patrocle; Gilles Cachemaille bass Calchas; René Schirrer bass Arcas; Guillemette Laurens mez Diane; Ann Monoyios sop First Greek woman, Slave; Isabelle Eschenbrenner sop Second Greek woman Monteverdi Choir; Lyon Opéra Orchestra / Sir John Eliot Gardiner

Erato ② 2292-45003-2 (132 minutes: DDD). Notes, text and translation included. Recorded 1987 Ⓕ ●●

Gluck's first reform opera for Paris has tended to be overshadowed by his other Iphigénie, the Tauride one. But it does contain some superb things, of which perhaps the finest are the great monologues for Agamemnon. On this recording, José van Dam starts a little coolly; but this only adds force to his big moment at the end of the Second Act where he tussles with himself over the sacrifice of his daughter and – contemplating her death and the screams of the vengeful Eumenides – decides to flout the gods and face the consequences. To this he rises in noble fashion, fully conveying the agonies that Agamemnon suffers.

The cast in general is strong. Lynne Dawson brings depth of expressive feeling to all she does and her Iphigénie, marked by a slightly grainy sound and much intensity, is very moving. John Aler's Achille too is very fine and sings both with ardour and vitality. There is great force too in the singing of Anne Sofie von Otter as Clytemnestre. Gardiner's Monteverdi Choir sings with polish, perhaps seeming a little genteel for a crowd of angry Greek soldiers baying for Iphigénie's blood. But he gives a duly urgent account of the score, pressing it forward eagerly and keeping the tension at a high level even in the dance music. A period-instrument orchestra might have added a certain edge and vitality but this performance wants nothing in authority. Securely recommended.

Iphigénie en Tauride

Christine Goerke sop Iphigénie; Vinson Cole ten 🅿 Pylade; Rodney Gilfry bar Oreste; Sharon Baker
sop 1st Priestess, Greek woman; Jayne West sop
2nd Priestess, Diana; Stephen Salters bar Thoas;
Mark Andrew Cleveland sngr Scythian; Mark
Risinger sngr Minister of the Sanctuary
Boston Baroque / Martin Pearlman
Telarc Classics ② CD80546 (134 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included. Recorded 1999 ●●

'With Gluck, there's a long sweep to the drama,' says Martin Pearlman towards the end of his introductory talk about Iphigénie, included here at the end of the second CD. It's obvious from his performance that this is how he sees the work; and it is his capacity to sustain that 'long sweep' that makes this version so compelling.

Pearlman, using period instruments (this recording is the first to do so), draws vivid and dramatic playing from his admirable group, and he is particularly successful, too, in the various dances in the course of the opera, which, beautifully alive and springy in rhythm, never for a moment permit the drama to flag – they emerge as an integral part of it, as Gluck intended, not as decorative interludes. With these clear textures, Gluck's orchestral colouring comes across sharply as, too, does the lofty, hieratic quality of the work. There is tenderness as well, and it is thanks partly to Pearlman's sensitive timing that the opera's climactic moment – the sacrifice scene, where brother and sister at last recognise each other – is so intense and poignant.

Although it lies quite high, the role of Iphigenia is often assigned to a mezzo, as if to heighten the intensity. Christine Goerke is a true soprano, which allows softer tones and more femininity than one generally hears, but there is metal in her voice, too (she does not altogether forgo vibrato), and the weight of the tragedy is by no means underplayed: listen to 'O malheureuse Iphigénie' – enhanced by the fine line of the oboe obbligato – or to her impassioned singing of the noble aria at the beginning of Act 4. Rodney Gilfry provides a strong, manly Orestes and is successful in conveying the tortures he is suffering. Vinson Cole gives a sympathetic reading of Pylades – lyrical, shapely and expressively phrased. There is excellent choral singing.

The principal rival recordings both have rather starrier casts. Muti's is a big, modern opera-house performance, powerful and exciting, Gardiner's more stylish, more concentrated dramatically. Both have Thomas Allen's superlative Orestes and for Gardiner Diana Montague is an outstanding Iphigenia. But this new set, in which Gluck's 'long sweep' is so well captured and the work's scale so tellingly conveyed without prejudicing its intensity of feeling, is just about first choice.

Orfeo ed Euridice

Derek Lee Ragin counterten Orfeo; 🅿
Sylvia McNair sop Euridice; Cyndia Sieden
sop Amore Monteverdi Choir; English Baroque
Soloists / Sir John Eliot Gardiner
Decca Compact Opera Collection ②
470 424-2DOC2 (89 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Text and translation accessible via website
Recorded 1991 ●

This version of Orfeo, played on period instruments and following the original text, has a degree of spiritual force to which other recordings scarcely aspire, and that is to the credit primarily of the conductor, John Eliot Gardiner. It begins with a taut, almost explosive account of the overture, moves to a deeply sombre opening chorus and then a ballo of intense expressiveness, finely and carefully moulded phrases (but plenty of air between them) and a lovely translucent orchestral sound. Every one of the numerous dances in this set, in fact, is the subject of thoughtful musical characterization, shapely execution and refined timing of detail. Derek Lee Ragin excels as Orpheus; the sound is often very beautiful, the phrasing extraordinarily supple and responsive for a countertenor voice. Eurydice is sung clearly and truly, and with due passion, by Sylvia McNair – she delivers 'Che fiero momento' and some of the recitative, with a considerable degree of force – and the casting of Cyndia Sieden, with her rather pert, forward voice, as Amore proves to be very successful.

Orfeo ed Euridice 🅿
Bernarda Fink contr Orfeo; Veronica Cangemi sop
Euridice; Maria Cristina Kiehr sop Amore;
Berlin RIAS Chamber Choir; Freiburg Baroque
Orchestra / René Jacobs
Harmonia Mundi ② HMU90 1742/3 (91 minutes: Ⓕ
DDD). Notes, text and translation included

Orfeo comes in many guises. There is Gluck's original Italian version, composed for Vienna in 1762, his adjusted version for Parma in 1769, his French revision of 1774 for Paris, and then the numerous, posthumous compromise texts – Berlioz's is only the most widely known of them – that seek the best of both worlds by incorporating sections of the French version within the framework of the Italian. The present version is 'pure' Italian, and although this means forgoing such famous and affecting music as the Dance of the Blessed Spirits, 'Cet asile' and the enhanced ending to 'Che farò', as well as the big D minor Dance of the Furies, it does offer a much more concentrated experience.

The tone of the performance here is set by the highly energetic overture, with its forceful accents and its sharply defined textures and dynamics. Jacobs takes pains throughout to give a clear yet also rich quality to Gluck's highly original orchestral textures and to shape his phrases with style and awareness of the omnipresence of dance. It is, however, the singer of Orpheus, even more than the conductor, who gives character to a performance of this work. Often nowadays it is sung by a countertenor in preference to the contralto long favoured in the role, which was of course composed for a castrato. So which voice better suits the semi-divine Orpheus? Ultimately of course it depends on the artistry of the singer. Bernarda Fink sings the role here very beautifully and quite unaffectedly. Her great strength lies in her smooth, natural and very even tone and her command of line.

This is probably the best version of the Italian original with a woman as Orpheus and can be recommended without hesitation to anyone who prefers to avoid the male alto voice. If you prefer to stick with the male voice the choice lies between Michael Chance's beautifully sung version under Frieder Bernius (Sony) and Derek Lee Ragin's ardent impersonation in Gardiner's account (reviewed above); both are revealing, in quite different ways, of this very special work.

Additional recommendations

Orphée et Eurydice
von Otter Orfeo Hendricks Euridice Fournier Amor
Lyon Opera Orchestra / Gardiner
EMI 556885-2 (89 minutes: DDD: 2/90) Ⓕ

Berlioz's edition of Gluck's masterpiece (sung of course in French) receives powerful advocacy from Sir John Eliot Gardiner, Anne Sofie von Otter and Barbara Hendricks. An extremely fine interpretation of this version of the work.

Orfeo ed Euridice (abridged recording) Ⓗ
Ferrier Orfeo Ayars Euridice Vlachopoulos Amor
Glyndebourne Festival Chorus; Southern Philharmonic Orchestra / Stiedry
Dutton mono CDBP9730 Ⓢ
(63 minutes: ADD: recorded 1947) ○

Though the sound may initially prove a little distracting, Dutton have done their best to clean it up, and Ferrier's singing more than makes up for it. Its beauty goes straight to the heart: a noble and intensely human Orfeo which deserves its place on every collector's shelves.

Leopold Godowsky

Polish/American 1870-1938

GROVE An American pianist and composer of Polish birth, Godowsky toured widely from the age of nine, making his American début in Boston in 1884. Tours of the USA and Canada followed and until 1900 he taught in Philadelphia and Chicago. Until World War II he continued to appear in Europe; his reputation as a Chopin interpreter was not enhanced by a series of elaborate Studies on the Etudes. His concert career ended in 1930.

53 Studies on Chopin's Etudes

Awards 2000

Marc-André Hamelin pf
Hyperion ② CDA67411/2 Ⓕ
(158 minutes: DDD)
Recorded 1998-99 ○○○

Godowsky's 53 studies on Chopin's 27 studies are the ne plus ultra of Romantic intricacy. Godowsky's wily disclaimer that, far from wanting to 'improve' on Chopin's matchless originals, he merely wished to extend the parameters of technique, hardly convinces purists, who dismiss his magnum opus as an outrageous gilding of the lily, an unforgivable powdering and rouging of Chopin's genius. For others, Godowsky's ingenuity, his ear-tickling wit and elegance, create edifices, indeed 'miracles of rare device'. But if heated debate still rages around the music, the quality of Hamelin's recording is entirely uncontroversial. Rarely can such a gargantuan task have been accomplished with such strength, grace and agility, with an ease bordering on nonchalance. His virtuosity is pre-eminent because it is so musical, and it is impossible to think of another living pianist who could have carried off this enterprise with comparable success.

In lesser hands these Etudes can seem overweight; with Hamelin, even the densest, seemingly impenetrable textures are kept as light as air and everything is mobile, fluent and adroit. And so, to evoke Schumann, it's 'hats off, gentlemen' to this handsomely presented and finely recorded set. A truly phenomenal achievement.

Alexander Goehr

British 1932

GROVE Goehr's father, the conductor Walter Goehr, brought the family to England in 1933, and Alexander studied with Hall at the Royal Manchester College (1952-5), where fellow students included Birtwistle and Davies. He then followed Messiaen's classes at the Paris Conservatoire (1955-56). Family and education thus fitted him to marry Schoenbergian with post-Webernian influences, which he did in two cantatas, The Deluge (1958) and Sutter's Gold (1960), and in instrumental pieces of this period. With the Violin Concerto (1962) and Little Symphony (1963) he moved into a broader style made possible by greater understanding of serialism. His first opera, Arden Must Die (1967), is a morality on the borders of Weill, and a triptych of music-theatre pieces (1968-70) also shows a concern with social behaviour. Orchestral and chamber works of this period move still closer to the ethos of the two Viennese schools, but in doing so display a more confident individuality (String Quartet No 3, 1976). His second opera, Behold the Sun (1985), is about the clash between revolutionary and established thought in 16th-century Germany. In 1976 he became professor of music at Cambridge.

Arianna

Ruby Philogene sop Arianna; Angela Hickey mez Venus, Dorilla; Juliet Schiemann sop Cupid; Lawrence Zazzo counterten Bacchus; Timothy Dawkins bass Jupiter, First Messenger; Philip Sheffield ten Theseus; Jeremy Huw Williams bar Counsellor; Andrew Hewitt ten Herald; Stephen Rooke ten Second Messenger
Arianna Ensemble / William Lacey
NMC ② NMCD054 (132 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded live in 1996

The title-page of Arianna describes it as a 'lost opera by Monteverdi, composed again by Alexander Goehr'. Precisely. At its heart is Ariadne's lament, all that survives of Monteverdi's score, richly and movingly sung by Ruby Philogene. The vocal line is embedded in an elaborate instrumental texture in Goehr's own manner, in which the modernism he grew up with is enriched with a modality that owes a lot to Goehr's own teacher, Olivier Messiaen, but a good deal also to Monteverdi himself. Whether Monteverdi ever set these lines we may never know. Goehr has set them effectively and very beautifully, in Monteverdi's manner.

Indeed, at times, it is as though Goehr and Monteverdi had collaborated on this opera, the vocal lines, brilliant toccatas and madrigalesque choruses often sounding very much like the earlier composer, even the instrumentation suggesting that Monteverdi has been so excited by the sound of the modern keyed flute, the soprano sax and bass clarinet that he cannot resist using them. Goehr's score is at once a loving homage and a vivid evocation for the 1990s of how dazzling and emotionally hard-hitting Monteverdi's lost original must have been to its first audiences in 1608.

The soloists are almost without exception excellent, and Lacey is clearly a conductor of real gifts. The live recording is admirable.

Berthold Goldschmidt

German 1903-1996

GROVE A British conductor and composer of German origin, Goldschmidt studied with Schreker in Berlin (1922-25) and moved to England in 1935; he conducted the Glyndebourne company at the Edinburgh Festival. His works, in many genres, have connections with Busoni, Weill and Shostakovich.

Concertos

Clarinet Concerto[a]. Violin Concerto[b]. Cello Concerto[c]
[a]Sabine Meyer cl [b]Chantal Juillet vn [c]Yo-Yo Ma vc
[a]Berlin Komische Opera Orchestra / Yakov Kreizberg; [b]Philharmonia Orchestra / Berthold Goldschmidt; [c]Montreal Symphony Orchestra / Charles Dutoit
Decca Entartete Musik 455 586-2DH Ⓕ
(67 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1990s ●

The oblivion into which these three concertos fell after their premières in the 1950s is puzzling. Their style, even by the standards of 40-odd years ago, is not 'advanced', but they make original use of traditional forms. The first movement of the Cello Concerto, for example, has half a dozen themes instead of the expected two, but the ideas are subtly related so that the overall impression is of a richly fertile but disciplined invention: there is not the slightest hint of garrulity, nor any sense that the music is derived from Hindemith, whom at a few moments it superficially resembles.

In the corresponding movement of the Clarinet Concerto each idea grows out of its predecessor, all of them flowering from a gently lyrical opening which repeatedly returns, sounding beautifully different at each recurrence. The finale of the Clarinet Concerto includes nimbly pattering scherzo material, gracious lyricism, athletic energy and jovial exuberance, but they are unified, not merely juxtaposed. Goldschmidt's lyricism is firm and strong, and a fast movement does not have to relax to incorporate it. The slow movement of the Violin Concerto is marked Andante amoroso, but its beauty is grave and ample, not languishing. All three of these concertos, in fact, are strong and rich enough to repay repeated listening. The Violin Concerto was recorded after a series of performances by Chantal Juillet that so impressed Goldschmidt that he dedicated the neglected 40-year-old work to her. Juillet's reading of 'her' concerto is a splendid one, but the others here are no less fine, and all three are admirably recorded.

Nicolas Gombert

Flemish c1495-c1560

GROVE Probably a native of Flanders and possibly a pupil of Josquin (he composed a déploration on Josquin's death, 1545), Gombert was a singer (from 1526) and maître des enfants (from 1529) in Emperor Charles V's court chapel, with which he travelled in Europe and for which he also served unofficially as composer. He was canon of Notre Dame, Tournai, by 1534. By 1540 he had been dismissed from the imperial chapel but was probably pardoned (and granted a benefice) c1552. Highly regarded by his contemporaries as a great innovator, he favoured dense textures and often used dark, rich timbres. He used pervading imitation more consistently than anyone of his own or an earlier generation, creating textures in which the voices tend to be equally important. All but two of his ten extant masses elaborate existing motets or chansons. His motets (over 160 survive) (from books, 1539, 1541, many in collections), are his most representative works, each phrase of text having its own expressive motif worked through the texture. Other sacred works include eight fine Magnificats and multi-voice works. His chansons (over 70) are like the Netherlands motet only more animated and often conceived on a broad scale. His music continued to be printed until long after his death.

Missa Tempore paschali

Missa Tempore paschali. Magnificat octavi toni. Adonai, Domine Iesu Christe. In illo tempore loquente Jesu. O Rex gloriae
Henry's Eight / Jonathan Brown
Hyperion CDA66943 (65 minutes: DDD). Texts and translations included. Recorded 1996 Ⓕ ●

This disc reinforces the impression of Gombert as the most involving composer of his generation; the booklet-note aptly describes his music as a cross between the imitative processes of Josquin's generation and the seamless style of Ockeghem. The Missa Tempore paschali is thought to be a fairly early work, whereas the Magnificat is one of a set that probably dates from Gombert's last years. The Mass is most ambitious, culminating in a 12-voice Agnus Dei modelled on Brumel's Mass, Et ecce terrae motus. The singing is confident and assured, with a good grasp of large-scale form in the Credo. The final Agnus Dei seems to crown the Mass in a more credible manner. An added feature is the more inventive, and highly convincing, use of false relations in the readings prepared for Henry's Eight by John O'Donnell. The result has invigorating harmonic incident throughout. The Mass is complemented by some of the composer's most well-known works; the motet, In illo tempore is particularly lovely and Henry's Eight respond with some particularly sensitive singing. Those familiar with their very English, yet full-bodied sound won't be disappointed; those who aren't can start here. In Henry's Eight Gombert has found worthy champions.

Henryk Górecki Polish 1933

GROVE Górecki studied with Szabelski at the Katowice Conservatory (1955-60) and with Messiaen in Paris. His music has connections with Penderecki, but its deepest affinities are with ancient Polish religious music, and it often shows a saintly simplicity. Most of his works are for orchestra or chamber ensemble; they include the chamber trilogy Genesis (1963) and three symphonies, the third of which achieved striking public success in the early 1990s.

Symphony No 2, 'Copernican'

Symphony No 2, 'Copernican', Op 31[a]. Beatus vir, Op 38
[a]Zofia Kilanowicz sop Andrezej Dobber bar Silesian Philharmonic Choir; Polish Radio Choir; Polish National Radio Symphony Orchestra / Antoni Wit
Naxos 8 555375 (67 minutes: DDD). Recorded 2000 Ⓢ

Górecki composed his Second Symphony in 1972 in response to a commission to mark the 500th anniversary of the birth of the Polish astronomer Nicolas Copernicus. It possesses a certain Janus-like quality in that it forms a bridge between his earlier 'modernist' works and his later 'reductionist' style, into which the ubiquitous Third Symphony falls. The Second Symphony comprises two movements, the first glancing back to the dissonance of earlier works, the second looking forward to more tonal pastures in which the seeds of the Third Symphony are in abundant evidence. Górecki's Copernican Symphony is an unsung masterpiece, and a greater and more impressively constructed work than the Third.

Beatus vir was composed in 1977 in response to a commission to mark the 900th anniversary of the martyrdom of the Bishop of Cracow, Stanisław of Szczepanów. The opening pages are particularly striking and there are some marvellously scored moments in the remaining 24 minutes or so, though it does not attain the stature of the Second Symphony. That said, this disc is thoroughly recommended to anyone wanting to expand their appreciation of Górecki beyond the Third. The Copernican Symphony more than justifies the price of the disc alone and the performances and recorded sound throughout are exceptionally fine.

Symphony No 3

Awards 1993

Symphony No 3, 'Symphony of Sorrowful Songs', Op 36
Dawn Upshaw sop London Sinfonietta / David Zinman
Nonesuch 7559-79282-2 (54 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1991 Ⓕ ●●●

Górecki's Third Symphony has become legend. Composed in 1976, it has always had its champions and admirers within the contemporary music world, but in 1993 it found a new audience of undreamt-of proportions. A few weeks after its release, this Elektra Nonesuch release not only entered the top 10 in the classical charts, but was also riding high in the UK Pop Album charts. It has since become the biggest selling disc of music by a contemporary classical composer.

The Symphony, subtitled Symphony of Sorrowful, Songs was composed during a period when Górecki's musical style was undergoing a radical change from avant-garde serialism to a more accessible style firmly anchored to tonal traditions. The Symphony's three elegiac movements (or 'songs') form a triptych of laments for all the innocent victims of World War II and are a reflection upon man's inhumanity to man in general. The songs are beautifully and ethereally sung by Dawn Upshaw, and David Zinman and the London Sinfonietta provide an intense and committed performance of the shimmering orchestral writing. The recording quality is excellent.

Symphony No 3, 'Symphony of Sorrowful Songs', Op 36[a]. Three Pieces in Old Style
[a]Zofia Kilanowicz sop Katowice Radio Symphony Orchestra / Antoni Wit
Naxos 8 550822 (66 minutes: DDD). Text and translation included. Recorded 1993 Ⓢ ●

Naxos's recording is virtually as good as the better-known Nonesuch disc reviewed above. The performance is exceptionally fine, although the acoustic is more resonant, the orchestral choirs less closely balanced and Antoni Wit isn't as meticulous as Zinman in his observance of minor details. Interpretatively, Wit leaves the more austere impression. His relative inwardness squares convincingly with the symphony's harrowing texts and 'Sorrowful Songs' sub-title. If spectacular singing is your main priority, then Upshaw's is the vocal tour de force. Zofia Kilanowicz displays stronger lower registers and a brilliant, bleached-white soprano that reflects the score's innate pathos, its sense of shock. Her enunciation is more idiomatic, while her partial suspension of vibrato is a powerful interpretative ploy. What is most impressive about this performance is its spirituality; and given the overall excellence of the recording, the conducting and the singing, it is strongly recommended, particularly to those who have yet to discover the Symphony's hypnotic sound-world. It is also commended to those who do know the work but who find Upshaw and Zinman too 'plush'.

Kleines Requiem für eine Polka

Kleines Requiem für eine Polka, Op 66[a]. Harpsichord Concerto, Op 40[b]. Good Night, 'In memoriam Michael Vyner', Op 63
Dawn Upshaw sop Sebastian Bell fl John Constable pf Elisabeth Chojnacka hpd David Hockings perc London Sinfonietta / [a]David Zinman, [b]Markus Stenz
Nonesuch 7559-79362-2 (59 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1993-94 ●

Like a small café huddled within the shadow of some ancient church, Górecki's Kleines Requiem für eine Polka (1993) evokes feelings of paradox. The opening movement suggests distracted tranquillity. This is followed by a grating Allegro which approximates the sort of vicious 'knees-up' that Shostakovich penned whenever he bared his teeth at empty celebration. Later, we are back within the tranquil interior of Górecki's imagination – and it's there that we stay until the work ends. The Kleines Requiem für eine Polka displays a profundity expressed via the simplest means. It is a pity, then, that the Harpsichord Concerto breaks the mood so quickly: one's initial impression is of a further violent 'episode' from the first work, although the stylistic contrast breaks the illusion soon enough. This is probably the most famous 20th-century harpsichord concerto after Falla's. Bach served as its creative prime mover, while Elisabeth Chojnacka is its dedicatee and most celebrated interpreter. Here she revels in the piece's playful aggression. It's an unrelenting display and in total contrast to Good Night, Górecki's deeply felt memorial to one of his staunchest supporters, Michael Vyner. The language is sombre, but never merely mournful. Mostly quiet and contemplative, Good Night is scored for alto flute, piano and tam-tam with Dawn Upshaw intoning Hamlet's 'flights of angels' in the closing movement. The work ends in a spirit of veiled ritual with a sequence of quiet gong strokes. The performance and recording are consistently fine.

Choral Works

Miserere, Op 44[a]. Amen, Op 35[a]. Euntes ibant et flebant, Op 32[a]. My Vistula, grey Vistula, Op 46[b]. Broad waters, Op 39[b]
[a]Chicago Symphony Chorus; [a]Chicago Lyric Opera Chorus / John Nelson; [b]Lira Chamber Chorus / Lucy Ding
Nonesuch 7559-79348-2 (67 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1994

Miserere is an intensely spiritual, prayerful work in which Górecki responds with heartfelt passion to the political events of 1981 (a sit-in by members of Rural Solidarity which ultimately led to the democratisation of Poland). It is as intellectually demanding and emotionally compelling as anything by Górecki released on disc. Lovers of the Third Symphony will fall under its spell straight away, but it should gain respect from those less easily swayed by the opulent orchestral textures of that work, for here Górecki is using what is probably his favourite medium, the unaccompanied choir. The voices enter in a series of layered thirds until all ten parts begin an electrifying ascent through the word 'Domine' to the work's climax which, with the first statement of 'Miserere', suddenly bathes us in a quiet chord of A minor – a moment as devastatingly effective as an orchestra full of banging drums and crashing cymbals. John Nelson directs a hypnotic performance full of impact, his choral forces emotionally committed and technically excellent. The recording itself is not technically excellent – there are a number of persistent background rattles and bangs; the church acoustic is a little cloudy and there is a haze of surface noise. But in the end, it only serves to reinforce this grainy aural picture of those dark times in Poland's recent history.

Górecki Totus tuus, Op 60. Amen, Op 34 Pärt Magnificat. The Beatitudes Tavener Magnificat. Nunc dimittis. Funeral Ikos Anonymous Plainchant – Alma redemptoris mater. Ave Maria. Regina caeli laetare. Alleluia, venite ad me. Beati mundo corde. Requiem aeternam. Ego sum resurrectio et vita. In paradisum
David Goode org Choir of King's College, Cambridge / Stephen Cleobury

EMI 555096-2 (59 minutes: DDD). Texts and translations included. Recorded 1994 Ⓕ ●●

This disc links the music of these three composers in an illuminating way. The contemporary pieces are separated by soberly sung plainchant which acts as a kind of sorbet to cleanse the palate between the various dishes. The performances of Górecki's Totus tuus and Amen are technically superb, and can rarely have been sung with such absolute control: similarly Tavener's Funeral Ikos is performed with perfect pacing and tuning. Yet these three pieces lack spontaneity. They are too polite, perhaps, so that the Górecki works never quite catch fire, and the Tavener never really moves one. The response is more convincing in the Tavener Collegium Regale canticles, sung with virtuoso flair and the Pärt Magnificat and The Beatitudes. Here the performances have just that element of flexibility lacking in the other pieces, for all their beauty of sound. Pärt's intimate austerity is well served here.

Louis Moreau Gottschalk

American 1829-1869

GROVE At 13 Gottschalk went to Paris for piano and composition lessons, and by 19, through the success of his 'Creole' piano pieces Bamboula, La savane and La bananier (the so-called Louisiana trilogy), his name was a household word throughout Europe. He was hailed as the New World's first authentic musical spokesman and his keyboard virtuosity was compared with Chopin's. After another charming genre piece, Le mancenillier (1851), and tours of Switzerland, France and Spain, 1850-52, he made his New York début. In touring the USA to increase his income, 1853-56, he catered ever more to the public taste for sensational effects (eg in Tournament Galop and The Last Hope). His most fruitful period, 1857-61, was spent in the Caribbean, where in relative seclusion he wrote some of his finest works, including Souvenir de Porto Rico, Ojos criollos (four hands), the Symphony no.1 ('La nuit des tropiques') and the one-act opera Escenas campestres. A second extended tour of the USA, 1862-65, produced little but the well-known Dying Poet and the duet La gallina. From his last years in South America, feverishly devoted to concert-giving, the most notable works are Pasquinade, the Grand scherzo and the Grande tarantelle for piano and orchestra. Although not an 'advanced' composer, Gottschalk was sensitive to local colour and often used quotation as both a musical and psychological device, as well as syncopated rhythms and jagged melodic lines – all traits associated with later music.

Piano Works

Sospiro, RO214 Op 24. Marguerite, RO158 Op 92. Bataille, RO25 Op 64. Réponds-moi RO225 Op 50 (arr Wachtmann). Solitude, RO239 Op 65. Ballade No 8, RO16 Op 90. Tremolo, RO265 Op 58. Orfa, RO186 Op 71. El cocoyé, RO57 Op 80. Polka de salon, RO207 Op 1. Rayons d'azur, RO220 Op 77. La chasse du jeune Henri, RO54 Op 10

Philip Martin pf

Hyperion CDA67248 (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

There is very little of Gottschalk's piano music on CD that has not been recorded by Philip Martin, the ideal exponent, but here's another whole collection of surprises – again a real enchantment from start to finish. It's interesting to hear Gottschalk's Op 1, the Polka de salon, published in Paris, which he wrote in his mid-teens. No particular character yet but genuine charm. More typical of the pianist-composer as pop star is El cocoyé, which gives a local carnival tune a flashy setting and brought the house down for Gottschalk's first recital in Havana in 1854. Solitude is a pretty nocturne inspired by Lamartine, Chopinesque but simpler. The middle section is a fine example of Martin's totally natural, relaxed melodic playing which perfectly fits the serenity of Gottschalk's lyricism. Martin knows how to pace Gottschalk's Caribbean syncopations, too, and is up to all the pyrotechnics.

Another immaculate Hyperion production.

O ma charmante, épargnez-moi, RO182. Grande fantaisie triomphale sur l'hymne national brésilien, RO108. Melody in D flat. Bamboula, RO20. The Dying Poet, RO75. Grande étude de concert, RO116, 'Hercule'. The last hope, RO133. Murmures éoliens, RO176. Symphony No 1, RO5, 'La nuit des tropiques' – Andante (arr Napoleão). La chute des feuilles, RO55. Tournament Galop, RO264

Philip Martin pf

Hyperion CDA66915 (73 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Recorded 1996 ●

It is not only the playing here which gives such satisfaction, but the whole package is stylishly produced – Rousseau on the booklet cover and fine notes from Jeremy Nicholas. The piano sound from the fastidious Hyperion team is flawless. Martin, operating in a context where some pianists can hardly play softly at all, has a ravishing pianissimo. This makes O ma charmante and the perennial – but highly original – The last hope simply enchanting. Gottschalk is a real melodist. Martin understands the intimacies of the salon but he also lacks nothing in his transcendental virtuosity. The more flamboyant numbers, such as Tournament Galop prove this. About 10 years after Gottschalk's death, his pianist colleague, Artur Napoleão, made a piano arrangement of the first movement of Symphony No 1 (Night in the tropics) which Martin includes here. It is slightly drab compared with the orchestral version and soon feels repetitive. But don't let that put you off this outstanding continuation of Martin's Gottschalk series.

La colombe, RO60. La moissonneuse, RO173. Le songe d'une nuit d'été, R0240. Pensée poétique. L'étincelle, RO80. Souvenir de Cuba, R0245.

La gitanella, RO103. Morte!!, RO174. Polonia, R0210. Fantôme de bonheur, R094. Forest Glade Polka, R098. Ossian ballades, RO187. Ricordati, RO227. Reflets du passé, R0223. Apothéose, RO8
Philip Martin pf
Hyperion CDA67118 (72 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1999

Piano Works for Two and Four Hands
Réponds-moi, RO225[a]. Printemps d'amour, RO214[a]. Marche de nuit, RO151[a]. Ses yeux, RO234[a]. La jota aragonesa, RO130[a]. Le bananier, RO21[a]. Ojos criollos, RO184[a]. Orfa, RO186[a]. L'étincelle, RO80[a]. Marche funèbre, RO148[a]. La gallina, RO100[a]. Radieuse, RO217[a]. Grande tarantelle, RO259[a]. Souvenir d'Andalousie, RO242[b]. Le banjo, RO22[b]. Grand scherzo, RO114[b]. Pasquinade, RO189[b]. Berceuse, RO27[b]. Tournament Galop, RO26[b]. Mazurkab. Union, RO269[b]. The Last Hope, RO133[b]. Scherzo-romantique, RO233[b]. Le mancenillier, RO142[b]. The Dying Poet, RO75[ab]
[a]Nerine Barrett, [b]Alan Marks pfs
Nimbus ② NI7045/6 (107 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1984-91

It was once necessary to explain who Gottschalk was. Now the proud American virtuoso from New Orleans has taken his place as a composer of some of the most colourful and charming Romantic piano music – thanks largely to Martin's advocacy in this immaculately produced Hyperion series. Compared with Gottschalk's syncopated masterpieces such as Souvenir de Porto Rico, which ends Volume 1, this collection may be slighter, but every track is a delight. Martin's feeling for this music is so convincing and the recorded sound so ideal that even the more trivial pieces are a joy – Gottschalk appears as a real melodist. A superficial crowd-pleaser such as Apothéose is good for a laugh. But Morte!! is moving in its simplicity. The piano duets on the two-disc set from Nimbus feature the magnificent team of Marks and Barrett, well recorded, who sparkle in infectious enjoyment of this vivid music. Try the Cuban syncopations of tracks 1 and 11. The Nimbus CD notes needed bringing up to date (the writer is Wilfrid Mellers) while the informative Hyperion booklet by Jeremy Nicholas takes advantage of two new monographs on Gottschalk.

Charles François Gounod

French 1818-1893

GROVE Gounod studied privately with Reicha and at the Paris Conservatoire with Halévy (counterpoint) and Le Sueur (composition), winning the Prix de Rome in 1839. At Rome (1840-42) he was deeply impressed by the 16th-century polyphonic music (particularly Palestrina's) he heard in the Sistine Chapel and wrote some rather austere masses; for a time a church organist in Paris, he considered joining the priesthood. The climax of his liturgical work came in 1855 with the florid Messe solennelle de Ste Cécile, a favourite setting scarcely superseded by his 12 later ones (1870-92). Meanwhile he wrote a Gluckian, then a Meyerbeerian opera, both failures; the succeeding five, all first performed at the Théâtre-Lyrique, are the works by which he is remembered, namely the small-scale Le médecin malgré lui (1858) and Philémon et Baucis (1860), the triumphant Faust (1859), in which sensitive musical characterization and a refreshing naturalness set new standards on the French operatic stage, and the major successes Mireille (1864) and Roméo et Juliette (1867).

In 1870 Gounod took refuge in England from the Franco-Prussian War, staying some four years to exploit the English demand for choral music. The first conductor of the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society (1871), he produced dozens of choruses and songs. But he experienced considerable intrigue in his private life, effectively marking the end of his fruitfulness as a composer. His oratorios for Birmingham, La rédemption and Mors et vita, if banal and facilely emotional, were nonetheless successful. Gounod's influence on the next generation of French composers, including Bizet, Fauré and especially Massenet, was enormous. Tchaikovsky and later Poulenc, Auric and Ravel admired his clean workmanship, delicate sentiment, gift for orchestral colour and, in his best songs, unpretentious lyrical charm.

Symphonies

Symphony No 1 in D. Symphony No 2 in E flat
Orchestra of St John's, Smith Square / John Lubbock
ASV CDDCA981 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996 and 1993

Gounod's symphonies are not brow-furrowing and do not represent any advance in symphonic thought beyond Schumann and Mendelssohn, but they reveal Gounod in the Gallic tradition of elegantly crafted works with a light touch. The melodious, classically built and even witty First Symphony, with its delicate second-movement fugue and vivacious finale, is not to be peremptorily brushed aside. The longer Second Symphony makes an attempt to sound more serious, especially in the first movement and the dramatic Scherzo – the cantilena of the Larghetto is beautifully shaped here – but high spirits return in the finale. John Lubbock and his St John's orchestra are adept at the crisply neat treatment that this music demands. His wind section is outstanding, but in the finale of No 1 the violins too show real virtuosity. A warm but clean recorded sound adds to our pleasure.

Mélodies

Où voulez-vous aller?[a]. Le soir[a]. Venise[a]. Ave Maria[b]. Sérénade[b]. Chanson de printemps[a]. Au rossignol[b]. Ce que je suis sans toi[a]. Envoi de fleurs[a]. La pâquerette[b]. Boléro[b]. Mignon[a]. Rêverie[a]. Ma belle amie est morte[b]. Loin du pays[b]. Clos ta paupière[a]. Prière[b]. L'absent[a]. Le temps des roses[a].

Biondina[c]. The Worker[c]. A lay of the early spring[c]. My true love hath my heart[b]. Oh happy home! Oh blessed flower![c]. The fountain mingles with the river[a]. Maid of Athens[c]. Beware! The Arrow and the Song[a]. Ilala: stances à la mémoire de Livingston[c]. If thou art sleeping, maiden[c]
[a]Dame Felicity Lott sop [b]Ann Murray mez
[c]Anthony Rolfe Johnson ten Graham Johnson pf
Hyperion ② CDA66801/2 (136 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1993

This well-filled two-CD set is surely the most wide-ranging single issue of Gounod's mélodies. The first of the discs confirms the commonly held view of Gounod. Almost without exception the songs are pleasing and sentimental, a sweetly scented posy of hymns to flowers, of rêveries and serenades. The selection includes two settings of poems that Berlioz had used in Les nuits d'été, plumbing the depths of the poetry, where Gounod is content to skim across the surface. In chronological order, the songs show how little Gounod's music deepened, but also how evergreen was his inspiration in melody and harmony.

To turn to the second disc is to have all one's prejudices overturned. This comprises non-French settings, for which Gounod dons first Italian garb for the song-cycle Biondina, and then English for a group of 10 songs written during his stay in London in the 1870s. The Italian cycle is a delight. It would be impossible to guess the composer, as Gounod exchanges his customary flowing themes and rippling arpeggios for an ardent, Tosti-like vocal line over dry staccato chords. Anthony Rolfe Johnson catches its mix of sunny lyricism and Gallic sensitivity to perfection.

All three singers are on their best form, Rolfe Johnson bringing an air of intimate seductiveness to Byron's Maid of Athens.

Gounod L'Arithmétique. Au printemps. D'un coeur qui t'aime. O ma belle rebelle. Mignon. Par une belle nuit. Sérénade. La siesta. Fleur des bois. Les vacances. Le banc de pierre. Donne-moi cette fleur Lalo Puisqu'ici bas. Aubade. Dansons! Saint-Saëns Clair de lune. Dans les coins bleus. El desdichado. Pastorale. Rêverie. Le rossignol. Le soir descend sur la colline. Viens!
Les Demoiselles de... (Sophie Marin-Degor sop Claire Brua mez Serge Cyferstein pf)
Alpha Productions ALPHA033 Ⓕ
(70 minutes: DDD). Texts and translations included
Recorded c2002 ◉◉

Every now and then a disc comes along that paralyses the critical faculties: you know you should be trying to be objective, but somehow cold analysis seems almost obscene. So it is here. Though just one word of warning: for some tastes, Sophie Marin-Degor's soprano may seem a little shrill at forte in the higher reaches. But then French sopranos have been taxed with this since forever, and we probably have to accept that it goes with the territory.

In all other respects that territory, as explored here, is the land where the oranges bloom; or, if you prefer, 'l'île heureuse'. Both Marin-Degor and Claire Brua come to this repertory from the world of Baroque music, and they bring with them a cleanness of articulation and phrasing that is wholly delightful, sensitively and tactfully supported by Serge Cyferstein. Apart from the sheer sonorous pleasure of the disc, the balance all three artists maintain between expressive moment and formal shaping is almost perfection itself: key words come over with just a little emphasis, but not so much that we are aware of some vocal coach in the background saying 'Bring out the verb here!' Similarly, rhythms are accurately observed, and delicate rubato reserved by and large for cadences.

This disc is stylish, responsive, impeccable in ensemble and tuning, sensuous, witty, moving... (that's enough epithets): utterly unmissable.

Faust

Richard Leech ten Faust; Cheryl Studer sop Marguerite; José van Dam bar Méphistophélès; Thomas Hampson bass Valentin; Martine Mahé mez Siébel; Nadine Denize sop Marthe; Marc Barrard bar Wagner; French Army Chorus; Toulouse Capitole Choir and Orchestra / Michel Plasson
EMI ③ 556224-2 (204 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, text and translation included
Recorded 1991 ◉

Richard Leech as the eponymous hero sings his part with the fresh, eager tone, the easy legato, the sense of French style that it has so badly been wanting all these years, certainly since Nicolai Gedda essayed the role on the now rather aged Cluytens/EMI sets from 1953 and 1958. Gedda's voice may be more lyrical in the role, but Leech encompasses it with less effort, and creates a real character. It is extremely distinguished singing. Beside him he has an equally impressive loved one in Studer and antagonist van Dam. Studer finds herself another amenable métier in Gounod; her Marguerite is not only sung with innate musicality, firm tone and expressive phrasing but also with a deep understanding of this style of French music in terms of nuance and the lighter touch. The Jewel song is a treasure, and to add to one's satisfaction Studer's French seems faultless.

Van Dam is a resolute, implacable Devil with a firm, even tone to second the insinuating characterisation. His voice may have dried out a little, but he remains a paragon of a stylist in all he attempts. The three French-speaking singers excel in subsidiary roles. Thomas Hampson is in places overextended as Valentin, a rôle that needs experience and perfect French.

Plasson almost but not quite kills the score with kindness. He so loves the piece that his tempos, especially in the more reflective moments, such as the start of the Garden scene, become much slower than the score predicates and demands. Against that must be set his respect for the minutiae of Gounod's often inspired writing for orchestra and a general warmth that lights the score from within. It was an inspired stroke to invite the French Army Chorus to sing the Soldiers' Chorus, delivered with such verve as to make it seem unhackneyed.

Faust
Jerry Hadley ten Faust; Cecilia Gasdia sop Marguerite; Samuel Ramey bass Méphistophélès; Alexander Agache bar Valentin; Susanne Mentzer mez Siébel; Brigitte Fassbaender mez Marthe; Philippe Fourcade bass Wagner; Welsh National Opera Chorus and Orchestra / Carlo Rizzi
Teldec ③ 4509-90872-2 (211 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, text and translation included. Recorded 1993

The tender, sweet-toned and idiomatically French singing and style of Gasdia and Hadley quite exceed expectations in these days of homogenised and uniform interpretation. These two principals step outside predictable parameters to give us readings of high individuality, favouring their music with delicately etched line, varied dynamics and real involvement in their characters' predicaments.

Both their happiness and later remorse are eloquently expressed. Gasdia gives a well-nigh faultless performance – light-hearted, elated in the Jewel song, ardent in the Garden duet, ecstatic in the bedtime solo that follows, ineffably sad in her 'Il ne revient pas'. She is no less touching when she has lost her reason. Subtle timbres, poised high notes inform all her singing. Hadley, with the ideal weight of voice for Faust, has done nothing better. 'Je t'aime' at the first meeting with Marguerite is whispered in wonder. In the love duet he sings to her as a gentle lover, caressing his music, and Gasdia replies in kind.

The good news continues with Mentzer. She sings both Siébel's regular solos with vibrant, properly virile tone, the quick vibrato attractive. It's a real coup to have Fassbaender as Marthe, making so much of little. Ramey is the one singer to give a standardised performance. His Mephisto is as soundly and resolutely sung as one would expect from this sturdy bass, but it doesn't have the Francophone smoothness and subtlety of other interpretations. The only drawback is the often lax conducting. Rizzi conducts an often alarmingly slow account of the score and in compensation the more exciting passages are given rather too much verve. However, he is aware of the sensuous nature of Gounod's scoring and the WNO Chorus and Orchestra are excellent. The recording is open, full of presence and well balanced.

Faust (sung in English)
Paul Charles Clarke ten Faust; Mary Plazas sop Marguerite; Alastair Miles bass Méphistophélès; Gary Magee bar Valentin; Diana Montague mez Siébel; Sarah Walker mez Marthe; Matthew Hargreaves bass Wagner; Geoffrey Mitchell Choir; Philharmonia Orchestra / David Parry
Chandos Opera in English Series ③ CHAN3014
(208 minutes: DDD). Notes and text included. Ⓕ
Recorded 1998

After listening to this Faust, one can feel something very like awe. The structure is massive, the workmanship infinitely thorough, the boldness of stroke (dramatic and musical) almost breathtaking. No doubt the performance contributes to the awe. That is because it is in many ways a very good one, and partly because it underlines seriousness and grandeur. But it appears that David Parry has joined the swelling ranks of the slowcoaches. The Church scene and Faust's solo in the garden, for instance, are probably the slowest on record. Happily, there is nothing boring about it. This recording and its production keep the stage in view, and it is particularly good to have the chorus in such clear focus.

The principals, too, form a strongly gifted team. Paul Charles Clarke, the Faust, is an interesting tenor, thrustful both in tone and manner yet capable of gentleness and delicacy. He never lets us forget that this is his story; when he sings everything counts. By comparison, Alastair Miles's Méphistophélès seems a mild-mannered type with reserves of authority and a magnificent voice. The absence of overt devilry may pass as a virtue, but the absence of character is surely taking the disguise too far. Gounod's Mephisto is a joker, a man of the world and an exhibitionist; this one, rarely in the spotlight, loses it entirely when Marthe enters the garden in the person of Sarah Walker.

The Valentin, Gary Magee, has a fine, vibrant baritone and rises well to his high notes and big moments. Diana Montague is an excellent Siébel (and how she rises to hers). The Marguerite, Mary Plazas, is totally likeable, ingenuous but not winsomely so, touchingly sincere in her love and her loss, clean in the scale-work of her Jewel song, a little underpowered in the grand melody of the Church scene, but having a powerful high C in reserve. The English version by Christopher Cowell reads well, sounds natural and does not affect the artless colloquialism that can be an embarrassing feature of modern translations.

Additional recommendation
Faust
Nash Faust Licette Marguerite Easton Mephistopheles BBC Choir; symphony orchestra / Beecham; Raybould
Dutton Laboratories mono ② 2CDAX2001 Ⓜ
(138 minutes: ADD: 5/94)

Recorded in 1929-30 Beecham's English version enshrines two wonderful performances by Heddle Nash and Miriam Licette. They are object lessons in style and diction. Beecham conducts with the lightest of touches.

Roméo et Juliette

Roberto Alagna ten Roméo; Angela Gheorghiu sop Juliette; José Van Dam bass-bar Frère Laurent; Simon Keenlyside bar Mercutio; Marie-Ange Todorovitch sop Stéphano; Alain Fondary bar Capulet; Claire Larcher mez Gertrude; Daniel Galvez Vallejo ten Tybalt; Didier Henry bar Paris; Till Fechner bar Grégorio; Guy Flechter ten Benvolio; Alain Vernhes bar Duc; Christophe Fel bass Frère Jean; Toulouse Capitole Chorus and Orchestra / Michel Plasson
EMI ③ 556123-2 (180 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, text and translation included
Recorded 1995 ●

Michel Plasson is no stranger to this opera. He's recorded it once before for EMI in 1983, but compared with his earlier self Plasson is more assuredly his own man here, taking a broader view of the turbulent, dramatic opening. Then comes the chorus's introductory narration; the earlier Plasson recording puts great emphasis on story-telling, and is not nearly as imaginative as the quieter, more intimate style he favours here, the chorus having more light-and-shade, better rhythmic pointing, more 'face'.

As Juliette Gheorghiu immediately makes her listeners echo the chorus's 'Ah! qu'elle est belle!', for the sound matches the imagined sight. Its beauty is more mature than Catherine Malfitano's (Plasson's earlier Juliette), but as the part develops towards tragedy so her warmer, richer tone is better able to embody the depth of feeling, and she brings a fine conviction to the despairing scene with Friar Laurence and to the scene of the potion.

Alagna's Romeo has, of course, youth on his side, and though he doesn't always sound too happy with the B flats of 'Ah, lève-toi, soleil', there are many, many things to enjoy. The opera also abounds in rewarding secondary roles – José Van Dam as the Friar is gravely firm and as fine as ever, while Simon Keenlyside is also excellent. The only slight question-mark hangs over the third disc – there to contain the ballet music, but which the opera is better off without. Nevertheless, this is now the version to go for.

Percy Grainger

American/Australian 1882-1961

Grainger studied with Knorr and Kwast at the Hoch Conservatory in Frankfurt (1895-99), where he became linked with Balfour Gardiner, Quilter and C Scott, and settled in London in 1901. Another close friend was Grieg. During the next decade he appeared widely as a concert pianist; he also took part in the folksong movement, collecting and arranging numerous songs. He was an unconventional man, in his attitudes, his lifestyle and his music where he experimented with a variety of techniques, including rhythm freed from regular metre, polytonality, improvisation and highly unusual instrumentation. In 1914 he moved to the USA, where he taught in Chicago and New York; he visited Australia several times, helping the establishment of the Grainger Museum at Melbourne. His large output, complicated by the fact that he often made several versions of a piece, includes both original works and folksong arrangements. He has suffered the fate of being remembered more for what he called his 'fripperies' (Country Gardens, Handel in the Strand, Molly on the Shore) than his larger works, but even in them his originality of spirit comes through.

The Warriors

Grainger The Warriors Holst The Planets, H125[a]
[a]women's voices of the Monteverdi Choir; Philharmonia Orchestra / Sir John Eliot Gardiner
DG 445 860-2GH (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1994 ●

Grainger's magnum opus, The Warriors, was the 'music for an imaginary ballet', a commission set up by Sir Thomas Beecham for Diaghilev's Ballets Russes, but one which failed to materialise. Grainger wrote it anyway, of course, his imagination running riot with visions of a great tribal pageant, a 'wild sexual concert', the ghostly clans of all humankind spirited together in celebration of life's prime. The Warriors was his corrective, a symphony of dissolution. It is excessive, vulgar, as strange as it is beautiful. Above all, it's the rhythmic excitement of the piece that is so totally irresistible. Gardiner's Classical and pre-Classical explorations have, by necessity of style, set great store by rhythmic matters, and what a boon they are in The Planets. It's Gardiner's insistence upon precise articulations that keeps fleet-footed 'Mercury' so airborne, that brings the opening of 'Jupiter' into such sharp relief, making it shine all the brighter. There are other moments where a little more theatrical rhetoric would not have gone amiss. But the marmoreal beauty of 'Venus' and 'Neptune', the sensitivity of the Philharmonia's playing, duly leave their impression. The recorded sound is superb.

Grainger The Warriors. In a Nutshell. Train Music (ed Rathburn). Lincolnshire Posy. Country Gardens, BFMS22 (rev 1950) Debussy (orch Grainger) Pagodes Ravel (orch Grainger) La vallée des cloches[a]
City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra / Sir Simon Rattle
EMI 556412-2 (70 minutes: DDD). Recorded Ⓕ [a]1990 and 1996 ●

This is a marvellous Grainger anthology. Rattle surpasses Richard Hickox's commendable account of In a Nutshell in terms of rhythmic point and bracing character and makes us even more aware of the originality of Grainger's vision. The Warriors is handsomely served on CD by Geoffrey Simon and John Eliot Gardiner (see above). Rattle's stunning version of The Warriors possesses a mastery of texture and irresistible choreographic flair to remind us of the piece's ballet origins. Country Gardens is quirkily scored, harmonically eventful and hugely entertaining. The delectable arrangements of Ravel's La vallée des cloches and Debussy's Pagodes are quite captivating in their imaginative sonorities and both receive exquisite treatment here. Train Music is an intriguing torso, dating from 1901, which the ambitious teenage composer began to score for an orchestra of about 150 players. It's heard here in a reduced orchestration by the American Grainger authority, Eldon Rathburn. Finally, we are given an exceptionally perceptive Lincolnshire Posy. Not only do the fabulous blend and immaculate intonation of the CBSO's wind and brass take the breath away, but Rattle's interpretation is also full of insight. Most remarkable of all is 'Rufford Park Poachers', full of tragic grandeur. Both the recording and presentation are immaculate.

Miscellaneous Orchestral Works

Green Bushes, BFMS12. Lord Maxwell's Goodnight, BFMS14 (both ed Barry Peter Ould). Hill Song No 2. The Merry King, BFMS39[a]. Eastern Intermezzo. Colonial Song, S1. Spoon river, AFMS2. The Power of Rome and the Christian Heart. The Immovable Do. County Derry Air, BFMS29. Ye Banks and Braes O' Bonnie Doon, BFMS31. English Dance No 1
[a]Paul Janes pf BBC Philharmonic Orchestra / Richard Hickox
Chandos CHAN9839 (70 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1999 ●●

Here's a recipe guaranteed to delight Grainger acolytes and inquisitive newcomers alike: a liberal sprinkling of old friends, three of the composer's most ambitious creations and no less than four world première recordings. Falling into the last two categories comes the giddily inventive English Dance No 1. Bearing the inscription 'For Cyril Scott with long love', this is the work of which Gabriel Fauré exclaimed: 'It's as if the total population were a-dancing.' Hickox and company have already set down this remarkable piece in its final scoring from 1924-29; the present orchestration dates from 1906-09 and wears an even more exuberantly colourful demeanour than its successor.

Originally conceived in 1907 for 24 winds (in which guise it can be heard on Chandos), the bracing, somewhat Delian Hill Song No 2 is played in its final incarnation from 1948 for symphony orchestra. That same year, Grainger accepted a commission for an even more ambitious wind-band creation, The Power of Rome and the Christian Heart, based on ideas from as far back as 1918 and given here with the optional string parts. It's an imposing, oddly moreish affair, whose second half borrows material from the 1943 orchestral essay Dreamery (Chandos) as well as the first movement ('The Power of Love') of the marvellous Danish Folksong Suite. From a clutch of indelible favourites, to be singled out are the well-upholstered 1919 orchestration of the supremely touching Colonial Song, Green Bushes and that memorably tangy 1920 harmonisation of the Irish Tune from County Derry.

Hickox secures a set of performances that are simply past praise in their combination of stylish swagger and heartwarming commitment to the cause. Wonderful Chandos sound, too, irrepressibly vivid. Terrific stuff!

Youthful Suite. Molly on the Shore, BFMS1. Irish Tune from County Derry, BFMS15. Shepherd's Hey, BFMS16. Country Gardens. Early one Morning, BFMS unnum. Handel in the Strand, RMTB2. Mock Morris, RMTB1. Dreamery (ed Ould). The Warriors (ed Servadei)
BBC Philharmonic Orchestra / Richard Hickox
Chandos Grainger Edition CHAN9584 Ⓕ
(75 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1997 ●

Featuring some ripe, beautifully clean-cut sonics, this collection is a great success for all involved. As the opening, chest-swelling 'Northern March' of the Youthful Suite immediately shows, Hickox draws playing of infectious swagger from the ever-excellent BBC Philharmonic (marvellous brass sounds especially). The suite boasts some striking invention, not least in the central 'Nordic Dirge' (a hauntingly eloquent processional, incorporating plenty of 'tuneful percussion') and a winsome, at times almost Ivesian 'English Waltz'. There follow seven of Grainger's most popular miniatures in the orchestrations Gershwin made for Leopold Stokowski. Hickox gives us Grainger's original thoughts and a delectable sequence they comprise, full of truly kaleidoscopic textural and harmonic variety. By the side of Rattle's CBSO version, Hickox's Country Gardens is perhaps marginally lacking in twinkling good humour and entrancing lightness of touch, but his infectious energy and evident affection more than compensate. Dreamery, described by Grainger as 'Slow Tween-Play' (an epithet which, annotator Barry Peter Ould suggests, 'could be construed as his particular term for an intermezzo'), appears here in the extended orchestral version.

For The Warriors, Hickox uses a new critical edition prepared by the Australian Grainger authority, Alessandro Servadei. Grainger's orchestral palette has never sounded more gloriously extravagant. Then again, this impression is just as much a tribute to Hickox's performance, which is breathtaking in its virtuosic brilliance and stunning co-ordination.

Further listening
'Peacock Pie'
Includes Gibbs Concertino. Peacock Pie. Jacob Concertino. Milford Concertino in E. Rootham Miniature Suite. Dring Festival Scherzo
Roscoe pf Guildhall Strings / Salter vn
Hyperion CDA67316 (60 minutes: DDD: 6/02) Ⓕ

A wholly delectable disc of spirited and inventively written miniature concertos, all with string orchestra. Performances are light-hearted and polished, and beautifully recorded.

Music for Wind Band

The Power of Rome and the Christian Heart. Children's March: Over the Hills and Far Away, RMTB4. Bell Piece[a]. Blithe Bells. The Immovable Do. Hill Songs – No 1; No 2. County Derry Air, BFMS29. Marching Song of Democracy
[a]James Gilchrist ten Royal Northern College of Music Wind Orchestra / Timothy Reynish, Clark Rundell
Chandos Grainger Edition CHAN9630 Ⓕ
(65 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1992-97 ●

Rundell's compelling realisation of the extraordinary Hill Song No 1 – regarded by Grainger as one of his finest achievements and performed here in its original guise for (wait for it!) two piccolos, six oboes, six cors anglais, six bassoons and double-bassoon – was actually made by BBC Manchester back in 1992; the remaining items date from 1997 and benefit from the splendid sound and balance achieved by Chandos.

Another of Grainger's most striking wind-band compositions opens the disc, namely the 12-minute The Power of Rome and the Christian Heart. Both the Children's March and Bell Piece feature some unexpected vocal contributions. In the latter – a charming 'ramble' on John Dowland's Now, O now I needs must part – Grainger incorporates a bell part specially written for his wife, Ella. The delightfully piquant arrangements of Blithe Bells and The Immovable Do date from March 1931 and November/December 1939 respectively. These fine players equally revel in the 'scrunchy' harmonies of the eventful version of Irish Tune from County Derry (made in 1920 for military band and pipe-organ). That just leaves the boisterous Marching Song of Democracy, which Rundell again directs as to the manner born. All in all, a most entertaining release.

Keyboard Works

Piano Music for four hands, Volume 3
Rondo. Crew of the Long Dragon. Fantasy on George Gershwin's 'Porgy and Bess'. Ye Banks and Braes, BFMS32. Tiger-Tiger, KS4/JBC9. Walking Tune, RMTB3. C Scott Three Symphonic Dances. Delius A Dance Rhapsody No 1, RTVI/18. Grieg Knut Lurasens Halling II. Addinsell Festival. Le Jeune La Bel'aronde. Gershwin Girl Crazy – Embraceable you (all trans Grainger)
Penelope Thwaites, John Lavender pfs
Pearl SHECD9631 (78 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1989-1991

Volume 3 of Grainger's music for four hands (Volume 2 is no longer available) contains short original compositions and a number of his transcriptions. These latter are fascinating in their admirable combination of scrupulous fidelity and creative rethinking for an entirely different medium. You would not necessarily think that a transcription, even for two pianos, of Delius's First Dance Rhapsody could possibly work with any real degree of success. However, the reality is that it works so well that some may even prefer Grainger's version to the original. In the Porgy and Bess Fantasy he treats the tunes with loving respect, but as a pianist he cannot help seeing different ways of presenting them: the very big gestures in 'My man's gone now'; a searching little prelude to 'It ain't necessarily so' implying all sorts of interesting things that Grainger could have done with that slithery little tune if he weren't obliged to play it straight – which he then does, and with sparkling enjoyment.

Grainger Jutish Medley, DFMS8. Colonial Song, S1. Molly on the Shore, BFMS1. Harvest Hymn. Spoon River, AFMS1. Country Gardens, BFMS22. Walking Tune, RMTB3. Mock Morris, RMTB1. Ramble on Themes from Richard Strauss's 'Der Rosenkavalier'. Shepherd's Hey, BFMS4. Irish Tune from County Derry, BFMS6. Handel in the Strand, RMTB2. The Hunter in his career, OEPM4. Scotch Strathspey and Reel, BFMS37. In a Nutshell Suite – No 4, The Gum-suckers March. The Merry King, BFMS38. In Dahomey Stanford (arr Grainger) Four Irish Dances, Op 89 – No 1, A March-Jig; No 4, A Reel
Marc-André Hamelin pf
Hyperion CDA66884 (73 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996

This is perhaps one of the most riveting and satisfying anthologies of Grainger's music. Hamelin's superb control and artistry just about sweep the board if you're looking for a disc that not only brings you all the old favourites but also explores some of the less familiar music, such as Grainger's arrangements of two of Stanford's Irish Dances, the Cakewalk Smasher, In Dahomey or some of the rather less familiar folk-music settings such as The Merry King – the latter a delightful discovery. The deceptive ease with which Hamelin presents these pieces is quite breathtaking. The Irish Tune from County Derry, for instance, contains some exacting problems which call on the pianist to play ppp in the outer fingers and mf with the middle in order to bring out the melody which Grainger places almost entirely within the middle register of the piano, and yet Hamelin makes it sound incredibly natural. This is a very desirable Grainger anthology.

Piano Transcriptions

Grainger Beautiful fresh flower. Lullaby. Paraphrase on the Waltz of the Flowers from Tchaikovsky's Flower Waltz. Free Settings of Favourite Melodies – Brahms: Wiegenlied, Op 49 No 4; Handel: Hornpipe from the Water Music; Fauré: Nell, Op 18 No 1; Fauré: Après un Rêve, Op 7 No 1; R Strauss:

Rosenkavalier Ramble; Dowland: Now, O Now, I Needs Must Part. Gershwin Transcriptions – The Man I Love; Love Walked In Scott Handelian Rhapsody Stanford Irish Dances, Op 89
Byrd The Carman's Whistle Delius Air and Dance, RTVI/21
Piers Lane pf
Hyperion CDA67279 (75 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded c2001 ●●

These short pieces range from simplicity to elaboration, from innocence to experience; most of them are homages to many of Grainger's friends and honour his trenchant belief in the sort of folk-melody that crosses all barriers. Wherever you turn you will hear music 'like a breath of spring air' (to quote Barry Peter Ould's excellent note) and, more paradoxically, transcriptions that show Grainger's originality.

Cyril Scott's Handelian Rhapsody, receiving its first recording, may suggest Scott and Grainger more than Handel but it is an intriguing oddity and one which rises to an impressive grandeur. Stanford's Leprechaun is gentle and confiding rather than mischievous and the 'Ramble on Love' from Der Rosenkavalier is a sophisticated 'dish-up' of introspection and open-hearted virtuosity. All this music makes a wide variety of subtle and fierce demands, but Piers Lane, weaving his expertise with the lightest of touches, meets them with warmth and brio. Heartache, heart-ease or a tantalising mix of both all come within his style and everything is played with unfaltering command. Grainger's 'woggles' (his idiosyncratic term for tremolandi) can rarely have sounded more convincing and the Tchaikovsky Waltz is taken by storm in a magnificent display of red-blooded virtuosity.

The recording and presentation are immaculate. This is a dazzling, affectionate tribute to the composer and pianist who once said: 'To know a world of beauty and not to be able to spread the knowledge of it is agonising.'

Songs

David of the White Rock[a]. Died for Love, BFMS10[a]. The Sprig of Thyme, BFMS24[a]. Willow, Willow, OEPM1[a]. Near Woodstock Town[a]. Early one morning[a]. In Bristol Town (arr Gibbs)[d]. Songs of the North[a] – No 2, This is no my plaid; No 3, Turn ye to me; No 4, Skye Boat Song; No 5, Weaving Song. The Bridegroom Grat[a]. The Land O' the Leal[a] (both arr Ould). Proud Vesselil[a] (ed Thwaites). Under a bridge[ac]. Hubby and Wifey, DFMS5[ac]. The Lonely Desert-Man sees the Tents of the Happy Tribes, RMTB9[abc]. Colonial Song[ab]. The Only Son, KS21[ab]. The Love Song of Har Dyal, KS11[ac]. A Song of Autumn[a]. Five Settings of Ella Grainger[a]. O Glorious, Golden Era[a]. Little Ole with his Umbrella[a]. Variations on Handel's 'The Harmonious Blacksmith'[a] (ed Ould). Harvest Hymn[ae]. After-word[a]
Della Jones mez [a]Penelope Thwaites pf with [b]Mark Padmore ten [c]Stephen Varcoe bar [d]George Black gtr [e]John Lavender pf
Chandos Grainger Edition CHAN9730 Ⓕ
(74 minutes: DDD). Texts included
Recorded 1998 ●

Again Grainger amazes, amuses, arouses, intrigues. These 'Songs for mezzo' originate in Britain (with an excellent sequence of Scottish songs), Jutland and Australia. Some are folk-songs collected in the early years of the century; two have words by Kipling, five by Ella, Grainger's wife, and some have no words at all. The latter are fortifying antidotes to those text-merchants who think that song is essentially 'about' the communication of words, whereas everybody knows that you sing (la-la, dee-dee, as in these of Grainger) because a tune has taken your fancy and singing it makes you feel better.

It is really Della Jones's record, or hers and that of the admirable Penelope Thwaites. But the menfolk appear occasionally and always to effect. Mark Padmore is a resourceful tenor with hints here that he has in reserve a vibrant, rather Italianate body of tone.

Della Jones hereself is a natural for Grainger: she has the spirit to match, and, like him, a certain ambiguity in her forthrightness, so that at times we're not quite sure what is serious and what is a bit of fun. The Colonial Song ('Sentimental No 1') is unashamedly nostalgic, but with an element of send-up too: in the piano solos especially a joyful passage of inspired improvisation that is both a joke and 'for real'. Also for real is the prime quality of this disc, with 15 tracks 'première recordings' and 14 'première recordings in this version'.

Rudyard Kipling Settings – Dedication, KS1; Dedication II; Anchor Song; The Widow's Party, KS7; Soldier, Soldier; The Sea-wife; Ganges Pilot; The First Chantey; The Young British Soldier. Three Settings of Robert Burns. Songs of the North – Fair Young Mary, SON7; The Woman are a Gane Wud, SON9; My Faithful Fond One, SON10; O'er the Moor, SON12. The Power of Love, DFMS4. The Twa Corbies. A Reiver's Neck-Verse. Lord Maxwell's Goodnight, BFMS14
Martyn Hill ten Penelope Thwaites pf
Chandos Grainger Edition CHAN9610 Ⓕ
(69 minutes: DDD). Texts included ●

Grainger cared for neither rules nor forms; he wrote what he wanted and for whom he wanted, and one sees him flinging down collar and tie to do it. A singer probably needs to shed a few inhibitions in coping with these songs, and if Martyn Hill had any to start with he has got rid of them. He gives magnificent performances, and is matched by Penelope Thwaites who seems unerringly to make sense of the idiosyncratic piano parts. Some are folk-songs or settings of Burns, and in at least one of these – Afton Water – a comparison with Britten's way with folk-song inevitably comes to mind, Grainger being similarly determined and single-minded in working out his concept, but exquisite in the delicacy of his murmurous water-colouring. In others he stands almost in reproach of Britten, for the traditional melody so 'takes' him that he wants little more than to present it, lovingly, almost reverently, in its own unadorned beauty. As for the eight poems of Kipling – one of them being set twice – they inspire him with a sense of strange, fierce compassion and unquenchable energy.

To the 'character' songs – The Widow's Party and the relentless Young British Soldier for instance – Martyn Hill brings an unfailingly right touch, directed by a sense of passionate, imaginative conviction. His voice is not now beautiful, at any rate not above a mezzo-forte; but it is pliant and resourceful, and at times capable of most lovely 'pure' singing. He has made many good recordings, but this, surely, is his masterpiece.

The Power of Love, DFMS4. Early one morning. Scherzo. Random Round, RMTB8. O Gin I Were Where Gadie Rins, SON13. Skye Boat Song, SON3. Danny Deever, KS12. Irish Tune from County Derry (all ed Ould). Mock Morris, RMTB1. Died For Love, BFMS10 (ed Perna). Love Verses from 'The Song of Solomon'. Shepherd's Hey, RMTB3.The Three Ravens, BFMS41. Youthful Rapture. The Merry King, BFMS39 (ed Rogers). Dollar and a Half a Day, SCS2. Molly on the shore, BFMS1
Susan Gritton sop Pamela Helen Stephen mez
Mark Tucker ten Stephen Varcoe bar Tim Hugh vc
Joyful Company of Singers; City of London Sinfonia / Richard Hickox
Chandos Grainger Edition CHAN9653 Ⓕ
(62 minutes: DDD). Texts included
Recorded 1998 ●

Once considered the musical equivalents of Betjeman's 'chintzy chintzy cheeriness', Molly on the shore, Mock Morris and Shepherd's Hey now raise a delighted smile in appreciation of their energy, wit, skill, grace and joy. Like most of the items here, they are short pieces, and it would be unthinkable to call any of them 'major works'. But in each instance, for the space of three or four minutes, Grainger is the Jupiter of composers: the unfeigned, unforced, Bringer of Jollity. He is other things as well. In all of his folksong arrangements there is scarcely one which at some moment does not make the heart jump, as (for instance) he feels his way towards the secretive beauty of the Brigg Fair tune in Died For Love or as he commits himself with unstinting sympathy and inflamed musical imagination to the protest of Dollar and a Half. His Random Round, meant for improvisation but eventually (in 1943) written out, begins as casual fun and ends in something very like ecstasy.

Among the soloists, Susan Gritton brings a pure tone and a ready understanding, and Stephen Varcoe leads a haunting performance of The Three Ravens. The Joyful Company of Singers deserves to remain so, and with Richard Hickox, the City of London Sinfonia sound as though they are playing for pleasure too. With fine sound and a good booklet, the disc is a stayer.

Enrique Granados

Spanish 1867-1916

GROVE Granados studied in Barcelona with Pedrell and in Paris (1887-89), then returned to Barcelona to work as a teacher, pianist and composer. His greatest success came with the piano suite Goyescas (1911), a sequence of highly virtuoso studies after paintings by Goya he expanded them to form an opera of the same title, produced in New York in 1916. His other works include songs, orchestral pieces and more piano music.

Danzas españolas

12 Danzas españolas, Op 37. 7 Valses poéticos
Allegro di concierto. El pelele. Danza lenta.
Goyescas Montsalvatge Divagación.
Sonatine for Yvette Alicia de Larrocha pf
RCA Victor Red Seal ② 74321 84610-2 Ⓑ
(147 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1994 ●

Alicia de Larrocha, that incomparable interpreter of the Spanish repertoire, is here revisiting many of her favourite musical haunts. And if some of her former edge and fire, her tonal and stylistic luxuriance are now replaced by more 'contained' and reflective qualities, her warmth and affection remain undimmed. Her rubato, while less lavishly deployed than before, is potent and alluring, and each and every dance is played with rare naturalness and authority. But if a touch of sobriety occasionally blunts the fullest impact of these fascinating, most aristocratic idealisations of local Spanish life and colour, the actual playing is never less than masterly. The Valses poéticos are offered as an engaging encore. The recordings have much less range and reverberance than her previous ones on Decca; however, all lovers of this repertoire will want to add this to their collection.

Goyescas

Granados Goyescas Albéniz Iberia. Navarra
Alicia de Larrocha pf
Double Decca ② 448 191-2DF2 (141 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1972-76 ●●

Alicia de Larrocha has been playing these works, the greatest in the repertoire of Spanish piano music, all her life. Complete technical assurance in these extremely demanding works has now become taken for granted, and Larrocha is not unique in mastering their terrors; but though there have been other distinguished interpreters, her readings have consistently remained a touchstone. She employs plenty of subtle rubato but possesses the ability to make it sound as natural as breathing. In the true sense of that much-misused word, this is classical playing, free from any superimposed striving for effect but responding fully to the music's sense of colour; and even in the densest of textures she is able to control conflicting tonal levels. Goyescas, which can tempt the unwary into exaggerated 'expressiveness', brings forth a wealth of poetic nuance, without losing shape. The recorded quality throughout always was good and here emerges as fresh as ever. Anyone who does not already possess these recordings should not hesitate to acquire them now – all the more since the two discs together cost the same as one full-price one.

Goyescas. El pelele
Eric Parkin pf
Chandos CHAN9412 (61 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1993

The Granados Goyescas are profoundly Spanish in feeling, but the folk influence is more of court music than of the flamenco or cante hondo styles which reflect gypsy and Moorish influence. A direction in the score at the beginning of the Goyescas is con garbo y donaire ('with charm and elegance'). The description aptly fits Parkin's performances. His readings have an element of free rubato, but this is never excessive, and it serves to underline the improvisatory nature of these pieces. Aided by a clean technique in this sometimes complex texture he gives persuasive performances that also contain much poetry. He captures the dignified flamboyance of the traditional dance in the 'Fandango by candlelight', carefully observing the direction avec beaucoup de rythme. Two of the hardest tests for a pianist in this collection are the preservation of coherence in the long 'Serenata del espectro' and the avoidance of mawkishness in 'La maja y el ruiseñor': Parkin emerges successfully from both. A piano with bright top octaves was perhaps not the ideal instrument for this recording, but there is no lack of colour or nuance from the performer.

Alexandr Grechaninov

Russian/American 1864-1956

GROVE Grechaninov studied at the Moscow Conservatory (1881-90) and with Rimsky-Korsakov at the St Petersburg Conservatory (1890-93) and worked as a piano teacher and folksong arranger; in 1910 he received a pension for his liturgical music. But that ceased with the Revolution, and in 1925 he settled in Paris, moving to the USA in 1929. His large output (nearly 200 opus numbers) includes operas, five symphonies, masses, songs and piano music.

Piano Trios

No 1 in C minor, Op 38; No 2 in G, Op 128
Bekova Sisters (Elvira Bekova vn Alfia Bekova vc Eleonora Bekova pf)
Chandos CHAN9461 (53 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996

Composed in 1906, Grechaninov's First Piano Trio is a typical product of Russia's 'Silver Age': typical in its expert, school-of-Rimsky craftsmanship, typical in its languishing lyricism, typical in its fundamental complacency. The first movement draws heavily on the figurations from Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony but divests them of all emotional immediacy or dangerous intensity. This makes for pleasant, undemanding listening, and throws into relief the achievements of Rachmaninov, Scriabin and Stravinsky. But don't expect more than that. Grechaninov is one of several candidates for the label of 'the Russian Brahms'. That fits him as unsatisfactorily as it does Taneyev or Glazunov, but the finale of his Second Trio at least shows why it sticks. This playful, yet sturdy and well-crafted music has a feel of 1881 rather than 1931. Composed in California, its childlike escapism is touching, and its sounds agreeable and rewarding to play. Strong, enjoyable, upfront performances from the talented Bekova sisters; the recording is well lubricated with resonance, but not absurdly so.

All-Night Vigil

All-Night Vigil, Op 59. Nunc dimittis, Op 34 No 1. 🅿
The Seven Days of the Passion, Op 58 – No 3, In Thy Kingdom[a]; No 6, Now the Powers of Heaven
[a]James Bowman counterten Holst Singers / Stephen Layton
Hyperion CDA67080 (63 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1998 ●●

The All-Night Vigil is an outstanding achievement. Like Rachmaninov's famous setting, it is a selection of texts from the services of Vespers and Matins celebrated as a Vigil, though in current parish practice this lasts rather less than an entire night. Grechaninov sets fewer texts: the duration of the work is just over 47 minutes. Here we find the sustained chordal writing and slow-moving melodies oscillating around a few notes familiar from Rachmaninov, but Grechaninov has his own distinctive harmonic vocabulary, and his writing is less text-driven. Chant is an inspiration, but is also used in a different way from Rachmaninov: none is quoted in its entirety, the composer preferring instead to use fragments of various chants which are combined and juxtaposed with considerable freedom. He is a master of texture: listen to the astonishing darkness of sound produced by the scoring for lower voices in Ot yunosti moyeya, for example. Overall there is a feeling of luminosity in the writing, however, as well as an undeniable grandeur. To round off the disc we are given three other liturgical works, including a dramatic setting of the Beatitudes (sung at the Divine Liturgy) with James Bowman as soloist. The Holst Singers under Stephen Layton are superb: they have a complete mastery of the style and the fine, rich choral timbre which the music demands. Very highly recommended.

Edvard Grieg

Norwegian 1843-1907

Grieg studied with EF Wenzel at the Leipzig Conservatory (1858-62), where he became intimately familiar with early Romantic music (especially Schumann's), gaining further experience in Copenhagen and encouragement from Niels Gade. Not until 1864-65 and his meeting with the Norwegian nationalist Rikard Nordraak did his stylistic breakthrough occur, notably in the folk-inspired Humoresker for piano Op 6. Apart from promoting Norwegian music through concerts of his own works, he obtained pupils, became conductor of the Harmoniske Selskab and helped found the Christiania Musikforening (1871), meanwhile composing his Piano Concerto (1868) and the important piano arrangements of 25 of Lindeman's folksongs (Op 17, 1869). An operatic collaboration with Bjornson came to nothing, but his incidental music to Ibsen's Peer Gynt (1875), the best known of his large compositions, produced some of his finest work. Despite chronic ill-health he continued to tour as a conductor and pianist and to execute commissions from his base at Troldhaugen (from 1885); he received numerous international honours. Among his later works, The Mountain Thrall Op 32 for baritone, two horns and strings, the String Quartet in G minor Op 27, the popular neo-Baroque Holberg Suite (1884) and the Haugtussa song cycle Op 67 (1895) are the most distinguished.

Grieg was first and foremost a lyrical composer; his Op 33 Vinje settings, for example, encompass a wide range of emotional expression and atmospheric colour, and the ten opus numbers of Lyric Pieces for piano hold a wealth of characteristic mood-sketches. But he also was a pioneer, in the impressionistic uses of harmony and piano sonority in his late songs and in the dissonance treatment in the Slåtter Op 72, peasant fiddle-tunes arranged for piano.

Piano Concerto

Grieg Piano Concerto in A minor, Op 16[b]
Debussy Préludes – Book 1[a]
Arturo Benedetti Michelangeli pf [b]New Philharmonia Orchestra / Rafael Frühbeck de Burgos
BBC Legends/IMG Artists [b]mono/[a]stereo
BBCL4043-2 (69 minutes: DDD/ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded live in [b]1965 and [a]1982 ●●●

Somehow you feel it must be possible to deliver the hackneyed opening flourishes of the Grieg Concerto with real abandon and impetuosity, to get the orchestra to respond to them with genuine ardour, then for the soloist to combine flow, virtuoso dash, fantasy and noble eloquence and to crown the structural highpoints in a way that lifts you out of your seat. Yet until you hear a performance like this one you may never quite believe it can be done. A sense of joyous rhapsody buoys up Michelangeli's playing from first note to last, yet everything is founded on a bedrock of high intelligence, taste and natural authority. Witness too the fabulous tone-colours he draws from the instrument. His slow movement is by turns balmy and ecstatic, and the finale has terrific drive. And the virtuosity...! If your hair is not standing on end in the finale's coda you need an urgent medical check-up. Forget the boxy recording and the hissy background. This is a performance that entirely merits the hysterical cheers that greet it.

Seventeen years on, Michelangeli's Debussy also provokes rapturous applause, but in this instance it was probably partly a tribute to his by this time legendary status – he was 63 and rapidly becoming as famous for his cancellations as for his performances. Of course there are marvels of pianism here, but an air of calculation hangs over much of the playing. Those who have Michelangeli's 1978 DG studio version will find little to prefer here, apart from the slightly warmer acoustic.

Grieg Piano Concerto in A minor, Op 16
Schumann Piano Concerto in A minor, Op 54
Stephen Kovacevich pf
BBC Symphony Orchestra / Sir Colin Davis
Philips 50 Great Recordings 464 702-2PM Ⓜ
(60 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1970-71 ●

Stephen Kovacevich's Philips recording has been tirelessly celebrated for its freshness and poetic vitality, and it remains a benchmark offering. His virtuosity is both inclusive and discreet, and his Grieg Concerto remains among the finest on record. The cadenza flashes fire with the best of them and in the central Adagio his playing has all the luminous magic lacking in Michelangeli's otherwise masterly performance on his BBC archive CD. Indeed, there is little of the Prussian officer about Kovacevich, and as he makes the final quasi presto dance on air you may well wonder when you have heard a performance of greater skill and affection.

True, some may find Kovacevich's Schumann too polite, bathed as it were in an often pale and silvery light rather than in more brilliant hues. Certainly he would be more characterful, even confrontational today.

Davis and the BBC Symphony Orchestra are beautifully sensitive to their soloist's subtle and acute musicianship, and the transfers have come up more than successfully. A treasurable reissue.

Grieg Piano Concerto in A minor, Op 16
Schumann Piano Concerto in A minor, Op 54
Murray Perahia pf Bavarian Radio Symphony Orchestra / Sir Colin Davis
Sony Classical SK44899 (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded live in 1987 and 1988 ●●

Despite the hazards, Murray Perahia delights in the inspirational heat-of-the-moment of a live recording. Though there are no claps, coughs or shuffles to confirm the presence of an audience, we're told that both concertos were recorded live at Munich's Philharmonie Gasteig. Of the two works, the Grieg is better served by the immediacy and warmth of Perahia's response, whether through rhythmic bite in livelier dance tempo or total surrender to lyrical nostalgia elsewhere. Never is there the slightest sacrifice of artistic sensitivity or keyboard finesse.

His Schumann is no less ardent. In the spirited finale, as throughout the Grieg, any collector would be as happy with this performance as that of Kovacevich for Philips. But in the first two movements, it is Kovacevich who finds a simpler, more confiding note – as well as more artfully weaving the piano into the comparatively light texture as if it were part of the orchestra instead of a spot-lit outsider.

Davis goes all the way in both works to uphold Perahia in his open-hearted point-making, and the Bavarian Radio Symphony Orchestra gives him all he asks. The sound is more clear-cut than the old Philips, which is still pleasing for its mellowness and balance.

Grieg Piano Concerto[a] Schumann Piano Concerto 🄷
in A minor, Op 54[a]. Romance in F sharp, Op 28 No
2. Vogel als Prophet, Op 82 No 7 Palmgren West-Finnish Dance, Op 31 No 5. Refrain de berceau
Benno Moiseiwitsch pf [a]Philharmonia Orchestra / Otto Ackermann
Testament mono SBT1187 (70 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1941, [a]1953 ●

Few pianists have played the silken aristocrat more engagingly than Benno Moiseiwitsch. His outward impassivity hid an imaginative delicacy and stylish nonchalance often mistaken for diffidence. Playful, individual, debonair, occasionally mischievous (why not expand on the last pages of the Grieg Concerto's cadenza if you feel like it?), he invariably had one more surprise up his sleeve than you expected.

The Grieg Concerto sounds newly minted, with markings such as tranquillo e cantabile observed with special affection. The catalogue may be filled with more openly confrontational performances but Moiseiwitsch, who took music more by stealth than storm, elegantly eclipses the readings of so many more assertive keyboard tigers. For encores there are classic performances of Palmgren and Schumann.

Both the Grieg and Schumann Concertos were central to Moiseiwitsch's immense repertoire but, as with so many other Russian pianists, Schumann remained his greatest love. His opening to the Schumann Concerto is understated (like a great actor throwing away his lines), but his projection of the principal theme has a matchless tonal bloom and subtlety. How many other pianists have eased their way through the central A flat dreams with such unaffected charm? In the opening of the Intermezzo he is delightfully grazioso, emphasising the staccatos as much as the manifold feelings and colours, and in the finale his play of light and shade are, again, inimitable Moiseiwitsch. Ackermann's partnership is arguably more able than inspiring, but Testament's transfers of recordings dating from 1941 to 1953 are superb.

Peer Gynt Suites

Grieg Peer Gynt – Suites Nos 1 and 2, Opp 46 and 55. Holberg Suite, Op 40 Sibelius Legends, Op 22 – No 2, The Swan of Tuonela. Kuolema – Valse triste, Op 44. Finlandia, Op 26
Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Herbert von Karajan
DG Karajan Gold 439 010-2GHS (78 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1981-84 ●●

Very impressive indeed. Somehow one feels that one could stretch out and touch the players, so vivid is the sound here. In the Peer Gynt movements, there is much greater range and separation. Peer Gynt is most beautifully done. At times you might think the wind could have been a shade more distant, particularly in the 'By the seashore' movement but there is no want of atmosphere here – quite the contrary! Not to put too fine a point on it, this is a marvellous recording. In the Holberg Suite, the sound has marvellous clarity and definition as well as exemplary range. For some tastes it may be a little too sophisticated but one's admiration for it remains undimmed. The playing throughout is beautifully cultured and there is wonderful lightness and delicacy. The present issue is Karajan's third account of 'The Swan of Tuonela' and it is regrettable that he never committed to disc the four Legends in their entirety. It is as powerful and atmospheric an account as ever recorded, and the remaining two pieces, 'Valse triste' and Finlandia, reinforce one's feeling that this partnership has never been equalled. The stirring account of Finlandia is incredibly wide-ranging – the orchestral playing is really in a class of its own.

Grieg Peer Gynt – Suites Nos 1 and 2, Opp 46 and 55
Saeverud Peer Gynt, Op 28 – Suites Nos 1 and 2
Anne-Margrethe Eikaas sop
Norwegian Radio Orchestra / Ari Rasilainen
Finlandia 0630-17675-2 (74 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996 ●

To juxtapose the Peer Gynt music of Grieg and Saeverud on record is such an obvious idea that it is astonishing that no one has thought of it before. It was inevitable that there should be a reaction against the pictorialism and Romanticism of Grieg's Peer Gynt, particularly after the upheaval of the Second World War and the Nazi occupation of Norway, and when Saeverud was approached by Hans Jacob Nilsen to compose his incidental music, it was for a realistic production shorn of sentiment and glamour. Saeverud's score for the play has no vestige of Romanticism, not a trace of gentility, and its musical language is robust and uncouth. It is full of character, whether it is in 'Peerludium', the portrayal of the cocky Peer himself, the wild and lascivious 'Anitra' (nothing demure about her) or the splendidly earthy 'Devil's Five-hop' and the equally brilliant 'Dovretroll jog'. The Norwegian Radio Orchestra is a highly accomplished body with great refinement of colour and tone, and Ari Rasilainen draws splendid, well-characterised playing from them. The familiar Grieg suites are hardly less fine. The recording is refined.

Peer Gynt – Suites: Nos 1 and 2, Opp 46 and 55. In Autumn, Op 11. Symphonic Dances, Op 64
City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra / Sakari Oramo
Erato 8573-82917-2 (74 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 2000 ●

As soon as the strings respond to the flute near the beginning of Peer Gynt's 'Morning' – longingly leaning on an expressive ritardando – you sense this is a quality production. Done to death it may be, but Grieg's vernal score still holds the potential to seduce, enthral and entertain. Here, charm and drama form a seductive alliance. Sakari Oramo has an architect's sense of proportion and an athlete's sense of pacing. He also knows how to shape and colour musical textures. Ase's death ends with a full-bodied pianissimo while the bassoon counter-subject that follows Peer through 'The Hall of the Mountain King' can rarely have sounded more mischievous. Rather than push an unworkable accellerando, Oramo moves with stealth, tightening the rhythm as he goes, letting in an element of swagger before speeding for the final chase. 'Ingrid's Lament' enjoys powerfully drawn basses and an unusually dramatic climax and 'Peer Gynt's Journey Home' allows ample space for the elements to rage. Note how, at around 1'14", woodwinds goad lower strings into action and the ensuing tumult gradually gains momentum. As for 'Anitra' and the 'Arabian Dance', both benefit from the CBSO's vivid but unforced characterisations.

The Concert Overture In Autumn takes its point of departure from a song called Autumn Storms. And if there's one aspect of Oramo's performance that pips Beecham's stereo version to the post, it's a feeling of what one might call 'weatheredness'. True, the superb recording helps, but so do Oramo's rock-steady control of rhythm and sense of atmosphere.

The Symphonic Dances are by turns lyrical or exuberant, the last of them – the partially pensive A minor – being faster than Järvi's thinner-sounding Gothenburg version by a good two minutes. The Birmingham orchestra are consistently responsive to Oramo's very specific demands. Credible rivals are headed by piquant Sir Thomas in Peer Gynt and In Autumn, and by Järvi in the Symphonic Dances. Oramo's Grieg matches both, being less fussy than keen-eared and with a sense of play that does credit both to Ibsen's dramatic prompt and the folk-music roots of the concert works.

Norwegian Dances

Norwegian Dances, Op 35. Lyric Suite, Op 54. Symphonic Dances, Op 64
Gothenburg Symphony Orchestra / Neeme Järvi
DG 419 431-2GH (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
●

These recordings are also available in a 6-CD bargain box of Grieg's complete orchestral works: DG 471 300-2GB6 ●●

Grieg's music has that rare quality of eternal youth: however often one hears it, its complexion retains its bloom, the smile its radiance and the youthful sparkle remains undimmed. Though he is essentially a miniaturist, who absorbed the speech rhythms and inflections of Norwegian folk melody into his bloodstream, Grieg's world is well defined. Both the Norwegian Dances and the Symphonic Dances were originally piano duets, which Grieg subsequently scored: Järvi conducts both with enthusiasm and sensitivity. In the Lyric Suite he restores 'Klokkeklang' ('Bell-ringing'), which Grieg omitted from the final score: it is remarkably atmospheric and evocative, and serves to show how forward-looking Grieg became in his late years. The recording is exceptionally fine and of wide dynamic range; the sound is very natural and the perspective true to life.

String Quartets

Grieg String Quartets – No 1 in G minor, Op 27; No 2 in F, CW146 Schumann String Quartet No 1 in A minor, Op 41 No 1
Petersen Quartet (Conrad Muck, Gernot Süssmuth vns Friedemann Weigle va Hans-Jakob Eschenburg vc)
Capriccio 10 476 (75 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1993

Grieg String Quartet No 1 in G minor, Op 27
Mendelssohn String Quartet No 2 in A minor, Op 13
Shanghai Quartet (WeiGang Li, HongGang Li vns Zheng Wang va James Wilson vc)
Delos DE3153 (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1993 ●

Since Grieg owed much to Schumann, coupling their quartets seems a good idea. These G minor and A minor Quartets were written when the composers were in their thirties, although Grieg was a few years older. Yet it is his work that sounds more youthfully passionate, while the Schumann is a rather self-conscious homage to his friend Mendelssohn and classical models. The Petersens invest the Grieg G minor Quartet with gravitas and are skilful in linking the disparate sections of its structure. Their recording has a natural balance and an impressively wide dynamic rang; it also copes well with Grieg's forceful, semi-orchestral string writing. The whole performance has vigour and tenderness in good proportion, and a truly Scandinavian feeling. The unfinished F major Quartet is another sensitive performance and the work sounds no more incomplete than Schubert's Unfinished Symphony.

The Schumann is no less enjoyable; the artists are fully inside his idiom and make a consistently beautiful and meaningful sound. The Shanghai Quartet's brightly lit account of the Mendelssohn suggests a rich store of interpretative potential. Theirs is a sizzling, multi-coloured performance. The Grieg coupling is, if anything, even finer, with an Allegro molto first movement that truly is ed agitato, a warming Romanze and a superbly characterised Intermezzo. It is arguably the most compelling performance of this score since the original Budapest Quartet's trail-blazing HMV 78s from 1937. It is richly recorded.

Violin Sonatas

No 1 in F, Op 8; No 2 in G, Op 13;
No 3 in C minor, Op 45

Augustin Dumay vn Maria João Pires pf
DG 437 525-2GH (70 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1993 ●

Grieg's violin sonatas span his creative life, the first two dating from his early twenties, before his Piano Concerto, and the Third Sonata of 1887 belonging to the last decade of his life. Augustin Dumay brings to this music a youthful seigneur, manifest in the impetuosity, charm and command of his playing. He and Pires are at their considerable best in the G major Sonata, with its vivid first movement, lilting Allegretto and triumphant finale – whose conclusion they lift to the skies. The recording does full justice to Dumay's silky and resourceful tone. Pires is rightly an equal partner, and both artists bring an infectiously fresh response to the music. The finale of the C minor Sonata, which anticipates Sibelius in its urgency and elemental force, is compellingly played.

Violin Sonatas Nos 1-3
Henning Kraggerud vn Helge Kjekshus pf
Naxos 8 553904 (67 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1996

This disc gives us consistently enjoyable performances. The two young Norwegians play with idiomatic style, and give the impression of expressing every aspect of the music. Their eagerness at the start of Op 8's first Allegro sets the tone; the doloroso opening of Op 13, the delicacy and serenity of the E major section of that sonata's middle movement, and the exciting 'Hall of the Mountain King' atmosphere they generate in the finale of Op 45 – these are just a few of the places where the pair convince us they've found exactly the right sound and manner of expression. Dumay and Pires on DG are magnificently recorded, causing one to regret the slight lack of brilliance in the Naxos recording and wish that the violin in particular had been given a more glamorous presence. They are as deeply involved as the Norwegians but play with far greater freedom. However, Kraggerud's account of the 'big tune' in the last movement of Op 45, respecting all Grieg's marks of expression and phrasing, has a nobility that Dumay, more heart-on-sleeve and cavalier about dynamics and slurs, misses. The Naxos disc is, in short, highly recommendable – as a contrast to Dumay/Pires or simply as an excellent bargain.

Piano Works

Volume 1: Piano Sonata in E minor, Op 7. Funeral March for Rikard Nordraak, CW117. Melodies of Norway – The sirens' enticement. Stimmungen, Op 73. Transcriptions of Original Songs I, Op 41 – No 3, I love thee. Four Humoresques, Op 6. Four Piano Pieces, Op 1
Einar Steen-Nøkleberg pf
Naxos 8 550881 (72 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1993

Volume 2
Two Improvisations on Norwegian Folksongs, Op 29. Melodies of Norway – A Ballad to Saint Olaf. 25 Norwegian Folksongs and Dances, Op 17. Transcriptions of Original Songs II, Op 52 – No 2, The first meeting. 19 Norwegian Folksongs, Op 66
Einar Steen-Nøkleberg pf
Naxos 8 550882 (70 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1993

Volume 3
Four Album Leaves, Op 28. Six Poetic Tone-pictures, Op 3. Melodies of Norway – Iceland. Three Pictures from life in the country, Op 19. Three Pieces from 'Sigurd Jorsalfar', Op 56 – Prelude. Ballade in G minor, Op 24, 'in the form of variations on a Norwegian melody'
Einar Steen-Nøkleberg pf
Naxos 8 550883 (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1993 ●

Volume 4: Holberg Suite, Op 40. Melodies of Norway – I went to bed so late. Six Norwegian Mountain Melodies, CW134. Peer Gynt Suite No 1, Op 46 – Morning. 17 Norwegian Peasant Dances, Op 72
Einar Steen-Nøkleberg pf
Naxos 8 550884 (71 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1993

These are the first four volumes of a complete Grieg cycle which stretches to no fewer than 14 discs. Since all of them are at super-budget price they make a very competitive alternative to other complete or near-complete surveys. Einar Steen-Nøkleberg came into prominence during the 1970s and won numerous Norwegian and other prizes. He was professor of the piano at the Hanover Musikhochschule for a number of years and is the author of a monograph on Grieg's piano music and its interpretation.
8 550881: The first disc juxtaposes early pieces, the Sonata, Op 7, the Op 6 Humoresques and the Funeral March for Rikard Nordraak, all written in the mid-1890s with his very last piano work,

Stimmungen (or 'Moods'), Op 73. He plays these bold and original pieces with great flair and understanding. Whatever its limitations there is much greater range in Grieg's piano music than is commonly realised and Steen-Nøkleberg is attuned to the whole spectrum it covers, whether in the Bartókian 'Mountaineer's Song' from the Op 73 to the charm and innocence of the Allegretto con grazia, the third of the Humoresques, Op 6. 8 550882: The 19 Norwegian Folksongs (1896) are remarkable pieces as Grieg himself knew. He wrote to the Dutch composer, Julius Röntgen, of having 'put some hair-raising chromatic chords on paper. The excuse is that they originated not on the piano but in my mind.' Readers will recognise No 14 as the source of the theme for Delius's On hearing the first cuckoo in spring. Steen-Nøkleberg plays them with great tonal finesse and consummate artistry.
8 550883: The most substantial work on this disc is the Ballade which Grieg wrote on his parents' death. This recording can hold its own with the best in this healthy area of the catalogue – even if there are moments when Steen-Nøkleberg seems too discursive. Yet what an imaginative colour he produces in the Adagio variation when the music suddenly melts pianissimo.
8 550884: The Norwegian Peasant Dances are amazing pieces for their period, and though their audacity and dissonance were later overtaken by Bartók, they still retain their capacity to surprise. The playing conveys the extraordinary character and originality of these pieces as do few others. The smaller pieces contained on this disc – as well as on its companions – are full of rewards.

Awards 2002

Lyric Pieces, Book 1, Op 12 – No 1, Arietta; No 2, Waltz; No 5, Folksong; No 6, Norwegian; Book 2, Op 38 – No 6, Elegy; No 7, Waltz; No 8, Canon; Book 4 Op 47 – No 2, Album Leaf; No 3, Melody; No 4, Norwegian Dance; Book 5, Op 54 – No 3, March of the Trolls; No 4, Nocturne; Book 6, Op 57 – No 2, Gade; No 3, Illusion; No 6, Homesickness; Book 7, Op 62 – No 1, Sylph; No 4, Brooklet; No 5, Phantom; No 6, Homeward; Book 8, Op 65 – No 6, Wedding Day at Troldhaugen; Book 9, Op 68 – No 3,
At your Feet; No 4, Evening in the Mountains;
No 5, Cradle Song; Book 10, Op 71 – No 6, Gone;
No 7, Remembrances
Leif Ove Andsnes pf
EMI 557296-2
(68 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Played on Grieg's piano at the Grieg Troldhaugen Museum, Bergen. Recorded 2001 ●●●

Once again on home-ground, Andsnes reminds you of his capacity to go directly to the heart of the matter. Taking you on a journey of increasing subtlety and introspection, he makes you aware that so much of this music is for those long winter nights. At the same time the music is so richly varied: 'Melody's insistent dactylic rhythm creates a strange unsettling poetic ambience, while the central oasis of calm in 'Wedding Day at Troldhaugen' would surely melt a heart of stone.

All Andsnes's performances have that deceptive simplicity which is his touchstone. His playing is always sensitive, never sentimental and with a bracing and essential 'touch of the codfish' (Grieg) when required. And while one would never want to be without Gilels' rapt DG performances (see below), praise could hardly be too high for a pianist who so enviably captures the poignant nature of a composer who Tchaikovsky once claimed had 'a glance like a charming and candid child'. Grieg's piano, with its distinctive timbre, provides an added touch of nostalgia.

Lyric Pieces – Arietta, Op 12 No 1. Berceuse, Op 38 No 1. Butterfly, Op 43 No 1. Solitary Traveller, Op 43 No 2. Album Leaf, Op 47 No 2. Melody, Op 47 No 3. Norwegian Dance, 'Halling', Op 47 No 4. Nocturne, Op 54 No 4. Scherzo, Op 54 No 5. Homesickness, Op 57 No 6. Brooklet, Op 62 No 4. Homeward, Op 62 No 6. In ballad vein, Op 65 No 5. Grandmother's Minuet, Op 68 No 2. At your feet, Op 68 No 3. Cradle Song, Op 68 No 5. Once upon a time, Op 71 No 1. Puck, Op 71 No 3. Gone, Op 71 No 6. Remembrances, Op 71 No 7
Emil Gilels pf
DG The Originals 449 721-2GOR (56 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1974 ●●●

Here, surely, is a classic recording, one of calibre and status for all time. Rarely can a great artist have declared his love with such touching candour. By his own admission Gilels discovered in Grieg's Lyric Pieces a 'whole world of intimate feeling' and at the sessions where these were recorded fought tirelessly to capture their intricate mix of innocence and experience. The results are of an unblemished purity, grace and contained eloquence. He brings the same insight and concentration to these apparent trifles as he did to towering masterpieces of the classic repertoire. The programme proceeds chronologically and one can appreciate the gradual but marked development in Grieg's harmonic and expressive language – from the folk-song inspired early works to the more progressive and adventurous later ones. Gilels's fingerwork is exquisite and the sense of total involvement with the music almost religious in feeling. Never can Debussy's sniping estimate of Grieg', 'a pink bonbon filled with snow' (or DG's dreary accompanying notes), have seemed wider of the mark. The recordings remain as impeccable as the playing. This is a disc for everyone's desert island.

Peer Gynt

Peer Gynt – The Bridal March passes by; Prelude; In the Hall of the Mountain King; Solveig's Song; Prelude; Arab Dance; Anitra's Dance; Prelude; Solveig's Cradle Song. Symphonic Dance, Op 64 – 🄷

Allegretto grazioso. In Autumn, Op 11. Old Norwegian Romance with Variations, Op 51
Ilse Hollweg sop Beecham Choral Society; Royal Philharmonic Orchestra / Sir Thomas Beecham
EMI Great Recordings of the Century
566914-2 (77 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1957 ●●

Grieg's incidental music was an integral part of Ibsen's Peer Gynt and from this score Grieg later extracted the two familiar suites. This recording of excerpts from Peer Gynt goes back to 1957 but still sounds well and is most stylishly played. Included is the best known ('Anitra's Dance' is a delicate gem here) together with 'Solveig's Song' and 'Solveig's Cradle Song'. Beecham uses Ilse Hollweg to advantage, her voice suggesting the innocence of the virtuous peasant heroine. There is also an effective use of the choral voices which are almost inevitably omitted in ordinary performances of the two well-known suites: the male chorus of trolls in the 'Hall of the Mountain King' are thrilling, and the women in the 'Arab Dance' are charming. The other two pieces are well worth having too; Symphonic Dances is a later, freshly pastoral work, while the overture In Autumn is an orchestral second version of an early piece for piano duet. This reissue is further enhanced by the first release in stereo of the Old Norwegian Romance.

Songs

Awards 1993

Haugtussa, Op 67. Two brown eyes, Op 5 No 1. I love but thee, Op 5 No 3. A swan, Op 25 No 2. With a waterlily, Op 25 No 4. Hope, Op 26 No 1. Spring, Op 33 No 2. Beside the stream, Op 33 No 5. From Monte Pincio, Op 39 No 1. Six Songs, Op 48. Spring showers, Op 49 No 6. While I wait, Op 60 No 3. Farmyard Song, Op 61 No 3
Anne Sofie von Otter mez Bengt Forsberg pf
DG Grieg Anniversary Edition 437 521-2GH Ⓕ
(68 minutes: DDD). Texts and translations included
Recorded 1992 ●●●

Von Otter is at the peak of her powers here, glorying in this repertoire. Take the Haugtussa cycle. Von Otter projects her imagination of the visionary herd-girl with absolute conviction. She is no less successful in the German settings that follow. The sad depths of One day, my thought from Six Songs, Op 48, the hopelessness of Goethe's The time of roses (Op 48 No 5), a setting of great beauty, are encompassed with unfettered ease, but so are the lighter pleasures of Lauf der Welt. Even the familiar A dream (Op 48 No 6) emerges as new in von Otter's daringly big-boned reading. Throughout, her readings are immeasurably enhanced by the imaginative playing of Bengt Forsberg. They breathe fresh life into A swan and in the almost as familiar With a waterlily, another superb Ibsen setting, the questing spirit expressed in the music is marvellously captured by the performers. This should be regarded as a 'must' for any collector.

Twelve Songs, Op 33. Five Songs, Op 26. For LM Lindemans's Silver Wedding. My little bird. She walked to the church. The Odalisque. To Christian Tønsberg. The Blueberry. The girl Gjenta. On Hamar's Ruins. The White and Red Roses.
Monica Groop mez Roger Vignoles pf
BIS BIS-CD1257 (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded c2002

The important item here is the complete set of the Op 33 songs. Only the second song of the Op 33 set, Våren ('Last Spring'), has had many takers – Schwarzkopf and Tauber among them. The rest are lucky to have a single recording in the catalogue, if that.

Grieg had been recovering from the deaths of his parents and was going through a bad patch in his marriage when he set 12 poems by AO Vinje for his Op 33 set, hence their preoccupation with darker themes of mortality and mankind. Groop does well by them, making full use of her deep mezzo colouring. Her singing is beautiful, sympathetic, typically bringing a sense of calm and understanding to 'The Spring' ('Våren') and stretching to the weightier seriousness needed for a song such as 'First Things' ('Det fyrste').

Groop and accompanist Roger Vignoles prove to be well paired, as both like to let the music flow naturally. This puts them in the opposite corner to Anne Sofie von Otter and Bengt Forsberg, whose award-winning Grieg recital (DG) comes with their personalities stamped on every bar.

Where they are in competition (only three songs here), Von Otter and Forsberg are instantly memorable, achieving lift-off with a tremendous sense of elation in 'Hope' ('Et Håb') from the Op 26 set, albeit at the expense of some pulling-around of the tempo from the pianist. There are people who are resistant to the Swedish couple's bold way with Grieg and for them the more traditional approach of Groop and Vignoles will be preferable.

The recording quality is first-rate.

Further listening
Orchestral Songs
Bonney sop Stene mez Hagegård bar Tellefsen narr Gothenburg Symphony Chorus and Orchestra / N Järvi
DG Classikon 469 026-2GCL (61 minutes: DDD: 8/00). Ⓑ

A collection of orchestral songs beautifully sung by Barbara Bonney (especially) and Håkan Hagegård. Neeme Järvi's direction is first-class.

Sofia Gubaidulina

Russian b1931

GROVE Gubaidulina studied with Peyko and Shebalin at the Moscow Conservatory (1954-62). During the 1960s and 70s she wrote primarily chamber music, which is characterized by a radical expansion of the range of musical sound and by use of serial techniques, as in Noch'v Memfise ('Night in Memphis', 1968). She then explored the potential of orchestral and vocal genres, paying particular attention to the role of rhythm and time; her experiments in the role of rests culminated in the solo for conductor in the symphony Stimmen Verstummen (1986). In Alleluja (1990) she gives coloured light a rhythmic function and this determines the structure of the work. Her music has a strong religious basis.

Canticle of the Sun

Music for Flute, Strings and Percussion[a]
The Canticle of the Sun[b]
[b]Emmanuel Pahud fls Simon Carrington, Neil Percy perc [b]John Alley celeste
[a]London Symphony Orchestra / Mstislav Rostropovich [b]vc/perc [b]London Voices / Ryusuke Numajiri
EMI 557153 2 (76 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Since the death of Alfred Schnittke, Sofia Gubaidulina has come to represent the best of contemporary Russian music, even though she lives and works in Germany. In both Music for Flute, Strings and Percussion (1994) and Canticle of the Sun (1997) Gubaidulina's special kind of meditative minimalism is offset by more intense, even neo-Romantic material. Music for Flute is a mightily impressive work, with the various members of the flute family set against abundant percussion and two string orchestras. Similar inventiveness is to be heard in Canticle of the Sun. The composer has spoken of this work as a tribute to Rostropovich's 'sunny energy', and she uses St Francis of Assisi's Canticle of the Sun as a basic text. Yet there is as much unquiet, brooding music here as the celebration of faith and light.

The material of both pieces seems a little thinly stretched in places, but Gubaidulina's blazing conviction (matched by Rostropovich as both cellist and conductor) is such that your attention is unlikely to waver for a moment.

Chamber Works

In croce[a]. 10 Preludes. Quaternion[b]
Alexander Ivashkin, [b]Natalia Pavlutskaya, [b]Rachel Johnston, [b]Miranda Wilson vcs [a]Malcolm Hicks org
Chandos CHAN9958 (56 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 2001

Sofia Gubaidulina's Quaternion for four cellos, written in 1996, here receives its first recording. At its best – as it certainly is here – Gubaidulina's music manages to combine a fiercely improvisatory freedom with a satisfying sense of balance and coherence. On one level Quaternion concerns the contrast between the mundane and the transcendent. Yet although the music contains strikingly immediate evocations of both the earthy and the uncanny, it never suggests the withdrawn serenity of a spirituality that regards the real world as 'lost'. Ivashkin and his colleagues achieve marvels of co-ordination, as well as an astonishingly wide range of colour, qualities enhanced by a well-balanced recording.

Two earlier works complete the programme. The Ten Preludes for solo cello (1974) encapsulate energy and expressiveness to highly-charged poetic effect. In Croce for cello and organ (1979) transforms what could have been a simplistic exercise in the crossing over of two very different sound sources into a grippingly unpredictable drama of convergence and divergence. Both pieces have been recorded before, and you might welcome the chance to acquire the bargain-price version of In Croce in its alternative arrangement for cello and accordion (Naxos). But Alexander Ivashkin is a fine player, unsurpassed in Gubaidulina's music.

De profundis[a]. Seven Words[b]. Ten Preludes[c]
[ab]Elsbeth Moser baya [c]Boris Pergamenschikov vc
[b]Munich Chamber Orchestra / Christoph Poppen
ECM New Series 461 897-2 (72 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Recordings of Sofia Gubaidulina's music differ markedly as to presentation. Elsbeth Moser and Boris Pergamenschikov interpret Seven Last Words, meditations rather than commentaries on the Biblical texts, with chamber-like inwardness. Their fervent confrontation in movement IV has a transparency of texture, incisive strings kept to the rear, which offsets the gestural immediacy of the experience. The final movement is not so much valedictory as implosive, draining away in a haze of sound and emotion. The première recording by Friedrich Lips and Vladimir Tonkha, briefly available on Melodiya, still has an impact like no other, while the Naxos account offers a very acceptable overview, but this new recording has a distinct and searching identity of its own.

It is enhanced by the companion pieces. The Ten Preludes have rightly become staples of the modern repertoire, harnessing technique to a range of moods which work perfectly as a through sequence. De profundis is a classic of its medium, and while Gerd Draugsvoll on BIS draws visceral emotion from this quirky mix of dissonance and incantation, Moser's lucid unfolding probes deeper. Sound, here and in the Preludes, is a model of solo balance.

Francisco Guerrero Spanish 1528-99

GROVE Guerrero was a pupil of Morales. He also taught himself the vihuela, harp, cornett and organ. He was maestro de capilla of Jaén Cathedral (1546-9) and then vice-maestro (1551) and maestro (1574-99) of Seville Cathedral. He visited Rome (1581-82), Venice and the Holy Land (1588-89). The most important 16th-century Spanish composer of sacred music after Victoria, he published 18 masses and c150 motets; because of their singable, diatonic lines, they remained in use in Spanish and Spanish-American cathedrals for more than two centuries after his death. He also published secular songs; many other works survive in anthologies and MSS.

Missa de la Batalla Escoutez

Missa de la Batalla Escoutez[ab]. Pange lingua[a]. 🅿
In exitu Israel[ab]. Duo Seraphim[a]. Regina coeli[b]
Magnificat[a]. Conditor alme siderum[a]
[a]Westminster Cathedral Choir; [b]His Majestys Sagbutts and Cornetts / James O'Donnell
Hyperion CDA67075 (72 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1998 ●●

Despite his suggestive name, Guerrero's parody of Janequin's La Bataille de Marignan is not the work of a fighting man: fanfares and alarums are definitely off the agenda while he develops, in an often rather sober manner, the smooth counterpoint of his model. Only in the 'Osanna' does Guerrero let rip, a moment seized on with gusto by the choir and His Majestys Sagbutts and Cornetts. Guerrero spent his career at Seville Cathedral, where the chapter was one of the first in Spain to agree to the establishment of a permanent, salaried wind band to participate in processions and at other points in divine worship.

The instruments (shawms, cornetts, sackbuts, dulcian and organ) subtly double the voices, adding depth to the sound, and strengthening major cadence points. Particularly striking is the earthy tone of the bajón (dulcian) reinforcing the bass-line in proto-continuo fashion. In fact, it is in the other items on this CD that the combination of voices and instruments really comes into its own. The setting of the psalm In exitu Israel experiments with Guerrero's forces, resulting in an opulence of sound more readily associated with Venetian music of the period. But this isn't just an exercise in applied musicology. These are well-paced, intelligent performances that get inside the skin of Guerrero's marvellous music. Don't be surprised to find yourself humming the Spanish chant for the hymn Conditor alme siderum after this compelling rendition. The musicianship is superb, the technical element entirely satisfactory and satisfying.

Reynaldo Hahn

Venezuelan/French 1875-1947

GROVE Hahn studied with Massenet at the Paris Conservatoire. While in his teens he gained a reputation as a composer of songs, which he sang to his own accompaniment in fashionable salons, gaining admittance to Proust's circle. But after 1900 he concentrated on the theatre, as conductor (at the Opéra from 1945) and as a composer of ballets, operas and operettas (Ciboulette, 1923; Mozart, 1925).

Violin Concerto

Violin Concerto[ch]. Piano Concerto[dh].
Suite Hongroise[cdh]. Violin Sonata in C[ce]. Romance
in A[ce]. Nocturne[ce]. Piano Quintet[eg]. Les feuilles blessées[bf]. Amour sans ailes[af].
Cinq petites chansons[af]. Neuf mélodies retrouvées[bf]. Méduse[af] – Chanson au bord de la fontaine; Danse, petite sirène. La dame aux camélias[af] – Mon rêve était d'avoir;
C'est à Paris!; Au fil de l'eau
[a]Catherine Dune sop [b]Didier Henry bar
[c]Denis Clavier vn [d]Angeline Pondepeyre, [e]Dimitris Saroglou, [f]Stéphane Petitjean pfs
[g]Quatuor Clavier (Denis Clavier, Marie-France Razafimbadà vns Florian Wallez va Claire Breteau vc);
[h]Lorraine Philharmonic Orchestra / Fernand Quattrocchi
Maguelone ③ MAG111 111 (203 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Texts and translations included

Both the Violin Concerto and the Piano Concerto belong to a period in Hahn's life when he knew that strange mixture of happiness and regret that comes to us all in our fifties. The great figures he had known in his youth were nearly all dead, the First World War had claimed many of his contemporaries, and the glamour that had once surrounded his name had faded. Yet in the Paris of the 1920s he had his biggest stage successes (Ciboulette and Mozart) and entered on the longest and happiest relationship of his life with the tenor Guy Ferrant; all this seems to be expressed in the slow movement of the Violin Concerto. Here we have Hahn spinning a slow, languorous tune that hovers between dance and delirium. It is marked throughout Tranquillo, Très calme, Amoroso and Sans rigueur. Denis Clavier plays it with just the right air of restraint: as Jean Gallois writes in the notes, it is 'a song from the soul without pathos'.

The better-known Piano Concerto from 1930 is a slighter work. Perhaps its curious structure – the second movement lasts less than three minutes – makes it seem a little jokey. Those who already have a recording should not be deterred from hearing this excellent performance: Angeline Pondepeyre takes the opening somewhat slower than Magda Tagliaferro in the historic recording conducted by the composer, but she brings out the jazzy element more.

The second CD starts with the Violin Sonata, composed in 1926. Denis Clavier and Dimitris Saroglou give a first-rate performance, the opening movement a beautiful questioning theme which gives way to a second, more romantic melody. The Romance and Nocturne are both real salon pieces, and the Romance in particular has a haunting tune. As for the Piano Quintet, this has some of Hahn's most passionate music in the slow movement. It's impossible not to believe that this piece – composed in 1920-21 – isn't a commentary on the tragic events of 1914-18.

The Quintet may be Hahn's personal reaction to the war, but while actually in the trenches, he composed music which was as far removed from the horrors as possible. His Five Little Songs were dedicated to Jan Bathori; it's very difficult for modern singers to hit off the mood of deliberate naivety in these songs, but it's good to have at least this performance.

Most of the other songs on the third CD in this set have not been recorded before: it's not difficult to see why; the heavy sentiment is so hard to take. Feuilles blessées, a cycle of 11 songs, is one of Hahn's most ambitious works. Didier Henry sings them with the right mixture of robust tone and detailed articulation.

The Neuf mélodies retrouvées were published a few years after Hahn's death. It's the final song, though, 'Sous l'oranger', that is the most fun, a 'tango-habanera' that seems to hark back to the Second Empire, that frivolous, dangerous period for which Hahn felt such nostalgia.

This set cannot be recommended too highly. Three CDs might seem too much to the uninitiated, but if you only know his songs or operettas, these is a lot to surprise here.

Chamber Works

Premières valses[a]. Venezia (arr Pidoux)[b].
Piano Quartet[c]. Soliloque et forlane[d].
Cello Concerto (unfinished, ed Pollain)[e]
[be]Roland Pidoux, [b]Pierre Cordier, [b]Renaud Guieu, [b]Antoine Lederlin, [b]Matthieu Lejeune, [b]Christophe Morin vcs
[c]Quatuor Gabriel ([ade]Yoko Kaneko pf Guillaume Plays vn [d]Vincent Aucante va Jérôme Pinget vc)
Maguelone MAG111 117 (72 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded c2002

According to Jean Gallois's notes for this invaluable disc, the Quartet in G for violin, viola, cello and piano, was completed just one month before Hahn died in January 1947. If that is so, it can be listened to as a farewell, something which inevitably invokes Hahn's friendship with Marcel Proust. And even if one were told that Hahn had composed this quartet when he was young and happy, it would still evoke a mood of regret and yearning.

It is the beautiful Andante, the third movement, which is the heart of the piece. A song without words which seems to speak of the pain of long parting, of thoughts unspoken, it ends on a reflective note of acceptance. Even the dance-like final movement, which contains a perhaps unconscious quote from some of the music for Hahn's musical comedy Mozart, also has a bittersweet quality. The Quatuor Gabriel play it eloquently, without undue sentimentality. The suite Premières valses for piano was composed in 1898, when Hahn was at the height of his youthful celebrity in Parisian society. The fifth waltz is subtitled 'A l'ombre rêveuse de Chopin', and the whole sequence seems to be a tribute to the style of the 1840s. Yoko Kaneko plays it with more emphasis on the Polish mood than Catherine Joly in her 1988 recording on Accord. This performance is a fine contrast, revealing more of the rhythmic inventiveness in these miniatures.

The romantic Soliloque et forlane was composed in 1937 as a test piece for the Conservatoire. Vincent Aucante and Kaneko bring out all the playful Spanish quality in the allegro scherzando finale. Now that this recording is available, this must surely become a favourite with viola players.

Finally, Roland Pidoux's arrangement of Hahn's song-cycle Venezia for cello sextet must be such an expensive proposition that one is unlikely to encounter it in the concert hall. The tunes, of course, are adorable.

Songs

A Chloris. Le rossignol des lilas. L'enamourée. Trois jours de vendange. Etudes latines – Lydé; Tyndaris; Phyllis. Les fontaines. Automne. Infidélité. Dans la nuit. D'une prison. Quand la nuit n'est pas étoilée. Fumée. Le printemps. Je me souviens. Quand je fus pris au pavillon. Paysage. Fêtes galantes. Nocturne. Mai. L'heure exquise. Offrande. Si mes vers avaient des ailes
Susan Graham sop Roger Vignoles pf
Sony Classical SK60168 (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1998 ●●

Susan Graham brings to these songs a voice of lovely quality, excellent French and – in keeping with Hahn's own insistence – gives overriding importance to clarity of enunciation, the verbal meaning governing the vocal colour. It is certainly better to savour these songs a few at a time, but the programme has been well put together to show Hahn's range, from the Bachian pastiche of A Chloris or the antique simplicity of Lydé to the adventurous harmonic progressions of Fumée, Le printemps or Je me souviens, from the despairing pathos of D'une prison to the light-heartedness of Quand je fus pris au pavillon, from the quiet rapture of Nocturne to the passion of Dans la nuit (a splendid miniature). His outstanding gift for lyricism is evident throughout; Le rossignol des lilas, for example, is enchanting. Susan Graham perfectly captures these songs' elegant intimacy with a wealth of nuance, from the gentle tone of L'enamourée to the fullness of L'automne; and the way she floats the words 'l'heure exquise' is haunting. Roger Vignoles provides most sensitive partnership throughout: he has more scope in songs like Les fontaines or Dans la nuit, but equally noteworthy is his subtle treatment of the repeated pattern of Infidélité.

Douze rondels. Etudes latines. Si mes vers avaient des ailes. Paysage. Rêverie. Offrande. Mai. Infidélité. Seule. Les cygnes. Nocturne. Trois jours de vendange. D'une prison. Séraphine. L'heure exquise. Fêtes galantes. Quand la nuit n'est pas étoilée. Le plus beau présent. Sur l'eau. Le rossignol des lilas. A Chloris. Ma jeunesse. Puisque j'ai mis ma lèvre. La nymphe de la source. Au rossignol. Je me souviens. Mozart – Air de la lettre. O mon bel inconnu – C'est très vilain d'être infidèle. Ciboulette – C'est sa banlieue; Nous avons fait un beau voyage. Une revue – La dernière valse
Dame Felicity Lott sop Susan Bickley mez Ian Bostridge ten Stephen Varcoe bar Graham Johnson, Chris Gould pfs London Schubert

Chorale / Stephen Layton
Hyperion ② CDA67141/2 (134 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1995 ●

The two cycles, Douze rondels and Etudes latines, are linked by a common fascination with the past. The Douze rondels were composed to poems in a medieval metre, which allowed Hahn to try his hand at pastiche madrigals and courtly ballads. The Etudes latines cast their gaze back still further in time to Classical antiquity. For Hahn, that era seemed to represent the ultimate in purity and sensuality rolled into one. This collection of 10 songs is a real discovery and rivals late Fauré, both in its refinement and mesmerising simplicity of utterance. Apart from a few moments when one would like a more substantial tone, Stephen Varcoe's light baritone suits Hahn very well and he is a refreshingly unaffected interpreter, who sings with grace and feeling. Susan Bickley is better at the larger canvas of a piece like Quand la nuit n'est pas étoilée than the more intimate songs but the most celebrated pair of all Hahn's mélodies goes to Dame Felicity Lott, whose sympathy for the French style could have no happier outlet. Both Si mes vers avaient des ailes and L'heure exquise are included here, the latter if not an hour, then at least two-and-a-half minutes that are truly exquisite. They are both beautifully sung and are undisturbed by the discomfort around the top of the stave that sometimes mars Lott's singing elsewhere. At the end, she offers four operetta solos as an encore. Graham Johnson's accompaniments are as sensitive as ever. The piano could have been placed a little closer, but the voices have been well captured.

George Frideric Handel

German/British 1685-1759

GROVE Handel was the son of a barber-surgeon who intended him for the law. At first he practised music clandestinely, but his father was encouraged to allow him to study and he became a pupil of Zachow, the principal organist in Halle. When he was 17 he was appointed organist of the Calvinist Cathedral, but a year later he left for Hamburg. There he played the violin and harpsichord in the opera house, where his Almira was given at the beginning of 1705, soon followed by his Nero. The next year he accepted an invitation to Italy, where he spent more than three years, in Florence, Rome, Naples and Venice. He had operas or other dramatic works given in all these cities (oratorios in Rome, including La resurrezione) and, writing many Italian cantatas, perfected his technique in setting Italian words for the human voice. In Rome he also composed some Latin church music.

He left Italy early in 1710 and went to Hanover, where he was appointed Kapellmeister to the elector. But he at once took leave to take up an invitation to London, where his opera Rinaldo was produced early in 1711. Back in Hanover, he applied for a second leave and returned to London in autumn 1712. Four more operas followed in 1712-15, with mixed success; he also wrote music for the church and for court and was awarded a royal pension. In 1716 he may have visited Germany (where possibly he set Brockes's Passion text); it was probably the next year that he wrote the Water Music to serenade George I at a river-party on the Thames. In 1717 he entered the service of the Earl of Carnarvon (soon to be Duke of Chandos) at Edgware, near London, where he wrote 11 anthems and two dramatic works, the evergreen Acis and Galatea and Esther, for the modest band of singers and players retained there.

In 1718-19 a group of noblemen tried to put Italian opera in London on a firmer footing, and launched a company with royal patronage, the Royal Academy of Music; Handel, appointed musical director, went to Germany, visiting Dresden and poaching several singers for the Academy, which opened in April 1720. Handel's Radamisto was the second opera and it inaugurated a noble series over the ensuing years including Ottone, Giulio Cesare, Rodelinda, Tamerlano and Admeto. Works by Bononcini (seen by some as a rival to Handel) and others were given too, with success at least equal to Handel's, by a company with some of the finest singers in Europe, notably the castrato Senesino and the soprano Cuzzoni. But public support was variable and the financial basis insecure, and in 1728 the venture collapsed. The previous year Handel, who had been appointed a composer to the Chapel Royal in 1723, had composed four anthems for the coronation of George II and had taken British naturalization.

Opera remained his central interest, and with the Academy impresario, Heidegger, he hired the King's Theatre and (after a journey to Italy and Germany to engage fresh singers) embarked on a five-year series of seasons starting in late 1729. Success was mixed. In 1732 Esther was given at a London musical society by friends of Handel's, then by a rival group in public; Handel prepared to put it on at the King's Theatre, but the Bishop of London banned a stage version of a biblical work. He then put on Acis, also in response to a rival venture. The next summer he was invited to Oxford and wrote an oratorio, Athalia, for performance at the Sheldonian Theatre. Meanwhile, a second opera company ('Opera of the Nobility', including Senesino) had been set up in competition with Handel's and the two competed for audiences over the next four seasons before both failed. This period drew from Handel, however, such operas as Orlando and two with ballet, Ariodante and Alcina, among his finest scores.

During the rest of the 1730s Handel moved between Italian opera and the English forms, oratorio, ode and the like, unsure of his future commercially and artistically. After a journey to Dublin in 1741-42, where Messiah had its première (in aid of charities), he put opera behind him and for most of the remainder of his life gave oratorio performances, mostly at the new Covent Garden theatre, usually at or close to the Lent season. The Old Testament provided the basis for most of them (Samson, Belshazzar, Joseph, Joshua, Solomon, for example), but he sometimes experimented, turning to classical mythology (Semele, Hercules) or Christian history (Theodora), with little public success. All these works, along with such earlier ones as Acis and his two Cecilian odes (to Dryden words), were performed in concert form in English. At these performances he usually played in the interval a concerto on the organ (a newly invented musical genre) or directed a concerto grosso (his Op 6, a set of 12, published in 1740, represents his finest achievement in the form).

During his last decade he gave regular performances of Messiah, usually with about 16 singers and an orchestra of about 40, in aid of the Foundling Hospital. In 1749 he wrote a suite for wind instruments (with optional strings) for performance in Green Park to accompany the Royal Fireworks celebrating the Peace of Aix-la-Chapelle. His last oratorio, composed as he grew blind, was Jephtha (1752); The Triumph of Time and Truth (1757) is largely composed of earlier material. Handel was very economical in the re-use of his ideas; at many times in his life he also drew heavily on the music of others (though generally avoiding detection) – such 'borrowings' may be of anything from a brief motif to entire movements, sometimes as they stood but more often accommodated to his own style.

Handel died in 1759 and was buried in Westminster Abbey, recognised in England and by many in Germany as the greatest composer of his day. The wide range of expression at his command is shown not only in the operas, with their rich and varied arias, but also in the form he created, the English oratorio, where it is applied to the fates of nations as well as individuals. He had a vivid sense of drama. But above all he had a resource and originality of invention, to be seen in the extraordinary variety of music in the Op 6 concertos, for example, in which melodic beauty, boldness and humour all play a part, that place him and JS Bach as the supreme masters of the Baroque era in music.

Concerti grossi

Op 3, HWV312-17; Op 6, HWV319-30

Concerti grossi, Opp 3 and 6 🅿
Vienna Concentus Musicus / Nikolaus Harnoncourt
Teldec ④ 4509-95500-2 (237 minutes: ADD/DDD) Ⓑ
Recorded 1982-85 ⦿

The somewhat perfunctory look of these recoupled reissues (there are no insert-notes) masks just what extraordinary music-making lies within. These recordings come from a time when even Harnoncourt's supporters were finding him a little too eccentric to handle. But listening now to these searching, unceasingly imaginative performances of Handel's finest instrumental music, you can't help feeling that Harnoncourt was simply ahead of his time.

The fact is that there is ferocious creativity in every bar. Every opening slow movement is the prelude to a drama, every fugue a precisely related episode. You can find imposing examples of the former in Op 6 No 5 (its opening solo violin notes are like being tickled under the nose with a feather) or Op 6 No 6 (like the start of some great operatic scena), and stunning demonstrations of the latter in Op 3 No 3 or Op 6 No 1 (both broadly painted but leading to very different types of climax). There is hardly a place where Handel's music is allowed to just play itself; Harnoncourt is everywhere busy with thunderous dynamic contrasts or the sort of vivid articulation that at one moment has us enthralled by a grippingly minimal staccato, at another swept up by the warm embrace of a sudden but grandly legato phrase (quite a Harnoncourt trademark, this).

The Vienna Concentus Musicus plays for the most part with a virtuosity and precision that is well highlighted by the slightly dry but transparent acoustic in which they are recorded. To Harnoncourt this is big music, and these are big performances. Of course, there is no denying that they sound eccentric, even now. Not everything works and we would hesitate to recommend them as one's only encounter with this music. But their consistent and often audacious probing at the music's meaning is a spirit-reviving antidote to what by comparison seems like bland cautiousness on the part of some of Harnoncourt's rivals.

Concerti grossi, Op 6 Nos 1-4 🅿
The English Concert / Trevor Pinnock Ⓕ
Archiv Produktion 410 897-2AH (42 minutes: DDD) ⦿

Nos 5-8 🅿
The English Concert / Trevor Pinnock Ⓕ
Archiv Produktion 410 898-2AH (61 minutes: DDD) ⦿

Nos 9-12 🅿
The English Concert / Trevor Pinnock Ⓕ
Archiv Produktion 410 899-2AH (58 minutes: DDD) ⦿

Trevor Pinnock's accounts contain much that is satisfying: polished ensemble, effectively judged tempos, a natural feeling for phrase, and a buoyancy of spirit which serves Handel's own robust musical language very well. Crisp attack, a judicious application of appoggiaturas and tasteful embellishment further enhance these lively performances. Pinnock varies the continuo colour by using organ and harpsichord and also includes Handel's autograph (though not printed) oboe parts for Concertos Nos 1, 2, 5 and 6; where they occur a bassoon is sensibly added to fulfil the customary three-part wind texture of the period. The recorded sound is clear and captures faithfully the warm sonorities of the instruments.

Concerti grossi, Op 6 Nos 1-5 🅿
Collegium Musicum 90 / Simon Standage vn Ⓕ
Chandos Chaconne CHAN0600 (62 minutes: DDD) ⦿
Recorded 1996

Concerti grossi, Op 6 Nos 6-9 🅿
Collegium Musicum 90 / Simon Standage vn Ⓕ
Chandos Chaconne CHAN0616 (58 minutes: DDD)
Recorded 1997 ⦿

Concerti grossi – Op 6 Nos 10-12; C, HWV318, 'Alexander's Feast' 🅿
Collegium Musicum 90 / Simon Standage vn
Chandos Chaconne CHAN0622 (56 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997 ●

The first disc of the ever-fresh Op 6 Concerti grossi includes the oboe parts that Handel later added to Nos 1, 2, 5 and 6. The performances are brimful of vitality, and the clean articulation and light, predominantly detached style give the music buoyancy and help to bring out Handel's often mischievous twinkle in the eye. Speeds are generally brisk, with boldly vigorous playing, but Standage's team can also spin a tranquil broad line. Dynamics, throughout, are subtly graded and natural-sounding, and except in one final cadence ornamentation is confined to small cadential trills. On the second disc, except, rightly, in the sombre colours in the splendid Sixth (G minor) Concerto – here with oboe and the agreeable addition of a theorbo to the continuo – there is a general air of cheerfulness about the performances that is most engaging. The fugue in No 7 is wittily buoyant, the Allegro in No 9 borrowed from the Cuckoo and the nightingale Organ Concerto could scarcely be more high-spirited, the final Passepied of No 6 and the Hornpipe of No 7 are spring-toed; and Standage's feeling for convincing tempos is nowhere better shown than in the long Musette of No 6, which too often, in other hands, can drag. Phrasing everywhere is shapely, and the surprise chords that interrupt the flow of No 8's Allemande are admirably 'placed'. A thoroughly enjoyable disc, cleanly recorded.

On the final disc the playing is always on its toes – positively twinkling in dance movements such as the concluding fugal gigue of No 12. The final two concertos, No 11 in particular, also give Simon Standage an opportunity to shine as a soloist; his ad lib sections are tastefully done, without excesses, and his semiquavers in the variants of the A major Andante are feather-light. Dynamics everywhere are well contrasted in a natural way, and the tempos are very nicely judged; a slightly faster repeat of the first half of No 10's fifth movement suggests the splicing of a different take. As a fill-up, we are presented with the Alexander's Feast Concerto grosso, for which the string group is joined by oboes and bassoon. The excellent concertino of two violins and cello is thrown into high relief and the Allegro movements are performed with delightful spring.

---

12 Concerti grossi, Op 6 🅿
Academy of Ancient Music / Andrew Manze vn
Harmonia Mundi ② HMU90 7228/9 Ⓕ
(157 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1997 ●

With one stride, Harmonia Mundi has stolen a march on Chandos Chaconne's rival set of Handel's Op 6 with Simon Standage's Collegium Musicum 90; by juggling with the order, the 12 concertos have been accommodated on only two CDs. The AAM is on sparkling form, clearly enjoying itself under Andrew Manze's leadership. Performances are invigoratingly alert, splendidly neat (all those semiquaver figurations absolutely precise) and strongly rhythmical but not inflexible, with much dynamic gradation which ensures that phrases are always tonally alive and sound completely natural (even if more subtly nuanced than Handel's players ever dreamt of). Manze's basically light-footed approach is particularly appealing, and he sees to it that inner-part imitations are given their due weight. Speeds are nearly all fast, occasionally questionably so (though exhilarating), as in the first Allegro of No 1, the big Allegro of No 6 and the Allegro in No 9. But Manze successfully brings out the character of all the movements, and the listener can't fail to love the vigorous kick of his No 7 hornpipe. He is mostly sparing in embellishing solo lines except in Nos 6 and 11. Altogether this is an issue of joyous vitality.

Organ Concertos, Op 4

No 1 in G minor; No 2 in B flat; No 3 in G minor; No 4 in F; No 5 in F; Op 7 – No 1 in B flat; No 2 in A; No 3 in B flat; No 4 in D minor; No 5 in G minor; No 6 in B flat. Harp Concerto in B flat, Op 4 No 6 🅿
Paul Nicholson org Frances Kelly hp
The Brandenburg Consort / Roy Goodman hpd
Hyperion ② CDA67291/2 (154 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996

This recording was made at St Lawrence Whitchurch on the organ which Handel must certainly have played. Under Paul Nicholson's hands, the organ sounds well. There is plenty of brightly glittering passagework – in the second movement of Op 4 No 1, for example, or the Allegro of Op 4 No 2 – and rich diapason sound in such movements as the passacaglia-like first of Op 7 No 1; while the softer side of the instrument is particularly appealing in Op 4 No 5, where Nicholson, doubtless conscious that this is a transcription of a recorder sonata, draws from it some very sweet sounds. It has of course a mechanical action, and here and there the incidental noise may be rather disconcerting. Still, it is authentic, so possibly we should be grateful to have it so clearly reproduced. There is some very lively and at times virtuoso playing from Nicholson in the quick movements, with sturdy rhythms, and some of the dance movements too go with a good swing.

Nicholson gives good, precise accounts of the various solo fugues and the transcriptions and improvisatory movements used here when Handel offered merely an ad lib. He is a thoughtful player; his added ornamentation is always musical and intelligent, and stylish too. In several movements, however, overdeliberate orchestral phrasing or accentuation can be damaging. This happens quite often and it sometimes affects Nicholson's playing. Op 4 No 6 is played on the harp, with some very delicate timing from Frances Kelly. The recording is bright and clear, capturing happily the acoustic of this moderate-sized church.

Water Music, HWV348-50

Water Music 🅿
Simon Standage, Elizabeth Wilcock vns
The English Concert / Trevor Pinnock hpd
Archiv Produktion Blue 471 723-2ABL Ⓜ
(54 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1983 ●●

It is highly unlikely that George I ever witnessed performances that live up to this one. These are sparkling performances; tempos are well judged and there is a truly majestic sweep to the opening F major French overture; that gets things off to a fine start but what follows is no less compelling with some notably fine woodwind playing, so often the disappointing element in performances on period instruments. In the D major music it is the brass department which steals the show and here, horns and trumpets acquit themselves with distinction. Archiv Produktion has achieved a particularly satisfying sound in which all strands of the orchestral texture can be heard with clarity. In this suite the ceremonial atmosphere comes over particularly well with some resonant brass playing complemented by crisply articulated oboes. The G major pieces are quite different from those in the previous groups, being lighter in texture and more closely dance-orientated in character. They are among the most engaging in the Water Music and especially, perhaps, the two little 'country dances', the boisterous character of which Pinnock captures nicely. Pinnock's is still the best performance of the Water Music on the market.

Water Music 🅿
Le Concert des Nations / Jordi Savall
Auvidis Astrée ES9920 (74 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1993 ●

Of the period-instrument couplings of these two 'elemental' suites, particularly the Fireworks Music, Savall's must be placed at the top of the list. It is, however, strange that though the booklet-notes acknowledge that the Water Music falls into 'three suites' and that the Suite in G major was probably played during supper, the recorded performance ends with that in F major (described as 'Suite II') preceded by the rest ('Suite I') – neither the published nor the 'logical' order. The movements from the earlier Concerto in F are not included and there is also the familiar retitling and juggling with the order of movements. What splendid performances these are though, spirited, clean-edged and elegantly embellished – by a solo trumpet in the Adagio of the Overture of the Fireworks Music, where the preceding section is repeated as marked. The orchestral force is substantial, and the comparatively high-level recording and generous acoustic give a deliberate sense of being close to the performers – just as, on the Thames, King George I may have been in a barge adjacent to the musicians – rather than of hearing them from the riverside.

Water Music. Music for the Royal Fireworks
Scottish Chamber Orchestra / Nicholas McGegan
Classic fM The Full Works 75605 57044-2 Ⓜ
(68 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1998 ●

The only punch that is pulled here is that modern instruments and pitch are used, but Nicholas McGegan is too wise and experienced to allow that to count for much. He places Handel's Water Music Suites in the order usually accepted as appropriate to a single excursion along the Thames – F major on the outward journey, D major on the way back, and the gentler G major during supper – one that is equally effective in a recording. Identifying the movements by their titles provides the usual occupation for a relaxed winter's evening, but no matter – the music is magnificent in whatever order it is played, and by whatever titles it bears. The flanking Suites are recorded in a more spacious acoustic, as befits the postulated outdoor location of their original performances. The beginning and end of the Music for the Royal Fireworks are ablaze with the brilliant sounds of the trumpets and drums that the King loved. Authentic or not, these beautifully balanced performances are most enjoyable.

Water Music. Il pastor fido – Suite, HWV8c 🅿
Tafelmusik / Jeanne Lamon vn
Sony Classical Vivarte SK68257 (76 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995 ●

The jubilant spirit of the Water Music is splendidly captured here. This Canadian group has a good grasp of Handelian style, and lots of energy; there is plenty of vigour to its playing but no roughness. There are many nicely and unobtrusively managed details of timing and accent, yet always perfectly natural and justified from within. The tempos in the main are on the quick side but not hurried. The flowing Andante for the famous Air, which so readily becomes sticky if done slowly, is particularly likeable; here it sounds just right and no less expressive than usual. Only the D major Lentement seems heavy and ponderous, and perhaps the Bourrée is also a little clumsily done. The horn playing, recorded well forward, is particularly impressive – clean and clear, with a fine ring; it would have sounded well across the Thames. The movements are done here with the F major music first, then the D major and G major mixed, an unusual arrangement these days but one that probably has Handel's authority: and it works well. Tafelmusik gets through the Water Music in some 52 minutes, and there is room for a substantial suite of dances from the second version of Il pastor fido. These are charming and lively pieces and the final Chaconne, with its inventive textures, is particularly appealing. The sound here is a shade middle- and bottom-heavy, rather more so than in The Water Music, but again the playing is splendidly fresh and spirited.

Music for the Royal Fireworks

Music for the Royal Fireworks, HWV351[d] H
Berenice, HWV38 – Overture (arr Whittaker)[a].
Concerti a due cori in F, HWV333 (arr Mackerras)[b].
Concertos[c] – in D, HWV335a; F, HWV331.. Water
Music, HWV38-50 (arr Harty)[e] – Allegro; Bourrée;
Hornpipe; Allegro decisio
[d]Wind Ensemble; London Symphony Orchestra[ce];
Pro Arte Orchestra[b] / Charles Mackerras
Testament SBT1253 (76 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded [ae]1956, [bd]1959, [c]1977 ●

Over the night of April 13-14, 1959 in St Gabriel's Church, Cricklewood, a recording session took place, historic in every way, when the young Charles Mackerras conducted a band of 62 wind players plus nine percussionists in Handel's Music for the Royal Fireworks. With no fewer than 26 oboists topping the ensemble, it was only possible to assemble such a band after all concerts and operas had finished for the day.

They began at 11pm and finished at 2.30 in the morning, yet so far from sounding tired or jaded, the players responded to the unique occasion with a fizzing account of Handel's six movements. The success of this extraordinary project fully justified Mackerras's determination to restore the astonishing array of instruments that Handel himself had assembled for the original performance in Green Park in April 1749.

It is thrilling to hear that 1959 recording, at last transferred to CD, with sound that is still of demonstration quality, full and spacious, with a wide stereo spread. It is true that Mackerras takes the introduction to the overture and the 'Siciliana' at speeds far slower than he would choose today, but this was a recording which marked a breakthrough in what later developed as the period performance movement.

As a coupling for the Fireworks Music, Mackerras devised a composite Concerto a due cori which draws on two works written with that title around 1747. It makes a splendid piece, in which the massed horns bray gloriously.

Whatever the degree of authenticity, this is an electrifying collection, superbly transferred.

Music for the Royal Fireworks. Concertos – F, P
HWV331; D, HWV335*a*. Passacaille, Gigue and Minuet in G. Occasional Suite in D (both arr Pinnock)
The English Concert / Trevor Pinnock hpd
Archiv Produktion 453 451-2AH (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996

Trevor Pinnock uses George II's preferred scoring rather than Handel's – that is, just wind and percussion. What we know about the first performances of the work seems to indicate that Handel had his way and strings were used, along with a massed wind; probably the wind version was never heard in Handel's day. Well, here it is, with 24 oboes, 12 bassoons, double bassoon, nine each of trumpets and horns and six percussion. It's certainly rousing stuff, and a noble noise. With his direct and unaffected rhythm, Pinnock sets up a sturdy momentum for the Overture and the effect is grand and imposing. The dances too receive straightforward performances, with plenty of spirit and energy. This disc offers some welcome rarities. The F major Concerto is made up of versions of two movements from the D major part of the Water Music, here in F major; one is the movement generally labelled in the 18th century 'Mr Handel's Water Peice', again, with some interesting and very characteristic differences from the familiar version and the other is the Alla Hornpipe. In between Pinnock plays, as a slow movement, an Adagio from Op 3 No 5. The D major Concerto consists of what are probably early versions of two movements from the Fireworks Music with a version of a movement from a violin sonata, on the organ, in between. The Passacaille, Gigue and Minuet come from a trio sonata and the Occasional Suite draws on the Occasional Oratorio overture, the Ariodante ballet and music composed for Joshua and Alessandro Severo. It all works pretty well, although some of the music in this last is not Handel's most distinguished. But the concertos especially are well worth having, and certainly George II's vision of the Fireworks Music is to be relished in its way.

Music for the Royal Fireworks P
Concerti a due cori – No 1 in B flat, HWV332;
No 2 in F, HWV333; No 3 in F, HWV334
Tafelmusik / Jeanne Lamon vn
Sony Classical Vivarte SK63073 Ⓕ
(66 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1997 ●

It makes excellent sense to devote a CD to the three Concerti a due cori and the Music for the Royal Fireworks. Here the Fireworks Music is done in the form, with strings as well as wind, that Handel preferred. The less familiar Concerti a due cori were composed in the late 1740s for use in the intervals of oratorio performances. They borrow freely from other works – in particular Messiah and Belshazzar – and some movements seem a little odd in shape because the structure is dictated, in the originals, by the texts; but they are cheerful pieces and make very attractive listening.

These performances are splendidly spirited and enjoyable on every plane. Tafelmusik tends to favour speedy tempos. In the Fireworks Music 'La paix' is taken steadily but it is all very nicely judged, and the jauntiness they bring to the main Allegro of the overture is particularly likeable, making it a shade more detached than usual. Once or twice there is a stylish lilt, almost a hint of inégalité, in the dances.

The band sounds a big one, but the strings are only 5.6.3.3.2, with a fair number of wind – six oboes, three bassoons, four horns and three trumpets, with percussion (their collective intonation is as good as one has any right to expect). In the concertos, there is some first-rate wind playing and a fine, earthy ring from the horns. One or two tempos may strike you as quickish; no one would think of singing 'And the glory of the Lord' as fast as Tafelmusik plays Handel's transcription of it, but there's no reason why it shouldn't be done this way.

Orchestral and Ballet Music

Orchestral and Ballet Music from Alcina, Ariodante, Arminio. Berenice, Rinaldo, Rodelinda and Serse 🅿
Collegium Musicum 90 / Simon Standage vn
Chandos Chaconne CHAN0650 (67 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1999 ●

Handel's music is never more winsome than when it is written for special occasions, not least operas. Several of the items in this programme are arias, but they are not sung. Like today's musicals, though not for calculated commercial reasons, some became what we would now term pops, and Handel reworked them as instrumental pieces, so no liberty has been taken here in presenting them in that form. The charm of this music has not escaped the notice of others in recording studios, but it has never been more persuasively captured than it is by Collegium Musicum 90. Other recordings exist of the complete operas and some of the individual instrumental items, but Arminio is represented by only one aria; there is nothing run-of-the-mill about the fugal subject of the Overture, or its treatment, and the Minuet is winsome and light of step. Collegium Musicum 90 fields a team of 32 players but their sound is marvellously light and transparent even when in full flood, and their use of period instruments (or copies thereof) leads also to a natural, revelatory balance. Flawless recording and excellent notes by Standage complete an outstanding issue.

Trio Sonatas

Trio Sonatas, Op 5, HWV396-402 – No 1 in A; No 2 in D; No 3 in E minor; No 4 in G; No 5 in G minor; No 6 in F; No 7 in B flat 🅿
London Baroque
Harmonia Mundi HMC90 1389 (69 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1991 ●

Handel's publisher, Walsh, printed the six Trio Sonatas, Op 2, in about 1730, following them up in 1739 with seven further trios which he published as the composer's Op 5. In each set Handel offered a choice of melody instruments though the writing suggests that he had violins foremost in mind. The performances by London Baroque are poised, well shaped and susceptible to the subtle nuances of Handel's part-writing. Ingrid Seifert and Richard Gwilt are partners of long standing and their even dialogue, sometimes grave, sometimes lively and at other times playful, serves the music effectively. Tempos are well judged and phrases eloquently shaped and articulately spoken. In all this the violinists are sympathetically supported by the continuo players who make their own vital contribution to clear textures and balance. Recorded sound is appropriately intimate, evoking a chamber music ambience. The music, it hardly need be said, maintains a high level of craftsmanship and interest which will surely delight listeners.

Trio Sonatas – Op 2 No 5 in G minor, HWV390; Op 5 Nos 4 and 7. Tra le fiamme, HWV170. Notte placida e cheta, HWV142 🅿
Catherine Bott sop Caroline Kershaw, Jane Downer recs/obs Nigel Amherst violone Jonathan Manson vc Purcell Quartet (Catherine Mackintosh, Catherine Weiss vns Richard Boothby va da gamba/vc Robert Woolley hpd)
Chandos Chaconne CHAN0620 Ⓕ
(70 minutes: DDD)
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1997 ●

The idea of alternating trio sonatas with cantatas is a happy one, based perhaps on the idea that people play CDs for pleasure and not simply for reference. The two cantatas presented here are rarities on record. Tra le fiamme is a spectacularly scored piece, its textures enriched by a viola da gamba obbligato and wind instruments (recorders in some numbers, oboes in another) as well as strings. Notte placida e cheta is a delightful evocation of night, sleep and amorous reflection, with its opening aria full of sinuous, voluptuous interweaving violin lines and its soft, gently accompanied recitatives; it ends – a slightly rude awakening, perhaps, to chime with the words – with a fugal aria in which the singer takes one of the four contrapuntal parts along with the violins and the bass. Catherine Bott sings them very responsively, both to the words and to the sense of Handel's lines, with neatly placed detail and some attractively floated phrases. The viol obbligato is done in accomplished style by Richard Boothby who supplies much of the continuo harmony with multiple stops. In the Trio Sonatas there is some splendidly athletic playing from the violins of the Purcell Quartet, which plays with its usual spruce rhythms and conversational give and take. These are probably the most appealing performances currently available of these works.

Violin Sonatas

Violin Sonatas. Andante in A minor, HWV412. Allegro in C minor, HWV408 🅿
Andrew Manze vn Richard Egarr hpd
Harmonia Mundi HMU90 7259
(77 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Uncertainty over the authenticity of the violin sonatas, coupled with the fact that Handel and his publisher were notoriously imprecise about which instruments his various solo sonatas were even intended for, has no doubt prevented many violinists from embracing them as they might in these scholarly times. But there is certainly a good CD's worth of material to be had, even if only five sonatas are thought to be definitely by Handel. Andrew Manze and Richard Egarr offer these, plus three questionable works originally published in one or other of two versions of Handel's Op 1 set of mixed solo sonatas and two authentic one-movement fragments, and there is not an unenjoyable note anywhere.

The recording was made three years ago, immediately after this pair's Gramophone Award-winning set of sonatas by Pandolfi (Harmonia Mundi), and it shows them in the same world-beating form. These are performances simply brimming with vitality and imagination, transforming Handel's sonatas from the polite, even rather staid music you might think it to be, into grand dramas full of incident, excitement and plenty of those little moments that make you sit up and listen. Manze's violin sings with wonderful, glowing tone (he is not afraid to use vibrato to achieve it), to which he adds a joyous assortment of flowery ornaments and emphatic double-stoppings. Egarr's contribution is no less crucial to the atmosphere of these performances; surely the most inspired continuo improviser around at present, he draws an astounding and mercurial array of colours and textures from his harpsichord. Whatever he does, though, it is never routine. This is a great chamber-music recording, made by a duo who complement each other to perfection.

Flute Sonatas

No 1 in E minor, HWV359*b*; No 2 in G, HWV363*b*; No 3 in B minor, HWV367*b*; No 4 in A minor, HWV374; No 5 in E minor, HWV375; No 6 in B minor, HWV376; No 7 in D, HWV378; No 8 in E minor, HWV379 🅿

Barthold Kuijken fl Wieland Kuijken va da gamba
Robert Kohnen hpd
Accent ACC9180 (73 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1991 ●

In this recording of solo flute sonatas Barthold Kuijken plays pieces unquestionably by Handel as well as others over which doubt concerning his authorship has been cast in varying degrees. Certainly not all of the pieces here were conceived for transverse flute – there are earlier versions of HWV363*b* and 367*b*, for example, for oboe and treble recorder, respectively; but we can well imagine that in Handel's day most, if not all, of these delightful sonatas were regarded among instrumentalists as more-or-less common property. Barthold Kuijken, with his eldest brother Wieland and Robert Kohnen, gives graceful and stylish performances. Kuijken is skilful in matters of ornamentation and is often adventurous, though invariably within the bounds of good taste. Dance movements are brisk and sprightly though he is careful to preserve their poise, and phrases are crisply articulated. This is of especial benefit to movements such as the lively Vivace of the B minor Sonata (HWV367*b*) which can proceed rather aimlessly when too legato an approach is favoured; and the virtuosity of these players pays off in the Presto (Furioso) movement that follows. In short, this is a delightful disc which should please both Handelians and most lovers of Baroque chamber music.

Recorder Sonatas

Sonatas for Recorder and Continuo – No 1 in G minor, HWV360; No 2 in A minor, HWV362; No 3 in C, HWV365; No 5 in F, HWV369; No 6 in B flat, HWV377. Sonata for Flute and Continuo No 3 in B minor, HWV367*b* 🅿

Marion Verbruggen rec/fl Jaap ter Linden vc
Ton Koopman hpd/org
Harmonia Mundi HMU90 7151 Ⓕ
(58 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1994 ●

These are very lively, musically intelligent performances. The recorder playing is outstandingly fine, sweet in tone, pointed in articulation, perfectly tuned, technically very fluent, and informed by a good understanding of the art of ornamentation. Add to that the fact that Marion Verbruggen has a real command of Handel's language and you will realise that this CD is out of the ordinary. Some of Ton Koopman's accompaniments are a little busy (half are on the organ, half on the harpsichord), but it's all part of the sense of lively music-making that runs through this attractive disc.

Keyboard Suites

HWV426-33 – No 1 in A; No 2 in F; No 3 in D minor; No 4 in E minor; No 5 in E; No 6 in F sharp minor; No 7 in G minor; No 8 in F minor. HWV434; HWV436-41 – No 1 in G minor; No 2 in D minor; No 3 in D minor; No 4 in E minor; No 5 in B flat; No 6 in G; No 7 in D minor; No 8 in G minor

Keyboard Suites, HWV426-33, Nos 2, 3 and 5. Chaconne in G, HWV435
D Scarlatti Keyboard Sonatas – B minor, Kk27; D, Kk29; E, Kk206; A, Kk212; C sharp minor, Kk247; D, Kk491; A, Kk537
Murray Perahia pf
Sony Classical SK62785 Ⓕ
(69 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1996 ●●●

In his projection of line, mass and colour Perahia makes intelligent acknowledgement of the fact that none of this is piano music, but when it comes to communicating the forceful effects and the brilliance and readiness of finger for which these two great player-composers were renowned, inhibitions are thrown to the wind.

Good! Nothing a pianist does in the Harmonious Blacksmith Variations in Handel's E major Suite, or the Air and Variations of the D minor Suite could surpass in vivacity and cumulative excitement what the expert harpsichordist commands, and you could say the same of Scarlatti's D major Sonata, Kk29; but Perahia is extraordinarily successful in translating these with the daredevil 'edge' they must have. Faster and yet faster! In the Handel (more than in the Scarlatti) his velocity may strike you as overdone; but one can see the sense of it. It is quite big playing throughout, yet not inflated. Admirable is the way the piano is addressed, with the keys touched rather than struck, and a sense conveyed that the music is coming to us through the tips of the fingers rather than the hammers of the instrument. While producing streams of beautifully moulded and inflected sound Perahia is a wizard at making you forget the percussive nature of the apparatus. There are movements in the Handel where the musical qualities are dependent on instrumental sound, or contrasts of sound, which the piano just can't convincingly imitate. And in some of the Scarlatti one might have reservations about Perahia's tendency to idealise, to soften outlines and to make the bite less incisive.

If you can't bear to hear it on anything other than the harpsichord this record won't be for you. But Perahia is an artist, not just a pianist, and he has an experience to offer here that is vivid and musically considered at the highest level – and not at all second-best. The virtuosity is special indeed, and there is not a note that hasn't been savoured.

Keyboard Suites, HWV431-433, Nos 6-8; HWV440-441, Nos 7-8. Suite No 9 in G, HWV442 – Preludio
Sophie Yates hpd Ⓕ
Chandos CHAN0688 (71 minutes: DDD) ●

Sophie Yates brings formidable technique and strong dramatic feeling to these suites. The works of the first, 1720, collection are the more demanding, each of them opening with a prelude (or overture) – complex, pensive, often sombre – with a large-scale, fully worked fugue. Yates plays these in an appropriately rhetorical manner, rhythmically taut yet with enough flexibility and attentiveness to the music's caesuras to shape and characterise it, at the same time giving it some sense of the improvisatory. Then she takes the fugues at a lively pace, just a touch too fast for the music to sound comfortable: this is brilliant and exciting playing that keeps you on the edge of your seat.

Her playing, with its thoughtful details of timing, puts the structure of the music across strongly. She finds the same grandeur of manner in the Passacaille that ends the G minor Suite. For the rest, it is mainly dance music: some lively courantes and exuberant gigues, sober and deliberate allemandes, spacious and noble sarabandes – the crisp and precise fingerwork in that of No 7 in the Second Set, with its intensely detailed line, is a delight.

These are the most appealing versions of Handel's suites: fresh, alive, with a real command of style and technique but also just a hint of risk about the playing. Handel's harpsichord music has sometimes been called dull, but there isn't a moment here when you'd believe that.

Keyboard Suites, HWV426-33, Nos 1[b], 2-3[a], 4[b], 5[a], 6-7[b] and 8[a]
[a]Sviatoslav Richter, [b]Andrei Gavrilov pfs
EMI Double Forte ② 569337-2 Ⓜ
(119 minutes: ADD). Recorded live in 1979 ●●

Keyboard Suites, HWV434; HWV436-41 Nos 1[a], 2-3[b], 4[a], 5[b], 6[a], 7[b] and 8[a] Beethoven Piano Sonata No 17 in D minor, Op 31 No 2, 'Tempest'[a]
[a]Sviatoslav Richter, [b]Andrei Gavrilov pfs
EMI Double Forte ② 569340-2 (119 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded live in 1979 ●

Even by Sviatoslav Richter's Tours Festival standards, 1979 was a red-letter year. Then, partnered by his dazzling young compatriot Andrei Gavrilov, he played Handel's 16 Suites, offering performances of such quality that long-familiar reservations concerning their provenance and overall success evaporated as if by magic. From Richter and Gavrilov these Baroque chains of dances emerge with an unforgettable wit and vitality. Listen to Gavrilov in the First Suite's opening Prelude and you will hear an authentic as well as spirited emulation of the extempore style. Yet it is in the slow movements that Gavrilov achieves his greatest effect. In such hands, the Sarabande from the Seventh Suite becomes Handel's 'black pearl', if you like, and in the same grave and ceremonial dances from Suites Nos 11 and 13, the music emerges like great mysterious pools of light.

Richter's genius has rarely sounded more imperturbable and, whether he is playful and resilient in, say, the Fifth Suite's Gigue or poised and tonally translucent – a model of sense and sensibility – in the Air con Variazione, you are always aware of the musical artist first and the transcendental pianist second. Tempos are judicious rather than extreme, and even the most determined Beckmesser will surely find himself abandoning pencil and paper and succumbing to the spell of such serenity and affection. Finally, as a further reminder of Richter's unique stature there is his legendary 1961 disc of Beethoven's D minor Sonata, Op 31 No 2. With Richter the music retains its mystery; he 'does' so little and the result is hauntingly pure and distilled. The recordings, though occasionally showing their age, have been beautifully transferred.

Keyboard Suites, HWV426-33 – Nos 1 and 7; Ⓟ
HWV438 – No 4 in D minor. Chaconne in G, HWV435. Prelude in D minor. The Lady's Banquet – Sonata in C; Capriccio in F, HWV481; Preludio ed Allegro in G minor, HWV574; Fantaisie in C, HWV490
Olivier Baumont hpd
Erato 0630-14886-2 (63 mins: DDD). Rec 1995 Ⓕ

A splendid disc, imbued with freshness and vitality. Employing three different instruments – a Flemish harpsichord (1652) by Couchet, a shallower, 'dustier'-toned anonymous Italian instrument of 1677, and a wonderfully rich 1707 French instrument by Dumont – all tuned to a pitch a whole tone lower than that of today, Olivier Baumont presents two of Handel's 1720 'grand suites', the D minor Suite from the 1733 collection, which is seldom heard, the great C major Chaconne (one of Handel's favourites), which Baumont plays with every variant repeated, and a handful of very early shorter pieces. Two things in particular are striking about these performances – Baumont's stylishness and spontaneous-sounding skilful free decorations of Handel's text (not only in repeats but, for example, in the minor-key variants of the Chaconne). Definitely a disc to raise one's spirits.

Cantatas

Il delirio amoroso, 'Da quel giorno fatale', HWV99. La Lucrezia, HWV145. Tra le fiamme, HWV170 P
Magdalena Kožená mez Les Musiciens du Louvre / Marc Minkowski
Archiv Produktion 469 065-2AH (67 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1999

The Czech soprano Magdalena Kožená brings to these Handel cantatas a sense of drama quite out of the ordinary. That is clear at the very start, in the recitative that begins Delirio amoroso, where she invests every word with meaning in her timing and colouring of the notes. But it is most telling in her fine performance of Lucrezia. In the exceptionally beautiful and tragedy-laden F minor aria, 'Già superbo del mio affanno', she draws a long line, of great intensity, encouraged by Handel's bold chromatics and his appoggiaturas; and she goes on, in the second aria, taken at a testing speed, to sing with passion and agility. The passacaglia-like aria that follows is equally telling, but the most striking moment falls at the opening of the final number, just six bars of quite heart-rendingly soft singing, as Lucretia faces death ('Gia nel seno comincia').

Delirio amoroso, too, has some fine things. The overture is a bit scurried and the exuberant first aria is by no means improved by the solo violinist's indulgent rubato in his lengthy solos – although his duetting with Kožená is a brilliant piece of musical trapeze. She does well in the difficult 'Per te lasciai la luce', high and sustained, with obbligato cello, and in the delightful third aria with recorders. Her voice, which is not free of vibrato but has a pleasant natural ring and vitality, proves equally pleasing in the remaining cantata, Tra le fiamme, another colourful piece, which Minkowski directs with a light touch and Kožená sings with particular athleticism in the final aria, 'Voli per l'aria'. Three really fine pieces here, then, in performances that show different facets of Kožená's singing but above all establish her as someone who lives the music and puts it across with real conviction.

Aci, Galatea e Polifemo, HWV72 P
Sandrine Piau sop Sara Mingardo contr Laurent Naouri bar
Le Concert d'Astrée / Emmanuelle Haïm hpd
Virgin Classics ② 545557-2 (99 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included. Recorded c2002 ●●

The cantata or serenata a 3 (for three), Aci, Galatea e Polifemo, dates from Handel's visit to Naples in 1708 and it has almost nothing in common – except of course, for its subject matter – with his exquisite English pastoral, Acis and Galatea for the Duke of Chandos's house at Cannons of 1718.

As with so many of his Italian compositions, Handel used this enchanting creation of his youth as a sort of melody bank, lifting whole arias for insertion into his subsequent operas, so even if there are Handelians new to this work some of the music won't be entirely unfamiliar.

Aci, cast originally, one presumes, with a high soprano castrato, has two sublime arias, 'Qui l'augel da pianta in pianta' and his dying lament, 'Verso già l'alma col sangue' ('My soul pours out with my blood'). Both belong to his most ravishing early inspirations, the first a simile aria in which the soprano voice 'competes' with birdsong supplied by oboe and violin solos, the second a wonderfully evocative representation of the dying hero's throbbing heart and intense anguish. This is top-flight Handel by any reckoning and Aci's music is superbly sung by Sandrine Piau with her brilliant, steely yet still sweet soprano, used with quasi-instrumental technical accomplishment.

Even though Galatea's music – written for a contralto – is less interesting, the Arcadian nymph is cast with the best singer here, the wonderful Sara Mingardo, one of the truly sublime Handelians of our time, who brings a dark sensuality to her love music and a heartbreaking outpouring of grief in the recative following Aci's death.

Haïm's spirited and imaginative direction, her singers and a pristine modern recording weigh the balance in favour of this set.

Chandos Anthems

No 4a, HWV249a, 'O sing unto the Lord'; No 6, HWV251, 'As pants the hart'; No 11, HWV256, 'Let God arise'
Ensemble William Byrd; Académie Sainte-Cécile / Graham O'Reilly
L'Empreinte Digitale ED13072 (57 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts included ●

Graham O'Reilly is clearly a fine musician with a keen and true feeling for this music. He uses very small forces, modelled on those Handel is likely to have had available to him. This produces not only lucid and well-balanced textures but also an intimacy of atmosphere that the more traditional type of choral performances rules out. It also allows O'Reilly to phrase the music sensitively. Listen for example to the opening Sonata of O sing unto the Lord, with its slightly detached articulation and its gently sprung rhythms, or to the vigorous but poised Sonata beginning As pants the hart. The sound in the first chorus here has an almost sensuous quality, with its rich suspensions and chromaticisms; and later, in 'Why so full of grief', taken at a nicely measured tempo, the effect is of highly expressive, devotional chamber music. In Let God arise there is some happy interplay between soprano and oboe in 'Let the righteous be glad', and spirited ensemble singing in the closing items. The recording is beautifully clear.

Coronation Anthems

Coronation Anthems, HWV258-61. Ode for the Birthday of Queen Anne, 'Eternal Source of Light Divine', HWV74
Susan Gritton sop Robin Blaze counterten Michael George bass King's College Choir, Cambridge; Academy of Ancient Music / Stephen Cleobury
EMI 5557140-2 (61 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Recordings of the Coronation Anthems are usually winners – the old Willcocks one from King's, and the Preston from Westminster Abbey certainly were in their day – and this one certainly hits the mark. It is a traditional enough reading, without eccentricities, with plenty of energy and duly grand in scale: listen to the noble opening of Zadok the Priest, the introduction beautifully sustained and shaped, and then overwhelmingly grand at the choral entry, whose weight and power may surprise you, bearing in mind the quite modest size of the King's choir. They know just how to manage this kind of music in the chapel acoustic, which is naturally appropriate to the music.

The other three are no less enjoyable. The clear young voices, free of the fuzziness and soft edges of most choirs, help in such movements as the first of 'Let thy hand be strengthened', or the lightly sprung first of 'My heart is inditing' and its vigorous finale too. The Ode for the Birthday of Queen Anne, one of Handel's earliest settings of English words is more of a rarity. This is a lively performance, with clear and light solo singing, notably from Robin Blaze. There are also admirable contributions from Susan Gritton and Michael George. Excellent choral singing, and the Academy of Ancient Music are on their toes throughout.

Arias

María Bayo

No se emenderá jamás, HWV140. Tra le fiamme, HWV170. Alcina – Sì; son quella!; Tornami a vagheggiar; Mi restano le lagrime. Giulio Cesare – V'adoro, pupille; Che sento? Oh Dio!; Se pietà di me non senti; Da tempeste il legno infranto. Rinaldo – Lascia ch'io pianga 🅿
María Bayo sop Capriccio Stravagante / Skip Sempé
Astrée Naïve E8674 (64 minutes: DDD). Texts and translations included. Recorded 1999 Ⓕ OO

Bayo starts with an aria that is always a sure winner, Cleopatra's celebration in Giulio Cesare of her brother's defeat and her conquest (amorous, of course) of Caesar: Bayo sings 'Da tempeste' with tremendous vivacity, precise articulation and beautifully clean pitching. In 'V'adoro, pupille', from much earlier in the same opera, she is gently seductive, conveying just a hint of sensual languor, singing on a chamber-music scale with a delicately colourful accompaniment from Capriccio Stravagante. In 'Se pietà', one of the more tragic utterances, at a dark moment in the opera, she is not over-intense, but the tone is richer, the lines expressively shaped. The performance of the cantata Tra le fiamme is notable for the brilliance and accuracy of Bayo's duetting in the opening aria with the obbligato viola da gamba. She sings 'Lascia ch'io pianga' with a refined line, but perhaps more vibrato than one might wish, and there is some gently alluring ornamentation in the da capo. As a Spaniard, she naturally includes Handel's little Spanish cantata, No se emenderá jamás, a light piece with guitar accompaniment, which is delicately done. Of the arias from Alcina, Morgana's 'Tornami a vagheggiar' is a delight for its high spirits and Bayo's easy, natural mode of delivery. 'Mi restano le lagrime', where Alcina faces her downfall, is done with pathos and poignancy – and again in the da capo her ornamentation allows for heightening of the expression.

David Daniels

Ariodante – E vivo ancora ... Scherza infida in grembo al drudo. Giulio Cesare – Cara speme, questo core; Va tacito e nascosto; L'angue offeso mai riposa; Al lampo dell'armi; Dall' ondoso periglio...Aure, deh, per pietà. Rinaldo – Cara sposa; Venti, turbini, prestate. Rodelinda – Pompe vane di morte!...Dove sei?; Vivi tiranno!. Serse – Fronde tenere...Ombra mai fù. Tamerlano – A dispetto 🅿
David Daniels counterten Orchestra of the Age of Enlightenment / Sir Roger Norrington
Virgin Classics Veritas 545326-2 (69 minutes: DDD). Texts and translations included Ⓕ
Recorded 1998 OO

The ever-increasing popularity of Handel and his contemporaries, and their employment of alto castratos, has encouraged the development of countertenors capable of similar vocal feats to the original interpreters of the heroic roles in these works. Among these David Daniels can certainly be counted as a leading contender. He displays and deploys his talent here in a wide range of arias reflective and dramatic. His amazing technique runs through Tamerlano's virtuoso 'A dispetto' and Bertarido's 'Vivi tiranno!' without a blemish in the sound and with every division in its place yet part of a confidently delivered whole: by and large Daniels's runs and embellishments are smoothly accomplished. In more reflective pieces such as Giulio Cesare's 'Aure, deh, per pietà' (he also tackles Sesto's 'Cara speme' from Giulio Cesare, a particularly liquid, subtle piece of singing), Bertarido's 'Dove sei?' and Ariodante's sad lament, 'Scherza infida', written for the great Senesino, he uses his impeccable Italian to express wide-ranging emotions. Throughout, Roger Norrington and the Orchestra of the Age of Enlightenment give excellent support. The recording is blameless so there is every reason for readers to sample this fine exposition of the countertenor's art.

Véronique Gens
Armida abbandonata, HWV105. Agrippina condotta Ⓟ
a morire, HWV110. La Lucrezia, HWV32
Véronique Gens sop François Fernandez, Mira Glodeanu vns Les Basses Réunies (Bruno Cocset vc Pascal Monteilhet theorbo Blandine Rannou hpd Richard Myron db)
Virgin Classics Veritas 545283-2 Ⓕ
(53 minutes: DDD). Texts and translations included
Recorded 1996 ●

Composed during Handel's youthful years in Italy, these cantatas contain some of the boldest music he ever wrote, and certainly amongst the most passionate. They are not set to the pastoral, amorous texts that were widely favoured: two of them deal with tragic episodes in Roman history (the rape of Lucretia and the condemnation to death of Agrippina by her son Nero), the other, after Tasso, with the betrayal of Armida.

These performances by Véronique Gens amply capture this passionate character. She brings to them a full, warm, large voice, not entirely without hints of vibrato, but handled with real feeling for style; she uses the words and their sound effectively, phrases expressively and sometimes subtly, varies her colour a good deal, and brings particular emotional energy to the recitatives. Lucrezia draws some remarkably intense singing from her, in the highly chromatic F minor aria and in the lament-like 'Alla salma infedel'. In this lament, the main continuo accompaniment is assigned to the theorbo, which emphasises the intimate tone of the music. The violin playing in Armida is also particularly enjoyable – brilliant in the furioso recitative, stylish and sweet-toned in 'Venti, fermate'. They play with admirable spirit and rhythmic spring in the lively second aria of Agrippina, too, where again Gens sings commandingly, impassioned in the first aria ('Orrida, oscura'), with lightness in the second and then with much intensity in the beautiful 'Come, o Dio!' and also in the concluding recitatives. Les Basses Réunies supplies excellent continuo support. In all, highly impressive performances of some superlative music.

Ann Murray
Alcina – Mi lusinga il dolce affetto; Ⓟ
Verdi prati, selve amene; Stà nell'Ircana. Ariodante – E vivo ancora?... Scherza infida; Dopa notte. Giulio Cesare – Va tacito e nascosto; Se in fiorito ameno prato; Piangerò, la sorte mia; Dall' ondoso periglio...Aure, deh, per pietà. Serse – Fronde tenere e belle...Ombra mai fù; Se bramate d'amar, chi vi sdegna; Crude furie degl'orrido abissi
Ann Murray mez Orchestra of the Age of Enlightenment / Sir Charles Mackerras
Forlane UCD16738 (75 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1994

The cautious tread of the watchful huntsman, with the lovely dialogue of voice and basset-horn in Caesar's first aria, makes a delightful start to this recital. The arias here range from the simple ease and beneficence of 'Verdi prati' to the florid outburst of the frustrated Xerxes in 'Crude furie'. In between are Cleopatra's lament, Caesar's love song, Ariodante's sadness and his new-found joy. Handel and Mackerras have long been associated, and with the Orchestra of the Age of Enlightenment he provides the singer with a stylish accom-paniment that is never assertive or doctrinaire but scrupulous in its care for phrasing and texture. Ann Murray responds with singing which has not only her customary expressive-ness and energy but also a generally well-preserved beauty of tone. Occasionally a harsher, less firmly placed tone threatens to emerge, as at the start and da capo of 'Stà nell' Ircana', but such moments are short-lived and instead she encourages a mellower, warmer sound which also has the advantage of being precise in its focus. The voice is quite closely recorded.

Dorothea Röschmann
Handel German Arias, HWV202-10[a] Telemann Ⓟ
Musique de table – 'Paris' Quartets: G, E minor
[a]Dorothea Röschmann sop Academy for Ancient Music, Berlin
Harmonia Mundi HMC90 1689 (79 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1998 ●●

Handel's nine German Arias are not as well known nor as often recorded as they deserve, perhaps because, being devotional music, they are generally rather solemnly, even earnestly sung. Dorothea Röschmann sings them delightfully. There is no want of seriousness, or intensity, where it is called for. The instrumental support is highly polished, but arguably too varied in colour: what is the justification for switching bass instruments for an aria's middle section? The obbligato part is shared between violin, flute and oboe: the oboe seems to be a mistake in the high part of 'Meine Seele', with a rather squealy effect – although Röschmann's exuberance at 'Alles jauchzet, alles lacht' ('all rejoice, all laugh') is happy. The Telemann 'Paris' quartets set off the arias well. Some of the playing in the E minor work is a little sober, but the lively G major is done in lively and elegant fashion, with spruce rhythms. But it is Röschmann's Handel that is the real joy: listen to 'Die ihr aus dunklen Grüften' and you won't be able to resist it.

Bryn Terfel

Judas Maccabaeus – I feel the Deity within ... Arm, arm, ye brave!. Te Deum in D, 'Dettingen' – Vouchsafe, O Lord. Samson – Honour and arms scorn such a foe. Berenice – Si, tra i ceppi e le ritorte. Alcina – Verdi prati, selve amene. Orlando – O voi del mio poter...Sorge infausta una procella. Acis and Galatea – I rage, I melt, I burn!...O ruddier than the cherry. Semele – Where'er you walk. Alexander's Feast – Revenge, revenge, Timotheus cries...Behold a ghastly band. Giulio Cesare – Va tacito e nascosto. Serse – Fronde tenere...Ombra mai fù. Messiah – Thus saith the Lord...But who may abide?; Why do the nations?; Behold I tell you a mystery...The trumpet shall sound

Bryn Terfel bass-bar Scottish Chamber Orchestra / Sir Charles Mackerras

DG 453 480-2GH (73 minutes: DDD). Texts and translations included. Recorded 1995 Ⓕ

'I feel', sings Terfel with assurance in his voice matching the solemnly, expectantly, ceremonious opening bars; and then, the second time, 'I feel', but now with the awed conviction of one who has experienced 'the Deity within'. The adjustment, the change of expression, is small, and no doubt when described sounds obvious enough; but it is typical of the imaginative intelligence Terfel brings. And what of his singing, his voice-production, his care for legato? As to the latter, conflict always lurks as expressive emphasis, shading and verbal naturalism assert their rights in the face of pure beauty and the evenness of the singing-line. Terfel is one in whom the rival claims work their way to a compromise, though if one side has to win it will generally be the expressive element. A good example of the compromise is the second track, the 'Vouchsafe, O Lord', quietly and simply sung, preserving the movement's unity and yet with a power of feeling that, at 'let thy mercy lighten upon us', is as overtly emotional as an operatic aria.

The adapted arias, 'Where'er you walk', 'Verdi prati' and 'Ombra mai fù', justify their inclusion readily enough, and it is good to hear Terfel in the solos from Messiah. The singing here incorporates a good deal of embellish-ment, some of it of Mackerras's devising. He is excellent, sharing with Terfel an appreciation of the zest in Handel. The recording is vivid and clean.

Alexander Balus, HWV65

Lynne Dawson, Claron McFadden sops Catherine Denley mez Charles Daniels ten Michael George bass New College Choir, Oxford; The King's Consort and Choir / Robert King P

Hyperion ② CDA67241/2 (156 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Notes and text included. Recorded 1997

Alexander Balus has never been one of Handel's more popular oratorios. That is mainly because its plot is by modern standards lacking in drama and motivation, and accordingly does not call forth the vein of his music that nowadays has the strongest appeal. Alexander Balus is essentially a sentimental drama, in which the interest centres on the various characters' emotional reactions to their situations, amatory, political and religious, and these are rather static in the first two acts but much more powerful in the more eventful third with the deaths of both Alexander and Ptolomee.

Here we have a very capable, idiomatic, sensibly cast performance under Robert King. The choruses are especially accomplished. The New College Choir, supported by men from The King's Consort Choir, is confident, bright-toned and vigorous, clean in line and well balanced. Lynne Dawson sings beautifully in her firm and resonant soprano and her usual poised and unaffected style. Her singing of the lamenting music in the final act is particularly moving. Cleopatra has a couple of duets, one with some attractive interplay with the secondary character Aspasia, sung with much assurance by Claron McFadden. As Alexander, Catherine Denley sings with much confidence and directness in music that isn't all of special individuality. Jonathan is sung fluently and warmly, but very plainly, by Charles Daniels. Lastly there is Michael George, who is ideally suited to the villainous Ptolomee, with his forceful (but always musical) manner and the touch of blackness in his tone. The orchestral playing is accomplished, and often rather carefully shaped. The recitative moves at a steady but natural pace; ornamentation is generally modest. All Handelians will want to acquire this set, and others should not be put off by the indifferent press Alexander Balus has received from time to time.

Alexander's Feast, HWV75

Alexander's Feast. Concerto grosso in C, HWV318, 'Alexander's Feast' P

Donna Brown sop Carolyn Watkinson contr Ashley Stafford counterten Nigel Robson ten Stephen Varcoe bar Monteverdi Choir; English Baroque Soloists / Sir John Eliot Gardiner

Philips ② 422 053-2PH2 (98 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Text included. Recorded live in 1987 ●

Alexander's Feast was the first work Handel set by a major English poet (Dryden) and the first time he allotted the principal male part to a tenor instead of the castrato heroes of his Italian operas. These factors, combined with fine music, scored with great brilliance and imagination, ensured the immediate success of Alexander's Feast. It is strange that nowadays it is seldom performed so this recording would have been very welcome even had it not been so full of vitality and so stylishly performed. The Monteverdi Choir and the soloists are all Gardiner regulars, and the English Baroque Soloists have ample opportunities to shine – especially the violins, although the natural horns' lusty entry in the bucolic 'Bacchus, ever fair and young' is exhilarating.

L'Allegro, il Penseroso HWV55

Awards 1987

Patrizia Kwella, Marie McLaughlin, Jennifer Smith sops Michael Ginn treb Maldwyn Davies, Martyn Hill tens Stephen Varcoe bar Monteverdi Choir; English Baroque Soloists / Sir John Eliot Gardiner 🅿
Erato ② 2292-45377-2 Ⓜ
(116 minutes: ADD). Notes, text and translation included. Recorded 1980 ●●●

The score of L'Allegro, il Penseroso ed il Moderato is presented virtually complete. The soprano aria 'But O, sad virgin' is omitted, which if you look at the marvellous opening for two cellos, seems savage indeed, but the music does rather lose its way in the long decorative passages for both voice and instruments, and its absence need not be regretted. The band is small and so is the superbly alert chorus. Playing and singing constantly delight by their delicacy. The three soprano soloists sound poised and clean-cut. Jennifer Smith's high notes are an especial joy. Handel wanted a boy treble for two arias and presumably knew that their words were never very clear; this one produces some pretty sounds. The succession of charming miniatures is interrupted in the middle of Part 2 by more substantial items and a blaze of brilliant coloratura from several soloists. Martyn Hill's 'These delights' is triumphantly good, and the choral singing here is excitingly precise. The final chorus in Part 2, a fugue with four subjects, is sublime, but he did not bother himself unduly with the final chorus in Part 3. But in general this is very likeable music, its charm, conciseness and emphasis on word-painting unlike anything else in Handel. The sound quality is very good.

L'Allegro, il penseroso ed il moderato, HWV55 🅿
Lorna Anderson, Susan Gritton, Claron McFadden sops Paul Agnew ten Neal Davies bass The King's Consort Choir; The King's Consort / Robert King
Hyperion ② CDA67283/4 (138 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included. Recorded 1999

This is the first truly complete recording of Handel's delectable pastoral ode. The early numbers of L'Allegro – literally 'the cheerful man' – have a spontaneous exuberance barely matched in Handel's output, while much of the music of Il penseroso ('The melancholy man') attains a contemplative ecstasy found elsewhere only in parts of Theodora. The whole work is suffused with an almost pantheistic sense of wonder and delight in the natural world. While alive to the al fresco gaiety of numbers such as 'Mirth, admit me of thy crew' and 'O let the merry bells', Robert King gives full value to the tranquil reflectiveness that lies at the core of the work, favouring broad tempos and gravely expressive phrasing. Occasionally, as in the soprano aria 'Straight mine eye hath caught new pleasures', his approach seems a shade too reverential. But for the most part he directs this glorious music with affection and relish, abetted by vivid orchestral playing and a typically responsive contribution from the chorus.

Susan Gritton is a soprano of rare accomplishment, with a warm, pure, yet highly individual timbre and a wonderful feeling for the broad Handelian line. Both the scena 'Come pensive nun' and the romantic nocturne 'Oft on a plat of rising ground', with its haunting evocation of 'the far-off curfew', are intensely moving; and, with the cellist Jane Coe, Gritton makes an eloquent case for the long florid aria 'But O! sad virgin', omitted in the Gardiner recording. Lorna Anderson, if a mite less secure above the stave, brings an appealing plangent tone to the nightingale aria 'Sweet bird' (done complete here, whereas Gardiner makes drastic cuts) and a trancelike absorption to the sublime 'Hide me from Day's garish eye'. Some slightly odd vowel sounds apart, Claron McFadden's bright, eager tones and nimble coloratura serve the more extrovert arias well; Neal Davies is sturdy in his bucolic hunting number and mellifluous in his minuet aria in Il moderato; and Paul Agnew is personable and stylish, though his legato is rather shown up by Susan Gritton's in 'As steals the morn'.

Apollo e Dafne, HWV122

Apollo e Dafne, 'La terra e liberata'. 🅿
Crudel tiranno amor, HWV97
Nancy Argenta sop Michael George bass
Collegium Musicum 90 / Simon Standage
Chandos Chaconne CHAN0583 (58 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1994

Handel's Apollo e Dafne is a difficult work to put in context. Completed in Hanover in 1710 but possibly begun in Italy, its purpose is not clear, while as secular cantatas go it is long (40 minutes) and ambitiously scored for two soloists and an orchestra of strings, oboes, flute, bassoon and continuo. But this is not just a chunk of operatic experimentation: it sets its own, faster pace than the leisurely unfolding of a full-length Baroque stage-work, yet its simple Ovidian episode, in which Apollo's pursuit of the nymph Dafne results in her transformation into a tree, is drawn with all the subtlety and skill of the instinctive dramatic genius that Handel was.

This recording features the expert Handelian voices of Nancy Argenta and Michael George, and both convey their roles convincingly. Argenta's hard, clear tone seems just the thing for the nymph, who is not required to be especially alluring but who does have to sound quick to anger and (literally) untouchable; and George strikes the right note as Apollo, bragging loudly at the opening of his superior skill in archery to Cupid before succumbing more gently, and in the end extremely touchingly, to Cupid's arts. The orchestra is bright and efficient, and the pacing of the work seems just right. This is superb Handel then, and as if that were not enough there is a bonus in the form of a shorter cantata for soprano and strings, Crudel tiranno amor. It is a beautiful piece indeed, and Argenta performs it perfectly.

Dixit Dominus, HWV232

Dixit Dominus. Laudate pueri Dominum, HWV237
Saeviat tellus, HWV240. Salve regina, HWV241
Annick Massis sop Magdalena Kožená mez
Choeur des Musiciens du Louvre; Les Musiciens du Louvre / Marc Minkowski
Archiv Produktion 459 627-2AH (78 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included
Recorded live 1998 ●●

These pieces, written in Handel's early twenties, embody a kind of excitement and freedom, and a richness of ideas, that come from his contact with a different tradition and a sudden realisation that the musical world was larger and less constricted than he had imagined, tucked away in provincial middle and north Germany: and that he was exhilarated by the discovery. You can positively hear him stretching his musical wings in this music. And it certainly does not fail to take off in these very lively performances. The quickish tempos habitually favoured by Marc Minkowski are by no means out of place here. The Saeviat tellus, although little recorded, is pretty familiar music as Handel recycled most of it, notably the brilliant opening number in Apollo e Dafne and the lovely 'O nox dulcis' in Agrippina. This is a solo motet, as too is the Salve regina, notable for the expressive vocal leaps and chromatic writing in the 'Ad te clamamus' and the solo organ and string writing in the 'Eia ergo' that follows. Laudate pueri, which uses a choir, is another fresh and energetic piece: the choir of the Musiciens du Louvre do their pieces in rousing fashion, and there is some happy oboe playing, as well as fine singing from Kožená, earlier on, in particular in the hugely spirited 'Excelsus super omnes'. The biggest item is of course the Dixit Dominus, where the choir sings very crisply. The illustrative settings of 'ruinas' tumbling down through the registers, and the 'conquassabit' that follows, are truly exciting; and the long closing chorus is done with due weight at quite a measured pace. These are splendid performances that truly capture the spirit of these marvellous pieces.

Oratorio Arias

David Daniels
Belshazzar, HWV61 – Destructive War;
Oh sacred oracles of truth. Jephtha, HWV70 – Dull delay, in piercing anguish; Up the dreadful steep ascending. Messiah, HWV56 – He was despised. Saul, HWV53 – O Lord, whose mercies; Brave Jonathan. Theodora, HWV68 – The raptur'd soul; Deeds of kindness; Kind Heav'n; Sweet Rose and Lilly. Semele, HWV58 – Despair no more shall wound me; Your tuneful voice
David Daniels counterten
Paris Orchestral Ensemble / John Nelson
Virgin Classics 545497-2 (67 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes and texts included. Recorded c2002 ●

The world's leading 'operatic' countertenor has sung on precious few of the abundant complete Handel recordings of the last decade so this selection of oratorio arias fills some of the gaps in the Daniels discography.

The American was to have sung Didymus in Paul McCreesh's Archiv recording of Theodora – the role of his Glyndebourne début in Peter Sellars's controversial 1995 staging – but he was unable to fit the preceding concerts into his burgeoning international schedule and was replaced by Robin Blaze. Not surprisingly, he includes four of Didymus's arias in his oratorio album, and rejoices in the wonderful music Handel composed for the young Italian castrato, Gaetano Guadagni. The sensuous colours of Daniels' falsetto are ideal in this music, which he sings with beguiling erotic ambiguity.

The same goes for David's ravishing 'O Lord, whose mercies numberless' – a prayer whose yearning melismata suggest passions more earthly than godly – from Saul. There is little cause for complaint, except perhaps about the use of the modern instrument Ensemble Orchestral de Paris rather than a period band, but at least John Nelson's conducting – particularly in the fast-moving numbers – is livelier than on his complete L'allegro. In excellent sound, this glorious disc comes highly recommended.

Israel in Egypt, HWV54

Libby Crabtree, Susan Gritton sops Michael Chance, Robert Ogden countertens Ian Bostridge ten Stephen Varcoe, Henry Herford basses Angela East vc Alastair Ross hpd James Vivian org King's College Choir, Cambridge; The Brandenburg Consort / Stephen Cleobury
Decca ② 452 295-2DH2 (126 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included. Recorded 1995 ●

Israel in Egypt is an experimental one-off, since no other Handel oratorio shows such a heavy imbalance in favour of choruses over arias and recitatives. Handel himself seems to have seen it as a miscalculation not worth repeating; after the lukewarm reception which attended its première in London in 1739 he quickly amended it by importing arias from other works, and when he revived the work in 1756 he replaced the first of its three parts with a new, largely pasticcio concoction.

Subsequently, the oratorio became known almost entirely by Parts 2 and 3 – 'Exodus' and 'Moses' Song' – and gained justifiable popularity for its thrilling echt-Handelian choruses, as well as for typically tender moments such as the alto aria 'Thou shalt bring them in'. The original Part 1 – basically the 1737 funeral anthem for Queen Caroline, minimally adjusted from 'The Ways of Zion do mourn' to become 'The Lamentations of the Israelites for the Death of Joseph' – was in the meantime consigned to obscurity, from whence it has rarely emerged, even in its independent state.

The first recording to restore Israel in Egypt to triptych condition was Andrew Parrott's with the Taverner Consort and Players in 1989 (reviewed below). The two make an interestingly complementary pair. Parrott's is a typical product of the British period-performance scene of the time, with a virtuoso, mixed professional choir delivering a brisk, lean and incisive reading, backed up by some stalwart Baroque soloists. It is very accomplished, but in places is under-powered and lacking in atmosphere.

The King's performance offers something different. The spacious chapel acoustic cannot help but bring a greater grandeur to proceedings, of course, but the presence of a choir of men and boys also forges an unmistakable aural link with the English choral tradition – which one assumes is what Handel himself was attempting to tap into when he put in all these choruses in the first place. It works wonders above all for Part 1, the erstwhile anthem, which in these evocative surroundings begins, at least, to escape the torpor which its static, slow choruses can create. The principal gain in Parts 2 and 3, on the other hand, is in sheer weight; the hammerblows of 'He smote all the first-born of Egypt', for instance, though blunter than Parrott's, are certainly mightier. The downside, inevitably, is a comparative lack of vocal precision in the choir; fast passagework, such as in 'I will sing unto the Lord', is clouded compared to the Taverner Consort, and the boys sound tired in 'But the waters overwhelmed their enemies'.

Elsewhere, however, Cleobury shows a surer touch than Parrott in some of the less bombastic descriptive music – the orchestral breezes of the soprano aria 'Thou didst blow with the wind' are bracingly real. Cleobury also has a strong solo line-up, better matched than Parrott's team, though for the latter the ever-stern David Thomas is surely more of a natural for the duet 'God is a man of war' than the more gentlemanly Stephen Varcoe.

On balance, the vote just about goes to Cleobury, though both have their virtues. But it is worth pointing out that for those who (probably along with Handel) consider that all the best music resides in Parts 2 and 3, a very strong rival exists in John Eliot Gardiner's vivid and superbly executed performance with the Monteverdi Choir, recorded live in 1990.

Israel in Egypt, HWV54

Nancy Argenta, Emily Van Evera sops Timothy Wilson counterten Anthony Rolfe Johnson ten David Thomas, Jeremy White basses Taverner Choir and Players / Andrew Parrott 🄿

Virgin Classics Veritas ② 562155-2 (135 minutes: DDD). Text included Ⓑ

Recorded 1989

Israel in Egypt, of all Handel's works, is the choral one par excellence – so much so, in fact, that it was something of a failure in Handel's own time, because solo singing was much preferred to choral by the audiences. Andrew Parrott gives a complete performance of the work, in its original form: that is to say, prefaced by the noble funeral anthem for Queen Caroline, as adapted by Handel to serve as a song of mourning by the captive Israelites. This first part is predominantly slow, grave music, powerfully elegiac; the Taverner Choir shows itself to be firm and clean of line, well focused and strongly sustained. The chorus has its chance to be more energetic in the second part, with the famous and vivid Plague choruses – in which the orchestra too plays its part in the pictorial effects, with the fiddles illustrating in turn frogs, flies and hailstones. And last, in the third part, there is a generous supply of the stirring C major music in which Handel has the Israelites give their thanks to God, in some degree symbolizing the English giving thanks for the Hanoverian monarchy and the Protestant succession. Be that as it may, the effect is splendid. The solo work is first-rate, too, with Nancy Argenta radiant in Miriam's music in the final scene and distinguished contributions from David Thomas and Anthony Rolfe Johnson.

Jephtha, HWV70

Awards 1989

Lynne Dawson, Ruth Holton sops Anne Sofie von Otter mez Michael Chance counterten Nigel Robson ten Stephen Varcoe bar Alastair Ross hpd Paul Nicholson org Monteverdi Choir; English Baroque Soloists / Sir John Eliot Gardiner 🄿

Philips ③ 422 351-2PH3 (158 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Text included. Recorded live in 1988 ○○○

Jephtha has the same basic story as several eastern Mediterranean myths familiar to the opera-goer (in Idomeneo and Iphigénie en Aulide, for example), of the father compelled to sacrifice his child. Jephtha's daughter Iphis is not in the event sacrificed: when Abraham-like, her father has shown himself willing to perform God's will, and she has shown herself ready to accept it, an angel happily intervenes and commutes her sentence to perpetual virginity. But not before the tragic situation has provoked some of the noblest music Handel wrote. From the moment that Jephtha sees that it is his daughter who has to fall victim to his improvident oath, the music, hitherto on a good but not outstanding level, acquires a new depth, above all in the sequence at the end of Act 2. This recording does the work full justice. It could scarcely have been better cast. Nigel Robson seems ideal as Jephtha. He has due weight as well as vigour, style as well as expressive force. Lynne Dawson's Iphis is also a real success. Sometimes this role is done in a girlishly 'innocent' vein; she does more than that, establishing the character in the appealing love duet in Part 1. Her firm, well-focused, unaffected singing is just right for this role.

The other outstanding contribution comes from Michael Chance as Hamor, her unfortunate betrothed. Stephen Varcoe sings Zebul's music with due resonance and spirit, and Anne Sofie von Otter makes a distinguished contribution in Storgè's music: 'Scenes of horror' has a splendid attack and depth of tone, and 'Let other creatures die!' is spat out with rare power. Ruth Holton makes a pleasantly warm and mellifluous angel. The Monteverdi Choir is in fine voice, responsive to all that Gardiner asks of them. Here and there one might cavil at some of the dynamic shaping in the choruses, for example in 'Doubtful fear' in Act 3; and the Overture can be a trifle fussy in detail. But the broad vision of the work, the rhythmic energy that runs through it and the sheer excellence of the choral and orchestral contributions speak for themselves. Cuts are very few, and amply justified by authentic precedent. This recording is firmly recommended as the standard version of this great work.

Joseph and his Brethren, HWV59

Yvonne Kenny sop Catherine Denley mez P
Connor Burrowes treb James Bowman counterten
John Mark Ainsley ten Michael George bass
New College Choir, Oxford; The King's Consort Choir; The King's Consort / Robert King
Hyperion ③ CDA67171/3 (164 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text included. Recorded 1996

There has never been a complete, professional recording of Joseph and his Brethren, a neglect out of proportion to the merits of its music. It is full of good and characteristic things, and there are several scenes, including the extended denouement in the last act, that are very moving. The work begins splendidly, with an unusual overture heralding a deeply felt opening scene for Joseph, languishing in an Egyptian prison. The setting of his prophecy is effective, with seven bars of darting arpeggios for the years of plenty and seven of sparse harmonic writing, adagio, for the famine years. The rest of Act 1 celebrates Joseph's foresight, preferment and marriage to Asenath, Pharaoh's daughter. The highlights of Act 2 include a prison scene for Simeon, an agonised G minor accompanied recitative and aria, a beautiful, nostalgic idyll for Joseph, and scenes for Joseph with his brothers which incorporate a splendid outburst from Simeon, an aria from Benjamin and a moving chorus from the brothers, a sustained prayer and a richly worked fugue.

The soloists dispatch all this music with spirit and accuracy. James Bowman is in excellent voice in the title-role, full, rich and duly agile in the rapid music. Joseph is well suited to Robert King's way of conducting Handel. This is not a specially dramatic performance, but carefully moulded and intelligently paced. The choir produces a sound that is bright and firm and the singing is resolute. King is particularly good at shaping the dynamics in a natural and unanimous way.

Messiah, HWV56

Dorothea Röschmann, Susan Gritton sops P
Bernarda Fink contr Charles Daniels ten Neal Davies bass
Gabrieli Consort and Players / Paul McCreesh
Archiv Produktion ② 453 464-2AH2
(132 minutes: DDD). Text included. Ⓕ
Recorded 1996 ●●

The Gabrieli Consort and Players are as responsive and professional a group as you will find. McCreesh has assembled solo singers with broad mainstream experience and Handel's choruses encapsulate all the vitality and litheness of the modern English vocal consort at its best. More than that, McCreesh is a natural dramatist and all his singers respond magnificently to the evangelical fervour. McCreesh's expression is candid and immediate, if not imparted with the unfolding spirituality of Suzuki, or fragrancy of Christie; his is a particular musicianship which reaches out, quite Sargent-like in the robust swagger of 'And the Glory', the grand leisurely 'Amen' and almost elegiac enunciation in 'Comfort ye' – perhaps too static for some but Charles Daniels's supreme control has us holding our breath.

McCreesh, in employing, for the most part, the Foundling Hospital version of 1754, treats us to a second soprano. His casting serves him well with two incandescent performances: Susan Gritton is suitably unmollifiable in 'a refiner's fire' though she turns on the intensity in 'I know that my Redeemer liveth'. Dorothea Röschmann provides a similarly bright edge and in both cases, we are treated to singing of real technical finesse. Bernarda Fink's heady and rasping contralto may not appeal to everyone but 'He was despised' leaves one in little doubt of Jennens's starkest sentiments. Neal Davies is sure-footed and impressive. The energy and focused proclamation of this reading will win many friends: while tempos may appear hard-pushed, there is a consistency and rooted concentration to proceedings, always thoroughly engaged. Recorded sound is resonant but also close, and fairly compressed in its livelier moments.

Messiah P
Arleen Auger sop Anne Sofie von Otter mez
Michael Chance counterten Howard Crook ten
John Tomlinson bass The Choir of the English Concert; The English Concert / Trevor Pinnock
Archiv Produktion ② 423 630-2AH2 (150 minutes: Ⓕ
DDD). Text included. Recorded 1988 ●●

How authentic is authentic? Trevor Pinnock and The English Concert, while using period instruments, are guaranteed to appeal very widely to traditional lovers of Handel's masterpiece, who might as a rule opt for a performance using modern instruments. Pinnock gets the best of both worlds. One of the most distinctive points is that, even more than his rivals, he brings out the impact of timpani and trumpets, above all in the 'Hallelujah' and 'Amen' choruses. In that he stirs the blood in a way that even Sargent would have envied. Another distinctive point is that a genuine, dark, firm, bass soloist has been chosen, John Tomlinson, who is ripely resonant here. Traditionalists who lament the lack of dark bass tone and the predominance of baritonal shades in Handel today will doubtless raise a cheer, and if it comes to authenticity, Handel must surely have been thinking of just such a voice, rather than anything thinner or more discreet. Not only Tomlinson but Arleen Auger too will delight listeners of all Handelian persuasions. She has one of the sweetest, most ravishing soprano sounds on any of the current versions, and the warmth of expressiveness, whether strictly authentic or not, brings many of the most memorable moments in the whole performance. Try the close of 'I know that my Redeemer liveth', where the dramatic contrasts of dynamic are extreme and masterfully controlled, without a hint of sentimentality. The male alto, Michael Chance, also outshines his direct rivals in artistry and beauty of tone, but he is given only a proportion of the alto numbers. The majority are given to Anne Sofie von Otter. Hers is another beautiful voice, finely controlled. The recording is one of the finest available, with plenty of bloom and with inner clarity never making textures sound thin or overanalytical.

Messiah H

Dame Isobel Baillie sop Gladys Ripley contr James Johnston ten Norman Walker bass Huddersfield Choral Society; Royal Liverpool Philharmonic Orchestra / Sir Malcolm Sargent

Dutton Laboratories Essential Archive mono
② 2CDEA5010 (146 minutes: ADD) Ⓑ
Recorded 1946 ●

From the 1940s until the early 1960s one of the greatest of regular British musical events (every bit as important as the Proms) was Malcolm Sargent's Messiah. He conducted it up and down the country, always to packed houses; and indeed for one to be able to attend the performance at Huddersfield Town Hall needed very special connections, for tickets were scarcer than an invitation to Buckingham Palace! Sargent usually omitted – as he does on this recording – three numbers from Part 2 and four from Part 4. Even then, the performance time was two-and-a-half hours without the interval. Apart from spacious tempos, Sargent had his own ideas about Handelian style. Today we usually listen to a quite different kind of Messiah, brisker, often exchanging grandeur for exhilaration; so it is heart-warming to have the opportunity to return to a great tradition that Sargent kept alive for so many years.

This is made possible by one of Dutton Laboratories' most miraculous 78rpm transfers – the finest ever heard taken from 78s of any music – of Sargent's extraordinarily vivid and expansive recording (the most spontaneous of the three he made). The four splendid soloists – that queen of oratorio sopranos, Dame Isobel Baillie; the rich-voiced Gladys Ripley; the warmly lyrical James Johnson; and the vibrant Norman Walker are right inside their parts. But the star of the performance is undoubtedly Isobel Baillie. Her first entry in 'There were shepherds' is a truly ravishing moment, while her gloriously beautiful 'I know that my Redeemer liveth' has never been surpassed on record. Sargent opens the work with a sumptuous presentation of the Overture, while his tempos for the choruses now sound very slow to ears used to 'authenticity'. Sargent believed deeply in this music and he carried the listener with him. The hushed close of 'All we like sheep' almost brings tears to the eyes. The sound itself is truly astounding! In its original 78rpm format this set sold more than 120,000 copies in America alone. At bargain price it is an ideal investment for anyone who relishes an old-fashioned, large-scale approach to Handel's Messiah.

The Occasional Oratorio, HWV62

Susan Gritton, Lisa Milne sops James Bowman P counterten John Mark Ainsley ten Michael George bass New College Choir, Oxford; The King's Consort / Robert King

Hyperion ② CDA66961/2 (144 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text included. Recorded 1994

The occasion that called forth this work was the Jacobite rising of 1745 and its impending defeat. The Duke of Cumberland's victory at Culloden was yet to come. Handel, anticipating it, hit off the mood of the moment with a rousing piece full of appeals to patriotic feeling, partly through the traditional identification between the English Protestant culture of Hanoverian times with that of the biblical Hebrews. Much of the music comes from existing works, notably Israel in Egypt. The 'plot' pursues the familiar route of Anxiety-Prayer-Victory-Jubilation, but the work lacks the unity of theme and purpose of the great dramatic oratorios; if, however, you value Handel primarily because the music is so splendid you will find a lot to relish here. King rises to the challenge of this sturdier side of Handel's muse and produces playing and singing full of punch and energy, and with that command of the broad Handelian paragraph without which the music lacks its proper stature.

The grand eight-part choruses, with the choir properly spaced, antiphonally, over the stereo span, make their due effect. King has a distinguished solo team. John Mark Ainsley's singing is particularly touching in the highly original 'Jehovah is my shield', where the rocking figures in the orchestra eventually turn out to symbolise sleep. Also very enjoyable is Susan Gritton's soprano, a sharply focused voice with a fine ring and due agility in the lively music and handled with taste and a keen feeling for the shape of phrases in the contemplative airs. A fine set.

Saul, HWV53

Lynne Dawson, Donna Brown sops Derek Lee Ragin counterten John Mark Ainsley, Neil Mackie, Philip Salmon, Philip Slane tens Alastair Miles, Richard Savage basses Monteverdi Choir; English Baroque Soloists / Sir John Eliot Gardiner 🅿
Philips ③ 426 265-2PH3 (159 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded live in 1989 ●

Saul is considered by many to be one of the most arresting music dramas in the English language, even though it is officially classed as an oratorio. In it Handel explores in some psychological depth the motivation of his characters, most notably that of the eponymous anti-hero, whose tantrums caused by envy and by his searching for supernatural intervention are all vividly delineated; as is the friendship of David and Jonathan and the different characters of Saul's daughters, Merab and Michal. In yet another compelling performance of Handel under his baton, John Eliot Gardiner – in this live recording made at the Göttingen Handel Festival in Germany – fulfils every aspect of this varied and adventurous score, eliciting execution of refined and biting calibre from his choir and orchestra. Alastair Miles captures Saul in all his moods. John Mark Ainsley and Derek Lee Ragin are affecting as Jonathan and David; so are Lynne Dawson and Donna Brown as Michal and Merab. There are a few cuts, but not serious enough to prevent us from making a firm recommendation.

Solomon, HWV67

Andreas Scholl counterten Inger Dam-Jensen, Susan Gritton, Alison Hagley sops Susan Bickley mez Paul Agnew ten Peter Harvey bass Gabrieli Consort and Players / Paul McCreesh 🅿
Archiv Produktion ③ 459 688-2AH3
(161 minutes: DDD). Notes and text included. Ⓕ
Recorded 1998. ●●

Solomon is universally recognised as one of Handel's finest masterpieces, not only with magnificent choruses, but more importantly containing rapturous love music, nature imagery, affecting emotion and, in Part 2, the vividly portrayed dramatic scene of Solomon's famous judgement over the disputed infant. This is in fact the only dramatic part of the oratorio; and each of the female characters appears in only one of the work's three parts. Paul McCreesh, responsive to the work's stature, employs an orchestra of about 60 (including a serpent as the bass of the wind group) and presents the oratorio in the original 1749 version, full and uncut.

It has been argued that even in so splendid a work Handel was fallibly human enough to include some dead wood. McCreesh, however, stoutly defends Handel's original structural balance. In one respect, though, he does depart from Handel's intentions. By the time Solomon was written, Handel was using no castratos in his oratorios, and the title-role in this case was deliberately designed for a mezzo-soprano; but here the chance to secure the pre-eminent countertenor Andreas Scholl was irresistible. The colour of Handel's predominantly female vocal casting (only Zadok and the smaller-part Levite being exceptions) is thus slightly modified. This historical infidelity is one of the few reservations that could be made about the set, which is a notable achievement. McCreesh is fortunate in his cast, too. Predictably, Scholl becomes the central focus by his beauty of voice, calm authority, charm and intelligent musicianship throughout. Inger Dam-Jensen, as Solomon's queen, sounds suitably ecstatic in the florid 'Blessed the day' and amorous in 'With thee th'unsheltered moor', and her duet with Solomon flows with easy grace. To Susan Gritton falls the sublime 'Will the sun forget to streak', with its wonderful unison oboe-and-flute obbligato. As the high priest Zadok, Paul Agnew shines in the ornate 'See the tall palm'. A more positive and audible keyboard continuo would have been welcome but this is a minor shortcoming, and the effect of the performance as a whole is deeply impressive, with such things as 'Will the sun', the grave interlude to 'With pious heart' and the elegiac chorus 'Draw the tear from hopeless love' haunting the listener's mind.

Theodora, HWV68

Susan Gritton sop Susan Bickley mez Robin Blaze counterten Paul Agnew, Angus Smith tens Neal Davies bass Gabrieli Consort and Players / Paul McCreesh 🅿
Archiv Produktion ③ 469 061-2AH3 Ⓕ
(184 minutes: DDD). Text and translation included
Recorded 2000 ●●●

Handel's penultimate oratorio, Theodora, was a failure in his own time. Until relatively recently it remained a rarity, but over the last few years it has come to be recognised as a masterpiece, although quite different in mood and treatment from most of his more familiar oratorios.

This recording encourages attentive listening to the subtleties of the work, because it is done with such affection, care and refinement. There is nothing sensational about it, no singer who overwhelms you with brilliance or virtuosity. But the solo music, all of it, is finely sung. Theodora herself is taken by Susan Gritton, who has won golden opinions recently, and will win more here for a great deal of lovely, clear and musicianly singing, with a quiet seriousness and unaffected intensity that are ideally suited to the role. Her presence at the centre of the tragic drama elevates it as a whole.

Irene, her fellow Christian, is sung with scarcely less distinction by Susan Bickley, coolly expressive in most of her music, more passionate in 'Defend her Heaven' in Act 2, a shapely performance with subtleties of timing. Didymus, originally a castrato role (very rare in oratorios), is sung by Robin Blaze, whose focused, even-toned countertenor – not a hint of the traditional hoot – serves well: this is fluent singing, with no great depth of tone, but very steady and controlled, with the detail precisely placed. As Septimius, Paul Agnew is in good voice, firm and full in tone, phrasing the music elegantly (although the Act 3 air is unconvincing, too bouncy and cheerful for the situation). Lastly, there is Neal Davies as the Roman ruler, Valens, whose excellent singing makes as persuasive a case as can be imagined for torturing Christians – his is a pleasantly grainy voice, with considerable warmth and fullness of tone, well suited to a figure representing authority, and he despatches the divisions with assurance.

Ornamentation is appropriate and tasteful, and McCreesh takes the recitative at a natural and relaxed pace. His main contribution, however, is in the well-sprung rhythms he draws from his Gabrieli singers and players, in the way he allows the lines to breathe, and in the sense of purpose and direction he imparts to the bass-line. Add to this a keen sense of the right pace for each number, and you have the recipe for what seems to be an outstanding reading of this noble work.

Il trionfo del Tempo e del Disinganno

Il trionfo del Tempo e del Disinganno, HWV46a 🅿
Deborah York, Gemma Bertagnolli sops
Sara Mingardo contr Nicholas Sears ten Concerto Italiano / Rinaldo Alessandrini org
Opus 111 ② OPS30-321/2 (133 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Il trionfo del Tempo e del Disinganno, of 1707, was Handel's first oratorio; in its third and final incarnation 50 years later it was to be his last. It has all the hallmarks of the finest music of his Italian years – tremendous verve, originality of invention, freshness. It calls for four soloists, representing Beauty, Pleasure, Time and Truth. This is the work in which Handel in effect invented the organ concerto, with the 'Sonata' in Part 1, seemingly the first piece for solo organ and orchestra. The Handelian will find it, Hamlet-like, full of quotations; in it Handel drew on some of the music of his German years, and it served in turn as a quarry for many later works, including Agrippina and Rinaldo.

This new version is done with prodigious energy and rather rapid tempos. The young Italianate Handel can readily take these fast tempos, generally speaking, but here and there the music would have profited from being allowed more time to unfold. But the rhythms do have plenty of spring and vitality, and the players, and the singers too, usually cope. The star is undoubtedly Deborah York, as Beauty, whose bright, diamantine tone and incisive articulation, not to mention her agility serve well. The other soloists are just as fine. This is certainly the most dramatic of the three versions of Il trionfo in the catalogue. Dazzlingly played and sung, it comes highly recommended.

Opera arias and duets

Suzie LeBlanc and Daniel Taylor
Overture in D, HWV337/338. Giulio Cesare – Caro! Bella!; Overture; Da tempeste il legno infranto[ab]. Rinaldo – Sinfonia, Act 1; Scherzano sul tuo volto[ab]; Cara Sposa[b]; Lascia ch'io pianga[a]. Rodelinda – Ombre, piante[a]; Io t'abbraccio[ab]. Serse – Ombra mai fù[b]. Tolomeo – Se il cor ti perde[ab]
[a]Suzie LeBlanc sop [b]Daniel Taylor counterten
Arion / Stephen Stubbs
ATMA Classique ACD2 2260 Ⓕ
(57 minutes: DDD). Texts and translations included
Recorded c2002

This disc is outstandingly well performed, partly through the contribution of Stephen Stubbs, better known as lutenist than conductor, whose beautifully sprung rhythms and sensitive orchestral phrasing animate the whole. The singing is no less distinguished. Suzie LeBlanc's reading of such an old favourite as 'Lascia ch'io pianga' brings it freshly to life, with her unaffected expression, her shapely phrasing and beauty of tone. In the Rodelinda aria her moulding of the music again adds to the poignancy of the climactic top notes, while the semiquavers are bright, precise and duly jubilant in Cleopatra's triumphal final aria from Giulio Cesare.

Daniel Taylor gives a moving account of 'Cara sposa', sweet and clear of tone and with some telling messa di voce, and he excels, too, in the purity of his expression of 'Ombra mai fù'.

And when they sing together the pleasure is more than doubled – both have admirable clarity of articulation, and they know how to make the most of the expressive content, as, for example, in their handling of the dissonances on 'amara' ('bitter') in the Tolomeo duet, or their quite modest but tasteful ornamentation in the da capo sections where often they echo each other. Listen, too, to their moving account of the elegiac duet in Rodelinda.

Alessandro – Overture; Sinfonia; Che vidi?; 🅿
No, più soffrir; Placa l'alma; Solitudine amate…Aure, fonti; Pur troppo veggio…Che tirannia d'Amor; Svanisci, oh reo timore…Dica il falso. Admeto, Re di Tessaglia – Il ritratto d'Admeto; La sorte mia vacilla; Quest'è dunque la fede…Vedrò fra poco. Riccardo Primo, re di Inghilterra – Morte vieni…A me nel mio rossere…Quando non vede. Siroe, re di Persia – A costei, che dirò?; L'aura non sempre; Si diversi sembianti...Non vi piacque, ingiusti dei. Tolomeo, re di Egitto – E dove, e dove mai...Fonti amiche; Ti pentirai, crudel

Catherine Bott, Emma Kirkby sops
Brandenburg Consort / Roy Goodman
Hyperion CDA66950 (76 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1997 ●●

It was a happy idea to assemble a selection of Handel's arias written for the two sopranos whose famous rivalry coloured the last years of the first Royal Academy. Francesca Cuzzoni – impersonated here by Catherine Bott – was Handel's principal soprano from 1723, creating among other roles Cleopatra and Rodelinda. Faustina Bordoni – her roles here go to Emma Kirkby – arrived in 1726 and the two sang together in several operas including five new ones by Handel, all represented on this recording. Both were superlative singers and each had a characteristic style.

In his music composed for them, Handel clearly differentiated between their capacities, as this disc illustrates. The 'rival queens' first sang together in Alessandro, which is the opera most fully represented here. There are two of Cuzzoni's arias, one brilliant piece with rapid divisions, which Bott throws off in splendidly free fashion, and a pathetic one, a typical F minor siciliano, taken very slowly here, allowing plenty of time for some expressive elaboration in the da capo. Of Faustina's music we have the exquisite scena that opens Act 2, including the aria, 'Aure, fonti', and the lively one with which the act closes. The aria typifies, in the way it demands and rewards precisely detailed singing, Handel's writing for her, and Kirkby's refinement of detail is remarkable. There is beautifully managed interplay between the singers in the Alessandro duet; they seem to feed one another with opportunities.

The programme is imaginatively put together and Goodman is a prompt and stylish accompanist. A thoroughly enjoyable disc.

Acis and Galatea, HWV49b

Norma Burrowes sop Galatea; P
Anthony Rolfe Johnson ten Acis;
Martyn Hill ten Damon; Willard White
1Acis and Galatea, HWV49*b*
Sophie Daneman sop Galatea; Paul Agnew ten Acis; Patricia Petibon sop Damon; Alan Ewing bass Polyphemus; Joseph Cornwell ten Coridon; François Piolino, David Le Monnier, Andrew Sinclair tens
Les Arts Florissants / William Christie
Erato ② 3984-25505-2 93 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts included ●●●

Christie has elected to give a 'chamber version' of the work, that is, with forces akin to those Handel used for his original Cannons performances: probably five singers and between seven and a dozen instrumentalists. He does not however follow the original Cannons text, adding a choral 'Happy we' after the duet, and assigning the role of Damon to a soprano: these changes are not without Handelian authority, but it comes from his 1739 revival, which embodied other departures and used much larger forces. Never mind: there is nothing that any modern conductor would do that is half as shocking as the violences that Handel himself did to Acis on some of its revivals – and that should mute purist complaint.

Christie strongly emphasises the work's central division. He adopts rather speedy tempos throughout Act 1 (that is, up to 'Happy we'), which is concerned with pastoral love: Acis's 'Where shall I seek' and Damon's 'Shepherd, what art thou pursuing?' don't seem, respectively, like Larghetto and Andante, but the urgency and the joy of the lovers' mutual desire is strongly caught. In Act 2, where Polyphemus's shadow falls over their love, the sparkle and vitality give way to the pathetic and the elegiac. Christie's tempos here are steady, and his shaping of the act seems something of a departure: its climaxes here come not in 'The flocks shall leave the mountains' (when Acis is killed) and 'Heart, the seat of soft delight' (when he is immortalised as a river) – arguably the most powerful musical numbers – but in the ensembles, 'Mourn, all ye Muses!' and 'Must I my Acis still bemoan', where the sustained, gentle singing of Christie's ensemble lends the music an emotional weight that it does not usually achieve. There are other, mostly smaller, points where Christie does new and different things, and some will not like all of them. Christie's orchestra is one-to-a-part, as Handel's may have been: this seems to produce a slightly oboe-heavy balance in some items, and in the lightly scored pieces the continuo line seems overweighted.

The opening scenes, then, are done more lustily, in two senses, than usual. The choral opening is remarkably hearty and robust. Sophie Daneman sings Galatea with something more than stylised pastoral sensuality: there is real intensity in her airs, with a pretty warbling recorder, very chirrupy, and sharply moulded phrasing, and particular sensuality in 'As when the dove'. If her 'Heart, the seat', at the end, seems to carry rather less emotional weight, that is part of the overall reading of the work. Paul Agnew makes an elegant Acis in Act 1, with an eager 'Where shall I seek' and 'Love in her eyes sits playing' done with quiet passion. 'Love sounds th'alarm', later, is lively but not quite stirring. Patricia Petibon's Damon is prettily sung, with a nice ring to the voice, and Alan Ewing's Polyphemus, done with spirit and humour in a well-focused, firm-edged voice and articulated with precision, is excellent.

Gardiner's 1976 version long held the field in this work, and to some extent still does, although Robert King's smaller-scale reading has many virtues, too. Christie's new version may not be everyone's answer but it is a polished and strongly characterised performance, and is certainly the first we would urge anyone to try.

Admeto, Re di Tessaglia

René Jacobs counterten Admeto; Rachel Yakar sop Alceste; Ulrik Cold bass Ercole, Apollo; Rita Dams mez Orindo; James Bowman counterten Trasimede; Jill Gomez sop Antigona; Max van Egmond bar Meraspe, A Voice; Il Complesso Barocco / Alan Curtis 🅿

Virgin Classics Veritas ③ 561369-2
(217 minutes: ADD). Notes, text and translation included. Recorded 1979 Ⓕ

This reissue is the first Admeto on CD. It is full of fine things, particularly in its music for the two women – Alceste, the nobly self-sacrificing wife of King Admetus, and Antigona, the princess he had once wooed but then rejected, who now returns after the supposed death of Alceste. The plot, then, is akin to the familiar one of Gluck's Alceste, but with an extra sub-plot that allows for touches of wit and irony and insights into human character. When it was first released, the recording was something of a pioneer as regards the use of period instruments and performing conventions. Things have moved on, of course: it seems a bit dated now, heavier in manner than most Handel opera recordings of recent years. And some of the cast are not wholly at home in a Baroque style where little vibrato is wanted. One thinks in particular of Rachel Yakar, but although her articulation and attack are not always ideally clean she does bring a good deal of spirit to some of the arias.

Jill Gomez's lighter, bell-like voice is, however, more convincingly Handelian: she sings Antigona's music charmingly and with due agility, and expressively too in the beautiful Act 2 siciliana. James Bowman is in his best voice as Trasimede, Admetus's brother who loves Antigona. René Jacobs, however, lacks the heroic tones and the incisiveness that the role demands. Ulrik Cold makes a strong Ercole, with appropriately sturdy, masculine tone, and Meraspe is neatly and very stylishly sung by Max van Egmond. Alan Curtis's direction is attentive to matters of style, but he sometimes lets the bass-line plod. Even so, Handelians need not hesitate.

Agrippina

Della Jones mez Agrippina; Derek Lee Ragin counterten Nero; Donna Brown sop Poppea; Alastair Miles bass Claudius; Michael Chance counterten Otho; George Mosley bar Pallas; Jonathan Peter Kenny counterten Narcissus; Julian Clarkson bass Lesbo; Anne Sofie von Otter mez Juno;
English Baroque Soloists / Sir John Eliot Gardiner 🅿

Philips ③ 438 009-2PH3 (217 minutes: DDD)
Notes, text and translation included. Ⓕ
Recorded 1991-92 ●●

Agrippina is Handel's Venetian opera, composed in 1709 for the S Giovanni Gristostomo theatre, where it was deservedly a great success. Any admirer of countertenor singing should be prepared to buy the set for Michael Chance's singing alone. But in fact there are two other countertenors here who are well worth hearing, especially Derek Lee Ragin, whose high-lying voice and sensitive, thoughtful phrasing serve Nero's music admirably. His last aria, a brilliant piece with colourful instrumental writing, as he renounces Poppea in expectation of the imperial crown, is breathtakingly done, fiery singing with very precise execution of the divisions. The third of the countertenors is Jonathan Peter Kenny as Narcissus, rather softer in tone and line, who provides some particularly musical singing in his Act 2 aria.

Della Jones gives a masterful performance in the title-role. She has several brief and catchy little pieces, which she throws off with spirit, but also some larger-scale numbers, such as the marvellous C minor aria near the end of Act 1, which is done with great vigour, and the noble, invocation-like 'Pensieri, voi mi tormentate', another of the opera's high points, to which she brings much intensity. Donna Brown as Poppea makes the most of a role with much lively and appealing music. Alastair Miles's full and resonant bass – the part goes down to cello C – brings due weight of authority to the emperor Claudius; Pallas is done by a clean, lightish but nicely firm baritone, George Mosley, and Julian Clarkson contributes some very neat singing in the role of Lesbo. Anne Sofie von Otter comes in as a dea ex machina at the very end, not to rescue the situation but to honour the marriage of Poppea and Otho – which she does in style.

John Eliot Gardiner is a fine and very experienced conductor of Handel and he has a sure feeling for tempo and for the character of each movement. The orchestral playing is beyond reproach. The text followed is that of the Chrysander edition.

This recording is comfortably among the half-dozen finest recordings of Handel operas.

Alcina

Renée Fleming sop Alcina; Natalie Dessay sop Morgana; Kathleen Kuhlmann mez Bradamante; Susan Graham mez Ruggiero; Juanita Lascarro sop Oberto; Timothy Robinson ten Oronte; Laurent Naouri bass Melisso; Les Arts Florissants / William Christie 🅿

Erato ③ 8573-80233-2 (191 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, text and translation included
Recorded live in 1999 ●

Alcina, musically and dramatically, is among the finest of Handel's operas. This performance shows the typical Christie touch: polished and sweet-toned playing, well-judged balance, care for detail. No doubt it is a consequence of performing in a large house (the Palais Garnier, Paris) that tempos are on the slower side of average, generally speaking, although there is no lack of fire in the big virtuoso pieces. The orchestral playing, with a good-sized band, is always warm and shapely, from the sparkling overture onwards – where Christie takes the Un peu lentement of the musette quite literally. The opera is given virtually complete, following the Chrysander score; the only ballet music included (besides the dances in the overture) are the entrée and tamburino in the final scene.

There have been some magnificent Alcinas in the past, headed by the two on record, Dame Joan Sutherland and Arleen Auger. Renée Fleming is in the same class. Less conscious a stylist, perhaps, than Auger, less obviously brilliant than Sutherland, she sings with great intensity. As a performance, and a reading of this marvellous role, hers is of a very high order. There are others to match. Susan Graham, in the primo uomo role of Ruggiero, has some of the opera's finest music, and brings to it a firm, full mezzo, clear and agile. The famous 'Verdi prati', her poignant farewell to the enchantments of Alcina's realm, is very simply and beautifully sung, with no ornamentation at all, and the result amply justifies it. Kathleen Kuhlmann sings Bradamante with great vigour and resource, the semiquaver runs done with absolute precision, the tone rich and warm with an attractive gleam. Natalie Dessay brings her full and warm soprano to Morgana's music, and a touch of the coquettish where called for.

The orchestra is much less aggressively 'period' in tone than some. But the opera is done with the spirit and passion that its superb music calls for, and can be recommended without hesitation as the finest to be had.

Ariodante

Awards 1996

Lorraine Hunt sop Ariodante; Juliana Gondek sop Ginevra; Lisa Saffer sop Dalinda; Jennifer Lane mez Polinesso; Rufus Müller ten Lurcanio; Nicolas Cavallier bass King of Scotland; Jörn Lindemann ten Odoardo; Wilhelmshaven Vocal Ensemble; Freiburg Baroque Orchestra / Nicholas McGegan P

Harmonia Mundi ③ HMU90 7146/8 Ⓕ

(202 minutes: DDD). Notes, text and translation included. Recorded 1995 ○○○

Highlights available on Ⓜ HMU90 7277

This recording, made with the cast from the Göttingen Festival in 1995 (largely American singers who have collaborated with McGegan in his Californian performances), seems at least the equal of the best he has done before. The quality of the music is of course a factor: Ariodante is one of the richest of the Handel operas. It begins with a flood of fine numbers, mostly love music for the betrothed pair, Ariodante and the Scottish princess Ginevra – she is introduced in a wonderfully carefree aria, he in a gentle, exquisite slow arietta; then they have a very individual and beautiful love duet, and each goes on to a more jubilant aria. But the plot thickens and the music darkens with Polinesso's machinations, designed to impugn her fidelity: thus Act 2 contains music of vengeance and grief (above all the magnificent 'Scherza infida!' for Ariodante, a G minor aria with muted upper and pizzicato lower strings, and soft bassoons), while the final act shows all the characters in extremis, until the plot is uncovered and equilibrium restored.

This is also one of Handel's few operas with extensive ballet; each act includes some splendid and ingeniously tuneful dance music. McGegan directs in his usual spirited style. There is a real theatrical sense to his conducting: this is one of those opera sets where, after the overture, your spine tingles in expectation of the drama. Lorraine Hunt's soprano seems warm and full for a castrato part, but her line is always well defined and she has a delightfully musical voice.

Ariodante P

Anne Sofie von Otter mez Ariodante; Lynne Dawson sop Ginevra; Veronica Cangemi sop Dalinda; Ewa Podles mez Polinesso; Richard Croft ten Lurcanio; Denis Sedov bass King of Scotland; Luc Coadou ten Odoardo; Choeur des Musiciens du Louvre; Les Musiciens du Louvre / Marc Minkowski

Archiv Produktion ③ 457 271-2AH3 (178 minutes: DDD). Text and translation included. Ⓕ

Recorded 1997 ○

Lynne Dawson is the star of this show. In Act 2, where Ginevra finds herself inexplicably rejected and condemned by everyone, Dawson brings real depth of tone and feeling to her E minor lament, 'Il mio crudel martoro'; in the final act she shines in the desolate miniature 'Io ti bacio' and brings much fire to the outburst 'Sì, morro'. But she never transgresses the canons of Baroque style. Von Otter, too, has much marvellous music – the aria 'Scherza infida' is one of Handel's greatest expressions of grief – and she sings it beautifully, but she is not really at one with his idiom and seems to lack a natural feeling for the amplitude of Handel's lines.

Yet of course there is much to enjoy here too, the beauty of the actual sound, the immaculate control, the many telling and musicianly touches of phrasing. But the noble, climactic triumphant aria, 'Dopo notte' doesn't have quite the effect it should. For that, however, Minkowski is partly to blame. Carried away, it almost seems, by the passion of the music, he is often inclined to go at it baldheaded, too fast and with a ferocity of accent that seems foreign to the style and dangerously close to ugly.

Veronica Cangemi makes a charming Dalinda, light, spirited and duly agile, with some gently pathetic expression in the delightful siciliana song early in Act 2. Ewa Podles brings her large, resonant voice to Polinesso's music; and the King of Scotland's fatherly music is done with due fullness and warmth by Denis Sedov, who covers the two-octave range with comfort and resonance.

Despite the driven quality of Minkowski's performance, especially in the high dramatic music of the latter part of the opera, the sheer passion of this set does give it claims to be considered first choice. The admirable McGegan performance is possibly a safer buy, and in some respects it is a more stylish performance, but the singing here, Lynne Dawson's above all, is on balance superior.

Arminio

Arminio
Vivica Genaux sop Arminio; Geraldine McGreevy 🄿 sop Tusnelda; Dominique Labelle sop Sigismondo; Manuela Custer mez Ramise; Luigi Petroni ten Varo; Syste Buwalda counterten Tullio; Riccardo Ristori bass Segeste
Il Complesso Barocco / Alan Curtis
Virgin Veritas ② VCD5 45461-2 Ⓕ
(147 minutes: DDD). Notes, text and translation included. Recorded 2000

On the evidence of this very fine recording Arminio can stand among the best of the Handel operas, full of beautiful and imaginative things. The first number, a minor-key duet largely in dialogue for Arminio and his wife Tusnelda, is done with an intensity and vitality that immediately involves you in the action. In Act 2 a series of more expansive arias unfolds: a pair for Arminio, one noble and the other furious, a striking one, austerely scored for Tusnelda, a more playful piece for Arminio's sister Ramise, and a spacious one – also almost an oboe concerto movement – for Sigismondo. This sequence is crowned by a sombre aria for Arminio, with hints of a music that clearly foreshadows 'He was despised', and a soft-textured, sensuous siciliana aria for Tusnelda. This is musically one of Handel's finest acts.

The performance is excellently directed by Alan Curtis, who paces the opera well, keeping the recitative moving and characterising the arias clearly. Sometimes his articulation is a shade exaggerated. Dominique Labelle is of star quality, delicate, precise, rhythmic, powerful where she needs to be. The lower castrato part, the title-role, is sung by Vivica Genaux, whose focused, slightly grainy voice serves ideally – there is singing of real brilliance here. Geraldine McGreevy gives a lot of pleasure too with her commanding singing in the prima donna role. Arminio isn't of the stamp of, say, Giulio Cesare or Alcina, but it has a lot of splendid music in it and is hugely enjoyable. Recommended.

Athalia

Awards 1987

Joan Sutherland sop Athalia; Emma Kirkby sop Josabeth; Aled Jones treb Joas; James Bowman counterten Joad; Anthony Rolfe Johnson ten Mathan; David Thomas bass Abner; New College Choir, Oxford; Academy of Ancient Music / Christopher Hogwood 🄿
L'Oiseau-Lyre ② 417 126-2OH2 Ⓕ
(122 minutes: DDD). Notes and text included
Recorded 1985 ooo

Athalia, composed for Oxford in 1733 to a libretto that draws on Racine's play, tells of the usurping, apostate Jewish queen, Athalia, and her overthrow when the prophet Joad and his wife Josabeth bring the true heir, the boy Joas, to the throne. The action is feebly handled by Handel's librettist, Samuel Humphreys; but several of the characters are quite strong and Handel grasps the opportunities offered him for striking music.

Athalia fares best of all, musically, as one would expect; and it was a brilliant stroke of imagination to ask Joan Sutherland to take the role here. She is a great Handelian, but is scarcely a figure one expects to see in early-music circles. In the event, the slight disparity of approach between her and the other members of the cast serves ideally to symbolise the separation of Athalia from her fellow-Israelites. Sutherland uses more vibrato than the others in the cast, but the singing is truly magnificent in its grandeur and its clear, bell-like, perfectly focused tone. Among the rest, Emma Kirkby is on her very best form, singing coolly, with poised musicianship, and with quite astonishing technical command at times. James Bowman, as Joad, has his moments, and always sounds well. David Thomas is dependable in the often very vigorous music for the priest, Abner; and as Athalia's priest, Mathan, Anthony Rolfe Johnson sings in shapely fashion. The boy Joas is sung, as it should be, by a boy, in this case Aled Jones, who gives a very controlled, exact performance, perhaps rather careful but of intense tonal beauty. The choral singing is a little variable. At its best, for example in the chorus that opens the Second Act, it is first-rate, spirited, forthright and accurate, but in certain of the others there is an air of the routine. There is much good, crisp orchestral playing, though some of the AAM's less positive characteristics are evident: an occasional moment of unsure ensemble, and a lack of broad shaping. These are however perfectionist quibbles: these two discs, excellently recorded, give an admirable and often striking realisation of a choice work.

Flavio

Jeffrey Gall counterten Flavio; Derek Lee Ragin 🄿 counterten Guido; Lena Lootens sop Emilia; Bernarda Fink contr Teodata; Christina Högman sop Vitige; Gianpaolo Fagotto ten Ugone; Ulrich Messthaler bass Lotario
Ensemble 415 / René Jacobs
Harmonia Mundi ② HMX290 1312/3
(156 minutes: DDD). Notes, text and translation Ⓜ included. Recorded 1989

Flavio is one of the most delectable of Handel's operas. Although it comes from his 'heroic' period, it is rather an ironic tragedy with a good many comic elements. Does that sound confusing? – well, so it is, for you never know quite where you are when King Flavio of Lombardy starts falling in love with the wrong woman; this starts as an amusing idle fancy but develops into something near-tragic, since he imperils everyone else's happiness, ultimately causing the death of one counsellor and the dishonour of another. The delicately drawn amorous feeling is like nothing else in Handel, and in its subtle growth towards real passion and grief is handled with consummate skill. The opera, in short, is full of fine and exceptionally varied music, and it is enhanced here by a performance under René Jacobs that, although it takes a number of modest liberties, catches the moods of the music surely and attractively, with shapely, alert and refined playing from the admirable Ensemble 415. And the cast is strong. The central roles, composed for two of Handel's greatest singers, Cuzzoni and Senesino, 18th-century superstars, are sung by Lena Lootens, a delightfully natural and expressive soprano with a firm, clear technique, and the countertenor Derek Lee Ragin, who dispatches his brilliant music with aplomb and excels in the final aria, a superb minor-key expression of passion. The singers also include Bernarda Fink as the lightly amorous Teodata and Christina Högman, both fiery and subtle in the music for her lover, and the capable Jeffrey Gall as the wayward monarch. Altogether a highly enjoyable set, not flawless but certainly among the best Handel opera recordings.

Giulio Cesare

Awards 1992

Jennifer Larmore mez Giulio Cesare; Barbara Schlick sop Cleopatra; Bernarda Fink mez Cornelia; Marianne Rørholm mez Sextus; Derek Lee Ragin counterten Ptolemy; Furio Zanasi bass Achillas; Olivier Lallouette bar Curio; Dominique Visse counterten Nirenus P
Concerto Cologne / René Jacobs
Harmonia Mundi ③ HMX290 1385/7 (243 minutes: DDD). Notes, text and translation included Ⓜ
Recorded 1991 ●●●

Handel's greatest heroic opera sports no fewer than eight principal characters and one of the largest orchestras he ever used. Undoubtedly this, and the singing of Francesca Cuzzoni (Cleopatra) and Senesino (Caesar), helped to launch Giulio Cesare into the enduring popularity that it enjoys to this day. But it is primarily the quality of the music, with barely a weak number in four hours of entertainment, that has made it such a favourite with audiences. Here the period instruments are an immediate advantage in giving extra 'bite' to the many moments of high drama without threatening to drown the singers in forte passages.

This performance is a particularly fine one with an excellent cast; Caesar, originally sung by a castrato, is here taken by the young mezzo, Jennifer Larmore. She brings weight and integrity to the role, seemingly untroubled by the demands of the final triumphant aria, 'Qual torrente'. Occasionally her vibrato becomes intrusive, but that is a minor quibble in a performance of this stature. Handel could just as well have called his opera 'Cleopatra' as it is she who is the pivotal element in the drama, a role taken here by Barbara Schlick and sung with acuity and imagination. If Cleopatra represents strength in a woman, then Cornelia is surely the tragic figure, at the mercy of events. Her first aria, 'Priva son', here taken very slowly, shows Bernarda Fink to be more than equal to the role, admirable in her steady tone and dignity of character. Derek Lee Ragin's treacherous Ptolemy is also memorable, venom and fire injected into his agile voice.

A first-rate cast is supported by René Jacobs and Concerto Cologne on fine form, though the continuo line is sometimes less than ideally clear. The recording is excellent.

Julius Caesar (sung in English: ed Mackerras)
Dame Janet Baker mez Giulio Cesare; Valerie Masterson sop Cleopatra; Sarah Walker mez Cornelia; Della Jones mez Sextus; James Bowman counterten Ptolemy; John Tomlinson bass Achilles; Christopher Booth-Jones bar Curio; David James counterten Nirenus; English National Opera Chorus and Orchestra / Sir Charles Mackerras
Chandos Opera in English Series ③ CHAN3019 Ⓕ
(183 minutes: DDD). Notes and English text included
Recorded 1984 ●

This opera was a personal triumph for Dame Janet. As Caesar, she arms the voice with an impregnable firmness, outgoing and adventurous. Valerie Masterson shares the honours with Dame Janet, a Cleopatra whose bright voice gains humanity through ordeal. The tinkle of surface-wear clears delightfully in her later arias, sung with a pure tone and high accomplishment. As a total production, Julius Caesar was an outstanding achievement in ENO's history. Strongly cast, it had a noble Cornelia in Sarah Walker, a high-spirited Sesto in Della Jones, and in James Bowman a Ptolemy whose only fault was that his voice lacked meanness of timbre appropriate to the odious character. John Tomlinson's massive bass also commands attention. At the time of this recording the cuts and adaptations in the texts were severely condemned in some quarters. Mackerras's conducting is impeccable and the opera is given in clear, creditable English.

Hercules

Hercules, HWV60 P
Gidon Saks bass-bar Hercules; Anne Sofie von Otter mez Dejanira; Richard Croft ten Hyllus; Lynne Dawson sop Iole; David Daniels counterten Lichas; Marcos Pujol bar Priest of Jupiter;
Chœur des Musiciens du Louvre;

Les Musiciens du Louvre / Marc Minkowski
Archiv Produktion ③ 469 532-2AH3 Ⓕ
(176 minutes: DDD). Recorded live in 2000
Notes, texts and translations included ●

Hercules has never quite occupied the place it merits in the Handel canon despite the fact that it includes some of the most powerfully dramatic of all Handel's music. This is certainly understood by Marc Minkowski, and his intentions towards the work are made clear in the opening bars of the Overture. But he is also intent on maintaining its dramatic pace and emphasising its range of feeling.

He has a cast well able to share his dramatic vision. Von Otter excels as Dejanira. This, rather than Hercules himself, is the central role, carrying the work's chief expressive weight. There is some beautifully shaped singing as in her opening air she mourns Hercules' absence, and she copes well with Minkowski's demanding tempo in 'Begone, my fears'. Lynne Dawson makes a delightful Iole, crystalline, airy, rhythmic, but able to call on more intensity where needed. 'My breast with tender pity swells' is truly lovely. Lichas' music is done with refinement but also vigour by David Daniels. Richard Croft, though often hurried by Minkowski, sings much of Hyllus' music with elegance, and his delicate sustained pianissimo in the da capo of 'From celestial seats descending', one of the most inspired pieces in the score, is remarkable.

The choral singing is strong, secure, responsive, though the French choir are rather less euphonious than the best English ones. The orchestral playing is duly alert. This account benefits from fewer cuts than his rival Gardiner and superior solo singing. It doesn't much matter which you have, but it's not a work to be without.

Orlando

Patricia Bardon mez Orlando; Rosemary Joshua sop Angelica; Hilary Summers contr Medoro; Rosa Mannion sop Dorinda; Harry van der Kamp bass Zoroastro
Les Arts Florissants / William Christie
Erato ③ 0630-14636-2 (168 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, text and translation included. Recorded 1996

Christie is very much concerned with a smooth and generally rich texture and with delicacy of rhythmic shaping. His management of the recitative could hardly be bettered and moments of urgency or of other kinds of emotional stress are tellingly handled. Sometimes he favours a rather sustained style in the arias, making the textures seem airless and heavy, and the lines within them too smooth. However, to set against it there is his exceptional delicacy of timing, his careful but always natural-sounding moulding of cadences and other critical moments in the score. Not many Handel interpreters show this kind of regard for such matters and it is certainly a delight to hear Handel's music so lovingly nurtured; also, of course, it helps the singers to convey meaning. The cast is very strong. The title-role is taken by a mezzo, Patricia Bardon, who draws a very firm and often slender line, with that gleam in her tone that can so enliven the impact of a lowish mezzo – the famous Mad scene is magnificent. The Sleep scene, with very sweet, soft-toned playing of the violette marine, is lovely.

Hilary Summers offers a very sensitively sung Medoro, pure and shapely in line. Harry van der Kamp makes a finely weighty Zoroastro, with plenty of resonance in his lower register; the last aria in particular is done in rousing fashion. As Angelica, Rosemary Joshua's musicianship comes through in her attractive phrasing and timing. Rosa Mannion's Dorinda is no less full of delights, catching the character to perfection. Hogwood's lighter orchestral textures are appealing but the refinement of detail in the newer set is equally admirable.

Rinaldo

Awards 2001

David Daniels counterten Rinaldo; Cecilia Bartoli mez Almirena; Gerald Finley bar Argante; Luba Orgonasova sop Armida; Bejun Mehta counterten Christian Sorcerer; Mark Padmore ten Herald; Daniel Taylor counterten Eustazio; Bernarda Fink contr Goffredo; Catherine Bott sop Siren I; Ana-Maria Rincón sop Donna; Siren II; Academy of Ancient Music / Christopher Hogwood
Decca L'Oiseau-Lyre ③ 467 087-2OHO3 Ⓕ
(179 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1999 ●●●

In a sense, Rinaldo is at once Handel's most familiar and unfamiliar opera: familiar because, as his lavish first stage work for London, it has been much written about both by modern historians and by the composer's contemporaries; unfamiliar because the Handel opera revival of recent years has largely passed it by. Although there are numerous recordings of its two hit slow arias – 'Lascia ch'io pianga' and 'Cara sposa' – this is its first complete studio recording for over 20 years. It may not be Handel's most dramatically effective work (Act 3 marks time rather), and its magic effects and transformation scenes no doubt make it a tricky prospect for opera companies, but in many ways its rich orchestration and impressive set-piece arias make it an opera ideal for recording. That much makes this release a welcome sight already; add the de luxe cast Decca has assembled for the purpose and it begins to look irresistible.

Top of the bill come David Daniels as the eponymous crusader knight and Cecilia Bartoli as his love Almirena. Daniels' heart-stopping countertenor voice is one of the marvels of our age. It is not big, and though he is technically untroubled by the virtuoso runs of the quicker arias, some may feel that it lacks some of the heroic power expected of a warrior; but there is an inner strength to it, and in the love music he is utterly convincing. Bartoli is equally impressive in her own way, though her singing is less well suited to Handel. Of course, she can deliver the most demanding music with almost frightening ease and force and, as ever, she throws herself into her role, but one cannot not help thinking that a more natural and unaffected style would have been more appropriate for arias such as 'Lascia ch'io pianga' and 'Augeletti che cantate'. Others may disagree.

The rest of the cast is almost unwaveringly strong. Daniel Taylor is slightly less technically secure or forceful than the others (which is hardly a criticism), but he does well enough with what is the opera's least effective role as Goffredo's brother Eustazio.

Christopher Hogwood's direction is typically neat and good-mannered. He is not, dare one say, a natural opera conductor – others may have found more magic in the enchanted gardens and more sensuality in the sirens who lure Rinaldo, and you sometimes get the feeling that he is rushing the singers at important moments – but he has an unerring sense of tempo and the opera as a whole is well paced. The Academy of Ancient Music plays to a high standard, backed up by a startlingly virtuoso performance (by the tape editor?) on the Drottningholm thunder machine and by some genuine birdsong at the beginning of Act 2.

Competition for this recording consists of Jean-Claude Malgoire's pioneering 1977 account, and from a performance recorded live under John Fisher in 1989. The latter is notable for having an impressive Marilyn Horne in the title-role, but little else. The former is altogether a better piece of work – it features notable singing from, among others, Carolyn Watkinson as Rinaldo and Ileana Cotrubas as Almirena – but it suffers some less distinguished contributions lower down the cast, and in general it treads a bit too carefully throughout. Decca's newcomer may not be the last word on the opera, but for all-round standard of performance and production it currently wins hands down and it will take some beating.

Rodelinda

Sophie Daneman sop Rodelinda; Daniel Taylor counterten Bertarido; Adrian Thompson ten Grimoaldo; Catherine Robbin mez Eduige; Robin Blaze counterten Unulfo; Christopher Purves bass Garibaldo; Raglan Baroque Players / Nicholas Kraemer hpd P
Virgin Classics Veritas ③ 545277-2 Ⓕ
(173 minutes: DDD). Notes, text and translation included. Recorded 1996 ●

Composed just after Giulio Cesare and Tamerlano, Rodelinda must rank in many people's top half-dozen of the Handel operas, with its complex plot of dynastic intrigue revolving around the powerful, steadfast love of Bertarido (the ousted king of Milan) and his queen Rodelinda: just the kind that unfailingly drew strong music from Handel. Nicholas Kraemer gives a very direct and unaffected reading of this score. The pacing is sensible, if anything slightly on the slow side, especially perhaps in the recitative; the playing of the Raglan Baroque Players is alive and rhythmically well sprung, with a firmly defined bass-line. There is some modest ornamentation in the da capo sections of the arias.

What you don't get very strongly is much sense of urgency or boldness, of an unfolding drama, or indeed of the musical characterisation of individual numbers. There is just a hint here of the 'concert in costume'. Its star is Sophie Daneman. The voice is bright and intense, very firm in focus, dead sure in pitch, with only the faintest and most discriminatingly used hint of vibrato. It is ideally suited to Rodelinda's character, as the poignant singing of her lovely, elegiac opening aria makes clear – and that is immediately followed by a defiant one, vigorously thrown off. Adrian Thompson is also particularly enjoyable as the would-be usurper Grimoaldo. Thompson's easy and natural delivery, his natural feeling for the shape of Handel's phrases and his elegant manner make all his music a pleasure to listen to, and perhaps especially his final aria, which is a delight.

Catherine Robbin sings Eduige's music with spirit and rhythmic life. The two castrato roles, Bertarido and Unulfo, are taken by countertenors. Daniel Taylor is a very accomplished singer, even-toned and accurate, well able to realise the pathos of Bertarido's prison scene, and the famous 'Dove sei' is touchingly done. But this role was written for Senesino, one of the great expressive singers of his day, and Taylor (or indeed the countertenor voice) isn't quite capable of conveying emotion on the scale the music demands. Unulfo's rather smaller part is neatly and clearly done – and some exceedingly awkward passagework is surely negotiated in his Act 1 aria – by Robin Blaze, although the general effect is rather bland.

This may not be the most dramatic of Handel opera recordings, but it gives an excellent account of the music and there is some first-rate singing – and in one of the very finest and most compelling of the Handel operas.

Rodrigo

Rodrigo (ed Curtis) P
Gloria Banditelli mez Rodrigo; Sandrine Piau sop Esilena; Elena Cecchi Fedi sop Florinda; Rufus Müller ten Giuliano; Roberta Invernizzi sop Evanco; Caterina Calvi mez Fernando; Il Complesso Barocco / Alan Curtis hpd
Virgin Classics Veritas ② 545897-2 Ⓕ
(155 minutes: DDD). Notes, text and translation included. Recorded 1997

The music of Handel's Italian years has a unique freshness, a boldness of invention, a novelty in textures and lines – characteristics which distinguish his first Italian opera, Rodrigo, written in 1707 for the Medici court at Florence. This recording restores all that survives of the lyrical music, with one item composed in a more-or-less Handelian manner by Curtis and other Handel music imported to fit the original text. Curiously, the dances are not included here, and – presumably in the interest of keeping the set to two CDs – there are many large cuts in the recitative. As a result some quite important sections are omitted and the often very close succession of lyrical numbers gives a slightly misleading impression of the opera. Even so the recording of this fine, often very moving and mostly inspiriting piece is warmly welcome.

Like most Italian operas of its time, it is essentially a succession of arias, mostly shorter ones than those of Handel's mature operas. As so often with Handel, much of the finest music comes in Act 2, with a pair of arias for Esilena (the second a furious outburst), and at the beginning of the next act, with Rodrigo and Esilena apparently facing death, Handel finds that marvellous vein of pathos familiar in his later operas. Alan Curtis, a man of the theatre, keeps the score moving along at a good pace. He conducts, as it were, from a 17th-century standpoint, with a flexibility over accent and metre that allows the music to move unusually freely. Yet he is rather predictable in his use of cadential rallentandos, and there are points where the orchestral discipline is a shade loose.

Sandrine Piau sings Esilena's part beautifully, with much attention to detail, to timing and to phrasing, as well as with fluency and with a richness of tone unusual for her. Gloria Banditelli makes a sturdy Rodrigo, direct and accurate, and very controlled in the fast semiquaver passages. Elena Cecchi Fedi perhaps overdoes the characterisation of Florinda as a shrew, singing shrilly at times and with rather more shouting and pouting than is consistent with musical enjoyment. But the singing is powerful and brilliant in its way. There is competent and spirited playing from Il Complesso Barocco, and there are excellent notes from Anthony Hicks and Curtis.

Serse

Judith Malafronte mez Serse; Jennifer Smith sop Romilda; Brian Asawa counterten Arsamene; Susan Bickley mez Amastre; Lisa Milne sop Atalanta; Dean Ely bar Ariodate; David Thomas bass Elviro 🄿
Hanover Band and Chorus / Nicholas McGegan
Conifer Classics ③ 75605 51312-2 Ⓕ
(177 minutes: DDD). Notes, text and translation included. Recorded 1997

Handel's Serse has proved to be one of the most popular of his operas over recent years – certainly in England. Wit may not be a part of most people's image of Handel's operas, and rightly: but from time to time, and especially when he was using a libretto of Venetian origins, Handel and his London librettists permitted themselves touches of ironic humour and sometimes rather more than that – Serse has one truly comic character, a servant, and King Xerxes himself is in some degree made a figure of fun by his unruly amorous whims. But as in all the best comedy, the situations give rise to serious emotion too, and in Act 2 of Serse, when events provoke first Xerxes, then Romilda (whom he thinks he loves) and then Amastre (who loves him) into forceful expressions of passion, touchingly followed by a gentle aria from Xerxes's brother Arsamene (Romilda's true lover), the music springs into real life and enters more than a purely entertaining plane. Otherwise, however, it is inclined to be elegant, thin-textured and short-breathed. Although the cast here isn't obviously starry it is evenly accomplished and the performance holds together very well under Nicholas McGegan's assured direction. His own personal touch is unmistakable – the light textures, quickish tempos, spruce rhythms, dapper cadences, faintly ironic tone – and it works well for this opera, perhaps better than it does for a big heroic piece. The soloists are exemplary, too. This set must surely be the choice for anyone wanting a stylish version of this lively and appealing work.

Teseo

Eirian James mez Teseo; Julia Gooding sop Agilea; Della Jones mez Medea: Derek Lee Ragin counterten Egeo; Catherine Napoli sop Clizia; Jeffrey Gall counterten Arcane; François Bazola bar Sacerdote di Minerva 🄿
Les Musiciens du Louvre / Marc Minkowski
Erato ② 2292-45806-2 (148 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1992

Teseo was Handel's third opera for London, given at the beginning of 1713. Exceptionally, its libretto was based on a French original, written by Quinault for Lully; it is a spectacular piece, in five acts, with Medea (after the events of Médée) and Theseus (before the events of Hippolyte or the Ariadne operas) as its central characters. It is Medea who, as slighted lover and jealous sorceress, provides the principal musical thrills; but the score is, in any case, an unusually rich and inventive one, with much colourful orchestral writing even before she turns up at the beginning of Act 2. When she does, she introduces herself with a Largo aria, 'Dolce riposo', of a kind unique to Handel in its depth of poetic feeling, with a vocal line full of bold leaps above throbbing strings and an oboe obbligato; but, lest we should think her docile, Medea hints at her true colours in the ensuing C minor aria, and by the end of the act she is singing furious recitative and fiery, incisive lines – real sorceress music. Her biggest scene comes at the start of the final act, a Presto vengeance aria, packed with raging rapid semiquavers. Handel scored the opera for a more varied orchestra than usual; there are recorders, flutes, oboes, bassoons and trumpets called for. The arias themselves tend to be rather shorter than usual for Handel. The work needs first-rate singing, and by and large receives it here. The role of Medea falls to Della Jones, a singer with a superb technique and a remarkable ability to identify with the role; she truly lives Medea's part and brings to it great resources of spirit and technique. Except when allowed to play too fast, too loudly or too coarsely, the Musiciens du Louvre are impressive. Several numbers are accompanied with only a continuo instrument, to good effect. The recitative always moves well, and appoggiaturas are duly observed.

Howard Hanson American 1896-1981

GROVE Hanson studied with Goetschius in New York and became director of the Eastman School (1924-64), where he was an influential teacher and founded the Institute of American music; he also promoted modern American music through his work as a conductor. His own music shows the influence of Sibelius, Grieg and Respighi (his teacher in Rome in the early 1920s). Among his works are seven symphonies, symphonic poems, choral pieces, chamber and piano music and songs.

Symphonies

Symphonies – No 2, Op 30, 'Romantic'; No 4, Op 34, 'The Requiem'. Elegy in memory of Serge Koussevitzky
Jena Philharmonic Orchestra / David Montgomery
Arte Nova Classics 74321 43306-2 Ⓢ
(60 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1996 ●

Here is enticingly off-the-beaten-track repertory from this new super-budget label. The Fourth (Requiem) was apparently Hanson's own favourite of his seven symphonies. Inscribed 'in memory of my beloved father', it is a darkly intense, neo-Sibelian outpouring which won the composer the first Pulitzer Prize given to music in 1944. The tuneful, opulently scored Romantic (No 2) has remained a firm favourite with American orchestras and audiences since its première in November 1930 under Serge Koussevitzky. More recently, its use on the soundtrack of the 1979 feature-film Alien won Hanson an entirely new band of admirers. The Elegy (1956) is a supremely touching memorial to a close friend and great conductor to whom American music this century owes an incontestably profound debt of gratitude. Performances are capable and shapely, and the sound is very good too.

The orchestra responds with plenty of enthusiasm to David Montgomery who knows his way round these scores. That said, nothing here poses a serious challenge to Gerard Schwarz and the splendid Seattle Symphony in terms of orchestral finesse or interpretative insight: Montgomery's provincial band inevitably don't possess the ingratiating tonal lustre and sheer muscle of their American counterparts, while Schwarz's direction displays just that little bit of extra commitment to the cause. None the less, at its absurdly low price, this issue will find many new friends for Hanson's ripely romantic vision.

Symphony No 1 in E minor, 'Nordic', Op 21. Merry Mount Suite. Pan and the Priest, Op 26. Rhythmic Variations on Two Ancient Hymns
Nashville Symphony Orchestra / Kenneth Schermerhorn
Naxos 8 559072 (61 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ

Another Hanson landmark in the unstoppable Naxos series, American Classics. The least-known piece here is the Rhythmic Variations, considered lost until recently and cited as such in the New American Grove. This seems distinctly careless of someone, since Hanson recorded this late work himself in 1977. It is serenely spacious, utterly diatonic but no great rediscovery.

The Nordic Symphony was completed when Hanson was in Rome studying with Respighi – stylistically it brings Sibelius south to Italy. The Nashville performance can be compared with the Seattle orchestra under that fine Hanson interpreter, Gerard Schwarz. Schermerhorn is more spacious, taking a good two minutes longer overall – no bad thing in such hyperactive music as it constantly strives towards the next climax. Schwarz is faster in the final Allegro but both performances are exciting and well recorded: the issue is settled by coupling and, of course, price.

There are many attractive features in the Merry Mount Suite – Charleston syncopation in the 'Children's Dance' and characteristic Hanson harmony oscillating between two chords at the start of the ecstatic 'Love Duet'. All supremely operatic but the stage work still remains in limbo. Pan and the Priest, a vivid symphonic poem reaching pagan intensity, completes a bargain Hanson package that's well recorded, too.

Symphonies – Nos 2, 4 and 6; No 7, 'A Sea Symphony'. Fantasy Variations on a Theme of Youth. Elegy in memory of Serge Koussevitzky. Serenade, Op 36. Mosaics
Carol Rosenberger pf New York Chamber Symphony Orchestra; Seattle Symphony Chorale and Orchestra / Gerard Schwarz
Delos ② DE3705 (136 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1988-92 ●

Gerard Schwarz's red-blooded 1988 account of the Second Symphony (Romantic) remains a match for any rival. Schwarz and his excellent Seattle band do full justice to its dark opulence, concision and organic power. Similarly, there's no missing the communicative ardour and clean-limbed security of Schwarz's lucid reading of the Sixth. Commissioned in 1967 by the New York Philharmonic for their 185th anniversary season, it boasts a formidable thematic economy and intriguing formal scheme of which Hanson himself was justifiably proud. Its successor, A Sea Symphony from 1977, sets texts from Walt Whitman's Leaves of Grass. In the unashamedly jubilant finale Hanson fleetingly quotes from his Romantic Symphony of more than four decades earlier: it is a spine-tingling moment in a score of consummate assurance and stirring aspiration. Schwarz's traversal finds the Seattle Symphony Chorale on rousing form. We also get exemplary renderings of the pretty 1945 Serenade for flute, harp and strings (a gift for Hanson's wife-to-be, Margaret Elizabeth Nelson) and characteristically inventive Fantasy Variations on a Theme of Youth from 1951 (with Carol Rosenberger a deft soloist), both these featuring Schwarz directing the New York Chamber Symphony. The present warm-hearted accounts of both the Elegy in memory of Serge Koussevitzky and Mosaics (which is a highly appealing set of variations written in 1957 for Szell and the Cleveland Orchestra) need not fear comparison with the composer's own Mercury recordings. The engineering is wonderfully ripe.

Solo Piano Works

Sonata in A minor, Op 11. Two Yuletide Pieces, Op 19. Poèmes érotiques, Op 9. Three Miniatures, Op 12. Three Etudes, Op 18. Enchantment. For the First Time. Slumber Song
Thomas Labé pf
Naxos 8 559047 (76 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1999

Much of this CD is an orgy of romantic piano music. Admirers of Hanson's Romantic Symphony (Arte Nova) or his one-time smash-hit opera Merry Mount (Naxos) will surely devour this collection, which includes unknown and unpublished music. A first impression is that the earliest works here, written around 1920, have the sort of ecstatic luxuriance that might be expected of a pupil of Respighi. But this influence came later since Hanson didn't start his three-year residence in Rome until 1921. His background was Swedish and there's a Nordic, Sibelian intensity about his whole approach, although the fulsome piano style clearly stems from Liszt.

The earliest piece is probably the Slumber Song, a pure salon morsel, and the latest is the suite For the First Time; this is known in Hanson's still current 1962 orchestral recording (Mercury), but the restrained piano version (1970) works admirably in the Schumann-to-MacDowell tradition of an extended set of character pieces. The three Poèmes érotiques (the fourth has disappeared) are what Hanson called his 'first studied attempt at psychological writing'. They are powerful in a surging melodic style where in several pieces the climaxes stem from an almost Tchaikovskian cathartic need to unburden tensions.

The striking three-movement Sonata (1918) has had to be completed from the composer's shorthand by Thomas Labé since it was never published, although Hanson performed it in 1919. The vivid improvisatory keyboard writing, at times extravagantly rhetorical, causes Labé to hit the piano rather hard in the last two movements. One can understand his enthusiasm, but there are times when a little more cantabile might have helped. However, nothing must detract from the real service that this CD does in bringing Hanson's piano music to public attention for the first time.

Merry Mount

Lawrence Tibbett bar Wrestling Bradford; Göta Ljungberg sop Lady Marigold Sandys; Gladys Swarthout mez Plentiful Tewke; Edward Johnson ten Sir Gower Lackland; Alfredo Gandolfi bar Myles Brodrib; Giordano Paltrinieri ten Jonathan Banks; Arnold Gabor bar Faint-not-Tinker; James Wolfe sngr Samoset; Irra Petina mez Desire Annable; Louis d'Angelo bar Praise-God-Tewke 🄷
Chorus and Orchestra of the Metropolitan Opera, New York / Tullio Serafin
Naxos Historical mono ② 8 110024/5 Ⓑ
(126 minutes: ADD). Recorded live in 1934 ●

Hanson's only opera was a considerable success when first given. This is the first opportunity to register the impact of the entire opera. The recording itself is a lucky scoop taken from 78rpm acetate and metal discs of the broadcast originally in the possession of Tibbett. No doubt technical wonders have been worked on the original sound but the result is still patchy, although, with announcements, commentary and applause included, the recording has a powerful sense of occasion. The story started with a grisly episode in New England history (about 1625) concerning feuding Puritan and Cavalier colonists. This was made the basis of a slender short story by Nathaniel Hawthorne and considerably embroidered in a libretto by Richard L Stokes, which was published separately before the opera had even been staged. The crowd scenes gave Hanson the opportunity to write some magnificent choruses, and the dances before the maypole in Act 2 (scene 1) were so exciting at this première that they stopped the show. When Bradford gives his soul to the devil (scene 3) the choral and orchestral panoply is as vivid as anything in the Shakespeare film scores of Walton, and similar in style.

Tibbett is magisterial in conveying all the horrors of repressive Puritanism souring into devil-worship but Göta Ljungberg (Marigold/Astoreth) is resplendent in her lyrical role, specially the climactic Act 3 lament (track 14). Their joint immolation must have made a convincing peroration on stage, judging by the reports of 50 curtain calls. What is remarkable is that a composer with so little experience in the theatre could deliver such an operatic grand opera. It has everything opera houses normally – like star roles, crowd scenes, violence and spectacle.

This is a very worthwhile release and let's hope it leads to a revival.

Karl Amadeus Hartmann

German 1905-1963

GROVE Hartmann studied with Haas at the Munich Academy (1924-27), with Scherchen and with Webern (1941-42). After the war he started the Musica Viva festival in Munich to present music that had been banned during the Nazi years, and most of his published works date from after this period. They include most importantly a cycle of eight symphonies (1936, 1946, 1947, 1949, 1950, 1953, 1958, 1962), which have a Brucknerian breadth while suggesting the influences of Reger, Berg, Stravinsky, Bartók and Blacher. He also wrote several concertos and vocal music including a chamber opera Simplicius Simplicissimus (1949), a strongly expressive work combining popular song, chorale and psalm-like recitation with symphonic method.

Symphonies

Symphonies – Nos 1[a], 2 – Adagio[b], 3[c], 4-6[b], 7 (1957-58)[d] and 8[b]. Gesangsszene (1963)
Doris Soffel contr Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau bar
Bavarian Radio Symphony Orchestra / [a]Fritz Rieger, [b]Rafael Kubelík, [c]Ferdinand Leitner, [d]Zdenek Macal Ⓕ
Wergo ④ WER60187-50 (225 minutes: ADD) ●

In the 1930s Hartmann was beginning to establish a reputation, but was forced to withdraw himself and his works from public musical life as a known opponent of the Nazi regime. During the war he destroyed or radically revised most of his output up till then, and these eight symphonies (five of which are based on, or are revisions of, earlier works) appeared between 1946 and his death in 1963. Together they show his broad sympathies with the 20th-century masters.

You can hear the presence of Bruckner in the monumental sense of structure, of Reger in the densely chromatic counterpoint and an intense, tortured lyricism derived from Berg. There is a tribute to the neo-classical Stravinsky in the Fifth Symphony, and more than a hint of Bartók in the irresistible momentum of the fugues that conclude the Sixth. Mahler is present in the Whitman settings of the First Symphony, significantly entitled 'Attempt at a Requiem' and in the upheavals of the first movement of the Eighth. The spectral Funeral March in Webern's Pieces, Op 6, haunts sections of the First, Third and Eighth Symphonies.

Whether Hartmann managed to forge a demonstrably personal idiom is questionable. What is indisputable is the power of his music to communicate, and its capacity to fascinate. On the debit side, not all the vigorously contrapuntal sections of the later works avoid sounding academic. The dates of these live recordings are not given, but they are all naturally balanced, with excellent clarity – Hartmann's torrents of tuned percussion are thrillingly captured, and the orchestra plays with polish and conviction.

Symphony No 4. Concerto funèbre[a].
Chamber Concerto[b]
[a]Isabelle Faust vn [b]Paul Meyer cl [b]Petersen Quartet (Conrad Muck, Gernot Sussmuth vns Friedemann Weigle va Hans-Jakob Eschenburg vc)
Munich Chamber Orchestra / Christoph Poppen
ECM New Series 465 779-2 (78 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

When Hartmann opted for internal exile during the Nazi era, he took with him some key influences from the free musical world. Beam up around 0'33" into the third movement of the 1939 Concerto funèbre and you have a virtual quote from the first movement of Bartók's 1934 Fifth String Quartet. Hartmann completed his Chamber Concerto for Clarinet, String Quartet and String Orchestra in 1935, seven years after Bartók wrote his Fourth Quartet – which in turn barges headlong into Hartmann's second movement (0'07" into track 9, an unmistakable reference to the Quartet's finale).

In the Chamber Concerto the melodic and structural profile of the first movement follows the profile of Kodály's 1933 Dances of Galánta (try following through from 1'09" until around 3'22" into track 8, taking particular note of the clarinet line). The language of the work is Magyar-inspired (even aside from the Galánta references) and the scoring lively and luminous.

The Concerto funèbre opens with a quotation (fully acknowledged this time) of the Hussite chorale 'Ye Who are God's Warriors', best known to Brits for its use in Smetana's Má vlast. The reference commemorates the Nazi betrayal of Czechoslovakia, though Hartmann's anger finds controlled expression in the Allegro di molto third movement.

The Fourth Symphony is scored for strings and frames a lively Allegro di molto with two profound Adagios that, again, draw you in by virtue of their intense arguments. All three performances do Hartmann proud. Isabelle Faust's eloquent playing of the Concerto funèbre draws maximum effect from extremes in mood and temperature and outplays her rivals, while Rafael Kubelík offers an admirably pliant live account of the Fourth Symphony, and while Ingo Metzmacher's Fourth is occasionally more intense than this version under Christoph Poppen (especially in the unison opening pages), Poppen's central Allegro has the stronger sense of propulsion.

With fine sound and programming, this is the ideal Hartmann primer.

Symphony No 6

Hartmann Symphony No 6
Bruckner Symphony No 6 in A
South West German Radio Symphony Orchestra / Ferdinand Leitner
Hänssler Faszination Musik 93 051 Ⓕ
(80 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1982 ●

'Truth prepared by joy and bound up with sorrow' was the motto of the distinguished German symphonist Karl Amadeus Hartmann (1905-63). Nazism and war blighted his career yet fired his imagination, as we can hear in the brief, thrilling and often moving Sixth Symphony which Ferdinand Leitner conducts here with rare acumen and power.

The Sixth Symphony, premièred by Jochum in 1953 and recorded by Fricsay in 1955, is in two movements: an at times apocalyptic but ultimately serene slow opening movement and a searing Toccata variata in which two of the three fugue subjects are variants of the first. If there are influences to be found, they are Berg in the first movement, Bartók in the second. This is white-knuckle-ride music, though the ride itself has you looking at the stars.

Leitner's performance eclipses all current rivals, not least because the recording is itself a tour de force. Leitner and his engineers place timpani, piano and xylophone with pin-point accuracy, further ensuring that the music's explosive force is generated from within, not imposed from without.

Leitner's Bruckner has grand moments but some less-than-convincing times in between. He is good on headlines, less good on argument and fine detail. Nevertheless, this disc is worth the price for the Hartmann alone.

Sir Hamilton Harty

Irish 1879-1941

GROVE Harty held organist's posts in Ireland and in 1900 moved to London. After early success as a composer and accompanist he turned to conducting, working with the LSO and becoming conductor of the Hallé Orchestra, 1920-33; he gave new British music and British premières of Strauss, Mahler (including the Ninth Symphony) and Shostakovich. He then worked with London orchestras. He was a noted Berlioz interpreter and made arrangements of popular Handel works; his own compositions include an attractive Irish Symphony, a Violin Concerto, chamber and vocal works, some written for his wife, the soprano Agnes Nicholls.

An Irish Symphony

An Irish Symphony. In Ireland. With the Wild Geese
National Symphony Orchestra of Ireland / Prionnsías O'Duinn
Naxos 8 554732 (57 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1996 ●

Back in 1996, Chandos cannily repackaged their enterprising and hugely enjoyable Harty series with Bryden Thomson and the Ulster Orchestra at mid-price, the third and final volume of which contains the same three items featured here plus an utterly delightful rendering of the boisterous Comedy Overture for good measure. The two conductors' approaches complement each other well. Thomson brings the greater epic grandeur and narrative flair to With the Wild Geese, yet Prionnsías O'Duinn's rather more urgent reading develops a fine thrust and red-blooded drama in the faster music, while not missing out on the touching melancholy of the lyrical episodes. The Dublin orchestra are on similarly responsive form in An Irish Symphony, of which O'Duinn gives another unmannered, chipper and thoroughly personable account. He imparts a mischievous swagger to 'The Fair Day' (the symphony's impish scherzo) and a likeable vigour to the opening movement, 'On the Shores of Lough Neagh', where he knocks nearly two minutes off Thomson's timing. Perhaps Thomson's more affectionately relaxed manner pays greater dividends in the charming fantasy for flute, harp and orchestra, In Ireland, where the principals from the NSOI have not quite the grace and character of their Belfast counterparts.

Whatever, both discs are thoroughly recommendable, and neither will break the bank! Naxos's production values are first-rate, though Chandos's outstandingly realistic Ulster Hall sound has the edge in terms of airy bloom and sheer sumptuousness.

Jonathan Harvey

British 1939

GROVE Harvey studied at Cambridge, privately with Erwin Stein and Hans Keller, and with Babbitt at Princeton (1969-70). He has taught at the universities of Southampton (1964-77) and Sussex. His early music shows enthusiasms ranging from Britten and Messiaen to Stockhausen and Davies, but since the early 1970s he has developed a more integrated style and has emerged as an outstanding composer of electronic music (Mortuos plango, vivos voco, 1980). Later pieces include Madonna of Winter and Spring (1986).

Madonna of Winter and Spring

Madonna of Winter and Spring[a]. Percussion Concerto[b]. Song Offerings[c]
[c]Penelope Walmsley-Clark sop [b]Peter Prommel perc [ab]Netherlands Radio Philharmonic Orchestra / Peter Eötvös; [c]London Sinfonietta / George Benjamin
Nimbus NI5649 (78 minutes: DDD). Text and translation included. [ac]Recorded 1998 and [b]live in 1997 Ⓕ ●●

This is an impressive disc indeed: a strong cast, a varied programme, and music of great integrity and beauty. In relation to many British scores that have garnered recent critical praise, Harvey more than holds his own. The three pieces – two of them recorded here for the first time – date from the 1980s and '90s. Each introduces a 'foreign' element to the orchestra in a slightly different way. There are elements of the competitive streak between soloist and orchestra in the Percussion Concerto; in Song Offerings relations between the two elements are more symbiotic, as one might expect; but in Madonna of Winter and Spring, the most extended piece here, the 'foreign' element is assumed by synthesisers and electronics. This piece, in particular, sums up Harvey's preoccupations: the interaction of the different media, and the programmatic elements derived from the composer's faith.

At intervals the orchestra recedes, creating electro-acoustic 'windows' reminiscent of similarly mixed-media scores (Birtwistle and Boulez come to mind); at others, individual instruments appear in a quasi-soloistic context, adding an extra dimension to the texture. Moreover, the quality of these interpretations gives this recording a special appeal. The electro-acoustic element is well captured, and conveys something of the spatial imaging mentioned in the composer's insert-notes.

All three pieces receive committed, dynamic interpretations: if only contemporary music could always enjoy such advocacy.

Death of Light / Light of Death

Death of Light/Light of Death. Advaya. Ricercare una melodia (performed on oboe). Ricercare una melodia (performed on trumpet). Tombeau de Messiaen. Wheel of Emptiness
Ictus / Georges-Elie Octors
Cyprès CYP5604 (77 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Three of the compositions on this disc offer ideal introductions to Jonathan Harvey's work, showing how music centering on a single line, or instrument, can evolve into a potently imaginative discourse when that line or instrument is manipulated electronically. In Ricerare una melodia the moment of revelation comes when the electronic material opens out a much wider registral spectrum than that 'naturally' available on the trumpet or oboe. Something similar happens both in the brief Tombeau de Messiaen, where the interaction of piano and electronics unleashes a torrential, joyously uninhibited commemoration of the French master, and also in Advaya. All three of these works have been recorded before, but Harvey enthusiasts should still find it difficult to resist this new release, not only for its outstanding recording quality, but for the interest and substance of the programme as a whole. The disc ends with the most striking evidence of Harvey's versatility. Death of Light/Light of Death is scored for five performers, without electronics, but with the harpist doubling on tam tam. It offers music of an intensity and, in the end, ceremonial solemnity which few composers today can match. With performances of supreme technical assurance and magnificently lucid sound, this is an outstanding disc in every respect.

Choral Works

I love the Lord. Carols. Lauds (with Paul Watkins vc). Sobre un éxtasis alte contemplación. Come, Holy Ghost. O Jesu, nomen dulce. Two Fragments. The Angels. Forms of Emptiness The Joyful Company of Singers / Peter Broadbent
ASV CDDCA917 (63 minutes: DDD). Texts and translations included. Recorded 1994 Ⓕ

Compare Jonathan Harvey's Come, Holy Ghost with one of his large-scale instrumental works and you might suspect that they are the work of different Jonathan Harveys, one providing short pieces for cathedral choirs, the other active on the avant-garde concert scene. So it is a particular virtue of this disc that by providing such a generous cross-section of Harvey's choral music it makes it easier to hear how the two Harveys are in fact one far-from-inconsistent composer. Since Harvey himself has progressed from choir school to electronic studio it is not so surprising that his music can relate to both worlds so effectively, and most of the compositions here takea fresh look at aspects of the English cathedral tradition without attempting to force those aspects into an unholy alliance with modernist techniques. From the early Fragments (1966) to The Angels (1994) we can hear versions of the kind of contemplative intensity that informs some of Harvey's finest concert works (for example, Bhakti), and these choral pieces are never poor relations. The short Sobre un éxtasis alte contemplación works within its own essential sounds, and in exploring speech as well as song it develops the more dramatic dialogue to be found in the larger-scale Forms of Emptiness (1986) and Lauds (1987).

The Joyful Company of Singers prove to be the ideal interpreters to project all facets of this often quite challenging music.

Joseph Haydn

Austrian 1732-1809

GROVE Haydn, the son of a wheelwright, was trained as a choirboy and taken into the choir at St Stephen's Cathedral, Vienna, where he sang from c1740 to c1750. He then worked as a freelance musician, playing the violin and keyboard instruments, accompanying for singing lessons given by the composer Porpora, who helped and encouraged him. At this time he wrote some sacred works, music for theatre comedies and chamber music. In c1759 he was appointed music director to Count Morzin; but he soon moved, into service as Vice-Kapellmeister with one of the leading Hungarian families, the Esterházys, becoming full Kapellmeister on Werner's death in 1766. He was director of an ensemble of generally some 15-20 musicians, with responsibility for the music and the instruments, and was required to compose as his employer – from 1762, Prince Nikolaus Esterházy – might command. At first he lived at Eisenstadt, c30 miles south-east of Vienna by 1767 the family's chief residence, and Haydn's chief place of work, was at the new palace at Eszterháza. In his early years Haydn chiefly wrote instrumental music, including symphonies and other pieces for the twice-weekly concerts and the prince's Tafelmusik, and works for the instrument played by the prince, the baryton (a kind of viol), for which he composed c125 trios in 10 years. There were also cantatas and a little church music. After Werner's death church music became more central, and so, after the opening of a new opera house at Eszterháza in 1768, did opera. Some of the symphonies from c1770 show Haydn expanding his musical horizons from occasional, entertainment music towards larger and more original pieces, for example Nos 26, 39, 49, 44 and 52 (many of them in minor keys, and serious in mood, in line with trends in the contemporary symphony in Germany and Austria). Also from 1768-72 come three sets of string quartets, probably not written for the Esterházy establishment but for another patron or perhaps for publication (Haydn was allowed to write other than for the Esterházys only with permission); Op 20 clearly shows the beginnings of a more adventurous and integrated quartet style.

Among the operas from this period are Lo speziale (for the opening of the new house), L'infedeltà delusa (1773) and Il mondo della luna (1777). Operatic activity became increasingly central from the mid-1770s as regular performances came to be given at the new house. It was part of Haydn's job to prepare the music, adapting or arranging it for the voices of the resident singers. In 1779 the opera house burnt down; Haydn composed La fedeltà premiata for its reopening in 1781. Until then his operas had largely been in a comic genre; his last two for Eszterháza, Orlando paladino (1782) and Armida (1783), are in mixed or serious genres. Although his operas never attained wider exposure, Haydn's reputation had now grown and was international. Much of his music had been published in all the main European centres; under a revised contract with the Esterháza his employers no longer had exclusive rights to his music.

His works of the 1780s that carried his name further afield include piano sonatas, piano trios, symphonies (nos.76-81 were published in 1784-85, and Nos 82-7 were written on commission for a concert organization in Paris in 1785-86) and string quartets. His influential Op 33 quartets, issued in 1782, were said to be 'in a quite new, special manner': this is sometimes thought to refer to the use of instruments or the style of thematic development, but could refer to the introduction of scherzos or might simply be an advertising device. More quartets appeared at the end of the decade, Op 50 (dedicated to the King of Prussia and often said to be influenced by the quartets Mozart had dedicated to Haydn) and two sets (Opp 54-55 and 64) written for a former Esterházy violinist who became a Viennese businessman. All these show an increasing enterprise, originality and freedom of style as well as melodic fluency, command of form, and humour. Other works that carried Haydn's reputation beyond central Europe include concertos and notturnos for a type of hurdy-gurdy, written on commission for the King of Naples, and The Seven Last Words, commissioned for Holy Week from Cadíz Cathedral and existing not only in its original orchestral form but also for string quartet, for piano and (later) for chorus and orchestra.

In 1790, Nikolaus Esterházy died; Haydn (unlike most of his musicians) was retained by his son but was free to live in Vienna (which he had many times visited) and to travel. He was invited by the impresario and violinist JP Salomon to go to London to write an opera, symphonies and other works. In the event he went to London twice, in 1791-92 and 1794-95. He composed his last 12 symphonies for performance there, where they enjoyed great success; he also wrote a symphonie concertante, choral pieces, piano trios, piano sonatas and songs (some to English words) as well as arranging British folksongs for publishers in London and Edinburgh. But because of intrigues his opera, L'anima del filosofo, on the Orpheus story, remained unperformed. He was honoured (with an Oxford DMus) and fêted generously, and played, sang and conducted before the royal family. He also heard performances of Handel's music by large choirs in Westminster Abbey.

Back in Vienna, he resumed work for Nikolaus Esterházy's grandson (whose father had now died); his main duty was to produce masses for the princess's nameday. He wrote six works, firmly in the Austrian mass tradition but strengthened and invigorated by his command of symphonic technique. Other works of these late years include further string quartets (Opp 71 and 74 between the London visits, op.76 and the Op 77 pair after them), showing great diversity of style and seriousness of content yet retaining his vitality and fluency of utterance; some have a more public manner, acknowledging the new use of string quartets at concerts as well as in the home. The most important work, however, is his oratorio The Creation in which his essentially simple-hearted joy in Man, Beast and Nature, and his gratitude to God for his creation of these things to our benefit, are made a part of universal experience by his treatment of them in an oratorio modelled on Handel's, with massive choral writing of a kind he had not essayed before. He followed this with The Seasons, in a similar vein but more a series of attractive episodes than a whole.

Haydn died in 1809, after twice dictating his recollections and preparing a catalogue of his works. He was widely revered, even though by then his music was old-fashioned compared with Beethoven's. He was immensely prolific: some of his music remains unpublished and little known. His operas have never succeeded in holding the stage. But he is regarded, with some justice, as father of the symphony and the string quartet: he saw both genres from their beginnings to a high level of sophistication and artistic expression, even if he did not originate them. He brought to them new intellectual weight, and his closely argued style of development laid the foundations for the larger structures of Beethoven and later composers.

Piano Concertos

Awards 2000

Piano Concertos – in G, HobXVIII/4; in F, HobXVIII/3; in D, HobXVIII/11
Norwegian Chamber Orchestra / Leif Ove Andsnes pf
EMI 556960-2 (54 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1998 ○○○

Like Emanuel Ax on Sony, Leif Ove Andsnes confines himself to the three concertos that have been fully authenticated. Had the works generally known as 'the Haydn piano concertos' been these three and not a rag-bag of juvenilia and pieces attributed to Haydn, the canon might have been more highly thought of than has often been the case. That said, even the slightest work can dazzle and delight if it is performed as well as these are here. Where Ax's performances have a slightly monochrome feel to them, everything tapped out (there is much audible fingerwork) with the same well-adjusted mix of energy and sensibility, Andsnes's playing is altogether more various while at the same time being perfectly at one with itself stylistically. Ax's Franz Liszt Chamber Orchestra is the more idiomatic of the two ensembles in the D major Concerto's Rondo all'Ungarese but that is just about the only occasion on which it has the edge over Andsnes's stylish and highly articulate Norwegian Chamber Orchestra; and, even here, Andsnes himself scores points for a less noisy plunge into the interlude in D minor and a more sunlit and finely flighted way with the episode which follows. The Norwegian players are never afraid to play full out, a strategy which the explicit but carefully balanced recording is happy to underwrite.

Thus the players make much of the 'look here, young man' chromaticisms in the first movement of the D major Concerto as the piano chatters irrepressibly on; and they contribute decisively to the superbly articulated – nay, revelatory – performance of the G major Concerto with which the disc begins. After a splendidly jaunty account of the first movement, Andsnes pushes this G major Concerto to its limits with a decidedly skilfully shaped account of the glooming C major slow movement and a dashing account of the concluding Presto. Andsnes's playing of the Largo cantabile of the F major Concerto – the concerto's centrepiece and its raison d'être – is the very embodiment of sweetness and light. All in all, few could doubt that this is a simply marvellous disc.

Cello Concertos

No 1 in C, HobVIIb/1; No 2 in D, HobVIIb/2

Cello Concertos Nos 1 and 2
Academy of St Martin in the Fields / Mstislav Rostropovich vc
EMI 749305-2 (49 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1975 ○○

This deserves a place on any collector's shelf. With Rostropovich directing from the bow the ASMF sounds a little less sturdy than usual, a little more lithe in the First Concerto. The scale of its first movement is little short of perfection: everything a Moderato should be, with Rostropovich humming along nonchalantly in its second theme. He is leisurely in the Adagio, playing it as an extended meditation which exists almost outside time. Without ever losing the life of the melodic line, Rostropovich progresses as slowly as it is humanly possible to do without total stasis; and, to wonderfully joyful effect, breaks all records for speed in the finale. Every note, every sequential phrase is there in its place, secured by glintingly true intonation and needle-sharp dramatic timing. The almost complete absence of physical stick and finger sound which Rostropovich and his engineers manage between them makes the latter two movements of the Second Concerto a most pleasing experience. Rostropovich takes deep, long breaths: the surface of his slow movement is glassy, every fragment of bowing and phrasing given the microscopic hair-pin treatment. For his deep, instinctive understanding of scale, and for Britten's cadenzas, many collectors' preferences in these concertos will remain with Rostropovich.

Cello Concertos – Nos 1 and 2; No 4 in D, HobVIIb/4 (formerly attributed to Haydn)
Gautier Capucon vc Mahler Chamber Orchestra / Daniel Harding
Virgin Classics 545560-2 (66 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded c2002 ○○

Barely 22, Gautier Capucon plays the cello with the control and wisdom of a much older musician. The lightness of his touch and the consistent clarity of his bow strokes are quite admirable in themselves, but when combined with an uncanny sweetness of tone in the higher registers they are breathtaking. These qualities suit the two Haydn concertos very well indeed and bestow upon the modest little anonymous D major Concerto unexpected dignity and charm.

Daniel Harding, conducting the Mahler Chamber Orchestra, opts for galant rather than driven tempi. The scale of his orchestral forces enables him to establish a relationship with the soloist more akin to chamber music than is usually heard in these works. There is lightness of articulation throughout, conveying both intimacy and vitality.

Their reading of the C major Concerto, while not strongly imprinted, is truly Classical in its delicacy and refinement. It is shapely and spirited but never forced. It is the second item, the D major Haydn, which proves the highlight. In the opening movement Capuçon conjures the darting image of a water sprite, who can nevertheless steal time in all the right moments. The doublestops are dizzying and the chords in the poetic cadenza are exquisitely rolled. The Adagio takes on the aura of a meditation; Capucon seems detached while gently supported by the orchestra, in a reverie of his own. When it comes, the elaboration that serves in the place of a cadenza is perfectly attuned to the moment. The final Allegro is never allowed to go 'peasant', remaining instead in the aristocrat's drawing room where it sparkles and glows.

Cello Concertos Nos 1 and 2
Truls Mørk vc Norwegian Chamber Orchestra / Iona Brown
Virgin Classics 545014-2 (50 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1991 ●

Playing a rare early 18th-century Domenico Montagnana cello, Truls Mørk brings an unusual lyrical tenderness to these perennially popular concertos. He can certainly produce a big, gutsy tone where appropriate, as in his imposing initial entry in the C major work; and the agility of his bowing is never in question, as you can hear in the finale of the same concerto, where he responds eagerly to the dramatic and comic potential of Haydn's bravura episodes, with their wide leaps and staccato repeated notes. But what lingers in the mind is the delicacy and suppleness of Mørk's cantabile phrasing and his beautiful range of colour in piano dynamics. Listen, for instance, to his veiled, dusky tone in the first-movement development of the C major, his sudden withdrawn pianissimo in the slow movement, the bow barely brushing the string, or his gravely eloquent shaping of the D major's Adagio. The finale, which can be a lumbering bore, dances with a lithe, airy grace. The expert Norwegian Chamber Orchestra accompanies crisply and attentively, though oboes and horns get a slightly raw deal in the resonant church acoustic. Among the rival versions of these concertos, several are outstanding, but Mørk can hold his own; and in some moods you might well prefer his fresh, sweet-toned, uncommonly gracious performances before all others.

Cello Concertos Nos 1 and 2
Sinfonia concertante in B flat, HobI/105
Symphony No 13 in D – Adagio cantabile
Steven Isserlis vc Douglas Boyd ob Matthew Wilkie bn Marieke Blankestijn vn Chamber Orchestra of Europe / Sir Roger Norrington
RCA Victor Red Seal 09026 68578-2 Ⓕ
(75 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1996 ●

What a versatile artist Steven Isserlis is. Having made his name as a sympathetic interpreter of a wide variety of romantic and modern music, here he shows he can be just as persuasive in 18th-century repertoire. His stylistic awareness is evident in beautiful, elegant phrasing, selective use of vibrato and varied articulation, giving an expressive range that never conflicts with the music's natural language. In the cello concertos he is helped by an extremely sensitive accompaniment, stressing the chamber musical aspects of Haydn's pre-London orchestral writing. The Adagios are taken at a flowing speed, but Isserlis's relaxed approach means they never sound hurried. The Allegro molto finale of the C major Concerto, on the other hand, sounds poised rather than the helter-skelter we often hear.

Mørk's vivacious, imaginative performances characterise the music very strongly, but some may prefer Isserlis's and Norrington's lighter touch and greater refinement. And this is not taking into account the extras – the lovely symphony movement (a cello solo throughout) and what many may find the highlight of the disc – the Sinfonia concertante. The first movement's tuttis have excessively prominent added dynamics that detract from the music's vigour and grandeur, but the serenade-like Andante, the robust and witty finale and, throughout, the conversational exchanges of the four soloists, are an unalloyed delight.

Trumpet Concerto

Haydn Trumpet Concertos in E flat, HobVIIe/1; in C[a] Albinoni Trumpet Concerto in B flat, Op 7 No 3[b]; Adagio (transcr. Orsomando) Corelli Trumpet Concerto in D[b] Hertel Trumpet Concertos in D and E flat[a] Hummel Trumpet Concerto in E flat JM Molter Trumpet Concerto No 1 in D[a] Mozart Trumpet Concerto in D FX Richter Concerto for Trumpet and Strings in D[a] J Stamitz Trumpet Concerto in D. Plus works by JS Bach, Clarke and Gounod
Håkan Hardenberger tpt Simon Preston org Academy of St Martin in the Fields / Sir Neville Marriner; [a]London Philharmonic Orchestra / Elgar Howarth; [b]I Musici
Philips Duo ② 464 028 (148 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1986, 1989, 1991, 1993 ●

This is probably the finest single collection of trumpet concertos in the catalogue. Hardenberger offers an interesting and generous programme, plus a first performance of a recently discovered trumpet concerto either by Stamitz or a musician called J. G. Holzbogen.

In the Haydn soloist and orchestra alike find an elegant style for the more lyrical side of the first movement and the Andante too is nicely relaxed, the noble melody obviously relished, then the finale swings off joyously to make a sparkling conclusion. The trumpeting on this disc is truly splendid and Hardenberger (or the record's producers) have ensured that the accompaniments are distinguished and full of characterful detail by asking Marriner and the ASMF to provide the backing.

Hardenberger opens with the famous Hummel Concerto, played in E major rather than the usual E flat, which makes the work sound bolder and brighter than usual. The finale with its crisp articulation, fantastic tonguing and tight trills, displays a genial easy bravura, yet overflows with energy and high spirits.

The Stamitz (or Holzbogen) piece seems to have a very doubtful lineage. Whoever it was written for was a formidable virtuoso: the writing lies consistently in the trumpet's stratospheric tessitura and includes some awkward leaps. It is an inventive piece, though, and even the second movement Adagio moves along quite briskly; the finale, however, is the most catchy section and Hakan Hardenberger dispatches it with panache, having taken all the earlier histrionics in his stride.

They are warmly and truthfully balanced in Philips's best manner and while the trumpet is well up front most trumpet fanciers will enjoy the realistic projection. A superb issue.

Symphonies – boxed sets

No 1 in D; No 2 in C; No 3 in G; No 4 in D; No 5 in A; No 6 in D, 'Le matin'; No 7 in C, 'Le midi'; No 8 in G, 'Le soir'; No 9 in C; No 10 in D; No 11 in E flat; No 12 in E; No 13 in D; No 14 in A; No 15 in D; No 16 in B flat; No 17 in F; No 18 in G; No 19 in D; No 20 in C; No 21 in A; No 22 in E flat, 'Philosopher'; No 23 in G; No 24 in D; No 25 in C; No 26 in D minor, 'Lamentatione'; No 27 in G; No 28 in A; No 29 in E; No 30 in C, 'Alleluja'; No 31 in D, 'Hornsignal'; No 32 in C; No 33 in C; No 34 in D minor; No 35 in B flat; No 36 in E flat; No 37 in C; No 38 in C; No 39 in G minor; No 40 in F; No 41 in C; No 42 in D; No 43 in E flat, 'Mercury'; No 44 in E minor, 'Trauersinfonie'; No 45 in F sharp minor, 'Farewell'; No 46 in B; No 47 in G, 'Palindrome'; No 48 in C, 'Maria Theresia'; No 49 in F minor, 'La passione'; No 50 in C; No 51 in B flat; No 52 in C minor; No 53 in D, 'Imperial'; No 54 in G; No 55 in E flat, 'Schoolmaster'; No 56 in C; No 57 in D; No 58 in F; No 59 in A, 'Fire'; No 60 in C, 'Il distratto'; No 61 in D; No 62 in D; No 63 in C, 'La Roxelane'; No 64 in A, 'Tempora mutantur'; No 65 in A; No 66 in B flat; No 67 in F; No 68 in B flat; No 69 in C, 'Loudon'; No 70 in D; No 71 in B flat; No 72 in D; No 73 in D, 'La chasse'; No 74 in E flat; No 75 in D; No 76 in E flat; No 77 in B flat; No 78 in C minor; No 79 in F; No 80 in D minor; No 81 in G; No 82 in C, 'L'ours'; No 83 in G minor, 'La poule'; No 84 in E flat; No 85 in B flat, 'La reine'; No 86 in D; No 87 in A; No 88 in G, 'Letter V'; No 89 in F; No 90 in C; No 91 in E flat; No 92 in G, 'Oxford'; No 93 in D; No 94 in G, 'Surprise'; No 95 in C minor; No 96 in D, 'Miracle'; No 97 in C; No 98 in B flat; No 99 in E flat; No 100 in G, 'Military'; No 101 in D, 'Clock'; No 102 in B flat; No 103 in E flat, 'Drumroll'; No 104 in D, 'London'.

Symphonies – Nos 1-104; 'A' in B flat; 'B' in B flat.
Sinfonia concertante in B flat, HobI/105; 'No 105'
Philharmonia Hungarica / Antál Dorati
Decca 448 531-2LC33 (33 discs: ADD) Ⓑ
Recorded 1969-73 ●

Dorati's famous integral recording of all 104 of the published Symphonies now returns in a Decca bargain box containing 33 CDs. It still holds its place in the catalogue as the only complete set to contain everything Haydn wrote in this medium, including the Symphonies 'A' and 'B', omitted from the original numbering scheme because at one time they were not thought to be symphonies at all. The survey also encompasses additional alternative movements for certain works (notably Nos 53 and 103) and alternative complete versions of the Philosopher Symphony and No 63, which are fascinating. The remastering confirms the excellence of the vintage Decca sound.

No more needs to be said, except that the one minus point in these very convincing modern-instrument performances is Dorati's insistence on measured, often rustic tempos for the minuets. For those who can run to the complete series this is self-recommending – a source of inexhaustible pleasure.

Symphonies, Nos 1-104
Austro-Hungarian Haydn Orchestra / Adám Fischer 🏵
Brilliant Classics 99925 (33 discs: DDD) Ⓢ
From Nimbus originals recorded 1987-2001 ●●

It was little short of tragic that the very last box of symphonies in Adám Fischer's Haydn series for Nimbus, Nos 21 to 39 plus the Symphonies A and B, appeared just as the demise of that label was announced in January 2002. The final box was the finest of the whole series, but sadly, all too few copies reached the shops, making this box of 33 discs covering all the symphonies very welcome indeed, even if over the 14 years that it took to complete the project, the quality and even the style varied.

Surveying the complete series confirms the view that that final box of 20 symphonies was the finest and most enjoyable of all, a superb culmination to the project. Not only are they a fascinating sequence of works written in the 1760s when the young Haydn was busy experimenting, the performances are outstanding. They were recorded as recently as 2000 and 2001, and far more than the earliest recordings in the series, they take full note of period practice while staying faithful to modern instruments. More than ever one registers the individual virtuosity of the various soloists in the orchestra, often challenged to the limit by fast speeds. So a movement like the variation finale of No 31, the Hornsignal, features a sequence of brilliant soloists such as Haydn might have been writing for in his Esterházy orchestra – violin, cello, horn and so on, even double bass. It is a performance full of panache, with the four horns braying out superbly.

Other striking symphonies in the group include No 22 in E flat, The Philosopher, with its extraordinary parts for two cors anglais. Also the Alleluia Symphony, No 30 in C, with trumpets and drums dramatically added to the usual published scoring – brought in later, according to HC Robbins Landon, by Haydn as an option. The minor-key works in this last batch, such as the Lamentatione, No 26 in D minor, and best of all, No 39 in G minor, are fine examples of Haydn's Sturm und Drang manner, with Fischer heightening dynamic contrasts to good effect. No 39 brings an example of Fischer's mastery when he enhances the tension of the nervy opening and exaggerates the pauses; he is far more effective in that movement than Dorati .

While with those symphonies recorded at the beginning of the project, from 1987 to 1990; comparisons with the Dorati series have the merits of each balanced fairly evenly, the advantage certainly tips in favour of Fischer as the project developed. For the London Symphonies, Nos 93 to 104, the first to be recorded, the Nimbus engineers – working in the very hall at the Esterházy Palace which Haydn used – produce rather washy sound, whereas the works recorded later benefit from a sharper focus. In those early recordings, too, the slow movements tend to be taken at the sort of broad speeds of tradition, with warmly expressive phrasing.

At that point, no doubt, Fischer was just beginning to woo his select band of Austrian and Hungarian musicians away from their usual Romantic manners. In the notes which come in the box, Fischer makes a point of describing the unfolding development of the project over 14 years. Most important of all, he increasingly takes note of historically informed style, notably in faster speeds for both slow movements and minuets (which increasingly acquire a scherzo-like flavour), giving him in that a clear advantage over Dorati. Also the string playing comes closer to that found in period orchestras, with lighter phrasing and less marked use of vibrato.

That development is noticeable as early as the recordings made in 1994 and 1995, when most of the Sturm und Drang symphonies were covered – broadly those in the late-40s and early-50s in the regular Breitkopf numbering. Finales in particular, taken fast, have all the bite and wildness one could want, with pinpoint attack. The very earliest symphonies in numerical order, Nos 1 to 20, were recorded early in the project between 1989 and 1991, with results that are more variable. The finale of No 12, for example, marked Presto, is taken surprisingly slowly, almost like a minuet. In No 13, very adventurously for that early period, Haydn uses four horns, yet because of the reverberant acoustic they do not ring out as prominently as those used in works like the Hornsignal, recorded later.

Even in these early symphonies, recorded near the beginning of the project, the trios in Minuets have solo strings, and regularly the vigour and thrust of Allegros is exhilarating, with rhythms lifted and admirably crisp ensemble.

This is a set guaranteed to encourage collectors to delve into works which from first to last convey the joy in creation that is the unfailing mark of this ever-welcoming master.

Symphonies – 'Sturm und Drang', 'Paris', 'London':
Nos 26, 35, 38, 39, 41-52, 58, 59, 65, 82-89, 90-104 🅿
Orchestra of the Age of Enlightenment,
Orchestra of the Eighteenth Century /
Frans Brüggen 💰
Philips Collectors Edition ⑬ 473015-2PB13 (DDD) Ⓑ
Recorded 1990-96 ●

Although increasingly rejected by scholars, the label Sturm und Drang is still widely used to describe the symphonies Haydn wrote during the late 1760s and early 1770s. Storm and stress is, of course, most evident in the half-dozen minor-key symphonies of this period. Several of the major-key works here also have their share of turbulence, above all No 46. Others, though, employ the cheerful, Italianate musical language of the day with a new force, originality and, as in movements like the 'limping' Minuet of No 58, comic eccentricity. No 48, the erroneously named Maria Theresia, is one of the noblest and most imposing in a line of 18th-century C major ceremonial symphonies. Stormy, majestic or playful, virtually every work here reflects Haydn's restless exploration of the symphony's expressive and intellectual potential during these years.

These symphonies have been well served by previous period-instrument recordings, but this set more than holds its own. Brüggen is the most 'Romantic' of the conductors in this repertoire: and he has little truck with the smart tempos and clean-cut phrasing favoured by Hogwood and Weil, in particular. Outer movements are often broad and Brüggen phrases the lyrical music as expressively as any traditional conductor, and reveals a strong control of cumulative symphonic tensions. Slow movements are shaped with all the refinement and chamber-musical delicacy heard on Pinnock's recordings, and often with more affection. In one or two of the faster movements Brüggen's tempo is arguably a notch too expansive, above all in the first movement of the C major, No 41. He also shows an intermittent fondness for shading away at cadences, notably in the opening movement of the Lamentatione, No 26. Equally controversial is his speeding up for the trios of several of the minuets, most blatantly in that of La Passione, though his tempos for the minuets themselves are thoughtfully chosen, ranging from the measured, elegiac No 26 to the stinging one-in-a-bar quasi-Scherzo of No 52.

Brüggen eschews a harpsichord continuo, though he rightly reinforces the bass-line with a clearly audible bassoon. And he omits second-time repeats in all but a few sonata movements, a small price to pay for an average of nearly four symphonies per disc. Brüggen's performances, though occasionally questionable, are the most individual in their shaping and characterisation.

Haydn's so-called Paris Symphonies, written in 1785-86 for the famed orchestra of the Concert de la Loge Olympique, have fared pretty well on CD: there are three rival period-instrument accounts from Sigiswald Kuijken, Roy Goodman and Bruno Weil respectively. Brüggen is crisp and vital in the allegros, yet always allows the music plenty of breathing space. And his phrasing of the lyrical themes is more expressively moulded than on any of these rival versions. The main theme of No 85's opening Vivace, for instance, glides with a feline grace, and the first movement of No 84 has an airy, dancing elegance. Yet Haydn's dramatic coups, such as the barbaric dissonances in the first movement of No 82, are played for all they're worth; and throughout Brüggen shows a shrewd grasp of long-range structure, knowing just when to tighten the screws (as in the fiercely modulating developments in the finales of Nos 83 and 85, both unusually tense and truculent here, and the thrilling, brassy codas to the finales of Nos 82 and 86). He judges nicely the pace and character of each of the minuets, too, ranging from the red and gold pomp of No 82 to the brisk and breezy No 85, with its whiplash accents and whooping high horns. And, predictably, his phrasing in the slow movements is more affectionate, more highly nuanced, than on any of the competing versions. Also, his tempos here are all aptly chosen.

It would be rash, perhaps, to recommend an outright 'winner' among period versions of the Paris Symphonies when all competitors have so much going for them, but Brüggen would get the vote, for his stronger sense of drama in sonata movements, for his more expressive phrasing, and for his superlative wind players, who in refinement and imagination eclipse all their rivals. The live Philips recordings are remarkably consistent, combining transparency with a pleasing ambient warmth.

If you're still undecided, this set – 13 well-filled discs at budget price – offers a serious price advantage over the other contenders.

Symphonies – smaller sets

Symphonies Nos 6-8
Northern Chamber Orchestra / Nicholas Ward
Naxos 8 550722 (59 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1993

Although this disc doesn't offer any revelations, there's quite a lot to enjoy in the popular Times of Day trilogy, with their colourful and entertaining concertante writing. The Northern Chamber Orchestra is a lively, responsive group, and fields a personable bunch of soloists – deft work from flute and violin, for instance, in the finales of Nos 6 and 7, an eloquent cello in the Andante of No 8, and nicely turned cameos from the double-bass in the Trios of Le midi and Le soir. The minuets could move with a nimbler spring, and the slow movements, especially that of Le matin, are sometimes short on delicacy and fantasy, with a dearth of truly soft playing. But Allegros are bright-eyed and propulsive, with ample verve and virtuosity in the finales. The horns are sometimes unduly discreet, but in general the full, immediate recording is very acceptable. No one staking a fiver on this disc could possibly be disappointed.

Symphonies – Nos 21–39; 'A'; 'B'
Austro-Hungarian Haydn Orchestra / Adám Fischer
Nimbus ⑤ NI5683/7 (334 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ

This culminating volume of Adám Fischer's Haydn symphony cycle – built up over 14 years – is in many ways the most enjoyable of all, not just because it covers a fascinating range of works written in the 1760s, when the young Haydn was busy experimenting, but in the performances too.

In most previous volumes the advantages of Fischer's cycle as against those of Antál Dorati's pioneering Decca cycle, have been relatively slight. Here the new performances, with lighter, more transparent textures and generally faster speeds, take far more note of period practice while staying faithful to modern instruments. More than ever one registers the individual virtuosity of the various soloists in the orchestra, often challenged to the limit by fast speeds. So a movement such as the variation finale of No 31, The Hornsignal, features a sequence of brilliant soloists such as Haydn himself might have been writing for in the Esterházy orchestra – violin, cello, horn and so on, even double-bass. That symphony, one of the most spectacular of the early works, is here presented with panache, with the four horns braying out superbly, and the fast opening Allegro adding to the intensity.

The immediately preceding symphony, No 30, nicknamed Alleluia after the chant quoted, is hardly less striking, the more so here when Fischer has adopted, with brilliant results, the option for this C major work of having trumpets and drums as well as horns.

No 39 in G minor, the last of the numbered symphonies here, is a wonderful example of Sturm und Drang, enhanced by Fischer at the start by the way he exaggerates the pauses between the nervily tentative opening phrases, leading to the fierce and urgent Allegro.

Throughout this set Fischer consistently relishes the originality of the scoring, as in the Trio of the Minuet of No 29 in E, where suddenly in E minor the horns in octaves hold a sustained note, an effect made the more eerie here with the strings stilling their vibrato in period style, as they regularly do in these performances.

The Symphonies 'A' and 'B' are both works which were only identified as symphonies rather than string quartets when in recent years wind parts were discovered for them. A superb achievement.

Symphonies Nos 22, 29 and 60
Northern Chamber Orchestra / Nicholas Ward
Naxos 8 550724 (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1992-93

In the Philosopher, Ward and the NCO (using modern instruments) present a spacious, elegantly phrased account of the title-character's personality. Ward's idiomatic feeling for Haydn's style produces a subtly balanced, appealingly smooth-lined performance. The E major Symphony, No 29, offers Ward and the NCO the chance to explore Haydn's attractive variety of instrumental forces and powerful opposition of major and minor. The programme culminates with No 60 (Il distratto). Here, Ward controls his orchestra with customary deftness to make the music's overtly descriptive elements especially telling. Haydn's comic depiction of the protagonist's absent-mindedness is vividly portrayed in the two outer movements, and distinctive thematic characterization effectively heightens the dramatic contrasts in the Minuet and Adagio, in a winning performance that fully captures the composer's infectious wit.

Symphonies Nos 22, 86 and 102
City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra /
Sir Simon Rattle
EMI 555509-2 (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1994 ◉

Rattle establishes a middle path between traditional and period styles of performance. In addition, the idea of coupling symphonies from different periods of Haydn's career – not new but relatively rare – is refreshing, and has here produced an issue that one can warmly recommend to anyone simply wanting a representative Haydn symphony disc.

The limited vibrato and light phrasing used by the strings throughout these performances set them apart from most others using modern instruments, giving them extra freshness and transparency. So in the Adagio of No 102, elegant at a flowing speed, the solo cello is clearly defined, and the Minuet brings the strongest contrast of all with modern-instrument rivals, exuberantly turned into a scherzo at one-in-a-bar.

No 86, the fifth of the 'Paris Symphonies', is similarly refreshing, and here too Rattle refuses to rush his first movement in the name of authenticity. The main Allegro is marginally more relaxed than that of Dorati (on Decca). By contrast Rattle's Presto for the finale is hectic, and one marvels at the agility of the Birmingham horns in their repeated triplets. In the square rhythms of the opening Adagio of No 22, Rattle achieves elegance without sacrificing the chunky strength of the chorale on cor anglais, and this symphony, unlike later ones, finds Rattle using harpsichord continuo.

The helpful acoustic of Symphony Hall, Birmingham, sets the seal on the disc's success with warm, clear sound.

Additional recommendation
Symphonies Nos 43, 46 and 47
Cologne Chamber Orchestra / Müller-Brühl
Naxos 8 554767 (64 minutes: DDD:
recorded 2001) Ⓢ

A beefier sound than from many chamber orchestras but with ample detail. Müller-Brühl's speeds cannot be faulted, with Allegros crisp and alert and slow movements kept flowing. A worthy rival for existing versions, whether on period or modern instruments.

Symphonies Nos 50, 54-57 and 60 🅿
Academy of Ancient Music /
Christopher Hogwood
L'Oiseau-Lyre ③443 781-2OH3 (179 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1993 ◉

These six symphonies date from 1773-74, when the intensity of Haydn's musical language during the preceding years was being tempered with a new urbanity and a deliberately calculated popular appeal. The older style is represented by the Adagios of Nos 54 and 56, with their spacious lines and rarefied atmosphere. Typical of the newer, more 'accessible' manner is the obscurely nicknamed Schoolmaster, No 55, with its droll, faux-naïf variation slow movement and its catchy finale, a deft and witty amalgam of variation, rondo and sonata forms.

The little-known No 57 also aims at popular effect in its theme-and-variation slow movement, its stomping Ländler-Minuet and Prestissimo finale suggesting a riotous comic opera imbroglio. The spirit of opera buffa permeates several movements here, including the opening Presto of No 54, a symphony Hogwood opts to perform in its original version – that is, without the slow introduction and the enhanced scoring for flutes, trumpets and timpani. Two of the other symphonies, both in C major with high horns, trumpets and timpani, have overt theatrical connections: No 50 probably started life as the introduction to Der Götterrath, the lost prologue to the marionette opera Philemon und Baucis, while the burlesque six-movement Il distratto, No 60, originated as incidental music to a farce centring on an 'absent-minded' hero – hence the music's frequent air of distractedness and comic inconsequentiality. Hogwood has thought carefully about the precise character of each movement, chooses his tempos shrewdly and is always alive to felicitous details of wind colour or inner string writing. Abetted by marvellously lithe, incisive playing from the Academy of Ancient Music, he gives a viscerally exciting reading of No 56, the finale dispatched with phenomenal panache at the fastest possible tempo. Here, and in Nos 50 and 60, brass and timpani rasp and thunder to thrilling effect. The finale of No 57 is likewise breathtaking, not only in its accuracy at high speed but also in its delicacy and point. Aided by notably sweet, refined string playing, the filigree writing in Nos 54 and 57 is exquisitely realised. The recording is clean, immediate and well balanced.

Symphonies Nos 55-69
Austro-Hungarian Haydn Orchestra /
Adám Fischer
Nimbus ⑤ NI5590/4 (317 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1996-97

With a fair sprinkling of named symphonies, and one or two whose theatrical associations render them eccentric in symphonic terms – as, for example, the six-movement Il distratto, No 60 – this makes a most attractive collection, with no hint of routine in any of the performances. In the helpful acoustic of the Haydnsaal of the Esterházy Palace at Eisenstadt, the sound is at once warmly atmospheric and intimate, with high contrasts of dynamic and texture. Fischer's fine control of dynamics is repeatedly illustrated in the subtlety of echo phrases, clear but unexaggerated. Fischer uses modern rather than period instruments. As he explains in the booklet, his players, carefully chosen from the leading orchestras of Vienna and Budapest, are happier with the instruments with which they have grown up. Also, the orchestra is designed to provide an alternative to period groups, based as it is 'on this living tradition of Austro-Hungarian music-making'.

This set offers a very agreeable alternative to the full period sound, when the strings are relatively sparing with vibrato, and most strikingly the characteristic Viennese oboes and horns stand out so vividly, with fine separation. Inevitably comparisons are to be made with Antál Dorati's classic, pioneering 33-disc set with the Philharmonia Hungarica. In important ways, not just in the extra fullness of the digital sound, the new performances improve on the old, notably in the brisker speeds for minuets. Fischer tends to prefer speeds in slow movements a fraction more flowing than those of Dorati, while outer movements are regularly a degree more relaxed than with the older conductor. Fischer's springing of rhythm is always persuasive, so that at no point does his chosen speed seem too slow, even if those dedicated to period practice might well prefer the more hectic prestos and prestissimos of the earlier set. Generally exposition or first-half repeats are observed, but not second-half repeats. Generally these are performances which register Haydn's humour more clearly than does Dorati's, even in the Sturm und Drang symphonies such as Nos 58 and 59 (Fire). Fischer may not point the humour of the tuning-up joke in the finale of No 60 quite as well as Dorati, but Fischer brings out the distinctive timbres in No 67, with the extraordinary fading out on string phrases col legno in the long slow movement, and the hurdy-gurdy effect underlined in the equally eccentric writing for two violins in the third-movement Trio. The bargain price adds to the appeal of the set.

Symphonies Nos 93, 94, 97 and 99-101
Concertgebouw Orchestra / Sir Colin Davis
Philips Duo ② 442 614-2PM2 (ADD/DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1975-81 OO

Symphonies Nos 95, 96, 98 and 102-104
Concertgebouw Orchestra / Sir Colin Davis
Philips Duo ② 442 611-2PM2 (ADD/DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1975-81 OO

A superb achievement. It's nigh-on impossible to imagine better 'big-band' Haydn than one encounters here on Colin Davis's four well-filled CDs. His direction has exemplary sparkle (try the superb opening movement of the Miracle Symphony) and sensitivity (witness his eloquent moulding of No 98's great Adagio). Minuets are never allowed to plod, outer movements have an ideal combination of infectious zip and real poise, and the humour is always conveyed with a genial twinkle in the eye. Quite marvellous, wonderfully unanimous playing from the Amsterdam orchestra, too (the woodwind contributions are particularly distinguished), with never a trace of routine to betray the six-year recording span of this acclaimed project. The Philips engineering, whether analogue or digital, is of the very highest quality, offering a natural perspective, gloriously full-bodied tone and sparkling textures within the sumptuous Concertgebouw acoustic. Invest in this set: it will yield enormous rewards for years to come.

Flute Quartets

Cassation in F, HobII/20. Divertissement in B flat, HobII/B4. Flute Quartet in A, HobII/A4. Notturno No 1 in C, HobII/25
Linos Ensemble
Capriccio 10 719 (68 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1994 Ⓕ

These highly polished, enthusiastic performances generate a compelling immediacy. What's more, the diverse choice of pieces amply shows the excellent soloistic skills of Linos's members and its deftly balanced ensemble, while close recording presents this group's eloquence and fresh vitality in fine, clear detail. The delightful, open-air qualities of this repertoire are exemplified by the F major Cassation, whose good humour is captured with buoyant vigour in the opening Allegro; with stately elegance in the two minuets, affecting melodiousness in the Adagio, and an engaging swing in the final rondo. The extrovert B flat Divertissement offers a charming display of fluent, conversational playing, a style which the Linos exploits to particular effect in the lively alternation of different instrumental groupings in the elegant A major Quartet for flute and strings. Ultimately, the infectiously high-spirited, effervescent exchanges between flute and oboe in the witty C major Notturno sum up the allure of this entertaining issue.

Complete String Quartets

Op 1 – No 1 in B flat, 'La chasse'; No 2 in E flat; No 3 in D; No 4 in G,; No 5 in E flat; No 6 in C. Op 9 – No 1 in C; No 2 in E flat; No 3 in G; No 4 in D minor; No 5 in B flat; No 6 in A. Op 20, 'Sun' – No 1 in E flat; No 2 in C; No 3 in G minor; No 4 in D; No 5 in F minor; No 6 in A. Op 33 – No 1 in B minor; No 2 in E flat, 'Joke'; No 3 in C, 'Bird'; No 4 in B flat; No 5 in G; No 6 in D. Op 42 in D. Op 50 – No 1 in B flat; No 2 in C; No 3 in E flat; No 4 in F sharp minor; No 5 in F, 'The Dream'; No 6 in D, 'Frog'. Op 54 – No 1 in G; No 2 in C; No 3 in E. Op 55 – No 1 in A; No 2 in F minor; No 3 in B flat. Op 64 – No 1 in C; No 2 in B minor; No 3 in B flat; No 4 in G; No 5 in D, 'The Lark'; No 6 in E flat. Op 71 – No 1 in B flat; No 2 in D; No 3 in E flat. Op 74 – No 1 in C; No 2 in F; No 3 in G minor, 'Rider'. Op 76 – No 2 in D minor, 'Fifths';

No 3 in C, 'Emperor'; No 4 in B flat, 'Sunrise'. Op 77 – No 1 in G; No 2 in F

Op 0; Op 1 – Nos 1[a], 2, 3, 4[a] and 6 in C[a]; Op 2 – Nos 1, 2[a], 4[a] and 6; Op 9; Opp 17, 20, 33, 42[a], 50[a], 54, 55, 64, 71, 74, 76, 77 and 103
Angeles Quartet (Kathleen Lenski, Steven Miller, [a]Sara Parkins vns Brian Dembow va Stephen Erdody vc)
Philips (21 discs) 464 650-2PX21 Ⓜ
(140 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1994-99 ●●

The most relevant comparisons for this newcomer are the Aeolian Quartet on Decca and the Kodály Quartet on Naxos. The all-digital Naxos series features performances that are, in the main, musically reliable and technically proficient. But turn back to the 1973-76 Aeolian series and every work becomes an event, every quirk of harmony, rhythm or timing is etched with maximum relish.

Comparative disc layouts begin to differ from CD 3, and the Angeles omit The Seven Last Words, a work which, beautiful though it is, was not originally written for string quartet. Recording-wise, Philips favours a warm, open sound, balanced much as you would hear it from the centre stalls in a smallish-size concert hall. Decca's analogue recordings are closer, dryer, more sensitive to extraneous noise and commonly balanced in favour of Emanuel Hurwitz's first violin. It's a clear and intimate sound frame and the leader bias actually suits the divertimento-style early quartets, but Philips's more refined engineering makes for less strenuous listening in extended (ie concert-length) sessions. A handful of edits (audible more through headphones than on speakers) are the only blots on Philips's otherwise immaculate aural landscape.

The svelte texture of the Angeles' pooled sound, their consistent evenness in full chords and the musical like-mindedness of individual players, whether in excited *presto*s or in shared rubato is admirable. As to contrasts in playing styles, think of the relatively smooth-toned Juilliard or Emerson Quartets (Angeles) as compared with the internally differentiated Amadeus Quartet (Aeolian). The Angeles are generally lighter, faster and subtler in their use of tone colouring whereas the Aeolians' roster of virtues includes strong (even emphatic) characterisation, consistently flexible phrasing and a more pungent approach to rhythm.

Surfing the set for good sampling points brings us, initially, to the early quartets, where both groups sport some superb first-violin solo work, tastefully inflected with Lenski, more candidly expressive with Hurwitz. A particularly telling comparison is provided by the quietly contrapuntal Minuet of Op 17 No 1, where the Angeles' seamless legato contrasts against the Aeolians' near staccato. The exquisite Adagio of Op 20 No 6 is another good place to compare, the Angeles with their perfectly timed pauses, warm cello line and overall restraint set against the more romantic, even rhapsodic, Aeolian. Listening to the first bars of Op 33 No 1 is like eavesdropping on a small gathering mid-conversation, where the cello line gradually gains in urgency. The Angeles' sotto voce handling of the scherzo to Op 33 No 3 is wonderful: it's rather more pensive than the Aeolians and marks much more of a contrast with the chirping trio.

Op 50 No 4's Andante anticipates the dramatic interjections that trouble various late Schubert slow movements. Both groups are effective here, though when the cello marks an expected change of key two minutes or so into the movement, it's the Aeolian's Derek Simpson who makes the biggest impact: you can almost see the rosin erupt from his strings. In Op 50 No 5 late Beethoven springs more readily to mind, but there the Angeles' extra speed and restraint is more effective. Note how beautifully they negotiate the quiet alternation between upper and lower voices towards the end of Op 50 No 6's Poco adagio and the sudden blossoming that follows. Then again, Op 54 No 1's mobile Allegretto second movement harbours the potential to switch from tenseness to lyrical effusiveness, which the Angeles exploit to the full, as they do for the rhapsodising Adagio of Op 54 No 2. Late Beethoven is evoked once more, this time the Cavatina from Op 130.

Beam up around three minutes into the Adagio of the Lark Quartet (Op 64 No 5) and you'll note how skilfully the Angeles cue a ritardando, while the bracing finale to Op 74 No 3 has just the right bounce to offset all the breathless excitement. The Sunrise Quartet (Op 76 No 4) opens like a spring flower (never more so than in the Angeles' ecstatically controlled performance) and Op 77 No 1's cheeky Allegro moderato bounds in with perfectly modulated high spirits.

Turning to other competition, the Lindsays, Amadeus, Vienna Konzerthaus, Quatuor Mosaïques, Pro Arte and Takács, all have added substantially – and characterfully – to the Haydn quartet discography, and all have their value. However, in this particular context it really is a head-to-head contest between two 'complete' sets similarly presented.

Richard Wigmore contributes detailed annotation, quite different from Lindsay Kemp's overview for Decca, but just as useful and equally well-written. The Angeles appeal perhaps primarily for their restrained expressiveness and consistent attention to detail. Philips's superior recording is another bonus. The Aeolians generate more immediate heat but, ultimately, the Angeles' intelligence and cooler blending pay the higher musical dividends. Personal taste will be a crucial deciding factor, but one thing is sure: you simply must invest in one or the other.

String Quartets: Op 1 No 1. Op 20 Nos 2 and 5. 🄷
Op 50 No 3. Op 54 Nos 1-3. Op 64 Nos 3 and 4.
Op 74 No 3. Op 76 Nos 3 and 4. Op 77 No 2
Pro Arte Quartet (Alphonse Onnou, Laurent

Halleux vns Germain Prévost va Robert Maas vc)
Testament mono ③ SBT3055 (229 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1931-38 ◉

String Quartets: Op 1 No 6. Op 20 Nos 1 and 4. H
Op 33 Nos 2, 3 and 6. Op 50 No 6. Op 55 Nos 1 and 3. Op 64 No 6. Op 71 No 1. Op 74 Nos 1 and 2.
Op 77 No 1 Hoffstetter String Quartets, Op 3 – No 4 in B flat; No 5 in F
Pro Arte Quartet (Alphonse Onnou, Laurent Halleux vns Germain Prévost va Robert Maas vc)
Testament mono ④ SBT4056 (243 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1931-38 ◉

The Pro Arte Quartet's first London appearance in 1925 prompted The Times to declare, 'One has never heard it surpassed, and rarely equalled, in volume and beauty of tone, in accuracy of intonation and in perfection of balance between the parts' – and that could well be the verdict on these sets. The musicians' tempos invariably seem just right and their phrasing has an inner life that is extraordinarily potent. Alphonse Onnou and Laurent Halleux were superbly matched, and Halleux often led in their early days. Such virtuosity as the quartet exhibits is effortless and totally lacking in ostentation. Of course, the actual sound is dated – the string tone is wanting in bloom and freshness – but the ear soon adjusts, though one might wish that these transfers could have given us a little more space between movements.

String Quartets, Op 1

String Quartets, Op 1 Nos 1-6
Petersen Quartet (Conrad Muck, Gernot Sussmuth vns Friedemann Weigle va Hans-Jakob Eschenburg vc)
Capriccio ② 10 786/7 (99 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995-96 ◉

The history of the string quartet in effect began with these cheerful, compact Divertimenti a quattro, as the composer titled them; and though they contain only spasmodic hints of future glories, their freshness and exuberance make for highly pleasurable listening.

As in the early piano sonatas, the trios usually turn to the comic minor, often with striking effect – for example in the violins' canonic imitations in the fourth movement of No 4, or the eloquent chromaticism in the second movement of No 5. The slow movements are accompanied arias for the first violin, often touching in their innocence and candour, while the ebullient Presto outer movements delight in quirkily irregular phrase-lengths, quick-fire repartee and contrasts of texture and register – the kind of music that led po-faced North German critics to accuse Haydn of debasing the art with 'comic fooling'.

The Petersen Quartet responds vividly to the music's youthful verve, with polished ensemble, keen attack and a wide spectrum of colour and dynamics. Purists may raise an eyebrow at the special effects the players deploy in repeats, especially in minuets – added touches of imitation, pizzicato and even col legno. But the young Haydn, famed for his mischievous humour, may have enjoyed these liberties. The recording combines clarity with an attractive church resonance.

String Quartets, Op 9

String Quartets, Op 9 Nos 1, 3 and 4
Kodály Quartet (Attila Falváy, Tamás Szabó vns Gábor Fias va János Devich vc)
Naxos 8 550786 (52 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1993

String Quartets, Op 9 Nos 2, 5 and 6
Kodály Quartet (Attila Falváy, Tamás Szabó vns Gábor Fias va János Devich vc) Ⓢ
Naxos 8 550787 (58 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1993

Overshadowed by four dozen later masterpieces, Haydn's Op 9 has usually received short shrift from both players and commentators. Least neglected of the set is the D minor, No 4, described by Hans Keller as 'the first great string quartet in the history of music'. The minor mode at this period (1769-70) invariably drew something special from Haydn, and this work stands apart from the others for its intensity of expression, its mastery of texture and development and the sheer character of its ideas. The opening Allegro moderato could well have been at the back of Mozart's mind when he came to write his own great D minor Quartet, K421. Of Nos 1-5 it is true that there are longueurs, nowhere more so than in the stiff, gawky opening movements of Nos 1-3, and the routine set of variations that opens No 5. But there are compensations elsewhere: in the terse, resourceful and witty finales; in the varied minuets, ranging from the high-stepping No 5, with its alfresco octave doublings, to the suave, chromatically subtle No 2; and in several of the slow movements. The Kodály Quartet is, as ever, a sympathetic Haydn exponent, impressing with its slightly old-fashioned warmth of sonority, the natural musicality of its phrasing and its care for blend, balance and intonation, though the boomy church acoustic hardly helps.

String Quartets, Op 20

Awards 1993

String Quartets, Op 20 Nos 1-6 P
Quatuor Mosaïques (Erich Höbarth, Andrea Bischof vns Anita Mitterer va Christophe Coin vc)
Astrée Naïve ② E8802 Ⓕ
(147 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1990 ◉◉◉
Also available separately: E8785 – Nos 1, 5 and 6. E8786 – Nos 2-4

The Op 20 String Quartets date from the composer's so-called Sturm und Drang period, though Haydn's increasingly frequent use of the more dramatic and 'serious' minor mode in these pieces can perhaps be attributed just as much to the fruitful influence of the three operatic projects he had been working on just a few years previously. Moreover, these quartets reveal a greater preoccupation with counterpoint than any of his music to that date, and the great fugal finales of Nos 2, 5 and 6 clearly herald the consummate craftsman so overwhelmingly displayed in the mature quartets to come. Incidentally, the Op 20 set's nickname Sun derives from the illustration on the handsome title-page of the Hummel edition of this music, at the top of which peers out the sun-god's head. These wonderfully flexible performances display an altogether breathtaking refinement, sensitivity and illumination. Indeed, in terms of expressive subtlety, imaginative intensity and sheer depth of feeling, the Mosaïques' achievement in these marvellous works is unmatched.

String Quartets, Op 20 Nos 1, 3 and 4
The Lindsays (Peter Cropper, Ronald Birks vns Robin Ireland va Bernard Gregor-Smith vc)
ASV CDDCA1027 (79 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997 ●
String Quartets, Op 20 Nos 2, 5 and 6
The Lindsays (Peter Cropper, Ronald Birks vns Robin Ireland va Bernard Gregor-Smith vc)
ASV CDDCA1057 (66 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1998 ●

The Lindsays are Haydn interpreters of rare understanding and communicative flair. Their characterisation is bold and decisive, enhanced by a scrupulous observation of the composer's expression and dynamic markings. Faster movements tend to be more urgent, less ruminative, than those from the Quatuor Mosaïques. The zingarese cross-rhythms of No 4's Minuet have an abrasive edge, and the Presto e scherzando finale is no mere frolic in The Lindsays' hands – its wit can scathe and sting, and the closing theme, with its gypsy acciaccaturas, has an almost manic insistence. Elsewhere The Lindsays bring an ideal warmth and lyricism to the opening movement of No 1, characteristically phrasing in long, eloquent spans, and a quixotic energy to the outer movements of the G minor, No 3, where the Quatuor Mosaïques is broader and tougher. In the Minuet of No 3 The Lindsays' singing line and flexibility of pulse realise to the full Haydn's searching harmonic progressions; and the lulling E flat Trio is exquisitely floated. Each of the slow movements reveals dedication and profound identification. The players vindicate their dangerously slow tempo in the sublime Affettuoso e sostenuto of No 1 with the breadth and intensity of their phrasing, subtlety of colour and feeling for harmonic flux. As ever, the occasional moment of impure intonation is a small price to pay for performances of such colour, character and spontaneity. The Lindsays observe all the important marked repeats and the recording is vivid and truthful.

Characterisation of the sharply contrasted Nos 2, 5 and 6 is invariably vivid, phrasing is alive and inventive, and the players combine a scrupulous care for Haydn's dynamic and expression markings with a strong feeling for the music's larger contours. The opening movement of the C major has a bold, exhilarating sweep and they underline the operatic associations of the Adagio, with Peter Cropper bringing a vocal eloquence to his consolatory E flat cantabile; and in the closing fugue, where Haydn wears his learning with supreme nonchalance, they play with captivating lightness and delicacy, the dynamic held down to sotto voce until the final send-off, as the composer requests.

The F minor, Haydn's most tragic quartet, and the sunny, extrovert A major are no less compelling. Both final fugues are intensely vital within their prescribed sotto voce dynamic; that in No 6 delightfully skittish. Equally enjoyable is the Adagio of No 6, for Peter Cropper's tender, spontaneously inflected line, the pointing of the beautiful viola part and, again, the subtle tonal shading in response to harmonic flux.

String Quartets, Op 33

Awards
1996

String Quartets, Op 33 Nos 1-6 🄿
Quatuor Mosaïques (Erich Höbarth, Andrea Bischof vns Anita Mitterer va Christophe Coin vc)
Auvidis Naïve ② E8801
(121 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995-96 ●●●
Nos 2, 3 and 5 won a 1996 Gramophone Award
Nos 1, 4 and 6 are also available separately on
Auvidis Naïve E8570 Ⓕ ●

The Mosaïques, at a rather slower tempo than usual, find in the theme-and-variation finale of the G major Quartet, No 5, an unsuspected reflective tenderness. The theme itself is played with a characteristic touch of flexibility and a gentle lift to the dotted rhythms; in the first variation Erich Höbarth shapes his decorative semiquavers fioriture with apparently spontaneous fantasy; the luminous, high-lying textures of the second are exquisitely realised; and even the Presto send-off has a delicacy and whimsy in keeping with what has gone before. The Mosaïques' readings of the slow movements in the so-called Joke (No 2) and Bird (No 3) Quartets are again outstanding in their grave tenderness, their sensitivity to harmonic flux and the improvisatory freedom Erich Höbarth brings to his ornamental figuration. The Bird, in particular, receives as searching a performance as ever heard: in the first movement the players steal in almost imperceptibly, respond vividly to the music's richness and wit, and bring a spectral pianissimo to the mysterious lull in the development. The Slavonic finale, one of several movements to benefit from the lighter, more flexible period bows, goes with terrific fire and panache.

From the teasingly timed initial upbeat of the D major Quartet, No 6, the Quatuor Mosaïques' performances have all the familiar hallmarks: inventive phrasing, subtly varied colour, a sure sense of organic growth and a spontaneous-sounding delight in Haydn's inspired unpredictability. Tempo and manner in the opening Vivace assai of No 6 are, typically, gentler than that of the equally imaginative Lindsays, the articulation lighter and more delicate, as you would expect from period strings. They catch ideally the music's glancing scherzando spirit, with a delightfully eager, quick-witted give-and-take between the instruments. Like The Lindsays, the Mosaïques vividly play up the contrast between the perky, high-stepping D major theme and alternating D minor melody. But the Mosaïques flex the tempo more freely and play with the length of Haydn's upbeats, to witty or pathetic effect.

In the Andante of the B minor Quartet (No 1) the Mosaïques arguably overdo the whimsical hesitations. However, their unusally reflective way with this movement, and the sense of remoteness they bring to the strange, spare second theme is very appealing. As for the undervalued B flat Quartet (No 4), it is a delight throughout, from the puckish opening movement, with its quasi-improvisatory freedom to the comic exuberance of the finale; the vitality and point of the inner voices' semiquavers in the finale's G minor episode are typical of the character the Mosaïques bring to seemingly routine accompanying figuration.

In sum, this set is a winner. It has playing that marries uncommon style, technical finesse (tuning, blend and balance suffering little by comparison with the finest modern-instrument quartets) and re-creative flair. And the recording has an attractive ambient warmth.

String Quartets, Op 33 Nos 1, 2 and 4
The Lindsays (Peter Cropper, Ronald Birks vns Robin Ireland va Bernard Gregor-Smith vc)
ASV CDDCA937 (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1994 ●

The Lindsays' is chamber-music-making of unusual re-creative flair, untouched by the faintest hint of routine. In their uncommonly grave, inward readings of the slow movements of the E flat and B flat Quartets they sustain a daringly slow tempo magnificently, phrasing in long, arching spans, always acutely sensitive to harmonic movement, as in their subtle colouring of Haydn's breathtaking tonal excursions in No 4. Beethoven is evoked in The Lindsays' swift, mordant reading of No 1's epigrammatic Scherzo: rarely have the waspish part-writing and the abrupt, disconcerting contrasts in dynamics and articulation been so vividly realised. Typically, it makes the most of the complete change of mood and texture in the major-key Trio, finding an almost Viennese sweetness of tone and phrase, complete with touches of portamento. The finale, fast, fierce, utterly uncomical, has a distinct whiff of the Hungarian puszta here, both in the wild gypsy figuration and the mounting passion of the sequence in the development. The Lindsays bring an ideal spaciousness and flexibility to the urbane, quietly spoken first movement of the E flat Quartet, No 2, taking due note of Haydn's cantabile marking. In the finales of this Quartet and No 4 they bring vital, inventively varied phrasing, palpably relishing Haydn's exuberance and comic sleight of hand. Here, as occasionally elsewhere, it's easy to overlook the odd moment of rhythmic unsteadiness or impure intonation for the sake of such characterful music-making.

String Quartets, Op 33 Nos 3, 5 and 6
The Lindsays (Peter Cropper, Ronald Birks vns Robin Ireland va Bernard Gregor-Smith vc)
ASV CDDCA938 (61 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995 ●●

The Lindsays eclipse all-comers in range of colour, vital, creative phrasing and emotional penetration. They respond gleefully to the subversive comedy that pervades each of the three works – most overtly in the Slavonic-influenced finale of The Bird (No 3), and in the outrageous Scherzo of No 5, where with explosive sforzandos and sly touches of timing they relish to the full Haydn's rhythmic and dynamic mayhem. But time and again in this music wit is suddenly suffused with poetry; and The Lindsays bring a glancing delicacy and grace of interplay to, say, the startling tonal deflexions in the opening Vivace assai of No 6. With The Lindsays' slower-than-usual tempo and wonderfully tender, contained sotto voce, the second movement of No 3, where Haydn transmutes the Minuet-scherzo into a hymn, becomes the expressive core of the quartet. The variation finales of Nos 5 and 6 can easily seem anticlimactic. Here, though, the players' rhythmic point and inventively varied phrasing and dynamics (repeats are never mere repetitions) make the music consistently compelling. The Lindsays observe both repeats in sonata movements – particularly important in the first movement of The Bird, where the four-bar lead-back to the development adds yet another point of harmonic subtlety. They constantly provoke you to respond afresh to Haydn; to his wit, comic exuberance and his often unsuspected profundity.

String Quartet, Op 42

Haydn String Quartet, Op 42
Schumann String Quartet No 3 in A, Op 41 No 3
Shostakovich String Quartet No 3 in F, Op 73
Allegri Quartet (Peter Carter, David Roth vns Jonathan Barritt va Bruno Schrecker vc)
Naim Audio NAIMCD016 (73 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996

The beauty of these readings is that they mean what they say. There is no hint of any over-earnestness and the programme has been very carefully chosen. Haydn's exquisite Op 42 is given an especially winning rendition, the Andante ed innocentemente first movement donning a degree of understatement that reflects its equivocal personality. Following Haydn's Op 42 with Shostakovich's Op 73 was an inspired idea: the former ends quietly and the latter opens with a sort of distracted innocence, marking time before the real drama starts. The argument suddenly intensifies, playfully, provocatively, though characterisation is cleverly differentiated. In the second movement, Prokofiev is an obvious point of reference and there has rarely been a more delicately pointed account of the weird, tiptoe staccato passage that emerges out of the first idea. The third movement is a striking precursor of the 10th Symphony's violent 'Stalin' Scherzo, the slow movement redolent of the 12th Symphony's noble opening and the long finale ending in a mood of veiled mystery. Above all, this is profoundly natural playing and the recordings maintain a realistic 'small concert-hall' ambience throughout. The disc ends with an affectionate, flexible performance of Schumann's loveliest string quartet. The opening Andante espressivo sets the mood while the ensuing second set (1'19") is limpid and rapturous, and the finale – which in some hands can seem repetitive – is given precisely the right degree of rhythmic emphasis. Again one senses wholehearted identification between the repertoire and its interpreters – and while one may question the wisdom of mixed-repertory CD programmes, this one is so well planned and well played, that it can be recommended even to those who already own recordings within cycles.

String Quartets, Op 54

String Quartets, Op 54 Nos 1-3
The Lindsays (Peter Cropper, Ronald Birks vns Robin Ireland va Bernard Gregor-Smith vc) Ⓕ
ASV CDDCA582 (66 minutes: DDD) ●●

All three quartets are in the usual four-movement form but they contain many surprises: in No 1, the false recapitulation in the first movement, the dark modulations in the following sonata-form Allegretto and the Hungarian gipsy flavour (anticipated in the Minuet) and mischievousness of the final rondo. No 2 has a rhapsodic fiddler in its second movement, a nostalgic minuet with an extraordinarily anguished trio, and an Adagio finale in which a Presto section turns out to be no more than an episode.

A notable feature of No 3 is its ternary-form Largo cantabile, the centre of which is more like a mini-concerto for the first violin; 'Scotch snaps' pervade the Minuet, and pedal points the finale. The performances (and the recording) are superb, marked by unanimity, fine tone, suppleness of phrasing, and acute dynamic shaping; in the second movement of No 1 there are hushed passages whose homogeneity and quality of sound are both quite remarkable. Overall, this recording is irresistible.

String Quartets, Op 55

String Quartets, Op 55 Nos 1-3
The Lindsays (Peter Cropper, Ronald Birks vns Robin Ireland va Bernard Gregor-Smith vc)
ASV CDDCA906 (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1994 ●

Most immediately striking of the trilogy is the F minor work, No 2, with its searching double variations on related minor and major themes (a favourite form in Haydn's later music), spiky, rebarbative second movement Allegro and strangely spare contrapuntal Minuet. The A major, No 1, has much of this key's traditional brilliance, with ample scope for the leader's creative virtuosity in the outer movements and the stratospheric trio of the minuet; in contrast the noble, wonderfully scored Adagio cantabile prefigures the profound slow movements of Haydn's final years. The more inward-looking No 3 in B flat is specially remarkable for the varied recapitulations in the flanking movements, astonishingly free and inventive even for Haydn, and the subtle chromatic colouring in all four movements which may just owe something to the quartets Mozart had dedicated to Haydn three years earlier.

Here and there The Lindsays' intonation is less than true, especially from the leader, but as so often with this group, this is a small price to pay for performances of such colour and penetration. The balance, as with many recent quartet recordings, is a shade closer than ideal but the overall sound picture is very acceptable.

String Quartets, Op 64

String Quartets, Op 64 Nos 1-3
Kodály Quartet (Attila Falvay, Tamás Szabo vns Gábor Fias va János Devich vc)
Naxos 8 550673 (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1992

String Quartets, Op 64 Nos 4-6
Kodály Quartet (Attila Falvay, Tamás Szabo vns Gábor Fias va János Devich vc)
Naxos 8 550674 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1992

The so-called Lark (No 5), with its soaring opening melody and moto perpetuo finale, is perhaps the most immediately fetching of all Haydn's quartets. But No 6 is at least as fine, with its intimate and intensely argued opening movement, its poignant, exquisitely textured Andante and a finale full of instrumental fooling and insouciant contrapuntal virtuosity. Of the other works, No 2 is one of Haydn's most astringent pieces, from its tonally deceptive opening to the mordant, unsettling humour of the finale. Quartets Nos 3 and 4 return to a more familiar vein of sociable wit. Both are endlessly subtle and surprising in their arguments, with cantabile slow movements of peculiar candour and eloquence. Quartet No 1, the least favoured of the six is certainly the plainest in its thematic ideas. But it is an absorbing, immensely sophisticated piece, exploring an astonishing range of textures; the recapitulation of the leisurely first movement opens up marvellous new harmonic vistas, while the central development of the finale is a canonic tour de force. The Kodály Quartet has rightly won plaudits for its wonderfully civilised playing; mellow and lyrical, far removed from the highly-strung brilliance cultivated by many modern quartets. Ensemble and intonation are first-class, tempos generally spacious, with broad, natural and beautifully matched phrasing. It is at its very finest where Haydn is at his most searching; and the Quartets Nos 2, 5 and 6 each receive outstanding, deeply considered performances. In one or two movements the Kodály's penchant for slowish tempos leads to a slight dourness. Against that, it brings a deliciously lazy Ländler lilt, enhanced by the first violin's portamentos, to the Trio of No 6, and a grave, inward intensity to each of Haydn's slow movements. The recording, made in a Budapest church, is resonant and less intimate than is ideal in this music.

String Quartets, Opp 71 and 74

String Quartets, Op 71 Nos 1-3
Kodály Quartet (Attila Falvay, Tamás Szabo vns
Gábor Fias va János Devich vc) Ⓢ
Naxos 8 550394 (62 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1989

String Quartets, Op 74 Nos 1-3
Kodály Quartet (Attila Falvay, Tamás Szabo vns
Gábor Fias va János Devich vc) Ⓢ
Naxos 8 550396 (63 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1989

The Kodály Quartet plays with self-evident joy and an easy neatness of ensemble. There is never a hint of routine and the inter-communication is matched by enormous care for detail. Just sample the elegant Andante with variations which form the slow movement of Op 71 No 3, or the witty Minuet which follows, or any of the consistently inspired Op 74 set. The hushed intensity of playing in the Largo assai of Op 74 No 3 is unforgettable. The recordings are wholly natural and balanced within a well-judged acoustic; the sound is of the highest quality and documentation is excellent. At their modest price this pair of CDs is irresistible.

String Quartets, Op 76

String Quartets, Op 76 Nos 1-6 H
Tátrai Quartet (Vilmos Tátrai, Mihály Szücs vns György Konrád va Ede Banda vc)
Hungaroton ② HCD12812/3-2 (128 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1964-65

Your reaction to this receiving our recommendation may be, for heaven's sake, why not a modern recording in stereo? Play them and you will know the answer. The performances are breathtaking – for each player's sensitivity and brilliance, their intimately interwoven ensemble and, most of all, their revelatory characterisation. Even the recording is remarkable for its age. When writing these six works in his mid-sixties Haydn was at the peak of his powers. You will be bowled over as much by their unpredictable ingenuity as by their startling range and variety of experience. The Tátrai's musical response is very immediate. This finds outlet in readiness to risk fast tempos for livelier movements (always with a touch of virtuoso brilliance when needed) as well as great intensity in slow movements. Pungency of accentuation and clarity of articulation also contribute to its youthful vividness, as does, even more, its wide range of dynamics and colour – so arrestingly demonstrated in the dramatic opening movement of No 2. Though the sound quality may not compare with the best on offer today, its clarity is admirable: microphones seem less close than on many modern recordings, permitting everything to emerge in better perspective. But it's Haydn's genius that overwhelms you, and just as Haydn's own imagination seems progressively to take wing in the course of the six works, so does the players' own commitment.

String Quartets, Op 76 Nos 1-3
The Lindsays (Peter Cropper, Ronald Birks vns Robin Ireland va Bernard Gregor-Smith vc)
ASV CDDCA1076 (75 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1998-99 ●

These are among the finest Haydn quartet recordings heard in years, performances which will quickly establish themselves as classics of the genre. They are consistently a degree more refined in texture and control of dynamic than the Lindsays' earlier live recordings, and the ensemble is more polished. Yet the feeling of spontaneity is just as intense as before, with Haydn's witty moments being pointed even more infectiously, as in the finale of Op 76 No 2 where in the main theme the little upward portamentos at the end of the eighth bar are delectably timed on each occurrence. The studio sound is fuller, too, and far better balanced, so that one can register far more clearly than before the first violin's rapid triplets in the finale of the Emperor; it is ideally crisp articulation. Matching the new performances of the Fifths and the Emperor, The Lindsays' account of Op 76 No 1 is just as strongly characterised. The sense of fun in the opening Allegro con spirito is deliciously brought out, leading on to an account of the sublime

Adagio, both dedicated and refined, which conveys a Beethovenian depth of expression, making most rivals sound superficial.

String Quartets, Op 76 – Nos 4-6
Lindsay Quartet (Peter Cropper, Ronald Birks vns Robin Ireland va Bernard Gregor-Smith vc)
ASV CDDCA1077 (78 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1999 ○○

Here, in the last three Op 76 quartets, you have Haydn interpretations that bring forth the full range of expression in these inspired works of his official retirement. They are not just polished and refined but communicate with an intensity that simulates live performance. No 5 in D was one of the works which The Lindsays recorded earlier live at the Wigmore Hall, but the extra subtlety this time means that rhythms are a degree more liltingly seductive, in which humour is more delightfully pointed, as in the repeated cadence-figure at the start of the finale, with comic pauses beautifully timed.

The quiet opening of No 4, which gave rise to the nickname Sunrise, gently insinuates itself before the full thrust of the Allegro takes over; with its heightened contrasts, it could not be more captivating. Most strikingly, too, the slow movements in each of these three quartets are given a visionary intensity, matching The Lindsays' treatment of the slow movement of No 1 in the companion disc.

Here is music from the last years of Haydn's career – written soon after his return to Vienna from his second brilliantly successful visit to London – which in these performances has you thinking forward to middle or late Beethoven and the new world of the 19th century. So the Adagio of No 4 brings a hymn-like dedication, not least in the dark E flat minor episode, and the astonishing modulations in the Fantasia slow movement of No 6 convey the tingle of new discovery, with magical pianissimos for contrast. This was a work which for Donald Tovey marked a tailing-off of inspiration, but one registers the opposite with The Lindsays, when the adagio Fantasia gives way to such witty treatment both in the presto Minuet (in fact a scherzo), with its weird leaps, and the Allegro spirituoso finale.

With refined sound that draws out the subtleties of balance between these players, here is another disc of Haydn from The Lindsays that sets the highest standards.

String Quartets, Op 76 Nos 2-4
Alban Berg Quartet (Günter Pichler, Gerhard Schulz vns Thomas Kakuska va Valentin Erben vc)
EMI 556166-2 (66 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1993-94

This disc is uncommonly fine, above all the performance of the D minor, No 2. The Berg take both outer movements more spaciously than most of their rivals. The opening Allegro is tough and austere, the players thinking and phrasing in long spans, bringing an urgent sweep to the development and a true sense of climax to the coda. And with its broader tempo the Berg realise details like the repeated hairpin crescendos on the sequence of tied notes in the second group. In the Berg's hands the Hungarian-tinged finale has great trenchancy and symphonic weight, with an imaginative variety of colour and accent.

The Emperor and the Sunrise are hardly less fine, marrying impressive formal control with a vivid sense of character and felicity of detail: listen, for instance, to the subtle timing and hushed, veiled tone at the sudden dip to E flat in the first movement of No 3; the rapt tenderness and breadth of phrase in the sublime Adagio of the Sunrise, the melody unfolding in a single unbroken span; or the deft management of the progressive speed increases in the finale of the same work. The leader's very fluid, ruminative phrasing in the Quartet's opening makes it seem even more than usual like a slow introduction, with the first phrase stealing in magically from nowhere.

At its best, especially in No 2, the Berg bring rare imaginative insight to this inexhaustible music. The recording is both clear and sympathetic.

String Quartets, Op 77

String Quartets – Op 77 Nos 1 and 2; Op 103 in D minor (unfinished) P
Quatuor Mosaïques (Erich Höbarth, Andrea Bischof vns Anita Mitterer va Christophe Coin vc) Ⓕ
Astrée Naïve E8800 (62 minutes: DDD)

Anyone who thinks that period-instrument performance means austerity and coolness should listen to this disc. Here is playing full of expressive warmth and vigour. The opening of Op 77 No 1 is done duly gracefully, but with a sturdy underlying rhythm and the Scherzo is crisp and alive. Then the first movement of the F major work is beautifully done, with many sensitive details; and the lovely second movement is ideally leisurely, so that the players have ample room for manoeuvre and the leader makes much of his opportunities for delicate playing in the filigree-like high music. The players show a real grasp of structure and illuminate the key moments with a touch more deliberation or a little additional weight of tone. These performances, clearly recorded, are competitive not merely within the protected world of 'early music' but in the bigger, 'real' world too!

Additional recommendation
String Quartets – Op 20, No 5; 'The Joke', Op 33 No 2; Op 54 No 1; 'The Lark', Op 64 No 5; 'The Rider', Op 74 No 3; 'Fifths', Op 76 No 2; Op 77 No 1
Emerson Quartet
DG ③ 471 327-2GH2 (141 minutes: DDD: 12/01) Ⓕ
A magnificent set – the Emersons' playing is lively, poised and expressive. An excellent introduction to Haydn's mature quartets.

Seven Last Words, Op 51

The Seven Last Words, Op 51, HobIII Nos 50-56
Rosamunde Quartet
ECM New Series 461 780-2 (66 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 2000 OO

This reading is alert not only to musical texture, but to the modulating phrase and the dramaturgy of key changes between movements. The playing is limpid and subtly coloured, sparing of vibrato (in that respect the Rosamunde are heedful of various period-instrument models) and, at the beginning of the third movement, suspended in a sense of rapture. Another imaginative aspect of this performance is the way it reflects the sense of the text, just as Haydn does in those movements that seem to follow the pattern of the words he set. This feeling of narrative is especially keen in the fourth movement, 'Woman, behold thy son!' and the closing 'Earthquake'.

So the list of virtues is fairly simple to enumerate: variety and refinement of tone, internal clarity, historical awareness, imagination and a certain poise that not all its rivals can claim in equal measure. It serves well as a compromise between period-instrument clarity and modern-instrument warmth. Against strong competition its fuller instrumental sonority is marginally to be preferred. First-rate reportage of a wonderful score.

Seven Last Words, Op 51[a] (interspersed with Seven Gregorian Responsories for Holy Week[b])
[a]Carmina Quartet (Matthias Enderle, Susanne Frank vns Wendy Champney va Stephan Goerner vc)
[b]Schola Romana Lucernensis / Father Roman Bannwart
Claves 50-2002 (74 minutes: DDD). Text and translation included. Recorded 1999-2000 Ⓕ O

Haydn's Seven Last Words was designed for performance in Holy Week, in the Santa Cueva grotto in Cádiz, with discourses from the bishop on each of the seven utterances followed by Haydn's musical meditation. Originally these were orchestral pieces, not the string quartet versions (arranged by Haydn to widen access to the music) which are more often given today. Haydn was concerned that 'seven Adagios' would be exhausting to the listener, and would probably not have favoured performance of them without a break. The idea of interspersing them with Holy Week Gregorian responsories is certainly an appropriate solution.

The group singing them here is a mixed choir, although we hear either the men or the women, never the two together. They sing in a carefully moulded style, cadences softly rounded off; ensemble is precise, from the women especially. The Carmina Quartet plays with a remarkably wide range of expression. The Introduction is quite fiercely done, and the 'Terremoto' at the end has a violence and is taken at a pace that almost obscures the pulse of the music.

In between, they play the 'seven Adagios' (as Haydn called them – actually three Largos, two Graves, a Lento and an Adagio) as they would any other Haydn slow movement. The first is quite relaxed and lyrical, although its accents are well marked, and it has touches of added ornamentation. Refinement and delicacy of line characterise the second, and the third, the E major meditation on 'Mother, behold thy son', is done with much tenderness.

In the fourth their realisation of Haydn's notated ornaments – the appoggiaturas in bars 2 and 4, and at several points later – are oddly perverse and disturbing: one played short, the other long, although the second phrase is a clear echo of the first. No 5 ('I thirst') again draws some very telling soft playing from the quartet, but also pained forzato accents, and there is forceful expression of 'Consummatum est', along with moments of tenderness. They play the E flat No 7 with the sense of calm and fulfilment that Haydn surely sought. Their tempos, generally, are well chosen, perhaps faster at times than many quartets take these pieces, but this helps bridge the gulf between Haydn's normal mode of expression and the special significance of this remarkable music.

Additional recommendation
Seven Last Words
Fitzwilliam Quartet P
Linn Records CKD153 (62 minutes: DDD: 7/01) Ⓕ

A chaste, inward reading on period instruments, deeply musical, swifter than some but always thoughtfully articulated. All in all, a compelling recording, beautifully balanced.

Piano Trios, Hob XV

Hob XV – No 1 in G minor; No 2 in F; No 5 in G; No 6 in F; No 7 in D; No 8 in B flat; No 9 in A; No 10 in E flat; No 11 in F minor; No 12 in E minor; No 13 in C minor; No 14 in A flat; No 15 in G; No 16 in D; No 17 in F; No 18 in A; No 19 in G minor; No 20 in B flat; No 21 in C; No 22 in E flat; No 23 in D minor; No 24 in D; No 25 in G, 'Gypsy Trio'; No 26 in F sharp minor; No 27 in C; No 28 in E; No 29 in E flat; No 30 in E flat; No 31 in E flat minor; No 32 in G;
No 34 in E; No 35 in A; No 36 in E flat; No 37 in F; No 38 in B flat; No 39 in F; No 40 in F; No 41 in G; No C1 in C; No f1 in E flat

---

Awards 1979

Piano Trios: HobXIV – No 6 in G; No C1 in C; HobXV – Nos 1-2, 5-32, 34-41, C1 and f1. Hob XVI – No 6 in G. Hob*deest* – D
Beaux Arts Trio (Isidore Cohen vn Bernard Greenhouse vc Menahem Pressler pf)
Philips ⓢ 454 098-2PB9 Ⓑ
(394 minutes: ADD)
Recorded 1970-79 OOO

Haydn's trios are essentially accompanied keyboard sonatas, with the cello wedded to the keyboard bass almost throughout; this lack of cello independence has deterred many groups from investigating their musical riches. Not, fortunately, the Beaux Arts, whose acclaimed complete cycle accumulated by stealth during the 1970s and has now reappeared on nine mid-price discs. The majority of the trios date from the 1780s and 1790s and contain some of Haydn's most imaginative, lyrical and harmonically adventurous music.

Two outstanding works from the 1780s are the E minor, No 12, with its passionate, closely worked opening Allegro, and No 14 in A flat, with its exquisitely tender Adagio in a remote E major that leads without a break into one of Haydn's most hilariously quixotic finales. The 14 magnificent trios of the 1790s range from relaxed, intimate pieces like the E flat, No 29, through the sombre, almost tragic F sharp minor, No 26, to the C major, No 27, unsurpassed in the whole series for its intellectual and virtuoso brilliance. Finest of all, perhaps, are the E major, No 28, with its radiant outer movements and its astonishing central E minor passacaglia; and the E flat, No 30, with its noble, lyrically expansive first movement, its deep-toned, often richly chromatic Andante and its glorious German-dance finale.

The Beaux Arts' playing throughout is vital, refined, and sharply responsive to the music's teeming richness and variety. The early trios were conceived for harpsichord, though such is the deftness and delicacy of Menahem Pressler's touch here that there is no question of the music being overpowered by the modern Steinway. In the later trios the players catch beautifully the leisurely, almost improvisatory feel of many of the opening movements, and bring a ruminative intensity, and a wonderful quality of soft playing to the great slow movements, while the finales have immense brio, wit and virtuosity, with ideally clean, crisp articulation from Pressler.

Occasionally in the earlier works the Beaux Arts sounds a touch oversophisticated for this guileless music – the opening violin solo in No 2 is a case in point. And there are a few disappointments in the later trios – the first movement of the great F sharp minor, No 26, sounds too lightweight, even skittish while, conversely, in the passacaglia of No 28 they take a ponderous view of Haydn's Allegretto. But there's a feast of superlative, little-known music here, most of the playing is remarkably felicitous, and the recording has Philips's customary warmth and refinement. £60 or so may seem a lot to fork out all at once, but no one is likely to regret the investment – this set will last a lifetime.

Piano Trios: HobXV – Nos 18, 24, 25 and 29
Vienna Piano Trio (Wolfgang Redik vn Marcus Trefny vc Stefan Mendl pf)
Nimbus NI5535 (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997 ●

The Gypsy Trio, No 25, may have been written in and for London, but this ensemble's short, snappy bowing, stomping piano accents and instinctive fluctuations of tempo and pulse in the finale, locate the work in the grape-treading, Romany heart of the Burgenland. The steps of the dance shape and pervade the E flat Trio, too, in the jaunty rhythms of the opening Allegretto, and the boisterous and cross-accented Allemande of its finale. Among countless delights in these bold performances is the sensitivity to the power of silence, and the short, hushed half-tones within the long-breathed lines of the Andante of the A major Trio. And, not least, the perceptive understanding and judgement of the shifting qualities of an Allegro which so well supports the structure of the outer movements of the D major, as well as enabling many a clearly articulated yet fanciful variation in the Gipsy Trio. These recordings are close, sometimes breathy, always thrillingly true.

Piano Trios: HobXV – Nos 27-30 🅿
Vera Beths vn Anner Bylsma vc Robert Levin fp
Sony Classical Vivarte SK53120 (74 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1992 ●●

These are truly magnificent pieces, full startling originality, and conceived on a grand scale – not simply long but composed with a remarkable spaciousness to their ideas and working-out. These performances do them ample justice, with their very brilliant and stylish pianism and a beautifully held instrumental balance: clearly Bylsma doesn't see Haydn's cello parts as routine stuff. Robert Levin, using a McNulty copy of a 1780 piano by J A Stein, produces playing of great vitality and delightful crispness, and puts across powerfully the intellectual force and the argumentative character of the music. This is outstandingly keen and vital musicianship, excellently recorded.

Piano Sonatas

Piano Sonatas: HobXVI – Nos 1-20, 28-62. HobIX – No 8, Seven Menuets from 'Kleine Tänze für die Jugend'. HobXVII – No 1, Capriccio in G; No 2, 20 Variations in A; No 3, 12 Variations in E flat; No 4, Fantasia in C; No 5, Six Variations in C; No 6, Variations in F minor; No 7, Five Variations in D; No 9, Adagio in F. Seven Last Words
John McCabe pf
Decca London ⑫ 443 785-2LC12 Ⓑ
(873 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1974-77 ●●●

McCabe's recordings of Haydn's piano sonatas represent one of the great recorded monuments of the keyboard repertoire. Sample any of the discs in this budget-price set and you will immediately become aware of the immense treasures on offer. The special qualities McCabe brings to his performances benefit from a composer's awareness of musical content, pursuing the structural argument with acute perceptions. Thus, assisted by the rich resonance and tonal subtlety of the modern piano, McCabe provides a consistently stylish view of Haydn's developing musical persona that comprehensively exploits this repertoire's inherent expressive potential. Spare textures and astonishing formal concentration in the earliest works establish a perfect balance between structure and content, and McCabe's crisp, poised playing enables the music to make its own potently expressive impact.

The middle-period sonatas demonstrate Haydn's further consolidation of style and technique. Harpsichord textures, reminiscent of Scarlatti, are still apparent in works such as the A flat Sonata (No 31), but so, too, are new influences. For instance, McCabe luxuriates in the Sturm und Drang characteristics of the G minor Sonata (No 32), penetrating to the core of the musical fabric to release the full power of the score's passion.

Haydn's piano sonatas reach a supreme level of refinement in the late works, and McCabe responds with suitably spacious playing, sensitive to the music's richer 'orchestral' colours. He brings a connoisseur's touch to the impressionistic harmonic effects in the first movement of the C major Sonata (No 60); his sinuous phrasing underlines the Schubertian flavour of the opening Andante to the D major Sonata (No 61); and ultimately achieves the perfect balance between content and design in the magisterial E flat Sonata (No 62).

McCabe's outstanding performances of both Seven Last Words and the ingeniously constructed F minor Variations are obvious highlights; but try, also, the enchanting Adagio, and the charming selection of dances. The 1970s recordings are vividly clear and McCabe's performances set the standards against which others will be judged.

Awards 1987

Piano Sonatas: HobXVI – No 20 in C minor; No 49 in E flat; No 34 in E minor; No 32 in B minor; No 42 in D; No 48 in C; No 51 in D; No 50 in C; No 52 in E flat; No 40 in G; No 37 in D. No 4, Fantasia in C. No 6, Variations in F minor. No 9, Adagio in F Alfred Brendel pf
Philips ④ 416 643-2PH4 (205 minutes: ADD/DDD) Ⓕ
Booklet included. ●●●

The sonatas collected in this set are some magnificent creations, wonderfully well played by Alfred Brendel. Within the order and scale of these works Haydn explores a rich diversity of musical languages, a wit and broadness of expression that quickly repays attentive listening. It is the capriciousness as much as the poetry that Brendel so perfectly attends to; his playing, ever alive to the vitality and subtleties, makes these discs a delight. The sophistication innate in the simple dance rhythms, the rusticity that emerges, but above all, the sheer joie de vivre are gladly embraced. Brendel's continual illumination of the musical ideas through intense study pays huge dividends. The recording quality varies enormously between the different works and though the close acoustic on some of the later discs could be faulted for allowing one to hear too much of the keyboard action, it certainly brings one into vivid contact with the music.

Piano Sonatas: HobXVI – G minor, No 44; C minor, No 20; E minor, No 34; G, No 40; C, No 48; E flat, No 49; C, No 50; D, No 51; E flat, No 52. HobXVII – No 4, Fantasia in C
András Schiff pf
Teldec ② 0630-17141-2 (147 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997 ●

András Schiff has consistently championed Haydn, not only the sonatas but also the glorious late piano trios. If his way with Haydn tends to be more intimate, less robust and less gleefully subversive than Alfred Brendel's, Schiff is equally acute in his responses to the music's drama, wit and poetry, and in his control of narrative line. His 'centred' tone and limpid, subtly coloured soft playing are a constant delight, as is his variety of articulation and nuance. He plays all the marked repeats, embellishing and dramatising them as appropriate; and he is alive to Haydn's manipulations of silence, timing pauses and fermatas with an ear for their exact comic or dramatic significance.

As for the great C minor Sonata, Schiff's is one of the most searching readings on record: the outer movements combine refinement of detail with bold dramatic contrasts and a terrific overall sweep. The finale, a notch slower than Brendel's, is also more impassioned and disturbing, rising (especially in the repeat) to a final climax of desperate intensity. Schiff's virtuoso technique – and his understanding of Haydn's silences – pays special dividends in a dazzling performance of the C major Fantasia. And he wonderfully realises the richness and sophistication of the final three sonatas. In the first movement of the C major, where Haydn conjures miracles from his initial vision of dry bones, Schiff's playing is as crisp and as vividly orchestrated as Brendel's. Schiff is also more spacious in the E flat sonata, a magnificent, probing reading which realises the music's reach, poetry and harmonic daring as completely as any.

The recording captures the beautiful, luminous sonorities of his Bösendorfer, and provides just the right amount of space around the sound.

Piano Sonatas: HobXVI – A, No 26; B minor, No 32; C sharp minor, No 36; D, No 37; E flat, No 49
Leif Ove Andsnes pf
EMI 556756-2 (58 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997 ●

This disc offers delectable performances of five shrewdly contrasted works: two troubled, trenchant minor-key sonatas from the 1770s juxtaposed with a pair of lightweight pieces from the same period and culminating in the great E flat Sonata. Andsnes is responsive to the individual character of these sonatas, to their richness and variety of incident, and their sheer unpredictablility. With his wide spectrum of colour and dynamics he makes no apologies for using a modern Steinway. But his playing, founded on a pellucid cantabile touch and diamantine passagework, marries classical refinement and clarity with a spontaneous exuberance, a sense that the next phrase is yet to be created. Repeats are never merely repetitions, and Andsnes is always ready to add stylish and witty touches of embellishment. The opening movements of both minor-key sonatas have a lithe, sinewy urgency, above all in the vehement sequences of their developments, together with a rare delicacy of nuance: and here, as elsewhere, you notice how alive and concentrated is his piano and pianissimo playing. Andsnes brings a bright, buoyant yet lyrical approach to the E flat Sonata's outer movements, to the wonderful Adagio a limpid line, a subtly flexed pulse and, in the B flat minor central episode, a true sense of passion. With few provisos this is just the sort of playing – joyous, imaginative, involving – to win Haydn's sonatas a wider following.

The recording of the E flat, made in a church in Oslo, has slightly more ambient warmth than that of the remaining sonatas, recorded at EMI's Abbey Road studios. But throughout, the piano sound is natural and present without being too closely miked.

Haydn Piano Sonatas: HobXVI – A, No 30;
E flat, No 52 Schubert Piano Sonata No 14 in
A minor, D784. Marche militaire No 1 in D, D733
(arr Tausig) Evgeni Kissin pf
Sony Classical SK64538 (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1994 ◉

Enormously enjoyable! This is Haydn playing of high style and verve – also affectionate, articulate, colourful and expressive – and its vitality seems authentic even when Kissin asks you to admire the means with which he achieves it. This is not wilful or eccentric playing. By the end of the A major work, an engaging and (even by Haydn's standards) unconventional sonata, you feel its stature has been enhanced, which is just as it should be. Kissin meets the greater challenge of Haydn's last Sonata equally well. The breadth as well as the brilliance of the first movement is there, and its warmth; his tempo may be a little brisker than usual but it still allows for weight. The last movement Presto really is breakneck, at a speed which would be unwise, not to say unrealistic, for most others; once again, the impression is of allure allied to perfectly judged dramatic tension and articulate speech. Maybe he sustains the phrases of the Adagio with less success: they tend to emerge a bar at a time instead of as an arching span. How difficult this is to do when tone on the piano dies so quickly. But it is precisely this kind of growth and building through sentences and long paragraphs – and through silences – that he manages so well in the first movement of the Schubert sonata. Above all, there is a commanding vision of the whole. The recording balance is not too close; the sound pleasingly open and natural.

Piano Sonatas: HobXVI – C, No 35; C sharp minor,
No 36; D, No 37; E flat, No 38; G, No 39
Jenö Jandó pf
Naxos 8 553128 (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1993 ◉

The exquisite, classical balance evident in these six keyboard sonatas makes them especially rewarding examples of the composer's exploitation of the piano's broad expressive range and rich textural variety. This volume in Jenö Jandó's complete edition presents these pieces in a compelling, modern-instrument version. For example, there is brilliance and sparkle in the opening movements of the D major and E flat Sonatas; warmth and dramatic intensity in the slow movements (most notably in the Baroque echoes of the Sonatas in C major and D major), and an appealing blend of wit and elegance in finales such as the third movement of the D major Sonata. Most remarkable, though, is the G major Sonata, where Jandó's precision and sensitive balance of linear and harmonic dimensions convey the work's concerto character and Haydn's imaginative approach to form. Try Jandó's engaging account of the opening Allegro, his deft balance of the slow movement's effective blend of major and minor, and his exuberant virtuosity in the finale.

Piano Sonatas: HobXVI – E flat, No 49; C, No 50; D,
No 51; E flat, No 52
Jenö Jandó pf
Naxos 8 550657 (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1992

The keyboard sonatas which Haydn originally intended for piano, such as the four considered here, show the composer's exploration of the instrument's capacity for greater dynamic variation. Jandó is sensitive to the relationship between motif and dynamics which is particularly evident in the E flat and D major Sonatas respectively. Aided by clear recorded sound, Jandó's warmth in the lyrical passages provides a dramatic contrast to his crisp, positive approach in the livelier music. Jandó's glittering technique has a high profile in the other two sonatas in the programme. His well-turned readings are uncontroversial, but they lack nothing in excitement. Sample the finale of the E flat Sonata, where the wealth of expressive detail at an extremely fast tempo is breathtaking.

Masses

Missa Sancti Bernardi de Offida in B flat, 🅿
HobXXII/10, 'Heiligmesse'. Mare Clausum,
HobXXIVa/9. Insanae et vanae curae. Motetti de
Venerabili Sacramento, HobXXIIIc/5a-d.
Te Deum in C, HobXXIIIc/2

Jörg Hering ten Harry van der Kamp bass
Tölz Boys' Choir; Tafelmusik / Bruno Weil
Sony Classical SK66260 (63 minutes: DDD). Texts Ⓕ
and translations included. Recorded 1994

A special attraction for Haydn lovers is the first-ever recording of the unfinished ode Mare Clausum, commissioned in 1794 by Haydn's English friend Lord Abingdon, and abandoned when the nobleman was imprisoned for libel. The gauche, crudely chauvinistic verses, trumpeting England's sovereignty of the sea, should make the most hardened Europhobe blush. But the two numbers Haydn completed are worthy of his ripest style: a noble F major bass aria with rich, inventive writing for woodwind, authoritatively sung by Harry van der Kamp, and a D major chorus whose verve and contrapuntal power presage the late Masses and oratorios. Under Bruno Weil's spirited direction both the Tölz Boys' Choir, with their bright-edged, slightly breathy tone, and the period orchestra, Tafelmusik, is on first-rate form here and throughout this enterprisingly planned disc. It includes the thrilling, majestic, late Te Deum and the motet Insanae et vanae curae, adapted from a 'storm' chorus in the oratorio Il ritorno di Tobia.

Weil's reading is eagerly responsive to the music's drama, with taut rhythms, sharp dynamic contrasts and keen instrumental detailing; and he maintains the initial pulse through the tranquil D major section. Between these masterpieces the four little Motetti de Venerabili from the 1750s (another recorded first) inevitably sound tame, for all their easy tunefulness and skilful marshalling of rococo cliché. The largest work on the disc is, of course, the so-called Heiligmesse, first of the six magnificent Mass settings of Haydn's old age. This receives an energetic, uplifting reading, with brisk tempos, fresh, incisive choral work and strongly etched orchestral colours. In one or two sections Weil can drive too hard and Harry van der Kamp sometimes overwhelms the excellent boy soloists. But there is no doubting the vigour and joyfulness of Weil's reading, nor the skill and commitment of his forces. Quite apart from its pioneering value, this is an inspiring Haydn collection whose appeal is enhanced by vivid sound.

Mass No 1, Missa Sunt bona mixta malis, P
HobXXII/2 – Kyrie; part of Gloria. Non nobis, Domine,
HobXXIIIa/1. Ave regina in A, HobXXIII*b*/3.
Responsoria de Venerabilis, HobXXIII*c*/4*a*-d.
Responsorium ad absolutionem in D minor,
HobXXII*b*/1. Salve regina in E, HobXXIII*b*/1. Mass No
7 in B flat, HobXXII/7, Missa brevis Sancti Johannis
de Deo ('Little Organ Mass')
Marie-Claude Vallin, Ann Monoyios sops
Tölz Boys' Choir; L'Archibudelli (with Anner Bylsma vc Anthony Woodrow db Bob van Asperen org);
Tafelmusik / Bruno Weil
Sony Classical Vivarte SK53368 (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included
Recorded 1992-93

This is the first appearance on disc of two recent Haydn discoveries, the brief Offertorium Non nobis, Domine and fragments of a Mass Sunt bona mixta malis. But its real charms lie in two works for solo soprano, choir and orchestra composed to mark the entry into convent life of Therese Keller whom Robbins Landon suggests was Haydn's great love. Be that as it may, what seeps out of every pore is a warmth and sincerity, something akin to profound inner happiness, which makes one wonder just how deep Haydn's love was for the devout Therese Keller.

Marie-Claude Vallin captures the essential innocence of the Ave regina; her voice has a naive, almost childlike quality, although in her ethereally soaring high notes and fluent trills there is no doubting her technical command. Ann Monoyios has an altogether fuller, more mature quality as befits the more intense Salve regina. Bruno Weil's support for these two delightful singers is as unobtrusive as it is sympathetic. His excellent team of musicians (not forgetting splendid work from the recording team) are allowed to relax in performances which seem almost to float on air, so graceful and effortless does it sound. Add to this a performance of the Little Organ Mass (No 7) of rare poise and elegance and you have a disc of real beauty.

Masses – No 1a in G, HobXXII/3, P
'Missal rorate coeli desuper'; No 13 in B flat, HobXXII/13, 'Creation' Mass (with alternative setting of the Gloria)
Susan Gritton sop Pamela Helen Stephen mez
Mark Padmore ten Stephen Varcoe bar
Collegium Musicum 90 Chorus; Collegium
Musicum 90 / Richard Hickox
Chandos Chaconne CHAN0599 (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1995 ●

The Creation Mass is no less resplendent or searching than, say, the Nelson Mass or the Harmoniemesse, a glorious affirmation of Haydn's reverent, optimistic yet by no means naive faith. Even by Haydn's standards, the work is startling in its exploitation of colourful and dramatic key contrasts, as in the sudden swerve from F major to an apocalyptic fortissimo D flat at 'Judicare vivos'; the Benedictus, characteristically, moves from serene pastoral innocence (shades of 'With verdure clad' from The Creation) to urgent intensity in its central development; and the sublime G major Agnus Dei has a profound supplicatory fervour extraordinary even among the composer's many memorable settings of this text.

This reading eclipses previous recordings in the quality of its choir and soloists, the subtlety of Hickox's direction and the vividness and transparency of the recorded sound. In faster movements like the Kyrie and the openings of the Gloria and Credo Hickox strikes just the right balance between dignity and happy, pulsing energy, relishing each of Haydn's dramatic coups; and he brings a marvellous clarity and verve, and a sure sense of climax, to the chromatically inflected fugues in the Gloria and at 'Dona nobis pacem'. Abetted by his first-rate orchestra, Hickox is always alive to the felicities of Haydn's scoring, while the 24-strong professional choir is superbly responsive throughout.

We also get the alternative version of the Gloria, and the ultra-compressed (6'49") and instantly forgettable Missa rorate coeli desuper, which David Wyn Jones, in his excellent note, wryly describes as 'a reminder of how perfunctory church music in 18th-century Austria could be'. It is neatly dispatched by Hickox and his forces, but inevitably comes as an anticlimax.

Masses – in E flat, Hob.XXII:4 'Great Organ Mass'[a];
in C, Hob.XXII:8 'Mariazeller'
Susan Gritton sop Louise Winter mez
Mark Padmore ten Stephen Varcoe bar
[a]Ian Watson org
Collegium Musicum 90 / Richard Hickox
Chandos Chaconne CHAN0674 Ⓕ
(71 minutes: DDD). Recorded c2002 ●●

This concluding issue in Richard Hickox's prize-winning Haydn Mass series follows a similar pattern to earlier discs, offering exhilarating performances which wear their period style lightly. Gardiner for Philips is by a fraction the more crisply incisive, with pinpoint attack and clean textures: Hickox generally prefers slightly broader speeds, with full, immediate sound, more clearly bringing out the joy of Haydn's inspiration as well as the drama.

Both of these Masses are relatively neglected, even on disc. The Great Organ Mass, dating from 1768-69, seems not to have been composed for a special occasion, but, exceptionally, because Haydn wanted to write it. It is a distinctive work, both in its choice of key, E flat, rare for a Mass of the time, and for replacing oboes in the orchestra with two cor anglais.

The role of the organ is far more important, though; its Baroque figuration attractively decorative, while the Benedictus includes a concertante organ part, accompanying the quartet of soloists. Choosing light registration, Ian Watson produces delightful sounds throughout, with delicate organ decorations set in contrast with the relatively plain choral writing. As in the rest of the Hickox series, the singing and playing of Collegium Musicum 90 is most stylish.

Hickox has a special relish for Haydn's rhythmic exuberance, as in the syncopated Amens in the Sanctus and the robust 6/8 rhythms of the 'Dona nobis pacem' at the very end.

The Mariazeller Mass, written much later in 1782, was the last Mass setting that Haydn composed before the final six masterpieces, and already points forward. As in those late Masses, the Kyrie is in a compressed sonata form: a slow introduction leads to a vigorous Allegro, with the 'Christe eleison' as the development section. Clearly, Haydn was already thinking of his Mass settings in symphonic terms, with striking key-changes also relating to Haydn's symphonic writing. Even more than in the Great Organ Mass, Hickox brings out the vitality of the writing, as in the extraordinary 'Dona nobis pacem' at the end, so wildly syncopated it is almost jazzy. A splendid culmination to an outstanding series.

Missa cellensis, Hob XXII:5. Missa sunt bona mixta,
Hob XXII:2.
Susan Gritton sop Pamela Helen Stephen mez
Mark Padmore ten Stephen Varcoe bass
Collegium Musicum 90 / Richard Hickox
Chandos CHAN0667 (70 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 2000 ●

This is the only current recording of the fragmentary Missa sunt bona mixta malis, consisting only of a brief setting of the Kyrie followed by a more expansive setting of the Gloria, which is cut off after the 'Gratias agimus tibi'. Improbably, the score was discovered as recently as 1983 in a farmhouse in the north of Ireland. Dating from 1768, it is tantalising having only a fragment when the contrapuntal writing presents Haydn at his most striking in this period. It makes a fascinating supplement to Hickox's superb account of what is the longest setting of the liturgy that Haydn ever composed. The title of the Missa cellensis – referring to the small Austrian town of Mariazell – is misleading in two ways. It is obviously so when there is another, later Mass also entitled Cellensis, but equally because it seems highly unlikely that so ambitious a work as this was ever designed for such a place as Mariazell: it was more probably written for a grand occasion in Vienna. So it would surely be less confusing to return to the usual title for this work, 'St Cecilia Mass'.

This is a 'cantata-mass' very different from Haydn's usual settings which involve a single movement for each of the six sections of the liturgy. Here instead, the liturgy is divided into 18 separate movements. Hickox's new version gains over the fine Preston issue from the late 1970s in weight and warmth of expression, helped by the Chandos recording which, while warm, allows ample detail in the many splendid contrapuntal passages. The choir's sopranos are amply bright and boyish and achieve a crisp ensemble. The soloists make an outstanding, responsive team.

Masses – No 6 in G, 'Missa Sancti Nicolai',
HobXXII/6; No 9 in B flat, 'Missa Sancti Bernardi von
Offida' ('Heiligmesse'), HobXXII/10
Lorna Anderson sop Pamela Helen Stephen mez
Mark Padmore ten Stephen Varcoe bar
Collegium Musicum 90 / Richard Hickox
Chandos Chaconne CHAN0645 (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included.

With fresh, inspiriting work from soloists, chorus and orchestra, the performance of the so-called Heiligmesse captures the symphonic impetus and the spiritual and physical exhilaration of this gloriously life-affirming nusic. Hickox opts for Haydn's original coring, minus the horn parts and the enhanced arts for clarinets that he (or someone with his pproval) later added for a performance in 'ienna's Court Chapel.

Hickox is ever responsive to the drama and olour of Haydn's orchestral writing, while the 4-strong chorus sings with firm, well-iourished tone over a wide dynamic range and real care for the meaning of the text. The nany high-lying entries are always true, never trained or overblown, and the sopranos rise nflinchingly to their frequent high B flats. The oloists have less to do here than in Haydn's ther late Masses: but, led by the plangent, eseeching soprano of Lorna Anderson, they ing with a chamber-music grace and intimacy.

The appealing Missa brevis is cast in the pastoral' key of G major. Again, the soloists nake their mark both individually and in nsemble, with Anderson floating a beautiful ine in the 'Gratias' and Mark Padmore aunching the expressive G minor 'Et ncarnatus est' with gently rounded tone and raceful phrasing. The recorded sound is lear, spacious and carefully balanced, ombining vivid orchestral detail with plenty f impact from the chorus.

Aasses – No 7 in B flat, HobXXII/7, Missa brevis Ⓟ
ancti Johannis de Deo ('Little Organ Mass'); No 12
n B flat, HobXXII/12, 'Theresienmesse'
anice Watson sop Pamela Helen Stephen mez
Aark Padmore ten Stephen Varcoe bar
Collegium Musicum 90 Chorus;
Collegium Musicum 90 / Richard Hickox
Chandos CHAN0592 (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
exts and translations included. Recorded 1995 ●

Hickox generates the physical and spiritual lation essential to this music, calling to mind Haydn's own much-quoted remark that vhenever he praised God his heart leapt with oy. In the glorious Theresienmesse of 1799 Hickox's manner is particularly fine in the xultant, springing Gloria and the rough-hewn igour of the Credo. He understands, too, the Aass's dramatic and symphonic impetus, oringing a powerful cumulative momentum to he sonata-form 'Dona nobis pacem' and hrillingly tightening the screws in the closing ages. The choir is placed forward, though never at the expense of orchestral detail, keenly bserved by Hickox. His uncommonly well-ntegrated solo quartet framed by the sweet-oned Janice Watson and the gentle, nellifluous Stephen Varcoe, sings with a hamber-musical grace and refinement in the Et incarnatus est' and the Benedictus. And their upplicatory tenderness in the 'Dona nobis pacem' contrasts arrestingly with the choir's irgent demands for peace. Hickox also captures he peculiar serenity and innocence of the much earlier Missa brevis Sancti Johannis de Deo, or Little Organ Mass, its intimacy enhanced here y the use of solo strings. A disc guaranteed to efresh the spirit.

Mass No 10 in C, HobXXII/9, 'Missa in tempore belli'. Te Deum in C, HobXXIIIc/1. Te Deum in C, HobXXIIIc/2. Alfred, König der Angelsachsen, HobXXX/5 – Aria des Schutzgeistes;
Chor der Dänen
Nancy Argenta sop Catherine Denley mez
Mark Padmore ten Stephen Varcoe bar Jacqueline Fox spkr Collegium Musicum 90 Chorus and Orchestra / Richard Hickox
Chandos Chaconne CHAN0633 (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1997 ●

Few other conductors on disc convey so happily the drama, symphonic power and spiritual exhilaration of these glorious works than Richard Hickox. He is fully alive to the ominous unease that permeates the great Mass in Time of War, but while others strive for maximum dramatic and rhetorical effect, Hickox directs the Mass with a natural, unforced sense of phrase and pace.

The playing of Collegium Musicum 90, led by Simon Standage, is polished and athletic, with detail sharply etched, while the chorus sings with fresh tone and incisive attack. The four soloists are well matched in the anxious C minor Benedictus; elsewhere Nancy Argenta brings a pure, slender tone, and a graceful sense of phrase to the Kyrie, while in the 'Qui tollis' Stephen Varcoe deploys his mellow baritone with real sensitivity. The fill-ups, all but one sharing the Mass's C major, trumpet-and-drum sonorities, are imaginatively chosen. The two Te Deum settings epitomise the immense distance Haydn travelled during his career, the rococo exuberance and strict species counterpoint of the little-known early work contrasting with the grandeur and massive, rough-hewn energy of the 1799 setting.

The two numbers of incidental music Haydn completed for the play King Alfred in 1796, shortly before embarking on the Mass, are a real collectors' item. Argenta sings the first hymn-like E flat aria with chaste elegance, while choir and orchestra palpably enjoy themselves in the following number, a rollicking, brassy celebration of the Danes' victory over the Anglo-Saxons. In sum, a winner of a disc: invigorating performances and first-class recorded sound, with an ideally judged balance between chorus and orchestra.

Awards 1998

Mass No 11 in D minor, HobXXII/11, Ⓟ
'Nelson'. Te Deum in C, HobXXIIIc/2
Dame Felicity Lott sop Carolyn Watkinson contr Maldwyn Davies ten
David Wilson-Johnson bar
The English Concert and Choir / Trevor Pinnock
Archiv Produktion 423 097-2AH (50 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included ●●●

The British Admiral had ousted the Napoleonic fleet at the Battle of the Nile just as Haydn was in the middle of writing his Nelson Mass. Although the news could not have reached him until after its completion, Haydn's awareness of the international situation was expressed in the work's subtitle, 'Missa in Augustiis', or 'Mass in times of fear'. With its rattle of timpani, pungent trumpet calls, and highly strung harmonic structure, there is no work of Haydn's which cries out so loudly for recording on period instruments; and it is the distinctive sonority and highly charged tempos of this performance which set it apart. The dry, hard timpani and long trumpets bite into the dissonance of the opening Kyrie, and the near vibrato-less string playing is mordant and urgent. The fast-slow-fast triptych of the Gloria is set out in nervously contrasted speeds, and the Credo bounces with affirmation. Just as the choral singing is meticulously balanced with instrumental inflexion, so the soloists have been chosen to highlight the colours in Pinnock's palette.

Mass No 11 in D minor, 'Nelsonmesse', HobXXII/11; Mass No 12 in B flat, 'Theresienmesse', HobXXII/12. Te Deum in C, HobXXIIIc/2 🅿

Donna Brown sop Sally Bruce-Payne mez Peter Butterfield ten Gerald Finley bass Monteverdi Choir; English Baroque Soloists / Sir John Eliot Gardiner

Philips ② 470 286-2PH (89 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ

Texts and translations included. Recorded c2002 ●●

Dating respectively from 1798 and 1799, the Nelsonmesse and the Theresienmesse are the third and fourth of the six Masses written for the name-day of the Princess Esterházy. That was a period during the Napoleonic wars when Prince Esterházy, Nikolaus II had economised by dismissing his Harmonie or windband. Even so, in 1798 for the Nelsonmesse, Haydn, seeking to reflect the mood of the times (hence the official title, Missa in angustiis – 'Mass in straitened times'), brought in three trumpets and timpani, and their impact is all the greater when set against strings and organ alone.

That heightened contrast is a point which comes out with thrilling attack in Gardiner's performance at the very opening of the Kyrie. This vigorous Allegro, typical of Haydn but totally untypical of Mass-settings, introduces martial fanfares, which recur through the whole work. Though Haydn composed the Mass in a mere 53 days in the summer of 1798, just when Nelson was winning the Battle of Aboukir, Haydn knew nothing of that victory till later, and the Nelson association dates from two years later when the admiral visited Eisenstadt, and the Mass was given in his honour.

Gardiner's treatment of the fanfares offers only the first of dozens of examples where his crisp, incisive manner highlights the extraordinary originality of this work. The Theresienmesse brings similar revelations. Here, in addition to trumpets and timpani, Haydn scored for two clarinets, and though this is a less sharply dramatic, more lyrical work, a martial flavour is again introduced. There are surprises aplenty, as in the sudden silence of the orchestra in the setting of the word 'miserere' at the end of the 'Gratias agimus tibi', or the setting of 'Et incarnatus' in the Credo in the rare key (in this context) of B flat minor, and 'Et vitam venturi' set in a galloping 6/8 time or the bold, square opening of Agnus Dei in bare octaves at an unapologetic forte. Such points must have startled early listeners, and Gardiner's treatment makes one appreciate that with new ears.

In this respect he even outshines Richard Hickox, whose prizewinning Mass series for Chandos brings equally enjoyable performances of both these works, just as energetic and a degree warmer, thanks in part to the recording acoustic. Gardiner's team, on the other hand, has markedly cleaner separation of textures, with soloists and chorus more sharply defined. Gardiner's Monteverdi Choir as ever sings with passion, brilliance and fine precision, and his soloists are all outstanding, fresh and youthful-sounding with firm clear voices.

As a splendid, very apt bonus there is a superb account of the magnificent ceremonial C major Te Deum.

Harmoniemesse

Mass No 14 in B flat, HobXXII/14, 'Harmoniemesse'. Salve regina in E, HobXXIII*b*/1

Nancy Argenta sop Pamela Helen Stephen mez Mark Padmore ten Stephen Varcoe bar Collegium Musicum 90 Chorus; Collegium Musicum 90 / Richard Hickox

Chandos Chaconne CHAN0612 (59 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Texts and translations included. Recorded 1996 ●

Haydn's first major work, the Salve regina of 1756, is here juxtaposed with his last, the Harmoniemesse of 1802, so-called because of its exceptionally full scoring for woodwind. The gulf between the two works, in sophistication, mastery and emotional range, is predictably vast. Yet, in their very different ways, both reconcile the formal liturgical conventions of their era with the expression of Haydn's own life-affirming religious faith. Hickox and his forces ideally capture this sense of celebratory spiritual energy. Tempos are lively, rhythms alert and vital. In the Mass Hickox generates an exhilarating symphonic momentum in, say, the opening sections of the Gloria and Credo, and, aided by an outstandingly clear, well-balanced recording, realises to the full such dramatic coups as the sudden swerve into A flat in the recapitulation of the 'Benedictus' and the martial fanfares that slew the music from D major to B flat at the start of the 'Dona nobis pacem'. The steely-edged valveless trumpets are thrilling here; and elsewhere the wind players do rich justice to Haydn's glorious writing, nicely balancing rusticity and refinement.

Nancy Argenta's innocent, bell-like tones and graceful sense of line are heard to touching effect in the 'Et incarnatus est' of the Mass. In the Salve regina, she also reveals her deft, fluent coloratura technique. No great depths in this youthful work, of course: but Haydn's setting of the Marian antiphon is elegant and affecting, with a command of shapely, Italianate melody and a feeling for dramatic contrast. This is certainly the most memorable work of Haydn's from the 1750s and aptly complements Hickox's fervent, inspiring reading of the Harmoniemesse.

Mass No 14 in B flat, 'Harmoniemesse'[a]; P
Mass No 13 in B flat, 'Schöpfungsmesse'[b]
[b]Ruth Ziesak, [a]Joanne Lunn, [a]Angharad Gruffydd Jones sops [b]Bernarda Fink mez [b]Susanna Spicer, [a]Sara Mingardo contrs [b]Christoph Prégardien, [b]Peter Butterfield, [a]Andrew Busher, [a]Topi Lehtipuu tens [b]Oliver Widmer bar [a]Brindley Sherratt bass Monteverdi Choir; English Baroque Soloists / Sir John Eliot Gardiner
Philips ② 470 297-2PH (84 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Notes, texts and translations included ●

Gardiner adds to the attractions of Philips' mid-price package by choosing outstanding teams of soloists. Particularly notable is the soprano for the Harmoniemesse, Joanne Lunn, with her fresh, at times almost boyish tone nicely set against the creamy contralto of Sara Mingardo.

Gardiner takes a dramatic, incisive view of these last two of the Masses, which in many ways can be said to continue Haydn's symphonic sequence. The contrasts between Gardiner and Hickox (on Chandos) bring out the positive qualities of each. Both inspire superb performances. Where Hickox is warmer in his approach with bouncing rhythms which bring out the joy of the old composer's inspiration, Gardiner is more incisive, with the Monteverdi Choir singing with pinpoint attack and exceptionally clean textures, helped by warm but relatively transparent recording quality. The Chandos sound for Hickox is a degree fuller and more immediate.

Gardiner also tends to favour speeds a shade faster than Hickox, often challengingly so in furious speeds for the settings of 'Et resurrexit', though in such a slow movement as the Sanctus of the Schöpfungsmesse Gardiner takes a broader view, moulding the phrases. Any lover of these works will be happy with either view, and the differences of coupling might well dictate choice.

Stabat mater

Stabat mater, Hob*XXbis*
Jeni Bern sop Jeannette Ager mez Andrew Carwood ten Giles Underwood bass David Goode org Christ Church Cathedral Choir, Oxford; London Musici / Stephen Darlington
Griffin GCCD4029 (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Haydn's Stabat mater, the first of his vocal works to establish his reputation internationally, is an ambitious cantata, and like the Cecilia Mass, from that same early period. It was written in 1767 soon after Haydn took over responsibility for Prince Esterházy's church music, having succeeded as full Kapellmeister on the death of Gregor Werner.

There is strong competition among current versions, but Griffin's disc finds a distinctive place among them. Like the Heltay version, and unlike Pinnock and Harnoncourt, it uses an orchestra of modern instruments, but far more than Heltay Stephen Darlington takes note of period practice, lightening string textures, finding extra detail. He also tends to adopt fast speeds, at times challengingly so, as in the big tenor aria, 'Vidit sum', stylishly sung by Andrew Carwood. The other distinctive point is that not only does it use a church choir with boy trebles, it offers a warmly atmospheric cathedral acoustic. The others were recorded in churches, though all markedly smaller than Christ Church Cathedral. The line-up of soloists may not be as starry as those on the rival discs, but these are young singers with fresh, clear voices and with keen experience of the choral repertory.

The Seasons

Barbara Bonney sop Anthony Rolfe Johnson ten Andreas Schmidt bar Monteverdi Choir; English Baroque Soloists / Sir John Eliot Gardiner P
Archiv Produktion ② 431 818-2AH2 Ⓕ
(127 minutes: DDD). Text and translation included
Recorded 1990 ●●

The comparative unpopularity of Haydn's The Seasons when considered against The Creation is understandable perhaps, but it is not all that well deserved. Less exalted its subject and libretto may be, but its depiction of the progress of the year amid the scenes and occupations of the Austrian countryside drew from its composer music of unfailing invention, benign warmth and constant musical-pictoral delights. As usual, John Eliot Gardiner and his forces turn in disciplined, meticulously professional performances, though the orchestra is slightly larger – and consequently a tiny bit less lucid – than the sort you might nowadays find playing a classical symphony. The choir, however, performs with great clarity and accuracy, and brings, too, an enjoyable sense of characterization to their various corporate roles.

The soloists all perform with notable poise and intelligence: Barbara Bonney's voice is pure and even, Anthony Rolfe Johnson sounds entirely at ease with the music, and Andreas Schmidt is gentle-voiced but certainly not lacking in substance. Perhaps in the end this is a performance which just lacks that last inch of necessary warmth to make it unbeatable, but it's a first-rate recommendation none the less.

Additional recommendation
The Seasons (highlights)
Janowitz sop Hollweg ten Berry bar
Chor der Deutschen Oper, Berlin; Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Karajan
EMI Encore 574977-2 (DDD) Ⓑ
A fine, polished reading, well recorded at a bargain price.

The Creation

Die Schöpfung (The Creation), HobXXI/2 🅿
Sylvia McNair, Donna Brown sops
Michael Schade ten Rodney Gilfry, Gerald Finley bars
Monteverdi Choir; English Baroque Soloists / Sir John Eliot Gardiner
Archiv Produktion ② 449 217-2AH2 Ⓕ
(101 minutes: DDD). Text included
Recorded 1995 ●●●

With Gardiner's first down-beat it is obvious that Chaos's days are numbered. Not that 'days' (strictly speaking) are in question till the mighty words have been spoken, and then, in this performance, what an instantaneous blaze! No premonitory intimation (of pre-echo in the old days whereas now even the faintest stirring in the ranks of the choir will do it), but a single-handed switching-on of the cosmic power-grid and a magnificently sustained C major chord to flood the universe with light. This is one of the great characteristics here: the superbly confident, precise attack of choir and orchestra. Enthusiasm, then, in plenty; but how about the mystery of Creation? It is certainly part of the aim to capture this, for the bass soloist's 'Im Anfange' ('In the beginning') with pianissimo chorus has rarely been so softly and so spaciously taken: the Spirit that moved upon the face of the waters is a veiled, flesh-creeping presence, felt again in the first sunrise and the 'softer beams with milder light' of the first moon. Even so, others have incorporated this element more naturally. Gardiner has an excellent Raphael in Gerald Finley, and gains from having extra singers for Adam and Eve, especially as the Eve, Donna Brown, brings a forthright style doubly welcome after the somewhat shrinking-violet manner and breathy tone of Sylvia McNair's Gabriel. On the whole, Gardiner is sound: yet his is a fun Creation and a real enrichment of the library. Against others of comparable kind, Gardiner stands firm as an easy first choice: a re-creator of vision, a great invigorator and life-enhancer.

Die Schöpfung (The Creation) 🅿
Ann Monoyios sop Jörg Hering ten
Harry van der Kamp bass Tölz Boys' Choir; Tafelmusik / Bruno Weil
Sony Classical Vivarte ② SX2K57965 Ⓑ
(91 minutes: DDD). Text and translation included
Recorded 1993

Bruno Weil's reading, using a period orchestra of up to 45 players and an all-male choir of similar strength, is above all a luminous, joyous affair, with generally fleet tempos, nimble, dancing rhythms and a richly communicated sense of delight in the work's sublime, pre-lapsarian innocence. Tafelmusik equals and sometimes surpasses rival period orchestras in the point and relish of its playing, and the Tölz Boys' Choir sings with brio, accuracy and characteristically fresh, bright-edged tone. Weil's direction mingles a sense of spontaneous discovery with a strong feeling for shape and structure and a sharp ear for Haydn's wonderful orchestral detail. Weil's eager pacing and judgement of tempo relationships almost invariably feel right, though occasionally you long for a deeper sense of mystery and reverence.

The three soloists are all stylish singers, clean of line and tone (vibrato used quite sparingly) and notably flexible in coloratura. They make their mark in recitative and aria, and blend and balance unusually well in ensemble. If Ann Monoyios's soprano lacks the hint of tonal depth ideally required, her purity, freshness and shapely sense of phrase are delectable. And like her male colleagues, she ornaments tastefully at fermatas and cadences. Jörg Hering is a compact, elegant tenor with no hint of bleat or strain. To sum up, Weil conveys most infectiously the work's unique joy and exhilaration. The recording has a fine depth of perspective and an almost ideal balance between voices and orchestra.

L'anima del filosofo

L'anima del filosofo, ossia Orfeo et Euridice 🅿
Uwe Heilmann ten Orfeo; Cecilia Bartoli mez Euridice, Genio; Ildebrando d'Arcangelo bass Creonte; Andrea Silvestrelli bass Pluto; Angela Kazimierczuk sop Baccante; Roberto Scaltriti bar First Chorus; Jose Fardilha bass Second Chorus; Colin Campbell bar Third Chorus; James Oxley ten Fourth Chorus
Chorus and Orchestra of the Academy of Ancient Music / Christopher Hogwood
L'Oiseau-Lyre ② 452 668-2OHO2 Ⓕ
(124 minutes: DDD) Notes, text and translation included. Recorded 1996 ●

Christopher Hogwood here builds his band on the model of those prevalent in late 18th-century London theatres. Not only does his phrasing and articulation discover no end of both witty and poignant nuances, but the grave austerity of the string playing, and the plangency of the early woodwind instruments are eloquent advocates of an opera whose uncompromisingly tragic ending owes more to Ovid and Milton than to operatic tradition. Hogwood also remembers that Haydn was writing for a Handelian London choral tradition: his chorus, be they cast as Cupids, Shades or Furies, have robust presence and sculpt their lines with firm muscle.

Cecilia Bartoli takes the role of Euridice. In her very first aria, 'Filomena abbandonata', she understands and eagerly re-creates the type of coloratura writing which simultaneously fleshes out the central nightingale simile and incarnates the single word 'crudeltà'. Her unmistakable, melting half-voice comes into its own as emotion first clouds reason, only to create the fatal emotional extremes to which she gives voice so thrillingly. Uwe Heilmann is just the tenor of rare agility and wide vocal range vital for this particular Orfeo. The minor parts are strongly profiled: Ildebrando d'Arcangelo is a stern, noble Creonte, Andrea Silvestrelli a fearsome, stentorian Pluto – and there's even a convincing strepito ostile off-stage as Euridice's abduction is attempted in Act 2. Beyond the detail, it is the poignancy of the musical drama at the heart of this strange, grave Orfeo which Hogwood reveals with such sympathetic and imaginative insight.

Armida

Jessye Norman sop Armida; Claes Hakon Ahnsjö ten Rinaldo; Norma Burrowes sop Zelmira; Samuel Ramey bass Idreno; Robin Leggate ten Ubaldo; Anthony Rolfe Johnson ten Clotarco
Lausanne Chamber Orchestra / Antál Dorati
Philips ② 432 438-2PH2 (140 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1978

Armida, widely considered Haydn's finest opera, is based on a familiar literary classic adopted for opera by numerous other composers: what is surprising is that in his setting Haydn reverted to opera seria style, with no buffo characters, very few ensembles and extensive secco recitatives. Dramatic action is minimal: for three acts Rinaldo lingers under the spell of the enchantress Armida despite all the efforts of fellow-Crusaders to recall him to his mission. The work's static nature, however, casts the emphasis on its musical qualities, and in this regard Armida is of the highest standard. The enchantress herself, personified by the redoubtable Jessye Norman, has the widest range of emotions to portray, from tenderness to rage; Ahnsjö as Rinaldo produces a fine legato and very accurate florid passagework, but his low register rather lets him down; Ramey shows laudable firmness and flexibility; and Burrowes's fresh youthful charm is very appealing. Another strength is the alert orchestral playing. The most notable features of the opera are three long through-composed sequences and imaginative scoring: the scene in the magic forest, where Rinaldo at last, to Armida's fury, breaks free from her spell, is masterly, and in itself is sufficient to compel a revision of the too common neglect of Haydn as an operatic composer.

L'isola disabitata, HobXXVIII/9

Ying Huang sop Silvia; Susanne Mentzer mez Costanza; John Aler ten Gernando; Christopher Schaldenbrand bar Enrico
Padova Chamber Orchestra / David Golub

Arianna a Naxos, HobXXVIb/2
Susanne Mentzer mez David Golub pf
Arabesque ② Z6717-2 (121 minutes: DDD). Notes, Ⓕ texts and translations included. Recorded 1997

L'isola disabitata may be the least viable of all Haydn's operas in the theatre, but it contains some memorable, richly worked music, not least the strenuous, impassioned G minor Overture. The heroine, Costanza, a latter-day Ariadne, has two eloquent Adagio arias, though their tone is grave and dignified rather than, as their texts suggest, truly tragic. The music for Costanza's husband, Gernando, abducted by pirates 13 years earlier and now returned to the desert island to rescue his wife and her sister, is also slow and soulful, and his one extended aria, 'Non turbar' (Act 2), provides the emotional climax of the opera.

The opera's most obviously attractive number is the splendid final quartet, with elaborate concertante parts for violin, cello, flute and bassoon symbolising each of the four characters. David Golub secures merely decent playing from the Padova Chamber Orchestra, admittedly not helped by the cavernous acoustic, but his soloists are excellent. Susanne Mentzer sings with intense, burnished tone and a fine breadth of phrase; Ying Huang sings quite beautifully, with pure, sweet tone, naturally graceful phrasing and a fullness in the lower register. John Aler's personable tenor has plenty of sap as Alva; and the young baritone Christopher Schaldenbrand makes a notable début as Enrico, warm and deep of tone.

Arabesque adds the tragic cantata Arianna a Naxos. If other singers have brought to the music more vivid colours and a greater sense of desperation, Mentzer sings very impressively, with a grandeur that never lets you forget that Ariadne was the daughter of Minos

Johann Heinichen German 1683-1729

GROVE Initially an advocate, German composer and theorist Heinichen composed music for the Weissenfels court, then moved to Leipzig (1709), where he presented operas and directed a collegium musicum. He also worked at Zeitz and Naumburg. In 1710-16 he lived in Italy and had two operas staged in Venice in 1713. From 1717 he was Kapellmeister (with JC Schmidt) at the Dresden court. He wrote serenatas, cantatas, sacred works, and instrumental music for the court, combining German, French and Italian features; his concertos and sonatas are italianate, with unusual instrumental combinations and sonorities. He wrote two versions of a thoroughbass treatise, the second (1728) among the major musical writings of the period.

Concertos

Awards
1993

Concertos – C, S211; G, S213; G, S214,'Darmstadt'; S214, Venezia'; G, S215; G, S217; F, S226; F, S231; F, S232; F, S233; F, S234; F, S235. Serenata di Moritzburg in F, S204. Sonata in A, S208. Movement in C minor, S240 🅿
Musica Antiqua Köln / Reinhard Goebel
Archiv Produktion ② 437 549-2AH2 Ⓕ
(137 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1992 000

Johann David Heinichen was a contemporary of Bach and one of an important group of musicians employed by the Dresden court during the 1720s and 1730s. As well as being an inventive composer, Heinichen was also a noted theorist and his treatise on the continuo bass was widely admired. All the music collected here was probably written for the excellent Dresden court orchestra and most of it falls into that rewarding category in which north and central German composers were pre-eminent. Vivaldi had provided effective models but the predilection for drawing upon other influences, too, gives the concertos of the Germans greater diversity. Heinichen admittedly does not so readily venture into the Polish regions whose folk-music gives such a piquancy to Telemann's concertos and suites, but the wonderful variety of instrumental colour and deployment of alternating 'choirs' is every bit as skilful.

Your attention will be held from start to finish. Much of the credit for this must go to Reinhard Goebel and his impeccably drilled Musica Antiqua Köln. Some of these pieces might well seem less entertaining in the hands of less imaginative musicians and it would be untruthful to claim that everything here is of uniform interest. Each concerto fields its own distinctive wind group drawing variously upon recorders, flutes, oboes, bassoons and horns, the latter always in pairs, in addition to concertante parts in many of them for one or more violins and cellos. There is little need to say more. The recorded sound is first-rate, and Goebel's painstaking essay is fascinating to read.

Hans Werner Henze German 1926

GROVE Henze studied at a music school in Brunswick and, after war service, with Fortner at the Institute for Church Music in Heidelberg (1946-48). At first he composed in a Stravinskian neo-classical style (First Symphony, 1947), but lessons with Leibowitz in 1947-48 encouraged his adoption of 12-note serialism. Unlike such contemporaries as Stockhausen, however, he held his music open to a wide range of materials. Occasionally he made his obeisance to Darmstadt (Second Quartet, 1952), but his large, varied output of this period also shows the continuing importance to him of neo-classicism, Schoenbergian or Bergian expressionism and jazz. Nor was he dismissive of old forms or, in particular, the theatre: he conducted the Wiesbaden ballet (1950-53) and composed ballets (Jack Pudding, 1951; Labyrinth, 1951) and operas (Boulevard Solitude, 1952).

In 1953 he moved to Italy, where his music became more expansive, sensuous and lyrical and he concentrated on a sequence of operas (König Hirsch, 1956; Elegy for Young Lovers, 1961) and cantatas (Kammermusik, 1958; Cantata della fiaba estrema, 1963). The climax to this period came with a rich and elaborate but also dynamic treatment of The Bacchae in the opera The Bassarids (1966), followed by a period of self-searching; that was externalised in the Second Piano Concerto (1967) and eventually gave rise to an outspoken commitment to revolutionary socialism. Henze visited Cuba (1969-70), where he conducted the first performance of his Sixth Symphony, incorporating the tunes of revolutionary songs. He also developed a bold, poster style in music-theatre works (El Cimarrón, 1970), leading to his dramatization of class conflict in the opera We Come to the River (1976).

But he was also continuing his exploration of an expressionist orchestral sumptuousness in such works as Heliogabalus imperator (1972) and Tristan (1974), and an enjoyment in reinterpreting old musical models (Aria de la folía española for chamber orchestra, 1977). Later works, including the opera The English Cat (1983) and the Seventh Symphony (1984), continue his highly personal synthesis of past and present, lyricism and rigour.

Piano Concerto No 2

Piano Concerto No 2ᵃ. Telemanniana
ᵃRolf Plagge pf
North-West German Philharmonic Orchestra / Gerhard Markson
CPO999 322-2 (62 minutes: DDD). Ⓕ
Recorded ᵃ1997 and 1995 ●

In an interview with Oliver Knussen for DG's 1996 reissue of the Second Piano Concerto (1967), Henze stated he felt it had 'made a breakthrough towards a vaster area of musical expression'. Manifest through every bar of this rich and intense score is a sense of release and discovery, of standing on the brink of a new musical landscape utterly different from what had gone before. Henze only had a couple of years to explore this before the storm over The Raft of the Medusa burst around his head, changing irrevocably the course of his career. Not until the Seventh Symphony did a very different Henze begin to approach the position the Second Piano Concerto had indicated.

But it would be wrong to read into the Concerto's explosive character a harbinger of the political storms and stresses to come. Henze's music reflected the outcome of musical decisions and dissatisfactions, a desire for change, in which the impact of Japanese Gagaku music is of much consequence. The Concerto forms 'the bridge between the Bacchants and Maenads of The Bassarids to the dying soldiers and workers of The Raft of the Medusa'.

Henze wrote the Concerto for Christoph Eschenbach, who premièred it in 1968, recording it under the composer's direction in London two years later. That performance still sounds splendid and has unassailable authority, but should not deter anyone from investigating this newcomer, which is brilliantly played and prepared. If Eschenbach and Henze occasionally wring more excitement out of the notes, Plagge and Markson are only just behind, and CPO's terrific recording captures even more of the subtle orchestral detail. The orchestra also turns in a very fine performance of Henze's Suite of Telemann arrangements, written in the same year as the Concerto. Recommended with enthusiasm.

Symphony No 7

Symphony No 7. Barcarola
City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra / Sir Simon Rattle
EMI 754762-2 (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded live in 1992 ●

This is a most important issue. Composed to a Berlin Philharmonic commission, No 7 is the most conventional in format of any of Henze's symphonies. Gone are the episodic and partita-like designs of earlier works, the Seventh adopting a recognisably Beethovenian model, although the music's point of departure seems to lie more immediately in the symphonies of Karl Amadeus Hartmann. Henze states in the notes that the Seventh is 'a German symphony, and it deals with matters German'. One of these is the poet Friedrich Hölderlin, whose sufferings in an asylum and late poem Hälfte des Lebens (Half of Life) inspired respectively the Scherzo and finale; what lies behind the intense and complex threnody of the towering second – and longest – movement is not divulged.

This repertoire is not normally associated with Simon Rattle or the Birmingham band but there is no lack of knowledge or commitment evident in the playing (they gave the first UK performance in 1986). Indeed, their familiarity with the music of Nielsen and Sibelius seems to have stood them in good stead, enabling them to tackle Henze's architectonic constructions with complete assurance. Particularly impressive are the first and last movements, both superbly prepared and flawless in execution. The many delicate passages in which both the Symphony and the earlier Barcarola abound are rendered equally impressively, and the excellent recording does full justice to these eruptive scores. All in all, a tremendous achievement.

Symphony No 9

Berlin Radio Chorus; Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Ingo Metzmacher
EMI 556513-2 (56 minutes: DDD). Text and translation included. Recorded live in 1997 Ⓕ

Henze's Ninth Symphony deals with his experience of Nazi Germany and it is dedicated 'to the heroes and martyrs of German anti-Fascism'. All seven of its movements are choral, settings of poems by Hans-Ulrich Treichel, themselves based on the novel by Anna Seghers, The Seventh Cross. The novel tells of seven prisoners, condemned to be crucified, who escape from a concentration camp. Six are recaptured; after a series of horrifying experiences the seventh manages to reach freedom by boarding a Dutch ship on the Rhine. The first movement, 'The Escape', is not an exciting action scene but a portrayal of abject, pitiful terror; in its successor, 'Among the Dead', the delirious prisoner finds himself in a no man's land of shadows. There is a brief, savage portrayal of the persecutors, then the trees from which the crosses will be made sing lyrically of their own beauty before they are ruthlessly hacked down. Now the fate of one of the other prisoners is described; he is an artist, and as he dies, 'I...the wounded eagle, spread my wings and fly once more over the only land I have'. At this point what is marked in the score as a gran canto, a grave, plangent string melody, rises with poignant eloquence in the strings. The penultimate movement is a hideous nightmare drama set in a cathedral, where the exhausted prisoner has hidden at night. Christ will not reply to his prayers; all he can hear is the voices of the dead (12 soloists, placed at the opposite end of the hall from the orchestra and choir), raptly and horribly praising the voluptuous pleasures of torture and martyrdom. 'The Rescue', finally, provides the huge contrast of rich, calm, multilayered polyphony, but though the prisoner has survived, the horror remains. The extremest of emotions are explored and extremes are needed to express them. The lines are often tortuous or angular, the textures often dense.

This is a live recording of the first performance. The chorus is not large and is placed behind the main body of the orchestra. The recording balance does not always compensate for this, and at times it is difficult to follow both the choral counterpoint and the words. Despite this the cumulative impact is shockingly powerful. It is a piece that one senses Henze has been steeling himself to write for years, and its eloquence catches you by the throat.

Undine

London Sinfonietta / Oliver Knussen with Peter Donohoe pf
DG ② 453 467-2GH2 (103 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996 ●●

Henze's Undine (or Ondine, as Frederick Ashton's ballet for which it was written is called) is easily his most approachable score, filled with melody, magically delicate evocation and humour. When the ballet first appeared, in October 1958, the music was dismissed by some critics as an eclectic and derivative mish-mash, and it makes no effort to disguise its indebtedness to, in particular, the neo-Classical Stravinsky. What we have been missing all these years, this committed performance demonstrates, is a score that pays homage to the whole tradition of classical dance and the music written for it, a score whose richness is out of all proportion to the chamber orchestra it uses. That richness ranges from a quite magnificently sonorous evocation of the sea, via the stately wedding music in Act 2, to the deliciously tongue-in-cheek miniature piano concerto that accompanies the quite irrelevant but entertaining divertissement in Act 3. The second divertissement, that is: disastrously for the otherwise poetic scenario about a water-nymph's fatal love for a human, Ashton insisted on two of them. But the heart of the ballet is the subtle, quietly iridescent music associated with Ondine herself.

Ashton's ballet was described as a 'concerto' for Margot Fonteyn who was its inspiration, and much of Henze's score is a sort of portrait of 'the radiant centre of the whole ballet...this wonder floating, almost, above the ground', as Henze described her at the time. It is his achievement that the concluding passacaglia, even after those interpolations, is so moving as Ondine, knowing that her kiss will kill her beloved, is nevertheless irresistibly drawn to embrace him. Knussen's performance is so good that you can almost imagine your own staging, and it is superbly recorded.

Piano Quintet

Henze Piano Quintet
Brahms Piano Quintet
Peter Serkin pf Guarneri Quartet (Arnold Steinhardt, John Dalley vns Michael Tree va David Soyer vc)
Philips 446 710-2PH (66 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995 ●

Henze's Piano Quintet, in three relatively compact movements, develops a dialogue that is often dense but avoids the tendency to diffuseness sometimes found in his larger compositions. The piano shares ideas with the strings as well as standing apart from them, and, as with all Henze's best work, emotional intensity leads directly to troubled, never-quite-serene lyricism.

Henze's Quintet is given a fine performance by its dedicatees, and the conviction with which its rapidly shifting moods and textures are realised creates some regret that more Henze, or another 20th-century piano quintet, was not included on the disc. Not that the performance of the Brahms is likely to disappoint. Both the Brahms and the Henze are recorded in a way which favours breadth of perspective over intimacy, but this seems entirely right, given the grand style of the playing.

Nachtstücke und Arien

Drei sinfonische Etüden. Quattro poemi.
Nachtstücke und Arien[a]. La selva incantata[a]
[a]Michaela Kaune sop North German Radio Symphony Orchestra / Peter Ruzicka
Wergo WER6637-2 (61 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1999

This attractive compilation fills significant gaps in the current discography of Henze's earlier compositions. The main work, Nachtstücke und Arien, dates from 1957, and mortally offended avant-garde puritans at its première by its revival of full-blooded lyricism, less than 10 years after Strauss's Four Last Songs was supposed to have said a final farewell to such self-indulgence. This sumptuous, at times explosively dramatic music, comes across well in this performance, Michaela Kaune singing with poise and, where necessary, an apt operatic flair. The recorded sound throughout is adequate, though not especially well defined.

Like the other works on the disc, Nachtstücke und Arien owes far more to the post-romantic espressivo of Berg and Schoenberg than it does to Strauss. It is most directly indebted to Henze's own opera König Hirsch, the major work of the 1950s in which he gave his new-found love of melody the fullest rein. With La selva incantata (The enchanted forest), from 1991, we find Henze revisiting König Hirsch and recasting some of its most characterful music in purely orchestral form. Three Symphonic Studies and Four Poems for orchestra were both written in the 1950s, and although less fully rounded than Nachtstücke und Arien, they all have Henze's typical blend of turbulent emotionalism and spacious, questing lyricism.

In the relatively extended first Study the risk of aimless drifting is not altogether avoided. But this lapse is corrected with interest in the shorter, more tightly controlled Poems. The Romantic resonances confirm how fruitful the experience of composing for the theatre, and engaging with earlier German traditions, had become for Henze. Those resonances continue in most of his finest later works, but the idiomatic performances on this disc let you hear some of their earliest manifestations.

Six Songs from the Arabian

Six Songs from the Arabian. Three Auden Songs
Ian Bostridge ten Julius Drake pf
EMI 557112-2 (57 minutes: DDD). Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 2000 ●●

Henze says that he doesn't accept commissions any more, but he was clearly eager to break his rule in this case: he was so impressed by Bostridge's voice and artistry that the music of this new cycle was 'more or less all written down in my head' before he had decided on which texts to use. With the exception of the sixth song (by Hafiz, translated by Rückert) and four quoted lines from Goethe in the first, the poems are Henze's own and, he insists, drawn from real life.

Henze has been visiting the East coast of Africa for several years and the bold sailor Selim and the tragically abandoned Fatuma are both people that he knows. The cycle certainly has the quality of personal experience: in the third, 'A Daybreak', the sense of patient waiting in velvet darkness for the first signs of dawn is tangible; in the elegantly sinister second, 'The Praying Mantis', you are quite sure that Henze has watched her horrible courtship intently. They are very big songs, strongly dramatic and very beautiful, especially the fourth ('Caesarion') and the last ('Paradise'). They are extremely but not impossibly demanding: although they stretch Bostridge they do so with an absolute understanding of his qualities. The keyboard writing, too, makes virtuosic demands at times, and Drake is as equal to them as to the cycle's tropical colours and bold imagery; fittingly, the cycle is dedicated to him as well as to Bostridge. Splendidly recorded, this is an outstanding achievement.

Louis Hérold

French 1791-1833

GROVE Hérold studied at the Paris Conservatoire with Louis Adam, Kreutzer, Catel and Méhul (who became the dominant influence on his style), composing his first opera in Italy in 1814. For several years he had difficulty finding adequate texts and his works frequently failed. Not until the delightful Marie (1826) did he score a triumphant success, meanwhile working as an accompanist at the Théâtre-Italien in Paris and later as singing coach at the Opéra, where he composed music for five ballets, including La somnambule and La fille mal gardée. The two operas for which he is remembered – Zampa, ou La fiancée de marbre (1831; originally Le corsaire) and the finer Le pré aux clercs (1832) – were both popular successes, the first full of effective theatrical situations and showing the brilliant tenor Chollet to advantage, the second treating thoughtfully a controversial subject. Such accomplished scores suggest that had Hérold lived longer, he might have fulfilled his ambitions to compose grand opera.

La fille mal gardée

La fille mal gardée – excerpts (arr Lanchbery)
Orchestra of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden / John Lanchbery
Decca Ovation 430 196-2DM (51 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1962 ●

The Royal Ballet's La fille mal gardée remains a source of perpetual delight, not least for the music that John Lanchbery arranged largely from Hérold's patchwork score for the 1828 version. The Clog dance is the obvious highlight; but there are felicitous moments throughout, with snatches of Rossini, Donizetti et al cropping up all over the place.

This recording is the original one that Lanchbery conducted when the ballet proved such a success in the Royal Ballet's repertoire in 1960. More recently he has recorded the score complete; and ballet lovers will consider this fuller version essential. However, others will find that the complete score rather outstays its welcome by comparison with this constantly uplifting selection. A most compelling recommendation.

Hildegard of Bingen

German 1098-1179

GROVE German composer, abbess and mystic Hildegard of Bingen's writings include much lyrical and dramatic poetry which has survived with monophonic music. The Symphonia armonie celestium revelationum contains musical settings of 77 poems arranged according to the liturgical calendar. The poetry is laden with imagery and the music, based on a few formulaic melodic patterns, is in some respects highly individual. Her morality play Ordo virtutum contains 82 melodies in a more syllabic style. She also wrote medical and scientific treatises, hagiography and letters and recorded her many visions.

Vocal Works

Awards
1982/83

A Feather on the Breath of God
Columba aspexit. Ave, generosa. O ignis spiritus Paracliti. O Jerusalem. O Euchari, in leta vita. O viridissima virga. O presul vere civitatis. O Ecclesia
Gothic Voices / Christopher Page with Doreen Muskett symphony
Robert White reed drones
Hyperion CDA66039 (44 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1981 ●●●

Here is a collection of choice gems from one of the greatest creative personalities of the Middle Ages. We have limited means of assessing how these inspired pieces were performed in Hildegard's time; but the refreshingly unsophisticated timbre of the four sopranos and the reedy, almost boyish, vocal quality of the contralto are convincing enough to transport the listener right back to the unpolluted atmosphere of Hildegard's cloister. Most to be savoured are the unaccompanied items, amounting to 50 per cent of the total. Indeed, since the notes go out of their way to tell us that 'distractions such as the intrusion of instrumental decorations' were to be avoided, then why did the producer go out of his way to introduce symphony and reed drones in the performance of the other 50 per cent? However, this is a delightful recording. When it was first released it sparked new interest in the music of the Middle Ages and it remains a jewel in Hyperion's crown.

Favus distillans. Et ideo puelle. O tu illustrata.
O vos angeli. Studium divinitatis. O ignee Spiritus.
O rubor sanguinis. O orzchis Ecclesia.
O gloriosissimi lux vivens angeli. Rex noster promptus est. Deus enim in prima muliere.
De patria. Sed diabolus in invidia.
Nunc gaudeant materna viscera Ecclesia
Sinfonye (Jocelyn West, Vivien Ellis, Stevie Wishart, Emily Levy, Vickie Couper, Julie Murphy); members of the Oxford Girls' Choir
Celestial Harmonies 13127-2 (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included ●

Stevie Wishart succeeds in putting Hildegard's music across chiefly by her imaginative choice of singers, which includes quite young girls. The tuneful, unsophisticated timbre of the youngest voices acts as a foil to the sturdy chest voices of the older women – which have a quality of their own, somewhat akin to that of Hungarian folk singers. Such contrasts seem to be typical of the whole Hildegardian picture. Hildegard herself was made up of contrasts: she is ecstatic and at the same time quietly tender; she can be passionate while maintaining a sense of decorum; she is erotic but also chaste.

One could do without the hurdy-gurdy and dispense with the drones and the improvised organum. What is left is a penetration of Hildegard's music which rarely comes through in other interpretations. One thinks particularly of the composer's portrayal of the mystery of the Incarnation in O tu illustrata and also, particularly, of the remarkably sustained lines of ecstasy in O vos angeli – this extraordinary outpouring ranging over two octaves, but which yet has shape and structure for all Hildegard's protestations that she had never studied her art formally.

Paul Hindemith

German 1895-1963

GROVE Hindemith studied as a violinist and composer (with Mendelssohn and Sekles) at the Hoch Conservatory in Frankfurt (1908-17) and made an early reputation through his chamber music and expressionist operas. But then he turned to neo-classicism in his Kammermusik No 1, the first of seven such works imitating the Baroque concerto while using an expanded tonal harmony and distinctively modern elements, notably jazz. Each uses a different mixed chamber orchestra, suited to music of linear counterpoint and, in the fast movements, strongly pulsed rhythm.

During this early period Hindemith lived as a performer: he was leader of the Frankfurt Opera orchestra, and he played the viola in the Amar-Hindemith Quartet (1921-9) as well as in the first performance of Walton's Viola Concerto (1929). Much of his chamber music was written in 1917-24, including four of his six quartets and numerous sonatas, and he was also involved in promoting chamber music through his administrative work for the Donaueschingen Festival (1923-30). However, he also found time to compose abundantly in other genres; including lieder (Das Marienleben, to Rilke poems), music for newly invented mechanical instruments, music for schoolchildren and amateurs, and opera (Cardillac). In addition, from 1927 he taught at the Berlin Musikhochschule.

His concern with so many branches of music sprang from a sense of ethical responsibility that inevitably became more acute with the rise of the Nazis. With the beginning of the 1930s he moved from chamber ensembles to the more public domain of the symphony orchestra, and at the same time his music became harmonically smoother and less intensively contrapuntal. Then in the opera Mathis der Maler (preceded by a symphony of orchestral excerpts) he dramatised the dilemma of the artist in society, eventually opposing Brechtian engagement and insisting on a greater responsibility to art. Nevertheless, his music fell under official disapproval, and in 1938 he left for Switzerland, where Mathis had its first performance. He moved on to the USA and taught at Yale (1940-53), but spent his last decade back in Switzerland.

His later music is in the style that he had established in the early 1930s and that he had theoretically expounded in his Craft of Musical Composition (1937-39), where he ranks scale degrees and harmonic intervals in order from most consonant (tonic, octave) to most dissonant (augmented 4th, tritone), providing a justification for the primacy of the triad. His large output of the later 1930s and 1940s includes concertos and other orchestral works, as well as sonatas for most of the standard instruments. His search for an all-encompassing, all-explaining harmony also found expression in his Kepler opera Die Harmonie der Welt.

Cello Concerto

Cello Concerto. The Four Temperaments
Raphael Wallfisch vc Howard Shelley pf
BBC Philharmonic Orchestra / Yan Pascal Tortelier
Chandos CHAN9124 (52 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1992

These two concertos, both from Hindemith's maturity (1940), make a good pairing. The outwardly conventional Cello Concerto contrasts a relatively small voice (the cello) which carries the work's lyrical message, with a large orchestra used initially for active statements delivered with great power. Hindemith's plan would seem to be gradually to reconcile these apparently contradictory modes of address. The Four Temperaments is a concerto for piano and string orchestra, a much more evenly balanced combination, using theme and variations form to integrate and relate the contrasted 'humours'. Hindemith's treatment of his material appears to argue that all temperaments, whatever the dominant disposition, are closely related. His portraiture, in fact, reveals characterization of great depth and dimension. Performances are superbly accomplished, indeed this is the finest of many currently available recordings of The Four Temperaments. And Chandos has resisted the temptation to move in on the soloist in the Cello Concerto. The sound is open and spacious.

Violin Concerto

Hindemith Violin Concerto[a] Bruch Scottish Fantasy[b] Mozart Sinfonia concertante[c]
[abc]David Oistrakh vn [c]Igor Oistrakh va
[b]LSO / Horenstein; [a]Hindemith; [c]Moscow Philharmonic Orchestra / Kondrashin
Decca Legends 470 258-2DM (DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1962-63 ●●●

What makes this mid-price disc indispensable is the 30-minute Violin Concerto with Oistrakh playing at his legendary best and the composer conducting. The late Deryck Cooke, in his original Gramophone review, wrote of Oistrakh as 'superbly poised and eloquent… and as performed here the Concerto shows that behind Hindemith's stony neo-classical facade beats a romantic German heart'. Listening to this recording it's hard to understand the concerto's relative neglect but easy to imagine current star violinists finding Oistrakh's an impossible act to follow. The 1962 sound gives Oistrakh a discreet dominance, and the engineers flatten out the slow movement's central climax, but thankfully there are no other allowances that need be made for this preservation of what can only be described as a classic recording.

Bruch's Scottish Fantasy makes an extremely fine coupling; a total joy from start to finish, this is an inspirationally eloquent reading to rank alongside Heifetz's indelible 1961 stereo version.

Additional recommendation
Violin Concerto[a]
Coupling: Konzertmusik for Brass and Strings. Symphonic Metamorphosis
[a]Kavakos vn BBC Philharmonic Orchestra / Tortelier
Chandos CHAN9903 (66 minutes: DDD: 8/01) Ⓕ

A splendid modern alternative in superb sound to Oistrakh's classic account; Kavakos is, if anything, even more fleet-fingered than the Russian.

Wind Concertos

Clarinet Concerto. Horn Concerto. Concerto for Trumpet, Bassoon and Strings. Concerto for Flute, Oboe, Clarinet, Bassoon, Harp and Orchestra
Walter Buchsel fl Liviu Varcol ob Ulrich Mehlhart cl Carsten Wilkening bn Reinhold Friedrich tpt Marie Luise Neunecker hn Charlotte Cassedanne hp Brigitte Goebel spkr Frankfurt Radio Symphony Orchestra / Werner Andreas Albert
CPO CPO999 142-2 (70 minutes: DDD) Ⓑ
Recorded 1990-93

Hindemith's four wind concertos (1947-49) have never enjoyed the success of the Kammermusik concertos with which they have much in common; that for clarinet came first, to a commission from Benny Goodman and its lack of overt display may have militated against its popularity. Ulrich Mehlhart's performance more than bears comparison with that of any rival, and is served by the best sound. The 1949 Horn Concerto was written for Dennis Brain. If not quite in Brain's class, Marie Luise Neunecker's is nevertheless a fine, highly musical account. The declamation of Hindemith's poem in praise of the horn, inscribed over its wordless setting, may be thought intrusive. The other two concertos are rarities indeed, not until now commercially available in the UK. In them, Hindemith most nearly approaches his 1920s manner, for instance in the woodwinds and harp Concerto with the finale's quotations from Mendelssohn's Wedding March, occasioned by his silver anniversary. In the Clarinet and Horn Concertos, Albert's tempos are brisker than the composer's own; in all four works the soloists and Frankfurt orchestra are committed advocates.

Mathis der Maler / Metamorphosis

Mathis der Maler. Symphonic Metamorphosis on Themes of Carl Maria von Weber
Nobilissima Visione
Philadelphia Orchestra / Wolfgang Sawallisch
EMI 555230-2 (71 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1994

The Philadelphia players for Sawallisch give taut performances that simply outclass the competition. Another plus point is the unusual running order that achieves a better musical balance, starting with the most brilliant piece, the Symphonic Metamorphosis, and increasing in weight to the resounding brass Alleluias at the climax of the Mathis Symphony. Sawallisch's interpretations rank with Blomstedt in the Mathis Symphony and Symphonic Metamorphosis. Though many will prefer the leaner sound of the San Francisco Orchestra, EMI's sound for Sawallisch is relatively recessed. Given the spacious acoustic of Memorial Hall and the conductor's largeness of vision this is entirely apposite, with no loss of detail.

Kammermusiken

Kammermusiken – No 1, Op 24 No 1; No 2; No 3, Op 36 No 2; No 4, Op 36 No 3; No 5, Op 36 No 4; No 6, Op 46 No 1; No 7, Op 46 No 2. Kleine Kammermusik No 1 for Wind Quintet, Op 24 No 2
Konstanty Kulka vn Kim Kashkashian va Norbert Blume va d'amore Lynn Harrell vc Ronald Brautigam pf Leo van Doeselaar org Royal Concertgebouw Orchestra / Riccardo Chailly
Double Decca ② 473 722-2DF2 Ⓜ
(138 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1990 ●●●

Even were the performances and recordings not outstanding (and they are) this would be a very valuable set. Hindemith's series of Kammermusik ('Chamber Music') began in 1921 as an iconoclastic response to the hyper-intense emotionalism of German 'Expressionist' music over the previous 15 years. It continued until 1927, at which point he began to rationalise the harmonic and expressive foundations of his style. This, then, is neo-classicism with a German accent and as such it was to be a vital force in sweeping away the cobwebs of late romanticism; Walton, Prokofiev, Shostakovich and Britten were among those who, however indirectly, would feel the benefit. The music is also immensely enjoyable in its own right. Hindemith cheekily throws together disparate idioms and sheer force of personality is all that guards against anarchy. All this is done with more than half an eye on the performers' enjoyment of recreation, and the fine array of artists assembled by Chailly savour every detail. Recording quality is exemplary.

String Quartets

Hindemith String Quartet No 3, Op 22 🄷
Prokofiev String Quartet No 2 in F, Op 92
Walton String Quartet in A minor
Hollywood Quartet (Felix Slatkin, Paul Shure vns Paul Robyn va Eleanor Aller vc)
Testament mono SBT1052 (74 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1951

Although many accounts of the Prokofiev have appeared over the years, none has approached, let alone surpassed, the Hollywood version of the Second Quartet. The same would no doubt apply to the Hindemith but for the fact that there have been fewer challengers. What a wonderful feeling for line these players had, what an incredible, perfectly matched and blended ensemble – and how well these transfers sound! That goes for the Walton, too: there is no other account of it that makes so positive a case for it.

Viola Sonatas

Viola Sonatas – F, Op 11 No 4; Op 25 No 4; C (1939). Nobilissima visione – Meditation. Trauermusik
Paul Cortese va Jordi Vilaprinyó pf Philharmonia Orchestra / Martyn Brabbins Ⓕ
ASV CDDCA978 (70 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1993

The late-Romantic lyricism of the early F major Sonata, Op 11 No 4, comes over as slightly saccharine, with a tendency for the extremes to be evened out – a common problem with works from Hindemith's most radical decade. But in the more acerbic Second, Op 25 No 4 (1922), Cortese's warmth is persuasive. He is at his best in No 3 (1939), where he gives a performance of real depth that edges out even the composer's own from the top spot – though some might prefer a quicker pace. This can be recommended as first choice in the sonatas and Meditation (from Nobilissima visione). The Trauermusik is a bonus, though it does not supplant the Walther-Blomstedt version.

Violin Sonatas

Violin Sonatas – E flat, Op 11 No 1; D, Op 11 No 2; E (1935); C (1939)
Ulf Wallin vn Roland Pöntinen pf Ⓕ
BIS CD761 (56 minutes: DDD)
Recorded 1995 ●

The E major Sonata of 1935 is brief (under 10 minutes long) and not complex, yet it is familiar Hindemith from first note to last. The C major work (1939) is more complex and grave, and probably the finest of them. The longest sonata – and most conservative in idiom – is that in D major. Both Op 11 works were written in 1918 while Hindemith was on active service, and are remarkable for bearing few traces of either the grimness of the Great War or Hindemith's personal voice. Both deserve wider currency. This issue is also welcome in including the fragmentary abandoned finale of Op 11 No 1, a rustic dance not in keeping with the symmetry of the whole. The sweet-toned Ulf Wallin is fully attuned to Hindemith's wavelength and Pöntinen provides exemplary support. The recording is typical BIS (ie excellent). A splendid disc.

Requiem for those we love

When Lilacs Last in the Door-yard Bloom'd (Requiem for those we love)
Jan DeGaetani mez William Stone bar Atlanta Symphony Chorus and Orchestra / Robert Shaw
Telarc CD80132 (62 minutes: DDD). Text included Ⓜ
Recorded 1986 ●

Hindemith's Requiem is a setting of Whitman's poem – the lilacs piled on President Lincoln's coffin as it was taken across the country after his assassination just as the Civil War was over, the thrush symbolising his own mourning, and the then fallen Western star (hailed at Lincoln's inauguration as a good omen) – further layers of association were added when, 80 years later almost to the day, President Roosevelt died as the Second World War was coming to an end. It includes a tragedy-laden sinfonia, arias, recitatives, marches, a massive double fugue and a passacaglia. It is not, however, the great technical virtuosity – in places as close-packed as Whitman's verse – which leaves the most lasting impression, but the haunting beauty of much of the setting.

Robert Shaw gives a superlative and moving performance of the work and receives an outstandingly vivid recording. He knows the work perhaps more intimately than anyone (having commissioned it from Hindemith in 1945 for his Collegiate Chorale in New York), and he makes the most of every expressive nuance, every shade of dynamics, though without losing the overall shape. There is greater subtlety in the playing of the prelude than ever before; the big brass chords have weight and fullness without stridency, and the orchestral playing generally is first-rate; it would scarcely be possible to find a more sympathetic baritone than William Stone, an unforced lyrical singer with clean technique and exemplary enunciation, or a sweeter or purer-voiced mezzo than Jan DeGaetani. Add all these factors together and you will understand why this disc should be added to your collection.

Das Unaufhörliche

Ulrike Sonntag sop Robert Wörle ten Siegfried Lorenz bar Berlin Radio Children's Choir; Berlin Radio Chorus and Symphony Orchestra / Lothar Zagrosek
Wergo ② WER6603-2 (95 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included. Recorded 1995

The oratorio Das Unaufhörliche ('The One Perpetual') was Hindemith's longest concert work. It never established itself in the repertoire (although Boult conducted the UK première as early as 1933). Das Unaufhörliche is cast in three parts, the first describing the 'one perpetual' itself, the second its effect on diverse areas of activity (including art, science and love), the third Humankind's reaction away from it and final acquiescence. How closely Hindemith accorded with the poet Gottfried Benn's viewpoint is a matter for conjecture, but his evanescent score matched the poem's expansiveness of theme and nobility of utterance. In this alone it pointed the way to Mathis der Maler, for there is nothing here akin to the Kammermusiken or Neues vom Tage (a smash-hit in Berlin at the time).

This is the work's first recording and the performance is a fine one with good sound. Flies in the ointment? Soprano Ulrike Sonntag, who seems too often to be straining for her notes and whose intonation is not always secure, and Wergo's failure to provide a translation of Benn's spoken introduction, recorded in 1932 and included as the final track. These are quibbles, however, and should not deter anyone from investing in this important release.

Mathis der Maler

Roland Hermann bar Mathis; Josef Protschka ten Albrecht; Gabriele Rossmanith sop Regina; Sabine Hass sop Ursula; Harald Stamm bass Riedinger; Heinz Kruse ten Hans Schwalb; Victor von Halem bass Lorenz von Pommersfelden; Hermann Winkler ten Wolfgang Capito; Ulrich Hielscher bass Truchsess von Waldberg; Ulrich Ress ten Sylvester von Schaumberg; John Cogram ten Der Pfeiffer des Grafen von Helfenstein; Marilyn Schmiege mez Helfenstein
North German Radio Chorus; Cologne Radio Chorus and Symphony Orchestra / Gerd Albrecht
Wergo ③ WER6255-2 (166 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes and text included. Recorded 1990

The masterpiece, Mathis der Maler, is one of the pinnacles of 20th-century German opera. It has become axiomatic to see in it a parable of the times, with Hindemith using the turbulent world of 16th-century Germany to mirror the Nazi Reich and his place in it. But in reality Mathis is a spiritual and historical opera, not a political one. Rudolf Stephan in his essay for Wergo plays down the political angle; if Hitler had not risen to power until, say, 1936, one doubts that Mathis would have turned out much different. Gerd Albrecht's acquaintance with Hindemith's music goes back to the early 1960s, before the composer's death. Hindemith even sanctioned some retouching of the orchestration in Mathis made by Albrecht for a festival performance, though it is not made clear whether Albrecht has applied this here, nor to what extent. Rarely have Hindemith's often heavy textures sounded so clear.

As to the music, is not the brief concluding 'Alleluia' duet that crowns the sixth tableau one of the great moments in 20th-century opera? You will be convinced from your first hearing of it. There are fine moments aplenty in Albrecht's reading, not least where familiar passages from the Mathis Symphony surface and precipitate some of the most intense music of the opera.

Roland Hermann is, perhaps, a shade stolid in places as the painter (though his world-weariness in the final scene is just right); Josef Protschka makes a most authoritative Cardinal, acting as a perfect foil to Hermann's Mathis. They head a fine cast, supported by some lusty singing and playing from the combined forces of Cologne and North German Radios.

Mathis der Maler
Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau bar Mathis; James King ten Albrecht; Gerd Feldhoff bass Lorenz von Pommersfelden; Manfred Schmidt ten Capito; Peter Meven bass Riedinger; William Cochran ten Schwalb; Alexander Malta bass Truchsess von Waldburg; Donald Grobe ten Sylvester von Schaumberg; Rose Wagmann mez Ursula; Urszula Koszut sop Regina; Trudeliese Schmidt mez Countess Helfenstein
Bavarian Radio Chorus and Symphony Orchestra / Rafael Kubelík
EMI ③ 555237-2 (183 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Notes, text and translation included
Recorded 1977

Comparing Albrecht with Kubelík's reissued version shows that honours are fairly even; choosing between them would depend largely on one's keenness for individual names. Neither version is perfect, but both are very fine. Albrecht, who makes one or two minor but noticeable cuts, has the benefit of more modern sound, but EMI's for Kubelík has transferred well. The choruses in particular are excellent, although Albrecht's seem tame in the famous 'Temptation of St Antony' scene when set next to Kubelík's devilish-sounding Bavarians. Comparison of the casts yields a mixed picture; many listeners will prefer Fischer-Dieskau as Mathis to the rather raw-voiced Hermann; for many this will be the crucial criterion, but Wergo does have the better of some other principals. The roles of Schwalb and his daughter encapsulate the predicament: for EMI, William Cochran is more imposing than Heinz Kruse as the peasant leader but Wergo's Gabriele Rossmanith is sweeter and younger-toned as Regina. For Albrecht, their first appearance seems to be a mid-afternoon stroll and not the convincing escape from pursuit that Kubelík effects here (first disc, track 4).

Despite the urgings of sentiment, neither set outclasses the other. For most, choice will rest on preferences for cast members. Those who love this score will want both.

Sancta Susanna

Sancta Susanna
Susan Bullock sop Susanna; Della Jones mez Clementia; Ameral Gunson mez Old Nun; Mark Rowlinson spkr Farmhand; Maria Treedaway spkr Maid Leeds Festival Chorus

Drei Gesänge, Op 9. Das Nusch-Nuschi, Op 20 – Dances. Tuttifäntchen – Suite
Susan Bullock sop
BBC Philharmonic Orchestra / Yan Pascal Tortelier
Chandos CHAN9620 (70 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, text and translations included
Recorded 1997

Sancta Susanna is one of the three early stage works Hindemith composed in the wake of the First World War, its companions being Mörder, Hoffnung der Frauen (1919) and Das Nusch-Nuschi (1920), based on a play for Burmese marionettes and represented here by its dances.

Hindemith earned a living in the Frankfurt Opera during this period and so it is natural that he nurtured operatic ambitions. Sancta Susanna enjoyed a certain notoriety during its time. Fritz Busch refused to conduct its première on account of its blasphemous plot. It tells briefly of a young nun, Susanna, inflamed by the legend she hears from Sister Clementia, of a girl coming naked to the altar to embrace the lifesize figure of Christ on the Cross. For this blasphemy she is buried alive. Aroused and undeterred Susanna strips off and rips the covering from Christ's torso. She is terrified when a huge spider falls on to her head from the crucifix and, horrified by her deed, begs the nuns to wall her up. A drastic cure for arachnophobia or blasphemy!

The opera is short, concentrated, highly imaginative and resourceful in its use of sonority; and its expressionist musical language is so powerful that one feels at the end of its barely 23 minutes that one has heard a much longer piece. It is superbly done here. No praise can be too high for the singers and for the delicacy, eloquence and power of the playing that Tortelier draws from his orchestra. The recorded sound is of demonstration quality in its unforced naturalness.

The gorgeous Straussian Drei Gesänge, Op 9, are very vehement and passionate and at times wildly over the top but their assured craft and confident ambition is breathtaking. Susan Bullock performs them with thrilling panache. The dances from Nusch-Nuschi are just as expertly done.

Leopold Hofmann Austrian 1738-1793

GROVE After a period as Kapellmeister at St Peter's, Vienna, Hofmann became court keyboard teacher (1769); from 1772 he was second court organist and also Kapellmeister at St Stephen's Cathedral. He enjoyed wide fame as both player and composer. His many sacred works (including over 30 masses) combine Austrian Baroque and Neapolitan traits, while his c55 symphonies are in a galant style. Among his other works are Lieder, concertos and chamber music.

Cello Concertos

Cello Concertos – D, B:D3; C, B:C3; D, B:D1; C, B:C1
Northern Sinfonia / Tim Hugh vc Ⓢ
Naxos 8 553853 (68 minutes: DDD) Recorded 1996

The supremacy of Haydn and Mozart has always cast a shadow over the other Viennese composers of their time. In his day Leopold Hofmann, Kapellmeister at St Stephan's Cathedral from 1772, was one of the most eminent, as a composer of church music, symphonies, concertos and chamber works. His cello concertos – there are eight in all – belong to the 1760s or early 1770s, much the time of the Haydn C major Concerto, which they resemble in style. They are attractive, agreeable pieces, technically and formally assured if without very much individuality. The longest of the four concertos here, the one catalogued as D3, is more mature in style than the others and makes greater demands on the soloist. Tim Hugh's advocacy certainly makes the revival of these concertos worthwhile. He brings a very sound modern technique to the music, throwing off the rapid passages with evident ease, and there is a breadth to his phrasing that gives some amplitude to Hofmann's writing. His intonation is faultless, his tone full and warm, and he brings a keen feeling for galant expression to the slow movements. There is vivacity in the quick movements too. The Northern Sinfonia plays responsively. Those who relish good cello playing, should try this disc.

Violin Concertos

Violin Concertos – B flat, B:Bb1; A, B:A2. Concerto for Violin, Cello and Strings in G, B:G1
Lorraine McAslan vn Tim Hugh vc
Northern Chamber Orchestra / Nicholas Ward Ⓢ
Naxos 8 554233 (60 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1997

For a composer long represented in the catalogue only by a concerto that masqueraded as Haydn's (Hob VII*f*:D1), this is a welcome issue of orchestral works, admirably edited and presented by the scholar Allan Badley. These Viennese concertos, probably from the 1760s, are galant works, with florid solo parts and elaborate lines, a leisurely harmonic pace and a good deal of sequence, but they are shapely and effective music, with tenderness in the slow movements – and also wit: the finale of the B flat Concerto is especially ingenious. Then there is the double concerto, for violin and cello, which has much attractive dialogue and duetting, rather in the manner of the Mozart violin-viola Sinfonia concertante. The Adagio here is also eloquent. The performances are excellent, with clean, perfectly tuned and expressive violin playing from Lorraine McAslan. Tim Hugh plays equally securely and with a keen sense of style. Tempos are well chosen by Nicholas Ward who obtains spruce accompaniments from his orchestra.

Joseph Holbrooke British 1878-1958

GROVE A pupil of Corder at the Royal Academy of Music, Holbrooke was influenced by Wagner and early Strauss. His large output, dating mostly from the beginning of the century, includes operas (among them the huge trilogy The Cauldron of Anwyn), symphonies, symphonic poems, chamber music and much for piano.

Piano Concerto No 1

Holbrooke Piano Concerto No 1, Op 52, 'The Song of Gwyn ap Nudd' Wood Piano Concerto in D minor
Hamish Milne pf BBC Scottish Symphony Orchestra / Martyn Brabbins
Hyperion CDA67127 (69 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text included. Recorded 1999 ●●

Holbrooke's ambitious First Piano Concerto is by some margin the most impressive orchestral piece of his we have yet encountered on disc. Dubbed a symphonic poem by its creator, it follows the narrative of a poem based on a Welsh legend by his patron Lord Howard de Walden entitled The Song of Gwyn ap Nudd. Yet the work can also be appreciated perfectly well as a red-blooded Romantic concerto in the grand tradition. There's no denying the deft resourcefulness and vaulting sweep with which Holbrooke handles proceedings. It receives outstandingly eloquent and tirelessly committed treatment in this performance.

The coupling is the D minor Piano Concerto by Haydn Wood (1882-1959), who, before he made his name in the field of light music, was a gifted violinist and composition pupil of Stanford at the Royal College of Music. Indeed, it was Stanford who conducted the Queen's Hall première of Wood's big-boned D minor Concerto in July 1909. The work is an altogether more straightforward, less individual confection than it's partner. Grieg's Concerto is the obvious template, and there are plentiful stylistic echoes throughout of Tchaikovsky, Rachmaninov and MacDowell. The opening movement is full of effective display and boasts a ravishing secondary idea. By far the best music comes in the central Andante – a genuinely haunting, deeply felt essay, boasting some wistfully fragrant orchestral sonorities. Not a great work, by any means, but incurable Romantics will devour it. All told, this is an exemplary release.

Robin Holloway British 1943

GROVE Holloway studied with Goehr (from 1960) and at Cambridge, where in 1974 he was appointed lecturer. His large output covers many genres (including numerous songs) and shows a remarkable command of diverse styles: some pieces lovingly reinterpret Romanticism (Scenes from Schumann for orchestra,1970); others are strikingly positive in their modernism (The Rivers of Hell for chamber ensemble,1977). His first opera, Clarissa, a study of rape, was given by the English National Opera in London in 1990.

Concertos for Orchestra

Awards 1994

Second Concerto for Orchestra, Op 40
BBC Symphony Orchestra / Oliver Knussen
NMC NMCD015M (34 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1993 ●●●

A North African holiday was the initial stimulus for Robin Holloway's Second Concerto for Orchestra. The extremes of contrast, he tells us ('opulence and austerity, richness and drabness, brilliant light and dense shadow…And above all, the noises…the polyphony of hammering, tapping, thudding, tinkling, bashing …'), haunted him and were soon demanding to be turned into music. At the same time, the experience seems to have set him off on a more enigmatic, private voyage through his, and our musical past. We hear a few particularly aching bars from Act 2 of Tristan and rather more of Chopin's F sharp major Barcarolle; while a strange, broken tune on muted trombone metamorphoses neatly into Parry's Jerusalem. It's bewildering, but gripping at the same time. Holloway can swerve from lush, late Romanticism to strident modernism and back again with the alarming quickness of an opium dream; but as with any really revelatory dream, the more you probe it, the more lucid it seems. There are few contemporary orchestral works about which you will feel, on reaching the end, that you want to go back and soak in the experience all over again, and then go away somewhere and ponder its riddles.

The members of the BBC Symphony Orchestra play as though each one of them were engaged on his or her own voyage of discovery. Oliver Knussen's triumph in pulling it all together, and then shaping and shading it so lovingly, is just one of the technically miraculous aspects of this disc; another is that the production team have somehow turned BBC Maida Vale Studio No 1 into a fine, spacious acoustic, with details beautifully focused. It all adds up to a quite fascinating disc.

Third Concerto for Orchestra, Op 76
London Symphony Orchestra / Michael Tilson Thomas
NMC NMCD039 (45 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded live in 1996 ●

The first ideas for No 3 came during a trip through South America – sound pictures of Lake Titicaca, riotous New Year's Day celebrations in the Bay of Bahia, the slow train-crossing of the Great Brazilian Swamp and the huge, satanic slag heap at the Potosì Silver Mine. Holloway jotted them all down on the spot: then his notebook was stolen, and it took another 13 years to recall them and finish the piece. By then, of course, the alchemical processes of memory had transformed the original musical impressions into something quite different. What might have been simply a descriptive tone-poem finally emerged as a powerful and unusual musical argument – a huge slow movement, with a moderately fast dance-like finale, which evolves from tiny scraps of motifs (there is hardly a 'theme' in sight). And yet much of the original 'illustrative' character of the piece remains.

String and woodwind textures recall dense, overripe rain forest foliage; the dark, 'sluggish' first movement suggests the movement of a vast, slow, muddy river; extravagant sensuousness contrasts with clangorous bells or craggy brass. This recording, based on its 1996 première, is quite an achievement. It is rare for a conductor and an orchestra to show such a compelling grasp of the shape and atmosphere of a work at its first performance. Technically the sound has none of the usual problems associated with a live recording – virtually no intrusive noise, good balance, warm tone.

Fantasy-Pieces on...'Liederkreis'

Holloway Fantasy-Pieces on the Heine 'Liederkreis' of Schumann, Op 16. Serenade in C, Op 41*b*
Schumann Liederkreis, Op 24
Toby Spence ten Ian Brown pf
Nash Ensemble / Martyn Brabbins
Hyperion CDA66930 (75 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translation included. Recorded 1996 ●

A contemporary composer takes a 19th-century classic – Schumann's song-cycle Liederkreis – and sets it in a musical frame of his own devising: a short, astringent 'Praeludium' and four extended movements, the style hovering between pure homage and what the composer calls 'phantasmagorical collage'. Certainly sufficient to cause hackles to rise! But the result, entitled Fantasy-Pieces on the Heine 'Liederkreis' of Schumann is uniquely fascinating, haunting and increasingly rewarding the more one goes back to it. Brief though it is, the 'Praeludium' is just enough to tell the ear that the performance of Liederkreis that follows is not going to be the whole story. Holloway picks up magically on Schumann's ending, in a short movement, 'Half asleep' (what follows is, at times, intensely dream-like). Then come an Adagio, a Scherzo and a finale – on one level, symphonic, on another, an intricate series of references and cross-references based on Schumann's songs (not all from Liederkreis). The manner drifts between masterful irony and fleeting moments of intense self-revelation. Liederkreis remains Liederkreis, and yet something profound and (in the wider sense) modern is added. The Serenade in C is a kind of post-modern divertimento. Scored for the same forces as Schubert's Octet, it alternates, charmingly and teasingly, between sensuous Viennese cosiness, something closer to the salon Elgar, and delightful, end-of-the-pier vulgarity – though with a more acerbic harmonic colouring from time to time. Play a short extract to a musical friend and he/she might well date it before the First World War. But nothing is ever what it seems for very long; the disruptive subtlety of Fantasy-Pieces is here too, despite the seeming holiday feeling. Splendid performances from the Nash Ensemble – colourful, precise and sensitive to Holloway's kaleidoscopic shifts in mood. The recordings are quite excellent: the change in perspective for the Schumann songs makes perfect aural sense.

Gilded Goldbergs

Gilded Goldbergs
(for two pianos after JS Bach), Op 86
Micallef-Inanga Piano Duo (Jennifer Micallef, Glen Inanga pfs)
Hyperion ② CDA67360 (98 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded c2001 ●●

Holloway's initial prompt for these stunning two-piano transcriptions of Bach's Goldbergs, was his frustration as a single pianist at his 'inability to clarify the close-weave canons or manage the more fiendish hand-crossing numbers so idiomatic on a two-manual harpsichord'. So far, so pleasurable – but then inevitably the full artistic implication of what he was doing struck home. It was only later, after much agonised self-questioning, that he decided to 'go for the gilding and lose the guilt!'

Bach's original is thrown in at the deep centre of a swelling harmonic sea, sometimes as a moment of ineffable calm (Variation 18, a 'canon in sixths'), at other times more like an oncoming tidal wave (Variation 29, 'Toccata with clusters'). The use of modulation is often alarming but always musically effective and never more so than in an ingenious re-working of the closing 'Quodlibet' (Variation 30), which traverses 'all 12 keys', ending in D.

Holloway's ear for nuance, not to mention the sheer ingenuity of his invention, will leave you open-mouthed with admiration and it's surely a tribute to the Micallef-Inanga piano duo that this reviewer only thought of mentioning them towards the end of the piece. For the rest of the time it was the music and only the music – Bach's and Holloway's, but ultimately more Holloway's – that seemed to matter. And that surely is praise beyond measure. Fine sound, too, the icing on a very nutritious cake. Whatever your CD priorities to date, this one surely has to fly straight to the top of your wants list.

Vagn Holmboe

Danish 1909-1996

GROVE Holmboe studied with Hoffding and Jeppesen in Copenhagen, and with Toch in Berlin, then returned to Copenhagen to work as a teacher (at the conservatory), critic and composer. He is the leading Danish symphonist after Nielsen (he has composed 11, 1935-82) and composer of a series of 14 string quartets (1949-75), regarded as the most important Scandinavian contributions to the genre since World War Two. He has also written operas, vocal and chamber music. His style is unproblematic if not immediately accessible, influenced by Nielsen, Hindemith and Stravinsky.

Chamber Concertos

Chamber Concertos – No 7 for Oboe and Chamber Orchestra, Op 37; No 8 for Orchestra, Op 38, 'Sinfonia concertante'; No 9 for Violin, Viola and Orchestra, Op 39
Max Artved ob Mikkel Futtrup vn
Tim Frederiksen va
Danish Radio Sinfonietta / Hannu Koivula
Da Capo 8 224086 (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997 ●●

While Holmboe remained audibly the same composer, Holmboe the concerto writer had a very different agenda from Holmboe the symphonist, and nowhere does that become more apparent than in No 8 (1945), subtitled Sinfonia concertante, a splendid chamber-orchestral concerto yet also a direct precursor of the magnificent First Chamber Symphony (1953). Internal cohesion seems to be No 8's raison d'être, not the interplay of soloist(s) and tutti found in, for instance, Nos 7 (1944-45) and 9 (1945-46). The Eighth also stands a little apart from its companions by virtue of its more Hindemithian aspect. The arch-form first movement of No 7, for oboe, has in its outermost sections distinct pre-echoes of the humane luminosity that infuses so much of the music of Holmboe's last three decades, and – as does the second of No 8 – nimbly synthesises elements of multiple movements within a single span as do several of the symphonies. No 9 is more conventional, a delightful two-part invention in three movements for violin and viola, with orchestral accompaniment in the outer spans only. The performances are exemplary, the sound clear if very slightly studio-bound. A definite must-buy for Holmboe enthusiasts.

Chamber Concertos – No 10 for Orchestra, Op 40; No 11 for Trumpet and Orchestra, Op 44; No 12 for Trombone and Orchestra, Op 52; No 13 for Oboe, Viola and Orchestra, Op 67
Max Artved ob Ole Edward Antonsen tpt Jacques Mauger tbn Tim Frederiksen va
Danish Radio Sinfonietta / Hannu Koivula
Da Capo 8 224087 (75 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997 ●

Chamber Concerto No 10 (1945-46) is a bracing early example of Holmboe's metamorphosis technique, its nine sections acting like variations within a traditional concerto format: the sections in pairs respectively form an introduction and three 'movements', with the last acting as coda. The concerto is described on the back of the jewel-case as being 'for wood-brass-gut and orchestra': in the official Hanson catalogue, 'Wood-brass-gut' – in Danish Trae-messing-tarm – is the subtitle, the concerto being listed as the composer's second (of three) for orchestra. Nos 11-13 (1948, 1950 and 1955-56) are conventional in layout. The gem of the disc is No 13, for the unusual combination of oboe and viola (for the most part playing as a pair in intertwining lines). This is music suffused by that wonderful Nordic light so prevalent in Holmboe's later works, beguiling and beautifully played. Although Da Capo's recording is a mite studio-bound, this is a fine disc.

Chamber Concertos – No 11 for Trumpet and Orchestra, Op 44; No 12 for Trombone and Orchestra, Op 52; Tuba and Orchestra, Op 127. Intermezzo concertante, Op 171
Håkan Hardenberger tpt Christian Lindberg tbn Jens Bjørn-Larsen tuba Aalborg Symphony Orchestra / Owain Arwel Hughes Ⓕ
BIS CD802 (55 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1995

The Trumpet Concerto has a leanness of texture and neo-classical air that will surprise those familiar with Holmboe's symphonies. Hardenberger's first entry creates an electricity that is maintained throughout the work – indeed, the disc as a whole. No 11's tripartite design recurs, condensed into a single movement, in No 12: a brief, expressively crucial slow section framed by a large-boned Allegro (rather grave in character in the trombone work), and a good-humoured, rollicking finale. The Tuba Concerto (1976), by contrast, requires a full orchestral complement, its one integrated span bearing little semblance of traditional three-movement form. It is the most dramatic and exploratory work here, both in mood and sonority, the demands of which on tuba virtuosos over the years have occasioned it to be played in slightly differing versions, especially with regard to the taxing cadenza. The short Intermezzo concertante reaffirms that the tuba really can sing. Wonderful music, wonderfully performed and recorded.

Symphonies

Symphonies – No 11, Op 144; No 12, Op 175;
No 13, Op 192
Aarhus Symphony Orchestra /
Owain Arwel Hughes
BIS CD728 (63 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1994 ●

Few who have invested in this series so far can doubt that these are among the most commanding symphonies to have emerged in post-war Europe. Some might even argue that they are the finest since Sibelius and Nielsen. All credit to Owain Arwel Hughes and the Aarhus orchestra for their committed advocacy and to BIS for recording them in such vivid, naturally balanced sound. The 11th, composed in 1980, is quintessential Holmboe, and its atmosphere resonates in the mind long after you have heard it. To quote Knud Ketting's notes, 'the symphony's climax in dynamic and emotional terms comes in the second movement and it then slowly retreats within itself…[it] is cast as a strong arch, which impresses at first hearing, and commands increasing admiration on closer acquaintance'. The arabesque that opens the symphony seems to come from another world and the transparent, luminous textures communicate the sense of a spiritual quest that one rarely encounters in modern music. The 12th is a taut, well-argued piece, and is, like its two companions on this disc, in three movements. No one listening to the 13th, written at the instigation of Owain Arwel Hughes, would think that it was the work of an 85-year-old. Of course, there have been other octogenarian symphonies but none that sounds quite so youthful or highly charged as this one.

Symphonic Metamorphoses

Symphonic Metamorphoses – No 1, Op 68,
'Epitaph'; No 2, Op 76, 'Monolith'; No 3, Op 80,
'Epilog'; No 4, Op 108, 'Tempo variabile'
Aalborg Symphony Orchestra /
Owain Arwel Hughes Ⓕ
BIS CD852 (75 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1996 ●

In form the symphonic metamorphosis is an offshoot of the symphonic fantasia (but of a radically different ilk to Sibelius's Pohjola's Daughter), each of these four very different from its companions. The vigour and luminous orchestration of the symphonies are present, as are many of the internal developmental processes, but not the level of integration. Holmboe's priorities here are unlike those of many others of his pieces, yet the music coheres perfectly on its own terms. Hughes is fully inside Holmboe's idiom, whether in the single-minded determination of Monolith or in the visionary Epilog, one of the composer's most searching utterances, prefiguring both the Ninth Symphony (1969) and Requiem for Nietzsche. This is extraordinary music.

String Quartets

String Quartets – No 10, Op 102; No 11, Op 111;
No 12, Op 116
Kontra Quartet (Anton Kontra, Boris Samsing vns
Peter Fabricius va Morten Zeuthen vc)
Da Capo 8 224101 (67 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997

These works are worthy of comparison with the best in 20th-century cycles. True, Holmboe's idiom was less overtly pioneering or sensational (in the best sense of the word) than his peers, yet his quartets are no less visionary or searching. The crucial difference was his uncommon humanity, which refracts through his music like light through a prism, with no place for Shostakovich-type desolation. The 10th Quartet (1969) is serious in tone but always positive in spirit. Cast as a diptych, the constituent sections (fast-slow-fast, and slow-fast) together form a five-movement arch design to which he would often return later – as in No 12 (1973). The 10th is typically subtle and seems to grow and develop with each re-hearing. The same is true of No 11 (1972). Do not be fooled by its comparative brevity (just over 18 minutes), the subtitle (Quartetto rustico) or the light, bird-like twitterings of the opening Allegro leggiero into believing it a relaxation or something merely diverting: it is just as purposeful as any of its fellows, even if it smiles throughout. No 11's Andante tranquillo third movement is another of Holmboe's wonderful creations combining Nordic light with sublime counterpoint. The 12th has two such spans, and is one of his finest quartets. The opening Allegro robusto has a Bartókian air reminding us that eastern European folk music was a lasting influence, while the work's final bars, unusually, resolve on a question mark.

The Kontra Quartet has the idiom under its skin; though the clear recording is not exactly spacious. Still, a fine disc.

String Quartets – No 13, Op 124; No 14, Op 125;
No 15, Op 135
Kontra Quartet (Anton Kontra, Boris Samsing vns
Peter Fabricius va Morten Zeuthen vc)
Dacapo 8 224127 (59 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997-98

Holmboe's Quartets Nos 13 and 14 were composed back-to-back in 1975, but are as different as chalk and cheese. No 13 is in the five-movement structure that he favoured at this time. Right from the opening gentle but severe dissonance, the work moves with complete sureness of touch into a new landscape. Jakob Levinson in his booklet-note comments on its Janus-like aspects: how it is 'at once more rigorous and freer', looking back to earlier symmetries and forward to the different tack taken by No 14 and its successors. The appeal of that new direction accounts, presumably, for his carrying on straight afterwards with No 14. Cast in six short movements gathered into groups of three, then two, with the Allegro vivace finale (the longest single movement) separate, it grows inexorably from the severe, almost Bach-like opening solo for the first violin. The movements have something of the character of variations, but are thoroughly integrated. The grave, concentrated No 15 (1977-78) has at its heart the Funèbre third movement, a searching and dramatic funeral march, motifs from which are taken up in the finale.

The Kontra's performances are excellent and Dacapo's recording is clear. A great disc.

Requiem for Nietzsche

Requiem for Nietzsche, Op 84
Helge Rønning ten Johan Reuter bar
Danish National Radio Chorus and Symphony Orchestra / Michael Schønwandt
Dacapo 8 224207 (52 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included
Recorded c2001 ●

Holmboe's Requiem for Nietzsche is his largest choral work, yet it is also one of his least known. Composed during 1963-64, it sets a series of 11 sonnets by the distinguished poet Thorkild Bjørnvig which together, to quote Paul Rapoport's fine accompanying note, 'create a symbolic interpretation of Nietzsche – his expectations, aspirations, discoveries, conflicts and tragic decline'.

Holmboe responded to Bjørnvig's remarkable sequence with one of his richest and stylistically most diverse scores, incorporating some of his most adventurous writing for chorus as well as orchestra. It is also one of his most exploratory in expression, the music teeming with ideas, the scoring varying from massive tumultuous outbursts to delicate duos and trios – for instance, the spectral tenor solo midway through Part Three. It is no easy ride, however, and this is music that requires close attention and repeated hearings. To those familiar with Holmboe's output, the tonal landscapes of Requiem for Nietzsche are not dissimilar to some of the later motets and the Ninth Symphony (1967-69).

The performance is as committed as the music, the orchestra alternately shimmering with that beguiling Nordic luminosity that suffuses so much of Holmboe's work, and charting the depths of Nietzsche's despair. Both vocalists are very fine, rich toned and beautifully balanced by sound engineer Jørn Jacobsen. The sound, although a little distant, catches the full range of this wonderful score in full depth. This is a disc to return to again and again.

Gustav Holst

British 1874-1934

Holst studied at the Royal College of Music GROVE with Stanford, and in 1895 met Vaughan Williams, to whom he was close for the rest of his life. From 1905 he taught at St Paul's Girls' School in Hammersmith. Like Vaughan Williams, he was impressed by English folksong, but also important was his reading in Sanskrit literature (chamber opera Savitri, composed1908; Choral Hymns from the Rig Veda, 1912) and his experience of the orchestral music of Stravinsky and Strauss (he had played the trombone professionally). In The Planets (1916) he produced a suite of seven highly characterful movements to represent human dispositions associated with the planets in astrology, and his interest in esoteric wisdom is expressed too in his cantata The Hymn of Jesus (1917). But his very varied output also includes essays in a fluent neo-classicism (A Fugal Concerto for flute, oboe and strings, 1923; Double Violin Concerto, 1929), a bare Hardy impression (Egdon Heath, 1927) and operas.

Egdon Heath

A Somerset Rhapsody, H87. Beni Mora, H107.
Invocation, H75. A Fugal Overture, H151.
Egdon Heath, H172. Hammersmith, H178
Tim Hugh vc Royal Scottish National Orchestra / David Lloyd-Jones
Naxos 8 553696 (69 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1996

This superb recording was made in the Henry Wood Hall in Glasgow. Lloyd-Jones has as his two weightiest items the Hardy-inspired Egdon Heath, arguably Holst's finest work, as well as the prelude and fugue, Hammersmith, comparably dark and intense. In the latter he chooses the wind-band version, achieving a subtlety of shading in phrasing and dynamic amply to justify that striking choice. The Naxos sound is vividly atmospheric while letting one hear inner detail. Lloyd-Jones generally adopts flowing speeds and is objective in his interpretation while bringing out to the full the tenderness and refinement of the writing. Particularly beautiful is the performance of A Somerset Rhapsody which opens the disc, with the cor anglais solo ravishingly played. The six works are neatly balanced, three dating from before the climactic period of The Planets and The Hymn of Jesus, and three after. Particularly valuable is the atmospheric Invocation for cello and orchestra of 1911, rather dismissed by Imogen Holst, but here given a yearningly intense, deeply thoughtful performance with Tim Hugh as soloist. This is a highly recommendable offering, whether for the dedicated Holstian or the newcomer wanting to investigate work outside The Planets.

Additional recommendations
A Somerset Rhapsody
Couplings: Beni Mora. A Fugal Overture.

Hammersmith. Japanese Suite. Scherzo
London Philharmonic Orchestra; London Symphony Orchestra / Boult
Lyrita SRCD222 (62 minutes: ADD: 7/92) Ⓕ

Conducted by one of the composer's greatest friends and staunchest advocate, this release is still of the front rank.

Somerset Rhapsody and Egdon Heath
Couplings: Brook Green Suite. Vaughan Williams In the Fen Country. Five Variants of Dives and Lazarus. Norfolk Rhapsody No 1
Bournemouth Sinfonietta / Del Mar; various artists
HMV Classics HMV5 73461-2 Ⓜ
(66 minutes: DDD/ADD: 2/81^{R})

The Somerset Rhapsody builds from the quietest of beginnings to a fine climax – a vivid recording.

The Planets

The Planets
Women's voices of the Montreal Symphony Chorus and Orchestra / Charles Dutoit
Decca Penguin 460 606-2DP Ⓑ
Awards 1987 (53 minutes: DDD)
Recorded 1986 ●●●

The Planets is undoubtedly Holst's most famous work and its success is surely deserved. The musical characterisation is as striking as its originality of conception: the association of 'Saturn' with old age, for instance, is as unexpected as it is perceptive. Bax introduced Holst to astrology and while he wrote the music he became fascinated with horoscopes, so it is the astrological associations that are paramount, although the linking of 'Mars' (with its enormously powerful 5/4 rhythms) and war also reflects the time of composition. Throughout, the work's invention is as memorable as its vivid orchestration is full of infinite detail. No recording can reveal it all but this one comes the closest to doing so. Dutoit's individual performance is in a long line of outstanding recordings.

Holst The Planets[a]
Elgar Variations on an Original Theme, Op 36, 'Enigma'[b]
[a]Geoffrey Mitchell Choir; [a]London Philharmonic Orchestra, [b]London Symphony Orchestra / Sir Adrian Boult
EMI Great Recordings of the Century
567748-2 (78 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded [a]1978, [b]1970 ●

Boult's long association with The Planets is well known (since the famous first run-through – for it can scarcely have been more – at the Queen's Hall in 1919). This splendid set from 1978 has been admirably remastered. Boult, in the composer's words, 'first made the Planets shine' and he always had something special to say about the music on all his recordings. Apart from public performances, he made five recordings of the work, and this is considered by many to have been the finest. Boult's interpretation varied very little throughout his long association with the work, only being temporarily shaken when he heard the reissue of Holst's own very different 1926 performance. However, he stuck to his own view which Holst thoroughly approved of.

The actual performance has an indefinable 'rightness' about it, a supreme authority that makes it difficult to imagine the score being interpreted in any other way. Has 'Mars' ever resounded with more terrifying ferocity since? In 'Venus' the playing has a translucent beauty, while the impish 'Mercury' really sparkles. 'Jupiter' has marvellous exuberance and sparkle, its big tune lent enormous dignity and humanity. 'Saturn', too, is paced to perfection (the central climax has a massive inevitability about it), and 'Uranus' goes about his mischievous antics with terrific swagger.

If you've never heard Boult's Planets, we urge immediate investigation of this set. Plenty of Enigma recordings have been added to the catalogue since 1970, but none has surpassed it in authority and fidelity. There is also a slightly elegiac feel to the phrasing here as if Boult, no sentimentalist, was nevertheless aware that his Enigma days must inevitably be numbered. Yet the faster variations have the vitality and brio that one might expect from a younger conductor. The LSO's performance is excellent and the recording too.

The Planets[a] (includes extra version of Neptune with original ending). Lyric Movement C Matthews Pluto
Tim Pooley va Hallé Orchestra and [a]Choir (Women's Voices) / Mark Elder
Hyperion CDA67270 (75 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Unusually popular repertoire for Hyperion; but the special interest here is Pluto, commissioned by the Hallé's outgoing director Kent Nagano to illustrate the eighth planet, discovered only in 1930. For proper effect, though, it obviously demands a decent Planets, which happily it receives. If the Hallé lack the glitz and sheen of Dutoit's and Karajan's orchestras, then they offer a warmly idiomatic sound which suits their new director Mark Elder's generally expansive yet detailed approach, and the full-blooded, rather forward recording.

Mars, with balefully clear percussion, steers a middle way between the machine-gun tempo favoured by the composer and Haitink's leaden grimness (Philips – nla). Venus and Mercury are sensuous, even lingering, but Jupiter is refreshingly vibrant and dancing. Tension slackens somewhat in Saturn, but spaciousness and detail make more sense of Uranus than usual, although the transcendent organ glissando is somewhat underwhelming.

Neptune is suprisingly lush, with a chorus as alluring as ethereal. Which, in the main version here, fades out to Pluto – a flashing scherzo, inspired by the rushing particles of the so-called 'solar wind'. Matthews wisely avoids Holstian pastiche, linking it to the original by tempo – Holst's favoured 5/4 – and sound; celesta, glockenspiel and jittery percussion create fleeting reminiscences of the other planets. The result is appealing, postmodern but lyrical, yet ultimately unsatisfying.

Like a spectacularly modern wing grafted onto a classic building, it stimulates by contrast, yet the uneasy lack of unity diminishes both. A separate piece, linked companionably rather than umbilically, might have been a rather more effective choice. As the composer disarmingly admits, Pluto's planetary status is pretty dubious, anyway. The Lyric Movement, with a fine soloist, raises hopes for some more rare Holst from this particular team.

The Planets. Egdon Heath, H172
BBC Symphony Chorus and Orchestra / Sir Andrew Davis
Warner Apex 8573-89087-2 (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1993

This is a mightily impressive account of The Planets. The high spot of Davis's reading is undoubtedly 'Saturn', whose remorseless tread has rarely seemed more implacable. Aided by orchestral playing that is both memorably concentrated and rapt, Holst's textures in the closing section acquire a breathtaking translucency, and how memorably the BBC SO brass thrusts home the terrifying central climax at 5'34". 'Neptune', too, is exceptionally successful: ethereally delicate tremolando harps set the scene for a tone picture of exquisite beauty, graced by choral work of notable purity from the women of the BBC Symphony Chorus. Elsewhere, 'Mercury' darts hither and thither in suitably impish fashion. 'Venus' is cool and chaste: if the BBC violins can't quite command the bloom and sheen of the very finest groups, the liquidity and poise of the woodwind are most striking. And the burst of energy at the close of 'Jupiter' is genuinely exhilarating.

The spectacularly ample sound certainly makes the mischievous antics of 'Uranus' a feast for the ears, and Davis handles the coda superbly, plunging the listener into a world which is unnerving in its bleakness. Davis shows comparable perception in the similarly remote terrain of Egdon Heath. He succeeds in conveying much of the sombre intensity of Holst's cloud-hung evocation.

The Cloud Messenger

The Cloud Messenger, H111[aef]. The Hymn of Jesus, H140[ef]. A Choral Fantasia, H177[bdg]. A Dirge for Two Veterans, H121[dg]. Ode to Death, H144[eg]. Ave Maria, H49[c]. Motets, H159-60[c] – The Evening-Watch. This have I done for my true love, H128[c]. Seven Partsongs, H162[bdg]. O lady, leave that silken thread, H4[c]. Short Partsongs, H13[c] – Soft and gently through my soul. The autumn is old, H1[c]. Winter and the birds, H App I/40[c]
[a]Della Jones mez [b]Patricia Rozario sop [c]Finzi Singers / Paul Spicer; [d]Joyful Company of Singers; London Symphony [e]Chorus and [f]Orchestra, [g]City of London Sinfonia / Richard Hickox
Chandos Two for One ② CHAN241-6 Ⓜ
(147 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1990 ◉

The Cloud Messenger is a 43-minute work of considerable imaginative power. Before its previous single issue release it had been virtually forgotten since its disastrous première under the baton of Holst himself in 1913. It shows the composer already working on an epic scale – something which casts light on the subsequent eruption of The Planets. It is marvellous to have the work on disc, though it is, as you might expect, uneven. Those who admire the ascetic rigour of Holst's later music may share the reservations of Imogen Holst and find the score disappointingly 'backward'. There are certainly echoes of Vaughan Williams's A Sea Symphony and several older models. On the other hand, the glittering approach to the sacred city on Mount Kailasa and the stylised orientalism of the climactic dance are new to British music; another world, the world of 'Venus', is foreshadowed in the closing pages. The text is Holst's own translation from the Sanskrit. One of the few incontrovertible masterpieces in Holst's output, the familiar Hymn of Jesus has seldom received a better performance on disc, although the grand acoustics of London's St Jude's impart a certain warm imprecision – the choral singing itself is splendidly crisp – which can blunt the impact of Holst's acerbic harmonies.

The Hymn of Jesus, H140

The Hymn of Jesus, H140[a]. First Choral Symphony, H155[b]
[b]Felicity Palmer sop [a]St Paul's Cathedral Choir; [a]London Symphony Chorus; London Philharmonic [b]Choir and Orchestra / [a]Sir Charles Groves, [b]Sir Adrian Boult
EMI British Composers 565128-2
(72 minutes: ADD). Texts included. Ⓜ
Recorded 1974 and 1977

When it first appeared in 1978, Groves's account of The Hymn of Jesus was generally rated a finer effort than Boult's 1961 Decca recording. The authority and honesty of the former's direction is impressive. True, orchestral discipline could at times be tighter, but the choral singing is never less than very commendable. It should, however, be pointed out that Groves's achievement has since been outshone by Richard Hickox (reviewed overleaf), who in turn cannot quite match the extraordinary fervour and intensity of Sir Malcolm Sargent in his pioneering 1944 account. The really good news here, though, is Boult's powerful 1974 première recording of the awesome Choral Symphony. This was one of Holst's most ambitious, imaginative and questing creations, still under-appreciated to this day. It contains pages that are among the most original he conceived, not least the opening 'Invocation to Pan' and extraordinarily intense setting of the Ode on a Grecian Urn. The sound is satisfyingly full and immediate.

Seven Partsongs

Seven Partsongs, H162. A Choral Fantasia, H177. A Dirge for Two Veterans, H121. Ode to Death, H144
Patricia Rozario sop London Symphony Chorus; Joyful Company of Singers; City of London Sinfonia / Richard Hickox
Chandos CHAN9437 (59 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts included. Recorded 1994

It is the First World War that is the unnamed, ever-felt presence here. 'I float this carol with joy, with joy to thee O Death', chants Walt Whitman with that willed mystical intoxication that proved so surprisingly attractive to both Holst and Vaughan Williams, composers who could face reality soberly enough and in Holst's case often with a bleak, spare beauty of sound that takes and bestows only a hard-won comfort. Listening even to the relatively 'light' and partially happy Bridges settings (the Seven Partsongs), one becomes aware of a hollow, half-anxious feeling, located in that mysterious area of midriff wherein these undefined apprehensions take their dwelling. With it comes a musician's cherishing of silence, as though the music which intrudes upon it must be most finely attuned if it is to justify the presumption. Death emerges from its temporary hiding place in the seventh ('Assemble, all ye maidens') and then, for the rest of the recital, comes into its kingdom. Most explicitly, the Dirge for Two Veterans takes up the 'full-keyed bugles' of war, and that was written in the last months of 1914. In the Ode to Death (1931) and even the partsongs for women's voices, it is surely the dreadful sadness of that war which fills the hollow places and so, for comfort, enhances the apprehension of beauty in music. The programme has a very special value, and the performances are worthy of it.

Arthur Honegger

French/Swiss 1892-1955

GROVE Honegger studied from 1911 at the Paris Conservatoire, then returned to Switzerland for military service (1914-15), though Paris remained his home. He was a member of Les Six, and set Cocteau's libretto in his stylised opera Antigone (1927), but he had no time for Satie or for the group's flippancy: he was acutely aware of artistic responsibility and took his guidelines from Bach and Beethoven.

His harmony, though fundamentally tonal, is often dense and wide-ranging, set in motion by a vigorous rhythmic propulsion that suggests Baroque formality wielding modern means: that is the manner of his oratorio-style stage works, including Le roi David (1921) and Jeanne d'Arc au bûcher (1938). His other works include five symphonies (1930, 1941, 1946, 1946, 1951), three 'symphonic movements' (Pacific 231, 1923; Rugby, 1928; No 3, 1933), chamber pieces, songs and much incidental music.

Symphonies

No 1 in C; No 2 for Strings and Trumpet obbligato in D, H153; No 3, H186, 'Liturgique'; No 4 in A, H191, 'Deliciae basiliensis' No 5 in D, H202, 'Di tre re'

Symphonies Nos 1-5. Three Symphonic Movements – Pacific 231, H53; Rugby, H67; No 3, H83. Pastorale d'été, H31
Suisse Romande Orchestra / Fabio Luisi Ⓕ
Cascavelle ③ RSR6132 (174 minutes: DDD) ●

The first thing to say about this recording is that it is in most respects excellent. The textures are clearer and sharper than Dutoit's (for Erato) and passages like the contrapuntal tour de force in the last movement of the Fourth Symphony are all the more impressive for it. The Suisse Romande's solo woodwind are fresh and seductive, with a particularly fine first oboe while, on the other hand, the clarity of the recording can bring with it a certain bleakness, entirely appropriate at the beginning of the Fifth Symphony, which here comes over rather like Sibelius.

Where Dutoit sometimes scores is in the more tender moments (his Pastorale d'été is a touch more loving than Luisi's) and in generally faster tempos for the symphony finales. In those of the first two symphonies, Luisi's tempos sound just a little heavy. But his penchant for slower speeds brings notable rewards both in the central movement of the Third Symphony and in the final Adagio of the third Symphonic Movement. This latter passage, only marginally affected by a few flat alto saxophone notes at the top of the range, makes Dutoit's Adagio seem like a lightweight Andante.

Luisi is alive to the strong element of melancholy and disillusion in this music – strong also in Honegger himself. Where, in the opening of the Second Symphony, Jansons allows himself to get increasingly excited by the repeated viola figure, Luisi recognises it as the call of fate, that changeth not. A large measure of Honegger's disillusion came from what he saw as the triumph of the forces of collectivism over the individual human spirit, and in the Third Symphony Luisi brings out the solo cello line in the third movement as the voice of the composer crying out against the waste of war. Luisi also obeys one of the composer's rare dictats over tempo: Honegger knew that conductors weren't going to like the slow speed of crotchet=52 for the central Adagio mesto of the Second Symphony, but he stuck by it none the less. If one compares this tempo even with Jansons' very nearly obedient crotchet=56, one can't help concluding that Honegger and Luisi are both right. And that goes for most of the music on these three discs.

Honegger Symphonies Nos 2 and 3
Stravinsky Concerto in D
Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Herbert von Karajan
DG The Originals 447 435-2GOR Ⓜ
(72 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1969 ●●●

Karajan's performances of these Honegger symphonies enjoy legendary status – and rightly so. This recording remains in a class of its own for sheer beauty of sound and flawless ensemble. The French critic, Bernard Gavoty, once spoke rather flightily of Karajan 'transcending emotions and imparting to them that furnace heat that makes a work of genius give off light if brought to the desired temperature' – but it's true! There is a luminous quality and an incandescence about these performances. The Stravinsky Concerto in D major was written within a year of the Symphonie liturgique and may perhaps be a little too 'cultured' and not spiky enough for some tastes. The lightness of touch, sprightliness of rhythm and flawless ensemble of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra are an absolute joy in themselves.

Symphony No 2, H153. Three Symphonic Movements Nos 1-3. Pastorale d'été, H31. Monopartita, H204
Zurich Tonhalle Orchestra / David Zinman
Decca 455 352-2DH (70 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1998

With the Symphony for strings David Zinman gives us a handful of shorter orchestral pieces ranging from the well-known to a comparative rarity, the Monopartita. This was Honegger's last orchestral work and has even been referred to as a Sixth Symphony which has imploded. It finds the composer at his most resourceful: one of its episodes hints at the slow movement of the Deliciae basiliensis Symphony. The Tonhalle does not offer string playing that can match Karajan's Berlin Philharmonic, but Zinman can more than hold his own against most comers. He gets responsive and sensitive playing from the orchestra. A finely characterised Pastoral d'été and a Pacific 231 that sounds as if it is coming in on time, and very good Decca sound enhance the attractions of this issue.

Symphonies Nos 3 and 5. Three Symphonic Movements – No 1
Danish National Radio Symphony Orchestra / Neeme Järvi
Chandos CHAN9176 (57 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1992

There is a resemblance in the Fifth to the opening bars (with their triads in contrary motion) to Milhaud's Moses and one wonders whether it was a deliberate tribute or merely fortuitous. Be that as it may, the Fifth remains one of Honegger's most individual scores, and this recording serves it well. There is nothing restrained here and even if the finale does not quite match the sheer exhilaration and gusto of Serge Baudo's wonderful Supraphon account from the early 1960s (which now sounds far more full bodied in its new transfer), the Järvi is not far behind: moreover it is very well recorded. So, too, is the rest of the programme and although the playing of the Danish orchestra for Järvi in the Third does not outshine that of the BPO for Karajan this is a very convincing and compelling account. The Pacific 231 also thunders mightily along the track.

Additional recommendation
Symphonies Nos 1-5
Couplings: Three Symphonic Movements – No 1, H53; 'Pacific 231'; No 2, H67, 'Rugby'
Bavarian Radio Symphony Orchestra / Dutoit
Erato Ultima ② 3984-21340-2 (141 minutes: DDD: recorded 1982-84) Ⓑ

Dutoit's cycle is a considerable achievement; at the price this is an attractive starting-point for the symphonies.

Alan Hovhaness American 1911-2000

GROVE Hovhaness studied with Converse at the New England Conservatory. His earliest music, though Romantic in harmony, reflects his interest in Renaissance style; from 1943 he began to incorporate elements of his Armenian heritage, and in the 1950s, when he travelled widely, he embraced non-Western and experimental procedures. From c1960 he took a keen interest in Japanese and Korean music, which affected his style; only in the 1970s did he return to a more Western style, richer and more spacious. An individual feature is his way of treating elements (harmony, tone colour etc) as either predominant or else neutral; any note may be exclusively linear, vertical, textural or rhythmic. Most of his work is broadly religious in inspiration; he is enormously prolific, having reached his first 60 symphonies in the mid-1980s, with corresponding production in other orchestral music, choral and solo vocal works, piano and chamber music.

Khaldis, Op 91

Khaldis, Op 91^{a}. Mount Katahdin, Op 405^{b}. Fantasy, Op 16^{c}
^{ab}Martin Berkofsky, ^{c}Alan Hovhaness pfs
^{a}William Rohdin, ^{a}Dan Cahn, ^{a}Francis Bonny, ^{a}Patrick Dougherty tpts ^{a}Neal Boyar perc
Crystal CD814 (52 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded ^{c}1970, ^{a}1972 and ^{b}1999

Khaldis (1951) has a connection with the late Hovhaness's well-known St Vartan symphony (1950) in their common use of a quartet of trumpets: the composer wanted a piece he could play with them and a percussionist alone. It is a striking work – named from the god of the universe of the pre-Armenian Urarduan people – full of apocalyptic visions. The even-movement structure has the feel of a set of studies rather than an integrated concerto, the brass tending to play en bloc and one movement scored as if for some primordial trio of giants.

The sonata Mount Katahdin (1986-87) does not sound almost a career later than Khaldis. The four movements resemble the sequence of a Bach orchestral suite, with the imposing opening 'Solenne', succeeded by three tiny movements, lighter in character and acting as foils for the first. The central 'Jhala of Larch Trees' is particularly lovely. Berkofsky plays with evident love and conviction, and these are persuasive performances, whether from 1972 or 1999 (Mount Katahdin).

Most fascinating of all is Hovhaness's own account of the Fantasy, written *c*1936 and also once available on a Poseidon LP. A mesmeric performance of a mesmeric piece, the 10 sections or 'steps' built from Indian ragas utilise Cowellesque devices such as playing the strings inside the instrument with fingers, plectrum, marimba mallet or timpani stick. The sound overall is acceptable but the remastered Khaldis and Fantasy are a touch lacking in depth.

String Quartets

Hovhaness Four Bagatelles, Op 30. String Quartets – No 1, Op 8, 'Jupiter'; No 3, Op 208 No 1, 'Reflections on my Childhood'; No 4, Op 208 No 2, 'The Ancient Tree'. Suite from String Quartet No 2 – Gamelan in Sosi Style; Spirit Murmur; Hymn
Z Long Song of the Ch'in
Shanghai Quartet (WeiGang Li, HongGang Li vns Zheng Wang va James Wilson vc) Ⓕ
Delos DE3162 (69 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1994 ⦿

The likeable First Quartet of 1936 boasts, like Mozart's Jupiter Symphony, a four-part fugue of impressive rigour (hence the work's subtitle). Next come three out of the seven pithy movements that comprise the Second Quartet from 1952: the concluding 'Hymn' is a particularly affecting creation. The Third and Fourth Quartets were inspired by childhood memories. The former basks in a soothing, supplicatory glow, with some occasional touches of Eastern promise (reminders of the composer's Armenian roots), whereas its more nostalgic companion is a sweetly lyrical essay of beguiling euphony and striking resonance.

Delos's collection begins with the haunting, perfectly crafted Four Bagatelles (delightful miniatures) and ends with Song of the Ch'in by the Chinese composer, Zhou Long: the 'ch'in' is a traditional Chinese zither and this imaginative piece attempts to convey the piquant sounds of that ancient instrument through the 'modern' medium of the string quartet. These are consistently pure-toned, beautifully rapt performances from the talented young Shanghai Quartet, and Delos's sound is warm and true.

Herbert Howells

British 1892-1983

GROVE Howells studied with Stanford and Wood at the Royal College of Music, where he taught from 1920 almost to his death. He also succeeded Holst at St Paul's Girls' School (1932-62) and was professor of music at London University. His music is within an English diatonic tradition embracing Elgar, Walton and Vaughan Williams. The earlier works include two piano concertos and chamber pieces, but most of his music is choral, including c15 anthems, a concert Requiem (Hymnus Paradisi, 1938, first performed 1950), masses, anthems and motets and some fine songs. Deeply tinged by the English choral tradition, Howells's music reflects a subtle and fastidious craftsman who was capable of a restrained, individual eloquence.

Piano Concertos

Piano Concertos[a] – No 1 in C minor, Op 4; No 2 in C, Op 39. Penguinski
[a]Howard Shelley pf
BBC Symphony Orchestra / Richard Hickox
Chandos CHAN9874 (71 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 2000 ⦿

An astonishing revelation, especially to anyone who still thinks of Herbert Howells as a nostalgic English rhapsodist, more at home in an organ loft than a concert hall. The First Piano Concerto is very early (1914 – Howells was 22) and has not been performed for many years because its last few bars are missing (John Rutter has provided them). It reveals the young Howells as more Russian than English – the dazzlingly flamboyant keyboard writing is strongly reminiscent of Rachmaninov – and with hardly a trace of English reserve as he brandishes theme after theme, intensifying many of them to heights of impassioned eloquence.

One or two lyrical paragraphs suggest the 'real' Herbert Howells. But who, the Second Piano Concerto demands, was he? This work was abused at its première (one critic shouted 'Thank God that's over!') and Howells, deeply wounded, withdrew it immediately. Indeed, although it's a lot closer to 'real' Howells in its rhapsodic lyricism, there's another quality which is angular, sometimes dissonant, tough and determined.

Surely we shall get closer to the real Howells, lifelong admirer of the arch-conservative Stanford, in Penguinski, from its title an obvious satire on Stravinsky? But in fact the sidelong glances at him are admiring and affectionate, and the robust humour is Howells' own.

There is more to him than we had imagined, and his stature is increased, not diminished, by the realisation that he was once an exuberant Romantic, that his ears were sharp and that he had a sense of humour.

Enthusiastic, virtuoso, very slightly rough-cornered performances and a sumptuously rich recording.

Threnody

King's Herald. Paradise Rondel. Fantasia[a]. Threnody[a]. Pastoral Rhapsody. Procession
[a]Moray Welsh vc London Symphony Orchestra / Richard Hickox
Chandos CHAN9410 (58 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995 ●

This delightful, moving disc offers a whole sequence of orchestral works which for whatever reason Howells hid from the world. Only since his death have such pieces as these emerged, and one can only marvel that so accomplished and imaginative a writer for the orchestra should have let any of them be buried. Howells completed the short score of Threnody with piano accompaniment in 1935, his first task after his son's death. Probably planned as the slow movement of a three-movement cello concerto, it is given here in the orchestration made by Christopher Palmer for the Howells centenary concert in 1992. More direct in style and structure, it is an effective pendant to the Fantasia, with the two movements together forming a rhapsodic concerto.

The other major piece is the Pastoral Rhapsody, written earlier in 1923 and more conventionally English except for a radiant climax with anglicised echoes of Daphnis and Petrushka. The Rhapsody is totally distinct, and so is the Paradise Rondel, named after a Cotswold village: a generally vigorous movement dating from 1925, which over a shorter span is full of sharp contrasts, including one passage which in its addition of a piano offers clear echoes of the 'Russian Dance' from Petrushka.

The collection opens with the boldly extrovert King's Herald, bright with Waltonian fanfares. Drawn from a brass band piece of 1934, it was arranged for orchestra as a Coronation offering in 1937. Procession, which closes the sequence, is the earliest work here, adapted from a piano piece written in 1920, and in this orchestration of 1922 brings more echoes of Petrushka, again reflecting Howells's response to appearances in London by Diaghilev's Ballets Russes. Helped by rich, atmospheric sound, Hickox draws performances both brilliant and warmly persuasive from the LSO, with Moray Welsh a movingly expressive soloist in the concertante works.

Suite for Orchestra, 'The B's'

Suite for Orchestra, 'The B's'. Three Dances[a]. In Green Ways[b]
[b]Yvonne Kenny sop [a]Lydia Mordkovitch vn
London Symphony Orchestra / Richard Hickox
Chandos CHAN9557 (65 minutes: DDD). Text and translation included. Recorded 1996 Ⓕ ●

Both The B's (1914) and Three Dances (1915) are from Howells's student days. The former is a delightful orchestral suite celebrating Howells's circle of closest friends at the Royal College of Music, each of the five movements bearing as its subtitle the nickname of a colleague. As with many of Howells's student offerings, the infectious confidence and sheer craft are remarkable. Completed just a couple of months after The B's, the Three Dances for violin and orchestra reveal a similarly assured touch and charm. Perhaps the most captivating of the set is the wonderfully serene Quasi lento, with its seraphically lovely melody. By contrast the first dance is all sunny, carefree vigour and the brief third like a boisterous Irish jig. Lydia Mordkovitch plays with enormous fervour, but in the middle dance she doesn't have quite the radiance or security of RLPO leader Malcolm Stewart on Hyperion; Hickox's accompaniment, too, is marginally 'bluffer' than that of Handley's, though still full of appealing bonhomie. In Green Ways had its origins in a song-cycle for high voice and small orchestra written the same year as the Three Dances. It takes its name from a collection of poetry by James Stephens, whose poem 'The Goat Paths' forms the emotional kernel of the whole sequence in Howells's sublime treatment. Yvonne Kenny sings radiantly, with Hickox and the LSO as model partners. The airy recording complements this hugely enjoyable release.

Chamber Works

Howells String Quartet No 3, 'In Gloucestershire'
Dyson Three Rhapsodies
Divertimenti (Paul Barritt, Rachel Isserlis vns Gustav Clarkson va Sebastian Comberti vc)
Hyperion Helios CDH55045 (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓑ
Recorded 1984

The reappearance of Divertimenti's shapely account of Howells' masterly In Gloucestershire (the last of his three works for string quartet) is all the more valuable now that the Britten Quartet's magisterial 1995 version on EMI British Composers has disappeared from the catalogue. If you don't yet know this exquisitely wrought, hauntingly atmospheric creation (Howells' most extended chamber offering), then immediate investigation is recommended.

The coupling, too, is a delight. Completed between 1905 and 1912, Dyson's youthful Three Rhapsodies form a most appealing triptych, uncommonly fluent, tightly knit and always evincing an engaging, at times positively Straussian lyrical grace. Divertimenti give another first-rate display brimful of commitment and communicative warmth. The airy, natural sound complements a budget-priced reissue that is absolutely not to be missed.

Further listening
Howells Rhapsodic Quintet
Couplings: Frankel, Holbrooke, Arnold Cooke and Maconchy Clarinet Quintets
King cl Britten Quartet
Hyperion Helios CDH55105 (66 minutes: DDD) Ⓑ

Howells' Rhapsodic Quintet is an absolute jewel, while no one could fail to be touched by the elegiac last movement of Frankel's eloquent Quintet. Thea King forms a stylish and sensitive partnership with the much-missed Britten Quartet. At budget price, don't miss it.

Organ Sonata No 2

Organ Sonata No 2. Six Pieces (1940-45)
Graham Barber org
Priory PRCD524 (67 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded on Hereford Cathedral organ in 1995

These are powerful, authoritative performances which ooze the spirit of Howells – that odd mixture of emotional detachment with a hint of deep personal passion, an undercurrent of tragedy and an almost improvisatory fluidity of structure. The Sonata has a formal structure which makes it easy to follow while the Six Pieces give such a kaleidoscopic array of organ colours that the ear is continually enchanted. The Hereford organ is a lovely instrument. Priory has, in focusing the microphones on the organ, expunged much of the building's aural ambience, but the sound is an utter delight to the ear.

Evening Services

Evening Services – G; Collegium Sancti Johannis Cantabrigiense; New College, Oxford; Collegium Regale; Sarum; York. Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis
The Collegiate Singers / Andrew Millinger with Richard Moorhouse org
Priory PRCD745 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 2000 ●

Howells wrote 20 settings of the evening canticles. His first setting (1918), the freshly vigorous work of the Stanford pupil, sets out on the long life's musical journey with bone and muscle. The gentler passages have a light-footed grace, and in exultation the spirit flares; this is the music of purposeful movement, where the more 'Howells' he becomes the more the firm lines of the Stanford pupil dissolve, and the nearer he draws to a music of mystical stasis. The opening of the Collegium Regale Magnificat has something of this, the great thing being that he can still pull out of it (with the strong-boned 'He hath shown strength with his arm', for instance). It's a pity that the series has not been arranged chronologically; it would have been good to follow the order of composition, seeing which parts of his musical system he developed and which he left unexercised.

The other slightly faltering element in this welcome release concerns the choice of a choir of mixed voices. The women scrupulously adhere to the tonal ideal, but boy trebles and male altos have a distinctive quality, and Howells's own sound is less distinctive without them. It is an extremely good choir, and they are under careful, intelligent direction, yet making a chance comparison with the choir of Bristol Cathedral in the G major setting one can't help rejoicing in a character (individual as a face) which those trebles possessed and for which the Collegiate sopranos substitute a collective identity somewhat de-personalised.

The recorded sound is fine, balance between choir and the excellent organist is well judged, and the acoustic resonance is sufficient to form an appropriate setting while preserving the clear articulation. The selection here also includes two première recordings (the York Service and the 1941 setting for men's voices, performed, as the score suggests, by women).

Requiem

Requiem[a]. Choral and Organ Works. Collegium Regale – Communion Service[ab]. St Paul's Service[ab]. Like as the hart[a]. Long, long ago[a]. Take Him, Earth, for Cherishing[a]. Organ Rhapsody No 3[b]. Paean[b]
[b]Ian Farrington org
[a]St John's College Choir, Cambridge / Christopher Robinson
Naxos 8 554659 (76 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Texts included. Recorded 1999

Howells, probably more than any other composer, extended the cathedral repertoire in the 20th century. Here his music is performed by one of the best choirs. Under Christopher Robinson, St John's has preserved its distinctive character (the bright tone of its trebles a famous part of it) and, as this record demonstrates, has gained in vigour and clarity of purpose. Immediately notable is the choice of relatively quick speeds. Howells sometimes appears to invite a relaxed style of performance which is not to his advantage.

St John's tempo suits the acoustic. This applies to a similar comparison with the Choir of King's College in its more reverberant chapel, singing the Communion Service dedicated to it: the more opulent sound matches the broader tempo, St John's achieving (as in the Sanctus) clearer effects within a narrower spectrum. Their discs also have in common the Rhapsody No 3 for organ, and whereas the expansive performance at King's includes a murmurous pianissimo next-thing-to-silence, the quicker, more sharply defined one at St John's has a dramatic urgency.

The choice of programme is particularly happy, with one of the lesser-known Evening Services (the 'St Paul's') and one of the best-known of Howells's anthems (Like as the hart).

Additional recommendation
Requiem
Couplings: Take him, earth, for cherishing.
Vaughan Williams Mass in G minor. Te Deum
Coxwell, Seers sops Chance counterten Salmon ten J Best bass Corydon Singers / M Best
Hyperion CDA66076 (DDD: 10/87) Ⓕ

A fine performance of the Requiem and attractive couplings.

Missa Sabrinensis

Janice Watson sop Della Jones mez Martyn Hill ten Donald Maxwell bar
London Symphony Chorus and Orchestra / Gennadi Rozhdestvensky
Chandos CHAN9348 (76 minutes: DDD). Text and translation included. Recorded 1994 Ⓕ ◉

Along with the Stabat Mater this 'Mass of the Severn', the river which together with the Wye defined the composer's homeland, shows even more than Hymnus Paradisi, the daunting accomplishment of Howells's complex choral-orchestral polyphonic technique and harmonic language. In Hymnus Paradisi and the Stabat Mater Howells movingly delineates spiritual and sensual responses to the grief of loss. The Missa Sabrinensis naturally encompasses a wider, different emotional spectrum, but without sacrificing self-consistency or intensity. It is unique, in English music, analogous perhaps to Janáček's Glagolitic Mass, though it could hardly be more different in temper and texture. A richly imploring Kyrie (subtly reworked for the Agnus Dei), a 20-minute Gloria of magnificent range and brilliantly balanced lyricism and exaltation, an exquisitely delicate Benedictus – all this is Howells at his most characteristic and inspired. The performance isn't always ideal. In the proliferating polyphonic complexes Rozhdestvensky is rather too broad-brush in matters of detail. And the generous-spirited chorus sometimes sound a degree under-prepared or under-directed – or both.

Of the soloists, an authoritative Martyn Hill and outstanding Janice Watson more than compensate for less certain colleagues. But the dominant impression of the performance – helped by a spacious, warm recording – is Rozhdestvensky's full-blooded communication of the rich emotional content, impulsively pointing-up the extremes, the climactic conflagrations, the fragrant lyrical pastures.

Johann Hummel Austrian 1778-1837

GROVE A child prodigy and a pupil of Mozart (Vienna, 1786-8), Hummel undertook an extended tour (1789-92) throughout northern Europe with his father, arousing particular interest in England, where he met Haydn. Back in Vienna he studied with Albrechtsberger, Salieri and Haydn, giving lessons to support himself. He held a position as Konzertmeister to Prince Nikolaus Esterházy (1804-11) and, after a period of writing piano and chamber music for Vienna, returned to the concert platform. He was Kapellmeister in Stuttgart (1816-18) and Weimar (from 1819), where he conducted the court theatre and many concerts, knew Goethe and other luminaries and still had time to teach and compose; he toured regularly as a pianist and worked tirelessly on his important piano method (1828). The climax of his career came in 1830 with a trip to Paris and London. Despite his public and financial success – he had an excellent business sense and systematised multinational music publishing – he remained a warm and simple person. His playing was praised for its clarity, neatness, evenness, superb tone and delicacy, products of his preference for the light-toned Viennese piano; he excelled at improvisation. Ferdinand Hiller was among his pupils. Hummel wrote some of the finest music of the last years of Classicism, with ornate Italianate melodies and virtuoso embroidery; his later music shows more expression and variety, including imaginative harmony and long flights of lyricism.

Trumpet Concerto

Hummel Trumpet Concerto in E flat Haydn Trumpet Concertos in E flat, HobVIIe/1; in C[a] Concertos by Albinoni, Corelli, Hertel, JM Molter, Mozart, FX Richter, J Stamitz. Works by JS Bach, Clarke and Gounod
Håkan Hardenberger tpt Simon Preston org
Academy of St Martin in the Fields / Sir Neville Marriner; [a]London Philharmonic Orchestra / Elgar Howarth; [b]I Musici
Philips Duo ② 464 028 (148 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1986, 1989, 1991, 1993 ◉

This is probably the finest single collection of trumpet concertos in the catalogue. When it first appeared in 1987 (the Hummel and Haydn have since been recoupled with a later set as listed here) it created overnight a new star in the firmament of trumpeters.

The two finest concertos for the trumpet are undoubtedly those of Haydn and Hummel, and Hardenberger plays them here with a combination of sparkling bravura and stylish elegance that are altogether irresistible. Hardenberger opens with the famous Hummel Concerto, played in E major rather than the usual E flat, which makes the work sound bolder and brighter than usual. The finale with its crisp articulation, fantastic tonguing and tight trills, displays a genial easy bravura, yet overflows with energy and high spirits. Marriner and his Academy accompany with characteristic finesse and warmth, with the lilting dotted rhythms of the first movement of the Hummel, seductively jaunty. The lovely Andante of the Haydn is no less beguiling, and both finales display a high-spirited exuberance and an easy bravura which make the listener smile with pleasure.

The recording gives him the most vivid realism and presence, but it is a pity that the orchestral backcloth is so reverberant; otherwise the sound is very natural. A superb disc.

Piano Concertos

Piano Concerto No 4 in E, Op 110
Double Concerto in G, Op 17
Hagai Shaham vn
London Mozart Players / Howard Shelley pf
Chandos CHAN9687 (63 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1998 ◉

Shelley is outstanding in this music, blending classical and Romantic elements perfectly. These two concertos are wonderfully infectious. The E major occupies a kind of bridge between Mozart and Chopin, although Mozart's depth and subtlety are in a different vein. Hummel is more of a show-off, and his music almost smiles at you, its charm and sparkle eschewing any pretentiousness. Throughout, Shelley conveys the music's joie de vivre, revelling in the figurative passagework. The Double Concerto may have been inspired by Mozart's Sinfonia concertante, K365; it doesn't have the same harmonic or lyrical variety as the E major Concerto, but it is a charming work, especially when so persuasively played. Shelley's well-proportioned piano part is perfectly complemented by Hagai Shaham's sweet-toned violin.

Shelley fulfils his dual role admirably, and the London Mozart Players respond well to his playing and conducting. The recorded sound is first-rate. A lovely disc.

Awards 1987

Piano Concertos – No 2 in A minor, Op 85; No 3 in B minor, Op 89
Stephen Hough pf
English Chamber Orchestra / Bryden Thomson
Chandos CHAN8507 Ⓕ
(66 minutes: DDD) ●●●

This is a staggering disc of Hummel's piano concertos played by Stephen Hough. The most obvious comparison is with the piano concertos of Chopin, but whereas those works rely on the grace and panache of the piano line to redeem an often lacklustre orchestral role, the Hummel works have finely conceived orchestral writing and no shortage of original ideas. The piano part is formidable, combining virtuosity of a very high order with a vigour and athleticism that does much to redress Hummel's somewhat tarnished reputation. The A minor Concerto is probably the better known of the works here, with a thrilling rondo finale, but the B minor is no less inventive with some breath-taking writing in the piano's upper registers. This disc makes strong demands to be heard: inventive and exciting music, a masterly contribution from Stephen Hough, fine orchestral support from the ECO under Thomson and a magnificent recording.

Piano Concerto No 5 in A flat, Op 113. Concertino in G, Op 73. Gesellschafts Rondo in D, Op 117
London Mozart Players / Howard Shelley pf
Chandos CHAN9558 (59 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997

These are decorous rarities played with an assured brilliance and affection. Hummel's Mozartian rather than Chopinesque bias declares itself most obviously in his Op 73 Concertino, though even here the figuration has a recognizably Hummelian froth and sparkle. Too charming to be vacuous, such surface brio has little in common with Mozart's depth and subtlety, and for music of greater romantic range and ambition we turn to the A flat major Concerto, with its fuller scoring and lavishly decorated solo part. Lovers of a finespun, operatic cantilena will warm to the central 'Romanze'. The Gesellschafts Rondo (offered here in a première recording) commences in solemn Adagio vein before turning to a bustling and ceremonious Vivace. It may be that Hummel 'puffed, blew and perspired' when he played but he won the admiration of Chopin (a hard master to please) and his sheer style is infectious when projected with such unfailing expertise by Howard Shelley in his dual role as pianist and conductor. The Chandos recordings are exceptionally well balanced.

Piano Trios

Piano Trios – E flat, Op 12; G, Op 35; G, Op 65; E flat, Op 96
Beaux Arts Trio (Ida Kavafian vn Peter Wiley vc Menahem Pressler pf)
Philips 446 077-2PX (69 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1996 ●

These are delightful, intelligent and witty performances of some very attractive music. The Op 12 work is fresh and untroubled, taking delight in the easy mastery of counterpart that was one of Hummel's qualities, and the Beaux Arts Trio plays it with a lively sense of enjoyment that suits it ideally. Hummel was not a profound composer, but he was an immensely talented one and the variety of his invention is remarkable. He never forgot Mozart, as an be heard in the G major Trio of 1811, and he kept an ear on current developments without changing his essentially classical approach to music. Romantic ideas were accommodated rather than imitated or seriously taken up. The Beaux Arts players understand the balance well, and do excellent justice to all these works.

Solo Piano Works

Rondo in E flat, Op 11. Piano Sonata No 2 in E flat, Op 13. Capriccio in F, Op 49. Variations on a theme from Gluck's 'Armide' in F, Op 57. Bagatelles, Op 107 – La contemplazione; Rondo all'ungherese. La bella capricciosa, Polonaise in B flat, Op 55
Howard Shelley pf
Chandos CHAN9807 (73 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1999 ●

This attractive recital shows several sides of Hummel's creative personality, from the classical sonata to the fanciful early Romantic character piece, with a good deal of virtuosity thrown in. Most relishable are some of the more contemplative items – including the 'Contemplazione' from his Op 107 bagatelles, a beautiful piece that takes a short theme as its starting point and weaves a poetic fabric around and beyond it. The other bagatelle here, the 'Rondo all'ungherese', is quite a different piece, exploiting ideas of gypsy themes and rhythms with a good deal of wit. Both respond splendidly to Howard Shelley's playing, his attentive shaping, his sense of the music's poetry, his springy rhythms. The rather earlier Capriccio, Op 49, is another particular success, notable for Shelley's exquisite timing and aristocratic poise in the slow music and his brilliant fingerwork in the fast.

The recital begins with the earliest piece, an 1804 Rondo to which Shelley brings crisp phrasing, precise ornaments and happily judged touches of rubato. He ends with a sonata of 1805, more classical than much of what has gone before: easy to say that the style is Beethovenian with less exalted content, but the central Adagio is a fine piece with a vein of nobility of its own. The other items are the ingenious Gluck variations, in which Shelley shows a fine command of piano sonorities and rhythms, as well as ample brilliance in the closing pages, and the polonaise La bella capricciosa, which moves from an unassuming start to a coruscating finish. The recording is a model of clear and rich piano tone.

Mass in B flat

Mass in B flat, Op 77. Mass in D, Op 111.
Offertorium, 'Alma Virgo', Op 89a[a]
[a]Susan Gritton sop
Collegium Musicum 90 / Richard Hickox
Chandos Chaconne CHAN0681 (76 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included
Recorded c2002 ●●●

When the glories of Haydn's late Masses have been widely appreciated, it is sad that Hummel's have been so neglected. They are for chorus and orchestra alone, without soloists, which may have deterred potential performers. However, while they cannot quite match late Haydn or Beethoven in originality, they are lively, beautifully written, and full of striking ideas, inspiring Hickox and his team to performances here just as electrifying as those they have given of Haydn, and just as vividly recorded.

Hummel follows Haydn in both Masses in his fondness for fugues. Similarly, he follows Haydn in offering joyfully energetic settings of 'Dona nobis pacem', only unlike Haydn he does not end either Mass on a fortissimo cadence, instead fading down the final phrases, maybe for liturgical reasons in the context of a church performance. Hummel, like Haydn and Beethoven before him, fully brings out the drama of the liturgy, though in both settings of 'Et resurrexit' he begins not with a sudden fortissimo but with a rising crescendo, as though a crowd of bystanders are gradually appreciating the wonder of it.

Another symbolic point is that the Mass in B flat, dating from 1810, the year before Hummel left the Esterházy court, includes a setting of the Credo with distinctive unison and octave passages for the chorus, as though to emphasise unity of belief. In both masses the settings of the Sanctus are surprisingly brief, even perfunctory, yet the musical ideas could not be more striking, with a gently flowing 6/8 setting in the D major work and a bold setting in the B flat Mass which crams into the shortest span surprisingly varied ideas.

Thanks to the imagination of Richard Hickox, we are finally able to discover the joys of Hummel's Masses. An extremely fine disc.

Engelbert Humperdinck

German 1854-1921

GROVE Humperdinck studied at the Cologne Conservatory (1872-76) and at the Royal Music School in Munich (1877-79), meeting Wagner in Naples and assisting him with Parsifal at Bayreuth (1881-82). After interludes in Paris, Spain, Cologne and Mainz (working for B Schotts Sohne), he moved to Frankfurt as a teacher and opera critic, also writing his most famous work, Hänsel and Gretel (1890-93; given its début at Weimar under Richard Strauss); by 1900 he was in Berlin, teaching, composing operas and writing Shakespearean incidental music (among his most successful work). The operatic version of Königskinder, another characteristic piece in his naive, folklike style, was first performed in New York in 1910; like Hänsel und Gretel it started from simple song settings and went through an intermediate stage to a full opera, showing Wagnerian harmonic and textural influences.

Hänsel und Gretel

Elisabeth Grümmer sop Hänsel; Elisabeth Schwarzkopf sop Gretel; Maria von Ilosvay mez Gertrud; Josef Metternich bar Peter; Anny Felbermayer sop Sandman, Dew Fairy;
Else Schürhoff mez Witch
Choir of Loughton High School for Girls; Bancroft's School Choir; Philharmonia Orchestra / Herbert von Karajan Ⓗ
EMI Great Recordings of the Century mono ②
567061-2 (108 minutes: ADD). Notes, text Ⓜ and translation included. Recorded 1953 ●●

This new CD transfer has opened up the mono sound, putting air round the voices and instruments, giving presence. Where EMI's earlier transfer of this set (nla) sounds disappointingly flat, a little gauzy, damped down, this one is brighter, clearer, fuller, with textures clarified. The voices too are better defined and separated. A full stereo recording would have been better still, but it was this recording which Walter Legge would often cite in conversation, when he mounted his curious hobby-horse, questioning the value of stereo over mono. The scene he picked on was where children hear the cuckoo in the forest: there the distancing of the cuckoo-call does indeed simulate stereo atmosphere, but that is far clearer this time than last. As for the performance, it remains a classic, with Karajan plainly in love with the music, and with the two principals singing immaculately. This is not for those who resist the child-voice inflexion of Schwarzkopf and Grümmer, but everyone else will register the mastery in singing and acting. The thinness of Anny Felbermayer's voice as the Sandman is an unwelcome contrast, but this is otherwise a satisfyingly Germanic team, and it is good to have it sounding so fresh.

Additional recommendations

Hänsel und Gretel

Fassbaender Hänsel Popp Gretel Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Solti
Decca ② 470 567-2 (108 minutes: ADD: 11/88). Highlights available on Decca Eloquence Ⓜ 467 435-2 Ⓜ

A fine mid-price alternative, though there's nothing cut-price about the casting. Fassbaender and Popp are delightful in the title-roles, and other treats include Walter Berry as the Father and the lovely Norma Burrowes as the Sandman. Solti draws gorgeous playing from the VPO.

Litz Hänsel Streich Gretel
Bavarian Radio Chorus; Munich Philharmonic / Lehmann
DG ② 459 494-2GITA2 (98 minutes: ADD: recorded 1953). Texts and translations accessible via website Ⓜ ●

A superbly idiomatic account, with Rita Streich perfectly cast as a pure-toned, totally ingenuous Gretel. Gisela Litz doesn't match EMI's characterful Elisabeth Grümmer, but the set does boast a near-ideal Witch in Res Rischer.

Sigismondo d'India Italian c1582-1629

GROVE As a young man d'India travelled in Italy, notably to Florence, and in 1611 he became chamber music director at the Turin court; he left in 1623, working in Modena and Rome. His five books Le musiche (1609-23) contain chamber monodies, varied in style but often of great emotional intensity, and duets; he also published eight volumes of madrigals (1606-24), some highly chromatic and expressive, villanellas and motets.

Madrigals

Il primo libro de madrigali
La Venexiana (Valentina Coladonato, Nadia Ragni sops Lucia Sciannimanico mez Giuseppe Maletto, Sandro Naglia tens Daniele Carnovich bass) / Claudio Cavina counterten
Glossa GCD920908 (49 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included

The northern and southern Italian madrigal traditions meet in the person of Sigismondo d'India. The date of publication of this, his First Book of Madrigals (1606) reveals him to be one of the last of the genre's most significant figures. Just think: by this time the majority of Monteverdi's publications were already in existence, and Gesualdo's too. The influence of both is clearly audible, and not just in the music.

One of the most memorable tracks here is Felice chi ti miro, although much of the tripartite Interdette speranze is equally impressive. Sometimes one feels that a phrase or sentiment might have been more dramatically and elastically projected, or else lingered over and savoured (even) longer. As to tuning, it is generally very accurate, and the slightest slip stands out. But that's the problem with tuning: standards are so high nowadays that critics risk expecting something inhuman, or at least superhuman. This will do just fine.

All in all, a movingly dramatic account of the first madrigal publication of a composer whose works are all too little known.

John Ireland British 1879-1962

GROVE Ireland studied at the Royal College of Music, first as a pianist, then as a composer under Stanford (1897-1901), under whom he gained command of a solid Brahmsian style radically altered during the next two decades by the impressions of Debussy, Ravel and Stravinsky. The result was a sequence of lyrical piano pieces, but also substantial chamber works, including two piano trios (1906, 1917) and two violin sonatas (1909, 1917). Meanwhile he served as organist and choirmaster at St Luke's, Chelsea (1904-26), later returning to the RCM to teach (1923-39). Postwar works include the symphonic rhapsody Mai-Dun (1921, one of many works suggestive of English landscape), the Piano Concerto (1930), a classic of 20th-century English music, and Legend for piano and orchestra (1933).

A Downland Suite

A Downland Suite (arr Ireland and Bush). Orchestral Poem in A minor. Concertino pastorale. Two Symphonic Studies (arr Bush)
City of London Sinfonia / Richard Hickox
Chandos CHAN9376 (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1994 ●

Hickox gives a sensitive account of the Downland Suite and extracts great expressive intensity from the glorious second movement 'Elegy'. The Concertino pastorale is another fine work, boasting a most eloquent opening 'Eclogue' and tenderly poignant 'Threnody', towards the end of which Ireland seems to allow himself a momentary recollection of the haunting opening phrase of his earlier orchestral prelude, The Forgotten Rite. In 1969 Ireland's pupil, Geoffrey Bush, arranged two sections of the score for the 1946 film The Overlanders which were not incorporated into the 1971 concert suite compiled by Sir Charles Mackerras. The resulting, finely wrought Two Symphonic Studies were recorded many years ago by Sir Adrian Boult for Lyrita – no longer available – and Hickox proves just as sympathetic an interpreter, whereas the Orchestral Poem in A minor is here receiving its recorded début. This is a youthful essay, completed in 1904, some three years after Ireland's studies with Stanford.

It is a worthy rather than especially inspiring effort, with hardly a glimpse of the mature manner to come, save for some particularly beautiful string writing. Hickox makes out a decent enough case for it. However, with rich, refined Chandos sound, this is most enjoyable.

Violin Sonatas

Violin Sonatas – No 1 in D minor^{a}; 🄷
No 2 in A minor^{b}. Phantasie Trio in A minor^{c}.
The Holy Boyd
^{ac}Frederick Grinke, ^{b}Albert Sammons vns
^{cd}Florence Hooton vc ^{ab}John Ireland, ^{c}Kendall Taylor, ^{d}Lawrence Pratt pfs
Dutton Laboratories Historic Epoch mono
CDLX7103 (73 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1930-45? ●●

Such was the critical acclaim that greeted the March 1917 première of Ireland's Second Violin Sonata that the 37-year-old composer's reputation was cemented virtually overnight. The performers on that momentous occasion were the legendary Albert Sammons and pianist William Murdoch. Some 13 years later, Sammons finally set down his thoughts on this glorious music with Ireland himself at the piano. Quite why this valuable document has never seen the light of day until now is a mystery, so all gratitude to Dutton for granting a long overdue lease of life to a nobly spacious rendering of such palpable feeling and insight.

As for the First Violin Sonata, Frederick Grinke's 1945 Decca recording (again with the composer) continues to strike as, quite simply, the most perceptive interpretation of this early offering ever encountered, possessing a compelling sweep and tingling concentration that grip from first measure to last. The November 1938 recording of the Phantasie Trio is yet another cherishable display, the playing wonderfully alive and always radiating a most winning understanding and spontaneity.

Good, if not exceptional transfers, the spookily quiet background is obtained at the expense of some naturalness of timbre. Urgently recommended all the same.

Additional recommendation
Violin Sonatas Nos 1 and 2
Couplings: Fantasy-Sonata. Cello Sonata. The Holy Boy. Phantasie Trio. Trios Nos 2 and 3
Mordkovitch vn Georgian vc Brown pf
Chandos ② CHAN9377/8
(147 minutes: DDD: 12/95) Ⓕ
Whole-hearted, affectionate performances.

Solo piano works

Merry Andrew. The towing-path. Rhapsody.
Two Pieces (1924-5). Decorations. Leaves from a Child's Sketchbook. The darkened valley.
Sonatina. Three Pastels. Two Pieces (1921).
Summer evening
John Lenehan pf
Naxos 8 553889 (71 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1996 ●

Nostalgia is Ireland's keynote, his pantheistic and wistful Gallic delicacy subsumed into a wholly English reticence. On this release there is a strong feeling of how purely local influences (Pangbourne and the Thames Valley in The towing-path, Le Fauvic beach, Jersey in 'The Island Spell', to take two examples) are transcended to become statements of wider poetic import. The large-scale Rhapsody, with its powerful Fauréan overtones, is relished by John Lenehan, a strong, sympathetic interpreter, and time and again he makes you wonder at works aptly described as 'some of the most appealing English piano music written this century, too long neglected.'

Sarnia. London Pieces. In Those Days. Prelude in E flat. Ballade. Columbine. Month's Mind
John Lenehan pf
Naxos 8 553700 (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1995 ●

The pleasures here are many. John Lenehan is a very accomplished performer: not only is his technical address impeccable, but he also has a strikingly wide dynamic range and sophisticated variety of tone colour, both of which he uses to poetic effect throughout. That Lenehan has a real affinity for Ireland's muse is immediately evident from his raptly intimate delivery of the gentle opening diptych, In Those Days. Similarly, in the extraordinarily imaginative, harmonically questing Ballade of 1929 Lenehan rises superbly to the elemental fury of the remarkable central portion, with its brooding echoes of the 'Northern' Bax from the same period. Elsewhere, Columbine is a treat, as is the ravishing Month's Mind and the haunting Prelude in E flat. Lenehan's supremely affectionate and articulate advocacy will surely win Ireland many friends.

Additional recommendation
London Pieces
Couplings: In Those Days. Leaves from a Child's Sketchbook. The darkened valley. Two Pieces. Equinox. Sonatina. Prelude. Ballade. Greenways
Parkin pf
Chandos CHAN9140 (74 minutes: DDD: 6/93) Ⓕ
The best of Ireland's piano music, revealing a subtle, nostalgic sensibility.

Charles Ives American 1874-1954

GROVE Ives was influenced first by his father, a bandmaster who had libertarian ideas about what music might be. When he was perhaps 19 (the dating of his music is nearly always problematic) he produced psalm settings that exploit polytonality and other unusual procedures. He then studied with Parker at Yale (1894-98) and showed some sign of becoming a relatively conventional composer in his First Symphony (1898) and songs of this period. He worked, however, not in music but in the insurance business, and composition became a weekend activity – but one practised assiduously: during the two decades after his graduation he produced three more symphonies and numerous other works.

The only consistent characteristic of this music is liberation from rule. There are entirely atonal pieces, while others are in the simple harmonic style of a hymn or folksong. Some are systematic and abstract in construction; others are filled with quotations from the music of Ives's youth: hymns, popular songs, marches etc. Some, like the Three Places in New England, are nostalgic; others, like the Fourth Symphony, are fuelled by the vision of an idealist democracy. He published his 'Concord' Sonata in 1920 and a volume of 114 songs in 1922, but composed little thereafter. Most of his music had been written without prospect of performance, and it was only towards the end of his life that it began to be played frequently and appreciated.

Symphony No 2

Symphony No 2. Robert Browning Overture
Nashville Symphony Orch / Kenneth Schermerhorn
Naxos 8 559076 (67 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 2000

Ives' Second Symphony is not as well served on CD as might be expected. Bernstein gave the première in 1951 some 40 years after the work's composition. His 1958 recording, showing its age, is still available and so is his live recording from 1987.

What's new about this Nashville release is that it uses Jonathan Elkus's edition made for the Charles Ives Society for both works. The main difference for the listener is that the exposition of the second movement of the Symphony is repeated. That this helps the overall balance in this extended, somewhat repetitive movement is debatable. When it comes to Bernstein, he quite unnecessarily cut 16 measures from the last movement. His tempos may be considered slow in the third and fourth movements, but in both his recordings the work luxuriates in a way that nobody else achieves.

The Robert Browning Overture is one of Ives' most visionary pieces, with declamatory trumpet parts that make Scriabin's Poème de l'extase seem reticent. The mystical calm of the opening is memorably caught in the Nashville performance; the energetic passages are vivid, although some textures inevitably get submerged. It is a great relief to have the obvious errors in the score corrected. This puts earlier recordings such as Stokowski's beyond the pale and it's well worth buying this CD for the Browning Overture alone, although both works in these carefully-considered editions make a bargain pair.

Symphony No 2. The Gong on the Hook and Ladder. Tone Roads – No 1. A Set of Three Short Pieces – Largo cantabile, Hymn. Hallowe'en. Central Park in the Dark. The Unanswered Question
New York Philharmonic Orchestra / Leonard Bernstein
DG 429 220-2GH (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1987-88 ●●

Although Bernstein thought of Ives as a primitive composer, these recordings reveal that he had a deep understanding of, his music. The Second Symphony (written in 1902 and first performed in 1951) is a glorious work, still strongly rooted in the 19th century yet showing those clear signs of Ives's individual voice that are largely missing from the charming but lightweight First Symphony. Bernstein brings out all its richness and warmth without wallowing in its romantic elements, and he handles with utter conviction the multi-textures and the allusions to popular tunes and snatches from Bach, Brahms and Dvořák, to name but a few. The standard of playing he exacts from the NYPO, both here and in the disc's series of technically demanding shorter pieces, is remarkably high with the depth of string tone at a premium – and the engineers retain this to a degree unusual in a live recording. An essential disc for any collection.

Symphony No 3

Symphony No 3, 'The Camp Meeting'.
The Unanswered Question. Central Park
in the Dark. Overture and March, '1776'.
Holidays – Washington's Birthday.
Country Band March
Northern Sinfonia / James Sinclair
Naxos 8 559087 (52 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ

James Sinclair has been a dedicated Ives scholar and performer for more than 30 years, which means this CD has to be something special. First on this issue comes the hymn-saturated Third Symphony, where Sinclair uses some of the thinly sketched options in the manuscripts. This means there is a bit extra in the distance at the end of the first two movements and slighty more of the barely audible bells, ingeniously made to sound like an outdoor carillon, at the end of the last movement, compared with Slatkin and the St Louis Orchestra. There are more distant effects if you listen carefully.

In The Unanswered Question Sinclair uses the version with two flutes and two clarinets rather than four flutes for the attempted answers to the questioning trumpet. Then, in Central Park in the Dark, he uses a battered upright piano for the bits taken from the 1899 hit-song ‘Hello! ma Baby’ which suggests the tavern scene in Berg’s Wozzeck. It works, but unfortunately the piano, marked fff, almost fades out at the climax.

There are two little-known early pieces which Ives drew on for ‘Putnam’s Camp’, the second of Three Places in New England. The Country Band March has hilarious junketings as an affectionate reflection of the mistakes of amateur players – Sinclair takes an option without the final chord which leaves the dilatory saxophonist exposed after the end. Then the Overture and March, ‘1776’ goes to town with a brass player using the wrong instrument so that quite a lengthy passage comes out in parallel semitones! Vintage Ives, all played with completely idiomatic feeling and adequately recorded.

Symphony No 4 / Orchestral Works

Symphony No 4 – Fugue[c]. Orchestral Set No 1, ‘Three Places in New England’. Charlie Rutlage[ad]. The Circus Band[bc]. From the Steeples and the Mountains[c]. General William Booth Enters into Heaven[bc]. In Flanders Fields[ad]. Memories[ad]. The Pond[abc]. Psalm 100[bc]. Serenity[ac]. They are There![abc]. The Things our Fathers Loved[ad]. Tom Sails Away[ad]. The Unanswered Question[c]
[a]Thomas Hampson bar [b]San Francisco Girl’s Chorus; San Francisco Symphony Chorus and [c]Orchestra / Michael Tilson Thomas [d]pf
RCA Red Seal 09026 63703-2 Ⓕ
(65 minutes: DDD). Recorded live in 1999 ●

If anyone has a hot-line to the cortex of Ives’s imagination, it is Michael Tilson Thomas. The programme he has devised here is not so much a journey, more a stream of consciousness through the hinterlands of Ives Americana. It’s about the things that mattered to Ives: the times, places, events that fashioned the nation and enabled it to find its own way. It’s a landscape of ballad songs and snatches, of hymns, marches, tall tales and short orders, assembled exactly as the man remembered them and entirely in keeping with the chaotic comedy of life. But above all, it’s about the spirit within us all – great and small.

From the Steeples and the Mountains is classic Ives: a visionary statement fashioned from bare essentials, bells and brass dissonances always just a whisper away from a recognisable hymn tune. Then from the mountains to the back yard – recollections of a very American childhood. Picket fences and parlour songs. Like The Things Our Fathers Loved written 16 years after the craggy bell and brass piece. You can be sure the Ives chronology will constantly wrong-foot you. Thomas Hampson is the man entrusted with these rich pickings from the Ives songbook. He lustily makes a drama out of a crisis in Charlie Rutlage, a cowboy song turned operatic gran scena. Later he’s the Salvation Army’s General William Booth banging the drum for all his pimps, floosies, and drunks – his ‘saved souls’ – as he leads them towards that great courthouse in the sky. Then one of the most heartfelt of all Ives songs, Tom Sails Away – a life in a song from cradle to grave.

Such juxtapositions make this all-live compilation especially affecting. Hard to believe that this is a live recording, so astonishingly lucid and transparent is the multi-layered orchestral sound. Tremendous impact, too.

Finally, a beautiful performance of that little masterpiece The Unanswered Question, as close as we get to an understanding of what spirituality actually meant to Ives. A superb disc.

String Quartets

String Quartets No 1, ‘From the Salvation Army’; No 2. A set of three short pieces – Scherzo, ‘Holding Your Own’ Barber String Quartet, Op 11
Emerson Quartet
(Eugene Drucker, Philip Setzer vns Lawrence Dutton va David Finckel vc) Ⓕ
DG 435 864-2GH (65 minutes: DDD) ●

The First Quartet (1896) is a student work, saturated in hymn-tunes: each movement was probably used as an organ voluntary. But, like the Third Symphony, it assembles an affectionate archive of religious forms of musical expression ranging from mystical intensity to almost ecstatic fervour. The Fugue, which forms the first movement of the First Quartet, crops up again as the third movement of the Fourth Symphony. In the performance the Emerson has everything under control even if the third movement is slightly cold. Ives’s Second Quartet (1913) is wildly different. With the first movement called ‘Discussions’ and the second ‘Arguments’ there is free scope for all Ives’s photographic realism with textures as violent as middle-period Bartók later on. The Emerson brings hard-edged attack to the ‘Arguments’ but the ironic ‘Andante Emasculata’, a burlesque cadenza at 0’43”, and similar moments are a little short-changed. The last movement, ‘The Call of the Mountains’, has a real chill when it opens largely without vibrato: and it climaxes resoundingly on ‘Nearer my God’, linking this peroration to the last movement of the Fourth Symphony. The Scherzo is a rarity – a brief comic study in rhythmic juxtapositions with the occasional diatonic tune sticking out of the melée. A fine, well-recorded performance.

Piano Sonata No 2, ‘Concord’

Piano Sonata No 2, ‘Concord’
Three Quarter-tone Pieces for two pianos
Pierre-Laurent Aimard, Alexei Lubimov pfs
Warner Apex 0927-49515-2 (59 minutes: DDD) Ⓑ
Recorded 1995 ●

Everything in the Sonata is utterly idiomatic, and the pacing of the four movements, each based on a different New England sage, is unexceptionable. Perhaps the first movement, 'Emerson', is a little wearing to listen to in Warner's slightly close piano sound, but the echo passages in 'Hawthorne' are magical. Here and elsewhere Lubimov seems sensibly aware of the recordings by the original performer, John Kirkpatrick.

The simpler textures of 'The Alcotts' are phrased immaculately and the more wayward last movement, 'Thoreau', has all the atmosphere of its mystical setting at Walden Pond as well as a lovely flute solo. Lubimov has absolute fluency in delivering everything from the massed sonorities of 'Emerson' through the rags of 'Hawthorne' to the transcendental calm of 'Thoreau'.

The Three-Quarter-tone Pieces are a significant bonus; the second piece, which juxtaposes ragtime figures from the song The Seer in different tunings, is hilarious Ives in a new idiom. Altogether an essential Ives release.

Elisabeth Jacquet de la Guerre

French 1666/67-1729

GROVE Elisabeth-Claude Jacquet de la Guerre was the daughter of Claude Jacquet (d 1702), member of a well-known family of harpsichord makers and organists. An accomplished harpsichordist with a talent for improvisation, she became a protégée of Louis XIV and Mme de Montespan. She wrote music for the Théâtres de la Foire. Her surviving music includes a ballet, an opera Cephale et Procris (1694), three collections of cantatas (1708- c1715), solo and trio sonatas with violin and bass viol, and two sets of Pièces de clavecin (1687, 1707). She was among the first in France to use the sonata and cantata genres, was the only woman to write a tragédie lyrique and among the earliest to publish harpsichord collections.

Pièces de clavecin

Premier livre de pièces de clavecin. P
Pièces de clavecin
Carole Cerasi hpd
Metronome METCD1026 Ⓕ
(79 minutes: DDD)
Recorded 1997 000

Awards 1999

Elisabeth Jacquet was remarkable. A member of a family of musicians, at the age of only five she attracted the benevolent attention of Louis XIV by her harpsichord playing, and subsequently was taken under the wing of his favourite, Mme de Montespan. At 18 she married the organist Marin de la Guerre and became famous for the concerts she gave at her home, in which her powers of improvisation were greatly admired. She wrote trio sonatas, an opera, violin sonatas, and two books of Cantates françaises on Old Testament subjects. Her first book of harpsichord pieces was published as early as 1687 and contains in its four suites, apart from partly unmeasured Louis Couperin-like preludes, sequences of dances that have real individuality and feeling for expressive harmony, a very unusual Tocade (to open the F major Suite) and a couple of chaconnes. Twenty years later, after a series of family deaths, she produced two more harpsichord suites 'that can be played on the violin'. All this music is performed with flair, vitality, panache and character by the Swedish-born harpsichordist Carole Cerasi. Her playing on a rich-toned Ruckers instrument is deeply impressive and rewarding, and a model of clarity.

Leos Janáček

Moravian 1854-1928

GROVE Janáček was a chorister at the Augustinian 'Queen's' Monastery in Old Brno, where the choirmaster Pavel Križkovský took a keen interest in his musical education. After completing his basic schooling he trained as a teacher and, except for a period at the Prague Organ School, he spent 1872-79 largely as a schoolteacher and choral conductor in Brno. In 1879 he enrolled at the Leipzig Conservatory, where he developed his interest in composition under the strict and systematic supervision of Leo Grill. After a month in Vienna he returned to Brno in May 1880; there he became engaged to one of his pupils, Zdenka Schulzová, whom he married in July 1881.

In Brno, Janáček took up his former activities, and also founded and directed an organ school and edited a new musical journal, Hudební listy. After composing his first opera, Sárka, he immersed himself in collecting Moravian folk music, which bore fruit in a series of orchestral suites and dances and in a one-act opera, The Beginning of a Romance. This was favourably received in 1894, but Janáček withdrew it after six performances and set to work on Jenůfa.

During the long period of composition of Jenůfa (1894-1903), Janáček rethought his approach to opera and to composition in general. He largely abandoned the number opera, integrated folksong firmly into his music and formulated a theory of 'speech-melody', based on the natural rhythms and the rise and fall of the Czech language, which was to influence all his ensuing works and give them a particular colour through their jagged rhythms and lines. Jenufa was soon followed by other operatic ventures, but his reputation in Brno was as a composer of instrumental and choral music and as director of the Organ School. Outside Moravia he was almost unknown until the Prague première of Jenůfa in 1916. The creative upsurge of a man well into his 60s is explained partly by the success of Jenůfa in Prague and abroad, partly by his patriotic pride in the newly acquired independence of his country, and perhaps most of all by his passionate, though generally distant, attachment to Kamila Stösslová, the young wife of an antique dealer in Pisek, Bohemia.

Between 1919 and 1925 Janáček composed three of his finest operas, all on subjects with special resonances for him: Káťa Kabanová with its neglected wife who takes a lover, The Cunning Little Vixen with its sympathetic portrayal of animals (and particularly the female fox), and The Makropoulos Affair with the 'ageless' woman who fascinates all men. Each was given first in Brno and soon after in Prague. His 70th birthday was marked by a doctorate from the Masaryk University in Brno. Early in 1926 he wrote the Sinfonietta for orchestra, characteristic in its blocks of sound and its forceful repetitions, and later that year his most important choral work, the Glagolitic Mass. While performance of his music carried his fame abroad, he started work on his last opera, From the House of the Dead, which he did not live to see performed. It received its première in April 1930 in a version prepared by his pupils Bretislav Bakala and Osvald Chlubna.

Janáček's reputation outside Czechoslovakia and German-speaking countries was first made as an instrumental composer. He has since come to be regarded not only as a Czech composer worthy to be ranked with Smetana and Dvořák, but also as one of the most substantial and original opera composers of the 20th century.

Taras Bulba

Janáček Taras Bulba. The Cunning Little Vixen – Suite V Novák Slovak Suite, Op 32 Ⓗ
Czech Philharmonic Orchestra / Václav Talich
Supraphon Historical mono 11 1905-2 Ⓜ
(71 minutes: AAD). Recorded 1953-54 ●●

Talich's Taras Bulba is hugely imposing. Aided by playing of brazen fervour from the Czech PO, his reading has a rare dignity, culminating in an apotheosis of overwhelming grandeur and majesty (magnificent brass sounds). Not that there's any want of energy and momentum: in Talich's hands, the battle scenes of the first two tableaux possess thrilling snap and vigour. Some might crave a leaner, harder-edged orchestral sonority, but the impact and stature of this music-making is not in question. It's followed by the affectionate orchestral suite from The Cunning Little Vixen which Talich himself compiled in 1937. Of course, not all Janáčekians will approve of the great conductor's 'sensualizing' of the original instrumentation, but many collectors will be grateful to have this classic 1954 recording restored to circulation at long last, and its sense of enchantment and magical atmosphere remain utterly intoxicating. The Novák coupling is an unmitigated delight. Talich's wonderful conception has all the tangy affection and lithe, rhythmic punch one could wish for, but he also locates and taps into a vein of tangible, old-world nostalgia that is extremely moving. If you don't already know these lovely scores, we urge immediate investigation, for you won't ever hear better performances than these.

String Quartets

String Quartets – No 1, 'Kreutzer Sonata'; No 2, 'Intimate Letters'. Along an Overgrown Path (1906-08) – Suite No 1
Radoslav Kvapil pf Talich Quartet (Petr Messiereur, Jan Kvapil vns Jan Talich va Evzen Rattai vc)
Calliope CAL5699 (73 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1986 ●

This recording does not give a true balance, and in places the sound itself is rather grey. At first blush, too, the Talich Quartet's manner can seem tentative. Yet this is exactly what is right. The music is sudden, questing, unpredictable, by turns mysterious, vehement in its emotions, passionately lyrical. The whole programme of the Second Quartet, with its reference in the title to secret affections, indicates the extraordinariness of the emotion for the younger woman that overcame Janáček; and its exceptional and impossible nature finds ideal expression in the idiom of Janáček's astonishing final years. The Talich Quartet suggests secrecy, fear even, in the quick shifts between musical gestures; yet it can allow Janáček's beautiful phrases declaring his full heart to find passionate expression. It is a more restrained manner of playing than that adopted by other groups, and it can make its effect by skilful understatement; but repeated hearings increasingly find it to yield subtle and true performances of both works. Room is also found for the First Suite of Along an Overgrown Path. Kvapil is direct and eloquent in his approach to Janáček's oblique statements and half-hidden memories, both passionate and tragic; but he never overstates, and his allusive manner is very effective indeed.

String Quartets – No 1, 'Kreutzer Sonata'; No 2, 'Intimate Letters'
Skampa Quartet (Pavel Fischer, Jana Lukášová vns Radim Sedmidubský va Peter Jarůšek vc) Ⓕ
Supraphon SU3486-2 (41 minutes: DDD) ●

Janáček changed his mind a great deal, especially about the Second Quartet, on the way from composition to performance and even after that. Most records use the scores published in Prague respectively in 1945 and 1949 as 'revised editions'. However, Milan Skampa published further revisions in 1975 and 1979, and these are what are used here by the quartet which studied under him at the time of its formation in 1989.

The differences depend mostly upon dynamic markings and emphases. To these the present players give great attention, stressing the sudden changes of tempo or dynamics and the consequent abrupt changes of mood which mark the music. They also pay particular attention to coloration of tone. In the First Quartet, for instance, where the seducer of the Tolstoy-inspired 'plot' makes his mincing entrance, the sound is deceptively warm within the delicacy; other quartets play the theme with almost disdainful thinness, but the Škampa allow him his dangerous charm. In the final movement of the Second Quartet, there is a searing discord marked to be played fortississimo but right up near the bridge where string tone is weakest: the outcome is a horrible sound, and the Škampa believe that that is what is meant. In short, these are sharp, well-considered performances, vivid in detail and excellently judged in structure. They take their place in the catalogue beside the marvellous Talich Quartet (reviewed above).

Pohádka

Pohádka. Presto in E minor. Violin Sonata.
Capriccio. Concertino
Pierre Amoyal vn Gary Hoffman vc Mikhail Rudy pf
members of L'Orchestre de l'Opéra National de Paris / Sir Charles Mackerras
EMI 555585-2 (72 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995 ●

This is an odd assemblage of Janáček's late chamber music, but the music itself is capable of an oddity which does not dim with time. Mikhail Rudy contrasts well the eccentricity of the left-hand Capriccio, never losing sight of its contained lyricism, with the more approachable lyricism of the Concertino In this he is ideally supported by Mackerras, whose expert judgement of the weight and pace and contrasts of the music never falters. Much of the secret in bringing off this difficult, haunting music lies in a sense of timing, together with something more, a long-acquired skill in contrasting textures dramatically, which has itself something to do with timing, at any rate with a sense of dramatic cut and thrust. The violin and cello works, themselves very different in their more romantic natures, are finely handled by Amoyal and Hoffman, with Rudy a sympathetic and supportive partner. There are now many different versions of each of these works, none in this exact compilation. It is certainly one that can be strongly recommended.

Janáček Pohádka
Kodály Cello Sonata, Op 4 Liszt Elégies – No 1, S130; No 2, S131. La lugubre gondola, S134
Anne Gastinel vc Pierre-Laurent Aimard pf
Astrée Naïve V4748 (50 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995

This is an imaginative piece of programme planning, with arrangements of Liszt's Elégies and La lugubre gondola separated by Kodály's Sonata and Janáček's Pohádka. Liszt, writing in the 1870s and early 1880s, sounds as modern as either of the two composers writing in 1910; and indeed there is much in his augmented-chord harmony and his fondness for unusual scales that influenced Kodály, while Janáček also admired him and used his religious music for teaching. This is Romantic music outside the mainstream of European musical romanticism. Gastinel and Aimard give performances as intelligent as these juxtapositions suggest, oblique and dark in the linking figure of Liszt, especially with La lugubre gondola, one of the most extraordinary late piano pieces. Kodály's sonata is played with a quiet intensity, rhapsodic in manner but strongly held together by the clarity of emphasis on the motto theme and its musical implications. Janáček's pieces can sound sharper and quirkier than here, and in such performances make their point more strongly; but this playing is of a piece with the whole approach. Gastinel has a clean, resinous tone, and a strong sense of line; she is well partnered by Aimard, and the recording is balanced.

Piano Sonata / On an Overgrown Path

Piano Sonata 1. X. 1905, 'From the street'.
On an Overgrown Path. In the mists. Reminiscence
Charles Owen pf
Somm SOMMCD028 (73 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded c2002 ●

It says much for Charles Owen and his understanding of this composer that a young British pianist should present this music with such a distinctive voice. As is evident from the first of the two movements of the Sonata, he is even more strikingly successful than Rudolf Firkušný (reviewed below), doyen of Czech pianists, at bringing out the quirky side of Janáček's writing. So the jagged little flurries of notes that bite away in contrast to the poetic lyricism of the opening are presented in sharper focus than with either Firkušný or Mikhail Rudy, an effect which directly echoes Janáček's orchestral writing. Here and throughout the disc Owen is helped by the clarity of the recording.

The qualities which distinguish Owen's performance of the sonata recur in the other works. Where Firkušný is regularly faster in a freely expressive style, and Rudy (on EMI) markedly slower, with rubato not always so idiomatic, Owen's middle way offers sharper focus and more refined dynamics. So his performances of the two series of miniatures which make up On an Overgrown Path reflect the composer's folk influences in their lyrical freshness, both in the songful pieces and the dances. In the four movements of In the Mists, Owen matches Firkušný in spontaneity; indeed, he gives an almost improvisatory feel to the suite. The tiny Reminiscence, a product from the year Janáček died, makes a moving supplement.

Piano Sonata 1.X.1905, 'From the Street'. Along an Overgrown Path. In the Mists. Thema con variazioni, 'Zdenka' Rudolf Firkušný pf
DG 20th Century Classics 429 857-2GC Ⓜ
(79 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1971 ●●

Janáček's only piano sonata has a history almost as dramatic as the events which inspired it. Its subtitle, From the Street, commemorates a student demonstration in which a 20-year-old worker was killed, an event which so outraged Janáček that he wrote a three-movement sonata as an expression of his feelings. Before the première in 1906 he burnt the third movement and after a private performance in Prague he threw the remaining movements into a river. It is only thanks to the pianist, Ludmil Tučkova, who had copied out the first two movements, that the work survives. The underlying theme of Firkušný's approach to this work (who may claim historical authenticity as he studied with Janáček) is anger, turning the first movement into a defiant roar of fury while the slow movement has an inherent restlessness, bitterness never far below the surface.

Much of the same characteristics can be found in the other works – Along an Overgrown Path and the masterly In the Mists – although he occasionally overloads these delicate little pieces with dramatic power. The early Theme and Variations are conventionally Romantic but impeccably played. This disc represents playing of the highest class.

Diary of One Who Disappeared

The Diary of One Who Disappeared[a].
Moravian Folk Songs[a] – Selection. Intimate Sketches – I am waiting for you!; A palace in the small quarter; Moderato; A little gold ring; Souvenir; Christ the Lord is born. Reminiscence
[a]Ian Bostridge ten [a]Diane Atherton sop
[a]Deryn Edwards, [a]Ruby Philogene mezzos
[a]Susan Flannery contr Thomas Adès pf
EMI 557219-2 (57 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 2001 ●

Ian Bostridge is an inspired soloist and Ruby Philogene sensuously rich-toned as the gypsy seductress of the farmer's son whose diary entries provide the text for this extraordinary piece. This is the first of the great sequence of works that Janáček was inspired to write in his last years through his passionate, yet unrequited love for the young Kamila Stosslova, whom in this cycle he expressly equated with the gypsy girl. This recording by Bostridge and Thomas Adès followed a sequence of highly acclaimed staged performances of the work that they gave in Dublin, Paris, London, Munich and New York. It certainly intensified the impact of their singing and playing, with a consistent feeling of spontaneity in their interpretation of Janáček's writing.

By voice quality as well as temperament, Bostridge seems ideally suited to this work, and though the high tessitura of the writing is daunting for any tenor, he seems totally untroubled, even when in the final song he is faced by two sustained high Cs. Instead of having more Janáček songs for fill-up, EMI have opted for piano music, played by Adès. As ever, Adès is a magnetic interpreter.

Glagolitic Mass

Glagolitic Mass[a]. Sinfonietta, Op 60[b]
Felicity Palmer sop Ameral Gunson mez
John Mitchinson ten Malcolm King bass Jane Parker-Smith org
[a]City of Birmingham Chorus and Orchestra;
[b]Philharmonia Orchestra / Sir Simon Rattle
EMI Great Recordings of the Century 566980-2 (62 minutes: DDD). Text and translation included Ⓜ
Recorded 1980s ●

'I am not an old man, and I am not a believer – until I see for myself.' Thus Janáček replied angrily to a critic after the première of his Glagolitic Mass. This is a gritty, masterful performance of a jagged, uncomfortable masterpiece. Its unusual title stems from the script of the ancient Slavonic text (Glagol) which Janáček set to music. Rattle's is a full-blooded, urgent view of the work, with particularly fine solo contributions from Felicity Palmer and John Mitchinson. That the language is an unfamiliar one is occasionally evident in the chorus, though they, like the orchestra, give totally committed performances under Rattle's inspired leadership. Also included on this disc is the Sinfonietta (originally entitled 'Military Sinfonietta', reflecting in the brass-heavy scoring). It is as much a study in orchestration as form with the melody of the fourth movement appearing unaltered no less than 14 times, changed only in orchestral colour. It is brilliantly played here, with the 12 trumpets coming up gleaming in the final climax. An enticing proposition!

Janáček (ed Wingfield) Glagolitic Mass (original version)
Kodály Psalmus Hungaricus, Op 13[a]
Tina Kiberg sop Randi Stene contr Peter Svensson ten Ulrik Cold bass Per Salo org [a]Copenhagen Boys' Choir; Danish National Radio Choir and Symphony Orchestra / Sir Charles Mackerras
Chandos CHAN9310 (63 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1994 ●●

Mackerras's version of the Glagolitic Mass is of particular interest as it embodies one of the reconstructions that have been painstakingly made of Janáček's original intentions in different works as his stature has drawn greater scholarly interest. This one has been made by Paul Wingfield. Briefly, his restorations involve the playing of the Intrada at the beginning and the end, in the Introduction a very complex rhythmic pattern and in the 'Gospodi pomiluj' ('Kyrie') use of quintuple metre instead of the familiar four-in-a-bar, and fierce timpani interjections in the wild organ solo. There are other points; but in any case, most interested listeners will care less for them in detail than for the heightened force and impact of the music. This it certainly now (or once again) has. These matters make it the more regrettable that, despite marvellous handling of the work by Mackerras, there are problems with a quartet of soloists that is less than exciting, and a recording that even with the most modern techniques can obscure the detail and clarity. This should not detract from the interest of the disc, which every lover of the work will surely want to hear. Those who acquire it will have the additional benefit of a fine performance of Kodály's Psalmus Hungaricus, though the restored Mass is naturally the occasion here for recommendation and choice.

The Cunning Little Vixen

Awards 1983

The Cunning Little Vixen. The Cunning Little Vixen – orchestral suite (arr V Talich)
Lucia Popp sop Vixen, Young vixen; Dalibor Jedlička bass Forester; Eva Randová mez Fox; Eva Zikmundová mez Forester's wife, Owl; Vladimir Krejčik ten Schoolmaster, Gnat; Richard Novák ten Priest, Badger; Václav Zítek bar Harašta; Beno Blachut ten Pásek; Ivana Mixová mez Pásek's wife, Woodpecker, Hen; Libuše Marová contr Dog; Gertrude Jahn mez Cock, Jay; Eva Hríbiková sop Frantik; Zuzana Hudecová sop Pepik; Peter Saray treb Frog, Grasshopper; Miriam Ondrášková sop Cricket
Vienna State Opera Chorus; Bratislava Children's Choir; Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Sir Charles Mackerras
Decca ② 417 129-2DH2 (109 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, text and translation included
Recorded 1981 ○○○

Janáček used the most unlikely material for his operas. For The Cunning Little Vixen his source was a newspaper series of drawings, with accompanying text, about the adventures of a vixen cub and her escape from the gamekeeper who raised her. The music is a fascinating blend of vocal and orchestral sound – at times ludicrously romantic, at others raw and violent. Mackerras's Czech training has given him a rare insight into Janáček's music and he presents a version faithful to the composer's individual requirements. In the title-role, Lucia Popp gives full weight to the text while displaying all the richness and beauty of her voice. There is a well-chosen supporting cast of largely Czech singers, with the Vienna Philharmonic to add the ultimate touch of orchestral refinement. Decca's sound is of demonstration quality.

Additional recommendation
The Cunning Little Vixen (sung in English)
Coupling: Taras Bulba
Watson Vixen Montague Fox Allen Forester
Royal Opera House Chorus & Orchestra / Rattle
EMI 754212-2 (120 minutes: DDD: 3/92) Ⓕ
Rattle's version it extremely well cast and is worth considering if you want to overcome the language barrier in an opera that in every way draws you into the drama.

House of the Dead / Makropulos ...

Awards 1980

From the House of the Dead[a]. Mládí[b]. Nursery rhymes[c] Dalibor Jedlička bar Goryanchikov; Jaroslava Janská sop Alyeya; Jiří Zahradníček ten Luka (Morosov); Vladimír Krejčík ten Tall Prisoner; Richard Novák bass Short Prisoner; Antonín Svorc bass-bar Commandant; Beno Blachut ten Old Prisoner; Ivo Zídek ten Skuratov; Jaroslav Souček bar Chekunov, Prisoner acting Don Juan; Eva Zigmundová mez Whore; Zdeněk Soušek ten Shapkin, Kedril; Václav Zítek bar Shishkov; Zdeněk Svehla ten Cherevin, A Voice Vienna State Opera Chorus; Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Sir Charles Mackerras; [c]London Sinfonietta Chorus; [bc]London Sinfonietta / David Atherton
Decca ② 430 375-2DH2 (123 minutes: DDD/ADD) Ⓕ
Notes, texts and translations included.
Recorded 1980 ○○○

The Makropulos Affair. Lachian Dances[a]
Elisabeth Söderström sop Emilia Marty; Peter Dvorský ten Albert Gregor; Vladimir Krejšík ten Vítek; Anna Czaková mez Kristina; Václav Zítek bar Jaroslav Prus; Zdeněk Svehla ten Janek; Dalibor Jedlička bass Kolenatý; Jiří Joran bass Stage technician; Ivana Mixová contr Cleaning woman; Beno Blachut ten Hauk-Sendorf; Blanka Vitková contr Chambermaid
Vienna State Opera Chorus; Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Sir Charles Mackerras; [a]London Philharmonic Orchestra / François Huybrechts
Decca ② 430 372-2DH2 (118 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Notes, text and translation included. Recorded 1978

From the House of the Dead (the 1980 Gramophone Record of the Year) was here recorded for the first time in its proper, original version; and this revealed it as even more of a masterpiece – a work, indeed, to count among the handful of masterpieces of 20th-century opera. The loss of the final chorus, a sentimental addition, is but the most striking of the clarifications: throughout, the sound is sharper, the textures are sparer, and this serves to sharpen the effect and to give the singers more clearly differentiated support. The cast are led, nominally, by Goryanchikov, but the character is not really the hero of an opera that has no heroes and in which all are heroes, though Dalibor Jedlička sings him warmly and well. The prisoners are skilfully contrasted in Janáček's writing so as to make an apparently random yet actually well-structured group, and there is not a weak performance among them.

The Makropulos Affair has, of course, very much a heroine, in the tragic figure of Emilia Marty; and here Elisabeth Söderström gives one of her greatest recorded performances. She succeeds amazingly in conveying the complexity of the character, the elegance yet flinty cynicism, the aloofness yet vulnerability, the latent warmth that can flower into such rich expressive phrases and then be reined in with a sense of nervy panic. She is only really alarmed by Prus, the most formidable of the men around her, powerfully sung by Václav Zítek. Mackerras is again masterly. This is a recording to set among great performances of it. As with From the House of the Dead, there is an essay by John Tyrrell that not only gives the listener the best possible introduction to the opera but is also a contribution to scholarship. The fill-ups, Mládí and the Nursery rhyme, come from David Atherton's splendid 1981 set of five LPs devoted to Janáček; the Lachian Dances set is a rather less successful companion to Makropulos.

Jenůfa

Awards 1984

Elisabeth Söderström sop Jenůfa; Wieslaw Ochman ten Laca; Eva Randová mez Kostelnička; Petr Dvorskü ten Steva; Lucia Popp sop Karolka; Marie Mrazová contr Stařenka; Václav Zitek bar Stárek; Dalibor Jedlička bass Rychtar; Ivana Mixová mez Rychtarka; Vera Soukopová mez Pastuchyňa, Tetka; Jindra Pokorná mez Barena; Jana Janasová sop Jano
Vienna State Opera Chorus; Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Sir Charles Mackerras
Decca ② 414 483-2DH2 (130 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1982 ○○○

Janáček's first operatic masterpiece is a towering work, blending searing intensity with heart-stopping lyricism. It tells of Jenůfa and the appalling treatment she receives as she is caught between the man she loves and another who finally comes to love her. But dominating the story is the Kostelnička, a figure of enormous strength, pride and inner resource who rules Jenůfa's life and ultimately kills her baby. Randová's characterization of the role of the Kostelnička is frightening in its intensity yet has a very human core. The two men are well cast and act as fine foils to Söderström's deeply impressive Jenůfa. The Vienna Philharmonic plays beautifully and Mackerras directs magnificently. The recording is all one could wish for and the booklet is a mine of informed scholarship.

Additional recommendation
Jenůfa (Brno version, 1908)
Mattila Jenůfa; Silvasti Laca; Silja Kostelnička; Hadley Steva; Royal Opera House Orchestra, Covent Garden / Haitink
Erato ② 0927-45330-2 (139 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, libretto and translation included
Recorded live in 2001

> Haitink's Jenůfa may not topple the Mackerras version from its pedestal but it makes a deeply rewarding and valid alternative, especially collectable for Mattila's heroine and Silvasti's superlatively sung Laca.

Káťá Kabanová

Awards 1977

Káťá Kabanová. Capriccio[a]. Concertino[a]
Elisabeth Söderström sop Kátá Kabanová; Petr Dvorsky ten Boris; Naděžda Kniplová contr Kabanicha; Vladimír Krejčík ten Tichon; Libuše Márová mez Varvara; Dalibor Jedlička bass Dikoj; Zdeněk Svehla ten Kudrjáš; Jaroslav Souček bar Kuligin; Jitka Pavlová sop Glaša; Gertrude Jahn mez Fekluša
Vienna State Opera Chorus; Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Sir Charles Mackerras; [a]Paul Crossley pf [a]London Sinfonietta / David Atherton
Decca ② 421 852-2DH2 (140 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Notes, text and translation included.
Recorded 1976-78 ○○○

Kátá, a free spirit, is imprisoned by marriage into, and domicile with, a family in a provincial Russian town on the Volga. The family is manipulated by her widowed mother-in-law. The only son (Kátá's husband) is spineless, and Kátá looks for escape in love. She finds the love, but true escape only in suicide. Janáček focuses on his heroine, giving her at least two of the most moving scenes in opera: the first where, to music of shimmering, seraphic beauty she describes her childhood imagination given free rein by sunlight streaming through the dome in church; and the second in the last scene where, after confessing her adultery, she concludes that 'not even God's own sunlight' gives her pleasure any more. Söderström has the intelligence and a voice which guarantees total credibility; and of the superb all-Czech supporting cast one might only have wished for a slightly younger-sounding sister-in-law. Mackerras obtains the finest playing from the VPO; and Decca reproduces the whole with clarity, atmosphere, ideal perspectives and discernible stage movement – only a detectable levelling of the score's few extreme fortissimos points to the recording's vintage.

As a bonus, Decca adds the late chamber concertos, both excellently performed and engineered, and equally essential Janáček.

Josquin Desprez

French c1440-1521

GROVE Josquin was a singer at Milan Cathedral in 1459, remaining there until December 1472. By July 1474 he was one of the 'cantori di capella' in the chapel of Galeazzo Maria Sforza. Between 1476 and 1504 he passed into the service of Cardinal Ascanio Sforza, whom he probably accompanied in Rome in 1484. His name first appears among the papal chapel choir in 1486 and recurs sporadically; he had left the choir by 1501. In this Italian period Josquin reached artistic maturity.

He then went to France (he may also have done so while at the papal chapel) and probably served Louis XII's court. Although he may have had connections with the Ferrara court (through the Sforzas) in the 1480s and 1490s, no formal relationship with the court is known before 1503 when, for a year, he was maestro di cappella there and the highest-paid singer in the chapel's history. There he probably wrote primarily masses and motets. An outbreak of plague in 1503 forced the court to leave Ferrara (Josquin's place was taken by Obrecht, who fell victim in 1505). He was in the north again, at Notre Dame at Condé, in 1504; he may have been connected with Margaret of Austria's court, 1508-11. He died in 1521. Several portraits survive, one attributed to Leonardo da Vinci.

Josquin's works gradually became known throughout western Europe and were regarded as models by many composers and theorists. Petrucci's three books of his masses (1502-14) reflect contemporary esteem, as does Attaingnant's collection of his chansons (1550). Several laments were written on his death (including Gombert's elegy Musae Jovis), and as late as 1554 Jacquet of Mantua paid him tribute in a motet. He was praised by 16th-century literary figures (including Castiglione and Rabelais) and was Luther's favourite composer.

Josquin was the greatest composer of the high Renaissance, the most varied in invention and the most profound in expression. Much of his music cannot be dated. Generally, however, his first period (up to c1485) is characterised by abstract, melismatic counterpoint in the manner of Ockeghem and by tenuous relationships between words and music. The middle period (to c1505) saw the development and perfection of the technique of pervasive imitation based on word-generated motifs. This style has been seen as a synthesis of two traditions: the northern polyphony of Dufay, Busnois and Ockeghem, in which he presumably had his earliest training, and the more chordal, harmonically orientated practice of Italy. In the final period the relationship between word and note becomes even closer and there is increasing emphasis on declamation and rhetorical expression within a style of the utmost economy.

His many motets span all three periods. One of the earliest, the four-part Victimae paschali laudes (1502), exemplifies his early style, with its dense texture, lack of imitation, patches of stagnant rhythm and rudimentary treatment of dissonance. Greater maturity is shown in Planxit autem David, in which homophonic and freely imitative passages alternate, and in Absalon, fili mi, with its flexible combination of textures. His later motets, such as In principio erat verbum, combine motivic intensity and melodic succinctness with formal clarity; they are either freely composed, four-part settings of biblical texts, or large-scale cantus firmus pieces. Transparent textures and duet writing are common.

Josquin's 18 complete masses combine elements of cantus firmus, parody and paraphrase techniques. One of the earliest, L'ami Baudichon, is a cantus firmus mass on a simple dance formula the simplicity of melody and rhythm and the clarity of harmony and texture recall the Burgundian style of the 1450s and 1460s. Fortuna desperata, on the other hand, is an early example of parody. Canonic writing and ostinato figures are features. His last great masses, notably the Missa de beata virgine and the Missa 'Pange lingua', were preceded by works in which every resource is deployed with bravura.

Josquin's secular music comprises three settings of Italian texts and numerous chansons. One of the earliest, Cela sans plus, typifies his observance of the formes fixes and the influences of the Burgundian styles of Busnois and Ockeghem. Later works, such as Mille regretz, are less canonic, the clear articulation of lines and points of imitation achieved by a carefully balanced hierarchy of cadences. Some, like Si j'ay perdu mon ami, look forward to the popular 'Parisian' chanson, of Janequin.

Songs and Instrumental Music

Master of Musicians – Songs and instrumental music by Josquin des Prez, and his pupils and contemporaries

Includes Josquin Adieu mes amours[b]. Bergerotte savoysienne[c]. Comment peult avoir joye. De tous biens pleine – à 3; à 4. Dido – Fama malum à 4[abcd]; Dulces exuviae à 4. El grillo[abcd]. Faulte d'argent[ab]. Je me complains[bc]. Mille regretz[abcd]. Pauper sum ego[d]. Petite camusette[ab]. Pleine de dueil[bc]. Se congié prens[ab] – Recordans de mia segnora; à 6. Si j'avoys Marion. Si j'ay perdu mon amy – à 3; à 4. Le villain. Also includes works by Agricola, Alonso, Anon, Févin, Gerle, Isaac, Japart, Orto, Le Roy and Spinacino

[a]Belinda Sykes contr [b]John Potter ten [c]Jennie Cassidy mez [d]Robert Evans bar

London Musica Antiqua (John Bryan rec/crumhn/viol Alison Crum rec/crumhn/viol/hp Jacob Heringman viol/lte/gtr Roy Marks crumhn/viol Rebecca Miles rec) / Philip Thorby

Signum SIGCD025 (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Texts and translations included. Recorded 2000 ●

The secular music of Josquin has not always been very successful in recordings. Many of the pieces are very short – some can seem like exercises for something else, and others make little sense unless they are understood in the wider context of other settings based on the same material. The last problem is solved here by the inclusion of a lot of the related settings alongside those of Josquin. And the recording solves the first problem by unapologetically offering no fewer than 37 tracks, with the pieces grouped together so they flow cleanly from one to the next; it also resists some of the more outgoing pieces, so that the whole disc occupies a consistent sound world.

That sound world is mostly a gentle one, with the lines flowing quite fast in an easy playing style that can occasionally lose a few details but compensates with clarity of design. The musicians also cultivate a sound that favours vivacity and flair over constant attention to all the details of intonation; but that, too, is good, because everything is lively and full of variety. The instruments used range from viols and lutes to an ensemble of recorders and even one of crumhorns (played with an admirable restraint). And the singers offer all the variety of tone-colour one might expect from a group spearheaded by John Potter.

Many pieces here have never been recorded before; and the disc has the twin benefits of being remarkably accessible for easy listening as well as providing a marvellous basis for closer understanding. Most enjoyable.

Masses

Missa L'homme armé sexti toni. Missa L'homme armé super voces musicales

A Sei Voci / Bernard Fabre-Garrus; Maîtrise des Pays de Loire / Bertrand Lemaire

Astrée Naïve E8809 (74 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included
Recorded 2000 ●●

Josquin's Masses on L'homme armé have one of the most impressive recording pedigrees of the early Renaissance, but A Sei Voci's is probably the finest so far. There is superlative singing, a compelling, enveloping acoustic presence, and above all an interpretative logic, a sure-footedness of tempo and of phrasing that makes sense of some of Josquin's most prolix and demanding music. First comes Sexti toni, which is sung for the first time in the range that the sources' low clefs seem to imply. Where all the previous recordings have women on the top line (in a correspondingly higher tessitura), here it is taken by countertenors, supplemented on occasion by the children of the Maîtrise des Pays de Loire. The sunny, almost genial tone of previous recordings gives way to a quite unsuspected, darker and more interiorised but still luminous sound world.

The contrapuntal intensity of the final Agnus Dei is wonderful to hear, especially after the restrained scoring of much of what precedes it. Still more impressive, perhaps, is the performance of Super voces musicales, Josquin's most extended work, and certainly one of his most abstract and intellectually challenging. In the past, its very abstraction bred a suspicion that here was a work easier to admire than to love. Fabre-Garrus and his singers change all that: the intellectual toughness is still there, but in addition they make clear the Mass's rhetorical logic in a way that previous recordings never quite managed. Rarely has Josquin's achievement appeared so compelling. In short, this recording is a revelation.

Missa 'Malheur me bat'. Virgo prudentissima. Liber generationis Jesu Christi. Ave Maria... virgo serena. Baiséz moy. Que vous ma dame/In pace in idipsum. Victimae paschali laudes. Comment peult avoir joye
The Clerks' Group / Edward Wickham
ASV Gaudeamus CDGAU306 Ⓕ
(71 minutes: DDD). Texts and translation included
Recorded c2002

The Clerks' Group once again earn our gratitude by heading straight for the top-class works that lack modern, top-class recordings. The Mass Malheur me bat is one of Josquin's most resourceful treatments of received material, taking all three voices of a secular piece and treating each separately, each in different ways; and in the magnificent final movement he follows an almost comical two-voice canon at the second with a broad treatment in six voices with two canons running simultaneously. As a display of contrapuntal techniques, this may well be his most stunning composition.

The Clerks' Group can seem less polished than previously. Intonation is not always out of the top drawer. And the speeds chosen often seem perplexing, but on further listening, it seems that they are trying to tackle different musical problems; they are going for the music, and that has to be good.

This is particularly the case in the most welcome novelty here, the Liber generationis, Josquin's setting of the genealogy from St Matthew's gospel. How wonderful to have this and the other works here in seriously skilled performances.

Missa Pange lingua
Missa La sol fa re mi
The Tallis Scholars / Peter Phillips
Gimell CDGIM009 (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1986 ●●●

Awards 1987

This is absolutely superb. We must accept that Josquin is unlikely to have heard this music with two women on the top line, but they do it so well that only a fundamentalist would mark the disc down for that. It should also be said that the least successful performance on the entire disc is in the opening Kyrie of this Mass where there is a certain brutality in the approach; and although The Tallis Scholars make much of the 'Benedictus' and the last Agnus Dei, there may still be better ways of doing it. On the other hand, as just one example among many, these were the first musicians to make the 'Osanna' truly successful and understand why Josquin should have chosen to compose it that way. But they sing even better in the Mass, La sol fa re mi. Again and again in the singing one has the feeling that Josquin's lines are projected with an understanding and clarity that have rarely been heard before. The La sol fa re mi of the title denotes (among other things) the melodic passage which appears over 200 times in the course of the work with its intervals unchanged – which may not seem a recipe for the kind of music one would want to hear. But Josquin treats his material with such astonishing sophistication that you are rarely aware of the melodic fragment as such; and Phillips is scrupulously careful never to emphasise the melody except in places – such as the end of the second 'Osanna' – where it is clearly intended to work as an ostinato. This performance shows that the La sol fa re mi belongs with the greatest works of its era.

Josquin Desprez Missa de beata virgine
Mouton Nesciens mater. Ave Maria virgo serena. Ave sanctissima Maria. O Maria piissima. Ave Maria gemma virginum
Theatre of Voices / Paul Hillier
Harmonia Mundi HMU90 7136 (53 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1993 ●

Jean Mouton was a composer who, in the eyes of 16th-century musicians, most successfully challenged the peerless Josquin Desprez. So it was a good idea to assemble a programme that juxtaposes the two composers: for Josquin it is his most successful Mass; and for Mouton a group of motets on the same theme – varied but all of them luscious and exhilarating. Effectively

Paul Hillier divides up the Mass, as it would have been divided in a celebration, and puts Mouton's motets into the gaps. This works particularly well, the constant juxtaposition of the two similar yet contrasting styles clarifying one's perception of both composers. The music is also superbly performed. The 15 singers of the Theatre of Voices are effortlessly clear, wonderfully in tune and beautifully balanced. You hear the lines and spaces of Josquin just as you hear the immaculately modulated colours of Mouton; and that is partly because the singers have such good control of a range of vocal timbre. But beyond that there is an energy in the performances that keeps everything marvellously alive: even if you occasionally feel that Hillier takes the music a touch briskly, there is constant delight in the shapes that result. An issue of true distinction.

Missa Gaudeamus. Recordare virgo Mater. Regina caeli. Missa Ave maris stella. Virgo salutiferi/Ave Maria
A Sei Voci; Maîtrise des Pays de Loire / Bernard Fabre-Garrus bass
Auvidis Astrée E8612
(68 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1997

Bernard Fabre-Garrus has long been experimenting with different ways of performing renaissance polyphony. It seems that each of his recordings offers a new sound; and in this particular case his novelty is to use the children of the Maîtrise des Pays de Loire – both boys and girls – to sing the top line of Josquin's Mass Gaudeamus. This is one of Josquin's most rhythmically intricate works, so there is a major challenge here; just occasionally the rhythms slip a little. But to compensate for that there is a stirring energy to their singing; and part of the elegance of Fabre-Garrus performances has always been in his fluid, linear approach to polyphony, which works splendidly here. Moreover, with just six singers on the three lower lines, he always manages to produce a beautifully clear and balanced texture. This is a very successful and exciting performance of one of Josquin's most stunning masterpieces. His astonishingly varied treatment of the Gaudeamus melody ranges from straight imitation through unusually long-held tenor notes (that have a stunning effect on the work's harmonic rhythm), via bravura exercises in ostinato, to the heart-stopping modulations of the final Agnus Dei. The plainchants are sung with an unusual lucidity and energy. The motets include the rarely heard Recordare virgo Mater, which gives a special opportunity for the children to sing in three parts; and they end with a superlatively eloquent and clear performance of one of Josquin's most famous five-voice motets, Virgo salutiferi.

Further listening
Josquin and his contemporaries
Includes works by Josquin Desprez, Craen, Champion, Willaert etc
Binchois Consort / Kirkman
Hyperion CDA67183 (71 minutes: DDD: 01/02) Ⓕ

This disc rescues from oblivion some really great works, the delicious Recordare and Planxit autem David, which still stands as one of the most moving motets of its time. Highly recommended.

Dmitry Kabalevsky

Russian/USSR 1904-1987

GROVE Kabalevsky had a liberal education, wrote poetry and painted and showed promise as a pianist. The family moved to Moscow in 1918, where he studied the piano with Selyanov and from 1925 at the Moscow Conservatory with Catoire and Myaskovsky, the latter a formative influence; in 1932 he returned to teach at the conservatory (full professor from 1939). He was also involved in organizational and union activities, and worked in the music publishing house. The period 1932-41 was prolific, with much dramatic music (including the first version of his opera Colas Breugnon) and the first three symphonies. In the war years he turned to topical works on heroic patriotism. After the party decree of 1948 he worked towards a more lyrical idiom, as seen in his concertos of the ensuing years; later he worked in operetta and topical cantatas. Kabalevsky occupied an important role in Soviet music, as writer, spokesman on cultural policy, teacher and administrator as well as composer.

Cello Concerto No 2

Kabalevsky Cello Concerto No 2 in G, Op 77
Khachaturian Cello Concerto
Rachmaninov (trans Rose) Vocalise, Op 34 No 14
Mats Lidström vc Gothenburg Symphony Orchestra / Vladimir Ashkenazy pf
BIS CD719 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded live in 1995

This coupling offers performances of two works which, if not masterpieces, are still sufficiently rewarding to be in the regular concert repertory. Ashkenazy creates an evocative opening atmosphere for the first movement of the Kabalevsky, when after mysterious string pizzicatos the soloist steals in with a gentle, singing tone. The soliloquy continues, for the work's unusual structure, with its three unbroken sections linked by cadenzas, invites an improvisational approach well understood by Mats Lidström. The Khachaturian Concerto opens with a flamboyantly coloured orchestral declamation before the cello sails off with vigorous animation. This is followed by a sinuous Armenian theme from the wind which the cello takes up ruminatively, with well-judged espressivo. Yet it is the energetic main theme that dominates and the soloist is carried along on its impetus, while ardently recalling the secondary material, finally leading to an exciting sequential coda. The finale offers the busy, rumbustious Khachaturian we know so well from the Violin Concerto. This composer's major works (with the exception of the Violin Concerto) can seem rather inflated, but here the combined concentration of Lidström and Ashkenazy minimises this impression. As an encore we are given a beautiful, restrained account of Rachmaninov's Vocalise. The recording is of high quality and well balanced, but a shade over-resonant, though the ear adjusts.

Mauricio Kagel

Argentinian 1931

GROVE Kagel, a self-taught as a composer, worked in Buenos Aires as a conductor and in films before moving to Cologne in 1957; he has taught at the Musikhochschule there since 1974. The first work he completed in Europe was Anagrama for voices and instruments (1958), using all sorts of improper vocal sounds in textures of Boulezian fastidiousness; this absurd combination of strict form and unconventional, subversive ingredients has remained characteristic. Many of his works are explicitly theatrical: at one extreme they include pieces for the opera house (Staatstheater, 1971; Die Erschöpfung der Welt, 1985) and radio dramas, though in other works the instrumentalists' actions are the drama (Match for two cellists and percussionist, 1964). The intention is often satirical, to examine ways in which music is used as psychological therapy, marketable commodity, religious devotion, subject of learned expertise etc. Several works have also been filmed by the composer (eg Ludwig van, 1970).

'1898'

'1898'^{a}. Music for Renaissance Instruments^{b}
^{a}Hauptschule Peter-Griess- Strasse Children's Choir; ^{a}Köln-Flittard, ^{b}Collegium Instrumentale / Mauricio Kagel
DG 20/21 459 570-2GX (74 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1967-73 ●

Mauricio Kagel's 1898 was commissioned by DG to celebrate the company's 75th anniversary. Taking its title from the year the firm came into being, 1898, in a typical Kagel inversion, sets out to re-create the intense, wiry sound of early gramophone recordings. The work reflects 19th-century musical culture, which, as the composer writes, was 'a time when one inhaled tonally and exhaled atonally.' The whole piece is conceived as a kind of two-part invention. The players are presented with the same two staves of music and the exact instrumental doublings of each line is only established in rehearsals. Then 22 children aged 10-13 from the Hauptschule Peter-Griess-Strasse in Cologne are brought in. The children's untrained vocal improvisations range from wonderfully off-key melodies to cruel bouts of bittersweet laughter that seem almost to mock the rest of the music, adding a whole new level of texture and meaning to 1898. Four 'Stroh' string instruments were designed for the piece to Kagel's specifications, which combine attributes from both the string and brass families of instruments in a bizarre way, their keening, magnified screeching noises a distinctive feature of 1898's sound world. Conceived with the physical attributes of the gramophone record in mind, 1898 has two sides, each lasting around 25 minutes.

The playing here is so extraordinarily sensitive and poignant that it makes for compelling listening, with the characteristically incisive contributions of the percussionist Christoph Caskel beautifully captured. In Music for Renaissance Instruments, a large ensemble of crumhorns, bombards, renaissance trombones, viols and a raucous positive organ are given a good work-out.

This piece is, as Kagel writes, 'pervaded with the breath of the past' even while breaking the taboos of its time. It is the particular genius of this composer that he has never been afraid to 'inhale'.

Giya Kancheli

Georgian 1935

GROVE Kancheli studied at the Tbilisi Conservatory (1958-63), where he has taught since 1972. He is recognised as one of the most radical thinkers in Georgian music. His works, using folk music, include six symphonies (1967-81), jazz pieces and musicals.

Liturgy for Viola and Orchestra

Liturgy for Viola and Orchestra, 'Mourned by the Wind'. Bright Sorrow
Ian Ford, Oliver Hayes trebs France Springuel vc
Cantate Domino Chorus; I Fiamminghi / Rudolf Werthen
Telarc CD80455 (72 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996 ●

Givi Ordzhonikidze, the editor of a well-known book on Shostakovich, was one of Kancheli's closest friends and staunchest supporters, and it was the sense of loss after his death in 1984 that prompted the composition of the heart-rendingly beautiful Liturgy (subtitled Mourned by the Wind). The other inspiration was Yuri Bashmet, for this four-movement lament was originally a Viola Concerto. It goes superbly on the cello too, thanks to France Springuel's passionate advocacy, and in this form it inevitably invites comparisons with Tavener's The Protecting Veil.

A common feature of these two pieces is that they can seem almost unbearably moving if they catch you in the right mood and yet almost unbearably protracted if they don't. Yet for all the obvious gestures of lamentation and assuaging, Liturgy is not a tear-jerking piece. In fact the texture is for the most part quite transparent, and Kancheli constantly steers away from potentially manipulative clichés on to stonier paths.

The Flemish orchestra gives a wonderfully controlled performance and Telarc's recording quality is superb. Bright Sorrow again draws from the bottomless well of lamentation which is the ex-USSR composer's special curse and privilege. It bears the dedication, 'To children, the victims of war', hence the choice of two boy soloists, symbolising the innocent victims of the last world war addressing themselves to the present-day generation. The soloists sing only slow, fragmented lines, conveying the fragility of innocence. The second half of the work seems to be gaining strength and optimism, but these are soon obliterated, leaving behind only a heart-broken crippled waltz.

Highly recommended, whether or not you already have the Kancheli 'bug'.

...à la Duduki

...à la Duduki. Trauerfarbenes Land
Vienna Radio Symphony Orchestra / Dennis Russell Davies
ECM New Series 457 850-2 (57 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997 ●

... à la Duduki (a 'duduki' is a Georgian folk-reed instrument) should prove the ideal introduction to Kancheli's current style. And while a momentary encounter might suggest familiar territories revisited (vast terrains sparsely but dramatically populated), the musical material is more immediately striking, the scoring more texturally variegated, and the time sequences – even the rhetorical uses of silence – quite different from those in Kancheli's other recent work. Furthermore, echoes of modern jazz frequently fall within earshot. Trauerfarbenes Land ('Country the Colour of Mourning') employs a large orchestra and is different again, being nearly twice as long as ... à la Duduki and darker in tone.

The opening has solo piano and fortissimo trombones hammer what sounds like a recollection of Carl Ruggles before six significant quavers (which turn up again later, in different hues and keys) mark a dramatic dynamic contrast. Time and again Kancheli's penchant for 'cliff-hanger' climaxes bring us to the edge of a towering aural precipice. This is the music of personal displacement: desolate, spacious, occasionally cryptic, and with sudden pangs of sweetened nostalgia that flutter across the canvas like torn diary jottings tossed by the wind. Dennis Russell Davies and producer Manfred Eicher conjure between them a precision-tooled sound picture where every grade of nuance is meticulously reported. Performance standards are unusually high throughout, so much so that it's hard to imagine either work being better played. An exceptional release of some extraordinarily powerful music.

Lament

Lament (Music of mourning in memory of Luigi Nono)
Maacha Deubner sop Gidon Kremer vn
Tbilisi Symphony Orchestra / Jansug Kakhidze
ECM New Series 465 138-2 (42 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included. Recorded 1998

Music of lamentation has long been Kancheli's preoccupation, and this Lament, inscribed to the memory of Luigi Nono, has all the familiar Kanchelian moods: damaged soulfulness, peremptory outbursts and transfigured sadness, invoked aphoristically yet stretched to a hypnotic unbroken 42-minute span. Initial dots of sound on the solo violin grow into painfully sweet bursts of melody, suggesting a context only the composer himself knows and which the listener has to grope towards. Meanwhile a non-vibrato singer intones prayerful fragments. Kremer's violin becomes an eloquent voice; Maacha Deubner's soprano becomes a celestial instrument. Just as you sense the need for new ideas, the orchestra's sculpted orchestral chords gain a pulverising force, and before long all hell breaks loose. The slight residual rawness of the Tbilisi brass is a treasurable authentic feature here, and the entire score is conducted faithfully by the man who knows Kancheli's music better than any musician alive. Eventually the text of Hans Sahl's poem, Strophen, reveals the underlying substance. The recording is first-rate.

Mieczysław Karłowicz

Polish 1876-1909

GROVE Trained as a violinist, he was active in the Warsaw Music Society and a strong supporter of the 'Young Poland' artistic movement, advocating the newest techniques in Polish orchestral music. Among his works are symphonic poems using thematic transformation and reflecting pantheism, sorrow and Wagnerian ideas of love and death, including Eternal Songs (1908) and StanisLaw i Anna Oswiecimowie (1912).

Eternal Songs

Eternal Songs, Op 10. Lithuanian Rhapsody, Op 11. Stanisław and Anna of Oświecim, Op 12
BBC Philharmonic Orchestra / Yan Pascal Tortelier
Chandos CHAN9986 (67 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded c2001 ●●●

What a fine composer Mieczysław Karłowicz might have become, had he not died at the age of 32 in an avalanche in the Tatra mountains. He had already produced a clutch of symphonic poems in a post-Wagnerian style, strongly pantheistic in outlook and, in the case of Stanisław and Anna of Oświecim, with a dash of illicit love thrown in. These luxuriant works set him broadly beside such near-contemporaries as Rachmaninov, Zemlinsky or Suk, and there are even signs in the 'Song of Eternal Being' (third and last of the Eternal Songs) of an individuality that might one day have become as powerful as Janáček's. This is, for the most part, sultrily ecstatic music, that hangs fragrantly or ominously in the air and seems to be constantly about to break through to some visionary realm. Even the relatively jaunty Lithuanian Rhapsody eventually turns wistful in a rather moving way.

If you have a taste for lush late-Romanticism but haven't yet encountered Karłowicz, you have a treat in store, not least because these are fine performances. His music has never been more than fleetingly represented in the catalogue. Back in 1990 there was a two-disc Chant du Monde compilation of the symphonic poems from the Silesian Philharmonic; but their courageous efforts are easily outclassed by the BBC Philharmonic and Yan Pascal Tortelier, as is the recording by Chandos's customary rich sound-stage.

Reinhard Keiser

German 1674-1739

GROVE Keiser wrote operas for Brunswick from c1693 and in 1694 became court chamber composer. From 1696-97 he was Kapellmeister at Hamburg, and from 1700-01 also Kapellmeister to the Schwerin court. As joint director of the Hamburg Theater-am-Gänsemarkt, 1702-7, he presented 17 of his own operas. Der Carneval von Venedig (1707), which included local dialect, was especially successful. He remained active in Hamburg until 1718. After a period as a guest Kapellmeister at Stuttgart he served intermittently at Copenhagen. He was back in Hamburg by 1723 and in 1728 became Kantor of the cathedral. The Singspiel Der hochmüthige, gestürtzte und wieder erhabene Croesus (1730), a version of a 1710 opera, was among his last stage works.

Keiser was the central and most original figure in German Baroque opera, and wrote over 80 stage works. Most have serious German texts, which cover a wide range of subjects and often include allegorical or comic elements. They are notable for their dramatic flavour and skilful characterisation. Italian and French musical elements appear (including Italian arias from 1703), with dramatic recitatives and ariosos, varied aria forms and inventive instrumentation. His several Passions, oratorios and cantatas show similar features. Among his other works are sacred music and trio sonatas. Handel drew heavily on his works in his own.

Croesus

Roman Trekel bar Croesus; Werner Güra ten Atis; Salomé Haller sop Clerida; Brigitte Eisenfeld sop Trigesta; Johannes Mannov bass Cyrus; Markus Schäfer ten Eliates; Dorothea Röschmann sop Elmira; Graham Pushee counterten Halimacus; Johanna Stojković sop Nerillus; Klaus Häger bass Orsanes; Kwangchul Youn bass Solon; Kurt Azesberger ten Elcius; Hanover Boys' Choir; Berlin RIAS Chamber Choir; Akademie für Alte Musik Berlin / René Jacobs

Harmonia Mundi ③ HMC90 1714/6 Ⓕ
(188 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1999 ●●●

Reinhard Keiser was principal opera composer at Hamburg's celebrated Theatre on the Goosemarket from 1697 to 1704 and from 1707 to 1718, returning intermittently, under Telemann's direction, between 1722 and 1735 when he retired after the death of his wife. During the first of these periods, a young man called Georg Friedrich Händel joined his theatre's orchestra and during his temporary absence composed three operas for the Goosemarket opera house, including Almira (1705) to a libretto set by Keiser.

Keiser's opera, given the catchy title Die Unbeständigkeit weltlicher Ehre und Reichthums der hochmüthige/gestürzte/und wieder erhabene Croesus ('The inconstancy of earthly glory and riches of the proud, deposed and rehabilitated Croesus') at its first performance in 1711, is called by the New Grove one of 'a handful of masterpieces' and René Jacobs concurs in his evangelising essay, 'Why Produce Croesus today?' printed in Harmonia Mundi's lavish booklet. The answer to Jacobs's question lies in the quality of the music, which will come as a delightful surprise to Baroque lovers.

The music itself is sheer bliss from first to last, and has a succession of variously characterised arias – the most exquisite are alloted to the heroine Elmira, ravishingly sung by Dorothea Röschmann, the most moving to the deposed Croesus (Roman Trekel) in his prison or facing his death in the flames of a sacrificial fire. The beauties of the work are manifold – the beginning of Act 2 is a pastoral scene in which peasants sing folksongs, and there is a delicious chorus for the peasant children extolling the joys of kissing lips as sweet as nuts. Suffice it so say that anyone who has enjoyed Handel's operas will be delighted by Keiser's.

The solo singing is uniformly first class, with eloquent performances from Trekel as Croesus, and from Werner Güra as his dumb son Atis, whose speech is restored by the shock of an assassination attempt on his father. Klaus Häger as Elmira's villainous, unwanted admirer is first-class, too. There are also vivid contributions from Graham Pushee, Salomé Haller and the performers of the two comic servants, Brigitte Eisenfeld and Kurt Azesberger. This is another outstanding Jacobs resurrection and a great Baroque operatic discovery too.

Albert Ketèlbey

British 1875-1959

GROVE Ketèlbey appeared as a solo pianist and conducted internationally. He was a popular composer of light orchestral pieces (In a Monastery Garden, 1915; In a Persian Market, 1920).

In a Persian Market

In a Persian Market[a]. In a Monastery Garden[a]
The Adventurers. Chal Romano Suite romantique. Caprice pianistique. The Clock and the Dresden Figures. Cockney Suite – No 3, At the Palais de Danse; No 5, Bank Holiday. In the Moonlight. Wedgwood Blue. Bells across the meadows. Phantom melody.
[a]Slovak Philharmonic Male Chorus; Bratislava Radio Symphony Orchestra / Adrian Leaper
Marco Polo 8 223442 Ⓕ
(74 minutes: DDD)
Recorded 1992 ●

What a splendid CD! The obvious favourites (In a Monastery Garden, In a Persian Market, Bells across the meadows) are played with a grace and sensitivity that never invites unfavourable comparison with earlier recordings of the same pieces. If others in the same somewhat maudlin vein (In the Mystic Land of Egypt, In a Chinese Temple Garden, Sanctuary of the Heart) are missing, it is to give us the opportunity to hear some of Ketèlbey's unjustly overshadowed compositions.

And what delights there are! Over-exposure to Ketèlbey's more stereotyped, highly perfumed compositions has disguised what varied and inventive music he composed. Once you acquaint yourself with the charms of The Clock and the Dresden Figures, In the Moonlight and the invigorating open-air spirit of Chal Romano, you will want to hear them again and again. With the playing, the conducting and the recording of a high standard, this is a collection that absolutely demands to be heard.

Aram Khachaturian

Russian/USSR 1903-1978

GROVE

Khachaturian, a bookbinder's son, at first studied medicine; he received his musical education comparatively late, studying the cello and composition under Myaskovsky at the Moscow Conservatory (1929-37).

He came to wider notice in 1936 with his Piano Concerto and his Violin Concerto (1940), and was active from 1937 in the Union of Soviet Composers. Most of his best-known works, including the ballet Gayane, date from the 1940s. In common with other Soviet composers, he was subject to official criticism in 1948; but his colourful, nationally tinged idiom was far removed from modernistic excess. He concentrated on film music in the ensuing years, and took up conducting and teaching (at the Gnesin Institute and the Conservatory).

His later works include 'concert rhapsodies' which re-interpret concerto form. His career represents the Soviet model of the linking of regional folklorism with the central Russian tradition; his Armenian heritage is clear in his melodies and his vitality, but in disciplined form. His greatest strengths lie in colourful orchestration and effective pictorialism.

Piano Concerto

Piano Concerto. Dance Suite. Five Pieces for Wind Band – Waltz; Polka
Dora Serviarian-Kuhn pf
Armenian Philharmonic Orchestra / Loris Tjeknavorian
ASV Platinum PLT8510 (59 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1995 ●

In the Piano Concerto Dora Serviarian-Kuhn and her Armenian compatriot, Loris Tjeknavorian, are in every way first-class: both identify naturally with the sinuous oriental flavour of the melodic lines and understand that the outer movements need above all to convey thrusting vitality; here there is plenty of drive and rhythmic lift. But what primarily makes this performance memorable is Serviarian-Kuhn's sense of fantasy, so that her various cadential passages, for all their brilliance, are charismatically quixotic rather than merely bravura displays.

The other works on the disc are small beer. The 'Waltz' for wind band has an engaging carousel flavour; the somewhat vulgar 'Polka' which follows roisterously suggests the circus. The Dance Suite goes through the usual Khachaturian routines with which he likes to clothe his agreeable but at times rather insubstantial Armenian folk ideas. Easily the most memorable movement is the first and much the longer of the two Uzbek dances, which opens gently and touchingly.

The performances here are excellent and they are vividly recorded.

Gayaneh – Suite No 2

Khachaturian The Widow of Valencia – Suite. Gayaneh – Suite No 2
Tjeknavorian Danses fantastiques
Armenian Philharmonic Orchestra / Loris Tjeknavorian Ⓕ
ASV CDDCA884 (65 minutes: DDD) ●

Khachaturian's The Widow of Valencia is an early work (1940), yet already reveals the composer's fund of good tunes. He admitted its lack of authentic Spanishness and while the 'Introduction' opens with flashing southern Mediterranean gusto, it soon makes way for a sultry Armenian melody of best local vintage. However, why worry? Altogether this is a most winning suite, without a dull bar, piquantly scored and brilliantly presented by an orchestra which is completely at home and clearly enjoying themselves.

They also give us another suite, comprising six indelible numbers – for the most part little known – from Khachaturian's masterpiece, Gayaneh. Tjeknavorian's own Danses fantastiques frequently burst with energy and the gentler dances have that Armenian flavour so familiar in Gayaneh. Brilliant playing in glittering yet spacious sound.

Spartacus – Ballet suites Nos 1-3

Royal Scottish National Orchestra / Neeme Järvi
Chandos CHAN8927 (63 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1990

Khachaturian's ballet, Spartacus, first produced in 1956, was a judicious and highly successful artistic response to the demands of Soviet populist realism. For its dramatic narrative of a Roman slave rebelling against his captors, eventually to be betrayed and killed, the composer created a score of striking vitality, at once full-blooded and crude, passionate and tuneful, and yet individual. The ballet's most famous number, the 'Adagio of Phrygia and Spartacus', is justly popular. Elsewhere there are many expressions of joyous extroversion and scenes of wild revelry, in which the music erupts with great energy, for example the 'Entrance of the Merchants' and the wild 'Dance of the Pirates', both in Suite No 2.

Järvi and his Scottish players respond exuberantly to the near vulgarity of the unbuttoned animation and revel in the lusher evocations. The resonant acoustics of the Henry Wood Hall, Glasgow, cast a rich ambient glow over Khachaturian's vivid primary colours. Recommended.

Oliver Knussen British 1952

GROVE Knussen studied in London and with Schuller at Tanglewood. His works display a fine ear for complex textural blendings; they include three symphonies (1967, 1971, 1979) and the operas Where the Wild Things Are (1983) and Higglety Pigglety Pop! (1985).

Horn Concerto

Flourish with Fireworks, Op 22. The Way to Castle Yonder, Op 21a. Two Organa, Op 27. Horn Concerto, Op 28. Music for a Puppet Court, Op 11. Whitman Settings, Op 25. '... upon one note', Fantazia after Purcell
Lucy Shelton sop Barry Tuckwell hn London Sinfonietta / Oliver Knussen
DG 449 572-2GH (45 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text included. Recorded 1995 ●

This is a sample of what Knussen has written since his two one-act operas Where the Wild Things are (1984) and Higglety Pigglety Pop! (1985), a period during which, he says, he has come to prefer being 'bewitched for a few minutes than hypnotised for an hour'. Bewitching these short pieces certainly are. The Flourish has lyrical substance as well as the appropriate 'occasional' brilliance. The Way to Castle Yonder is a very brief suite from Higglety Pigglety Pop!, but also a vivid orchestral tone-poem in its own right. The Organa are fine examples of his love of fantasy, ingenious pieces that use a 12th-century technique to modern ends with such audible logic and lucid instrumentation that you want to hear both again immediately. Something similar happens in Music for a Puppet Court, two solutions to puzzle-canons by the Tudor composer John Lloyd flanking further developments of the same material. The lengthiest works here are both in a sense dreams. '... upon one note' is a day-dream from which Knussen is awoken by Purcell. The Horn Concerto is a beautiful, allusive dream about all the worlds that the solo horn can evoke, from woodland poetry to dark menace. Knussen is a masterly orchestrator. This disc will give unalloyed pleasure.

Higglety Pigglety Pop!

Cynthia Buchan mez Jennie; Lisa Saffer sop Potted Plant; Baby; Mother Goose; Rosemary Hardy sop Rhoda; Voice of Baby's Mother; Christopher Gillett ten Cat-Milkman; High voice of Ash-tree David Wilson-Johnson bass-bar Pig-in-Sandwich Boards; Low voice of Ash-tree Stephen Richardson bass-bar Lion

Where the Wild Things Are
Lisa Saffer sop Max; Christopher Gillett ten Wild Thing with Beard; Goat Wild Thing; David Wilson-Johnson bass-bar Rooster Wild Thing; Stephen Richardson bass-bar Bull Wild Thing; Mary King mez Mama; Tzippy; Quentin Hayes bass Wild Thing with Horns
London Sinfonietta / Oliver Knussen
DG 20/21 ② 469 556-2GH2 (102 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes and texts included ●

The stories and drawings of Maurice Sendak upon which both these operas are based explore a vein of surreal dreaming and of the delight that children take in both fantasy and disorder, and all of these things appeal to something close to the centre of Oliver Knussen's creativity. An obvious model for both operas is Ravel's L'enfant et les sortilèges, and Knussen shares Ravel's pleasure in mechanisms that work immaculately well. He also has much of Ravel's mastery of orchestration, and one of the most enjoyable aspects of both scores is their kaleidoscopic sequence of brilliantly imagined and faultlessly executed instrumental textures.

Knussen's music reveals profundities and a childlike awe in Sendak that you might not have expected. The Ash-tree in Higglety Pigglety Pop!, for example, is at one level a straightforward comic character ('You are taller than I am', says the Sealyham terrier Jennie; 'Sixty feet taller, to be precise', replies the tree, primly), but Knussen's setting of its words for two singers, tenor and bass, and his evocative orchestra make of it a magic voice of nature as well. The Lion in the same opera is a relative of the amiable beast in The Wizard of Oz, but at the same time formidable. Knussen's Wild Things, roaring gibberish, are anarchically comic and their 'Wild Rumpus' hugely inventive fun, but they have also the musical equivalent of the pointed teeth and glaring yellow eyes that Sendak gave them; and something of pathos when the child Max leaves them on their island. In the best sense both of these operas are for children of all ages, or indeed for any listener who is inclined to respond to wonder, humour and meticulous intricacy.

Both recordings were made following staged performances, and have benefited from it: the singers, all first class, are audibly enjoying themselves, and the orchestra takes no less obvious pleasure in Knussen's magical sounds.

Additional recommendation

Songs without Voices, Op 26. Whitman Settings, Op 25. Hums and Songs of Winnie-the-Pooh, Op 6. Variations, Op 24. Four Late Poems and an Epigraph of Rainer Maria Rilke, Op 23. Sonya's Lullaby, Op 16. Océan de terre, Op 10

Shelton, Shaffer sops Serkin pf

Chamber Music Society of Lincoln Center / Knussen

EMI British Composers 575296-2 (DDD; recorded 1970-92) Ⓑ

An authoritative survey and perfect introduction to the work of Oliver Knussen at budget price.

Zoltán Kodály Hungarian 1882-1967

GROVE Kodály was brought up in the country, he knew folk music from childhood and also learnt to play the piano and string instruments, and to compose, all with little tuition. In 1900 he went to Budapest to study with Koessler at the Academy of Music, and in 1905 he began his collaboration with Bartók, collecting and transcribing folksongs. They also worked side by side as composers, and Kodály's visit in 1907 to Paris, bringing back Debussy's music, was important to them both: their first quartets were played in companion concerts in 1910, marking the emergence of 20th-century Hungarian music.

Kodály, however, preferred to accept rather than analyse folk material in his music, and his style is much less contrapuntal and smoother harmonically. His major works, notably the comic opera Háry János, the Psalmus hungaricus, the 'Peacock' Variations for orchestra and the Dances of Marosszék and Galánta draw on Magyar folk music (unlike Bartók, he confined himself to Hungarian material). His collecting activity also stimulated his work on musical education, convincing him of the value of choral singing as a way to musical literacy. He taught at the Budapest Academy from 1907, and after World War Two his ideas became the basis of state policy, backed in part by his own large output of choral music, much of it for children, as well as other exercise pieces, and was widely used as a model abroad.

Symphony in C

Symphony in C. Summer Evening. Magyar Rondo

Christopher Warren-Green vn Philharmonia Orchestra / Yondani Butt Ⓕ

ASV CDDCA924 (54 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1994

Kodály's only Symphony has an engagingly pastoral quality, with mild but memorable thematic material, lively – even somewhat overwrought – musical arguments and notably scenic orchestration. Yondani Butt presents a volatile view of the piece, with weighty textures and a fairly intense delivery, especially in the first movement's emphatic development section. The slow movement, an elegiac Andante based on folk-style motives, is appealingly atmospheric, while the fresh-faced finale generates plenty of rustic excitement. Summer Evening underlines the music's alternation of dance and reverie, whereas Butt's invigorating performance of the rarely heard but strangely more-ish Magyar Rondo (shades of Bartók's Romanian Folk Dances) has the Philharmonia playing like a generously augmented gipsy band, with stylish solo work from Christopher Warren-Green. Enthusiasm and sincerity are much in evidence throughout this well-recorded concert, while the odd spot of executive ruggedness is fairly appropriate to the music's outdoor character.

Dances from Galánta

Dances from Galánta[a]. Dances of Marosszék[a]. Háry János[a] – concert suite; The Flute-Playing Hussar; The Old Woman; The Jewish family; Háry riding Lucifer; The two gipsies. Dancing Song[b]. St Gregory's Day[c]. See the gipsies[b]

[b]Budapest Children's Choir Magnificat;

[c]Kecskemét Children's Choir Miraculum;

[a]Budapest Festival Orchestra / Iván Fischer

Philips 462 824-2PH (66 minutes: DDD). Texts and translations included. Recorded 1998 Ⓕ ●●

Iván Fischer and his Hungarian band join the most august company in this wonderful repertoire. As both sets of dances amply demonstrate, Fischer's Budapest Festival Orchestra is no less virtuosic than Ormandy's dazzling Philadelphians or Ferenc Fricsay's exemplary Berlin RSO, and its impassioned playing melds an earthy physicality, tangy exuberance and improvisatory flair to consistently telling effect. Add to the mix Fischer's wittily observant direction (an abundance of affectionate rubato in the opening section of the Marosszék Dances especially, allied to a generous quotient of 'gypsy' slides from the strings elsewhere), and the results are irresistible. Similarly, their Háry János Suite is immensely engaging. After a spectacularly good introductory 'sneeze', Fischer sees to it that Kodály's great arcs of melody are truly espressivo cantabile as marked. Napoleon's battlefield antics are hilariously depicted (splendidly bolshy trombones), while Fischer's thrusting 'Intermezzo' has joyous swagger. Moreover, for all the giddy festivities of the brassy 'Entrance of the Emperor and his Court', Fischer still manages to extract plenty of ear-burning detail. Five miniatures from the original Singspiel are also included, programmed separately from the suite; in 'The two gypsies' Fischer shares fiddling duties with Gábor Takács-Nagy. Last but not least we get three choral offerings from 1925-9, which are delivered with captivating freshness and charm by the two admirable children's choirs here.

A peach of an issue, complemented by an irrepressibly vivid recording.

Cello Sonatas

Solo Cello Sonata, Op 8. Cello Sonata, Op 4. Three Chorale Preludes (after Bach)
Maria Kliegel vc Jenö Jandó pf
Naxos 8 553160 (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1994-95 ●

Maria Kliegel rises to the challenge of Kodály's Solo Sonata with considerable gusto: harmonics, glissandos, sul ponticello, fiery arpeggios – all are expertly employed and delivered via a nicely rounded tone. Kliegel's lustrous account of the Adagio underlines harmonic similarities with late Liszt and the folky, one-man-band finale has ample panache. The appreciative booklet-note relates Bartók's enthusiasm for the Solo Sonata's 'unusual and original style…[and] surprising vocal effects'. In fact, no other work by Kodály is so profoundly Bartókian in spirit. The Sonata, Op 4, is a far milder piece, though forthright expressive declamation sits at the centre of the first movement and the second is infused with the spirit of folk music. Kliegel and Jenö Jandó are in musical accord, and the recording is very good – although if you listen to the 'Bach-Kodály' tracks and wait for the Solo Sonata to start, you'll note a huge expansion in the cello's recorded profile. The three Chorale Preludes that open the programme are 'attributed Bach' and enjoy the rich trimmings of a thunderous piano part (Busoni-cum-Liszt, with a snatch of Bartók for good measure) and a warm flood of tone from Kliegel. All in all, then, a fine bargain, and a well-planned coupling.

Solo Cello Sonata, Op 8. Cello Sonata, Op 4[a]. Adagio[a]. Sonatina[a]
Sung-Won Yang vc [a]Ick-Choo Moon pf
EMI Debut 575685-2 (67 minutes: DDD) Ⓑ
Recorded 2002 ●●

These two Korean artists are clearly seasoned performers, approaching their interpretive task with the sort of confidence and certainty that only comes from considerable experience.

Sung-Won Yang, who studied in Paris and in the US, produces a notably rich, expressive tone, ideal for the Solo Sonata's extensive explorations of the lower register – the opening of the Adagio sounds magnificently dark and resonant. It's obvious that he and Ick-Choo Moon feel a strong affinity with Kodály, and perform his long, arching melodies with a fine sense of line and of rising and falling tension. And they have no trouble in finding just the right Hungarian idiom, whether for the florid rhetorical outbursts that open the Solo Sonata and (on the piano) the Sonatina, or for the dance styles that predominate in the finales of both sonatas.

The whole programme is indeed very finely and sympathetically played, but the major achievement has to be the Solo Sonata. It takes a player of Sung-Won Yang's technical brilliance and expressive boldness to make one feel the work's full grandeur. 'One of the greatest masterpieces', asserts Yang. As you listen, you're inclined to agree.

Laudes organi and Missa brevis

Kodály Laudes organi. Missa brevis
Janáček (ed Wingfield) Mass in E flat
Andrew Reid org
Westminster Cathedral Choir / James O'Donnell
Hyperion CDA67147 (73 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1999 ●●

Janáček began his Mass around 1908, left it to gather dust for 20 years, then turned it into the first draft of the Glagolitic Mass. Paul Wingfield's reconstruction draws substantially on the original draft of the Glagolitic Mass to the extent of including a complete movement (the Sanctus) from it. Clearly Janáček knew best, and the only distinguishing moments are those bits recognisably from the Glagolitic Mass. Unquestionably, though, both the Missa brevis and Laudes organi are among Kodály's most inspired creations. Yet new recordings of favourite works are prone to disappoint. Not this one. If anything, this stunning performance, crowned by Andrew Reid's masterly organ playing, raises this setting of dog-Latin verses in praise of the organ and commissioned by the American Guild of Organists even higher. About 20 years before Laudes organi, the Missa brevis was first performed in this version for organ and chorus (it was originally an organ solo) in a bomb shelter during the 1944-45 Siege of Budapest. From such an inauspicious start, the work has fared remarkably well on record and this release represents an undoubted climax. It's a simply glorious performance and, in short, should not be missed.

Charles Koechlin

French 1867-1950

GROVE Koechlin studied with Massenet, Gédalge and Fauré at the Paris Conservatoire from 1890 and was associated with such contemporaries as Ravel, Schmitt and Debussy (whose Khamma he largely orchestrated in 1913). As a public figure he soon became noted more for his writings on music and for his teaching (Milhaud and Poulenc were pupils) than for his composing, which at all periods was prolific. His output is enormous: there are over 200 works with opus numbers, many of them big symphonic, choral or chamber pieces. His symphonic poem Les bandar-log (1939), one of seven works based on the Jungle Book stories, shows his knowledgeable and sometimes satirical view of a wide range of contemporary musical languages, as does his Seven Stars' Symphony (1933), a portrait gallery of the contemporary cinema. Other works include symphonic poems, choral works, songs and instrumental sonatas, as well as numerous small pieces for diverse combinations. Some reflect his communist sympathies, some are polytonal, some influenced by his love of Bach. His uncompromising and unworldly nature contributed to his unjust neglect.

La course de printemps

La course de printemps, Op 95[a].
Le buisson ardent, Opp 171 and 203[b]
Stuttgart Radio Symphony Orch / Heinz Holliger
Hänssler Classic Faszination Musik 93 045 Ⓕ
(73 minutes: DDD). Recorded live in [a]2000, [b]2001 ●●

The influence of Rudyard Kipling's Jungle Book on Koechlin was profound and La course de printemps, which gestated over a very long period, was the finest of the tone poems he gathered together under the composite title Le livre de la jungle. Although the events depicted are certainly connected with the character and life of Mowgli, the music itself is above all evocative of the jungle itself, its exotically humid atmosphere and unpredictable bursts of violence and animal energy. The underlying sinister ambience is balanced by a Ravelian sensuality (there is even is a hint of Daphnis in the dawn evocation of the opening), while the mysteriously gentle but lustrous string monody which closes the work is other-worldly in its vision of a voluptuous moonlit spring night. Koechlin's scoring is headily brilliant and one is engulfed in its rich panoply, so that for all the music's ecclecticism, it has a life and individuality of its own.

Le buisson ardent makes an ideal coupling. An evocation of rebirth – at times passionately intense in the strings, but with the ondes martenot later used to represent the ethereal voice of the reborn spirit. The work climaxes with a lusciously positive affirmation, but closes gently and rapturously. Heinz Holliger, justly famous as oboist, shows himself equally sensitive with the baton, inspiring a splendid orchestral response from the Stuttgart players (especially the strings). They in turn are served by a first-class recording. A superb introduction to Koechlin's exotic sound-world.

Erich Wolfgang Korngold

Austro/Hungarian 1897-1957

GROVE Korngold, an American composer of Austro-Hungarian origin, was the son of the music critic Julius Korngold (1860-1945). He studied with Zemlinsky and had spectacular early successes with his ballet Der Schneemann (1910, Vienna) and operas Violanta (1916) and Die tote Stadt (1920). In 1934 he went to Hollywood and wrote some fine film scores. After World War II he wrote orchestral and chamber pieces, including a Violin Concerto and Symphony in F sharp, in a lush, Romantic style.

Violin Concerto

Korngold Violin Concerto[a]. H
Rózsa Violin Concerto, Op 24[b]. Tema con variazioni, Op 29a[b]. Waxman Fantasy on Bizet's 'Carmen'[c].
Jascha Heifetz vn Gregor Piatigorsky vc
[b]Chamber Orchestra; [a]Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra / Alfred Wallenstein; [b]Dallas Symphony Orchestra / Walter Hendl; [c]RCA Victor Symphony Orchestra / Donald Voorhees
RCA Victor Gold Seal [ac]mono/[b]stereo
09026 61752-2 (70 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1946-63 ●

Heifetz's legendary recording of the Korngold Concerto serves a double purpose: as an effective introduction to Korngold's seductive musical style, and as the best possible example of Heifetz's violin artistry. The work itself was written at the suggestion of Bronislaw Huberman, but it was Heifetz who gave the première in 1947. It calls on material that Korngold had also used in three of his film scores, although the way he welds the themes into a three-movement structure is masterly enough to suggest that the concerto came to him 'of a piece'. The very opening would be enough to seduce most listeners. Miklós Rózsa's Concerto has its roots in the composer's Hungarian soil, and echoes of Bartók are rarely absent. But whereas Korngold's score is taken from movie music, Rózsa's (or parts of it) became a film score – namely, The Private Life of Sherlock Holmes. Rózsa's self-possessed, skilfully written Tema con variazoni was taken, in 1962, from a much larger work then in progress, but Heifetz and Piatigorsky play it in a reduced orchestration. As to the Carmen Fantasy by Franz Waxman (another notable film composer), its luscious tunes and frightening technical challenges were written with the great violinist very much in mind. It's a stunning piece of playing, and wears its years lightly. The other recordings sound far better; and the Rózsa items are in stereo. Marvellous stuff!

Additional recommendation
Couplings: Much Ado about Nothing, Op 11 – Maiden in the Bridal Chamber; Dogberry and Verges; Intermezzo; Hornpipe
Barber Violin Concerto, Op 14
Shaham vn LSO / Previn pf
DG 439 886-2GH (71 minutes: DDD: 9/94). Ⓕ

Shaham is yearningly warm without being sentimental, and clean and precise in attack. The suite from Much Ado About Nothing provides a delightful makeweight.

Film Music

The Sea Hawk (excerpts). The Prince and the Pauper (excs). The Private Lives of Elizabeth and Essex (excs). Captain Blood (excs). (Scores reconstructed and assembled by Patrick Russ)
London Symphony Orchestra / André Previn Ⓕ
DG 471 347-2GH (68 minutes: DDD) ●

Erich Korngold was the pioneer composer of the Hollywood film score during the 1930s and '40s. Errol Flynn starred in the films whose scores are featured on this CD, playing assorted dashing heroes swashbuckling their way through four slices of English history.

The line-up assembled here could not be bettered. Previn knows just how this music should go while the LSO bring the prerequisite pizzazz and élan that the music needs to take wing. The dexterity with which they negotiate the heavily scored cue 'Duel Continued' from The Sea Hawk (track 8) would prompt anyone to give a spontaneous round of applause.

The brilliant panoply of brass and strings that opens The Sea Hawk at once denotes these as 'action' films, but Previn's way with the music is not to let the mood be dictated by the 'separate card' by which each moment in the credits was given a specific number of seconds on the screen. So the broad string theme of The Sea Hawk unfolds with a symphonic breadth akin to that majestic opening of Vaughan Williams's A Sea Symphony. In The Prince and the Pauper the LSO respond in true Romantic style to Korngold's luxuriant expansion of his material, and it comes across in this most affectionate performance as Korngold's finest cinematic achievement. A marvellous recording sets the seal on a definitive account of this splendid music.

Symphony in F sharp

Symphony in F sharp, Op 40. Einfache Lieder, Op 9 – No 1, Schneeglöckchen; No 3, Ständchen; No 4, Liebesbriefchen; No 6, Sommer. Die tote Stadt – Glück, das mir verblieb
Barbara Hendricks sop Philadelphia Orchestra / Franz Welser-Möst
EMI 556169-2 (63 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995

Franz Welser-Möst's view of Korngold's magnificent Symphony is less expansive than other interpretations, especially in the weighty Adagio slow movement, but he is no less impressive for that. His account is curvaceous and 'filmic', but one has less of an image of Errol Flynn sailing the high seas when that wonderful horn theme appears in the Scherzo. The sombre Adagio is superbly controlled and beautifully crafted. Elsewhere, he generates a huge degree of rhythmic incisiveness from his players – the fleet-footed Scherzo for instance, or the daring-do finale. Although not wearing its heart on its sleeve, Welser-Möst's reading is not lacking in passion. Barbara Hendricks's ravishing accounts of four of the six Einfache Lieder and the famous Marietta's Lied from Die tote Stadt make an excellent foil to the symphony.

Sursum corda

Sursum corda, Op 13. Die kleine Serenade ('Baby Serenade'), Op 24. Der Schneemann – Prelude; Serenade. Die tote Stadt – Prelude to Act II[a]. Das Wunder der Heliane – Interlude
[a]Karen Robertson sop [a]Tibor Pazmany org Linz Bruckner Orchestra / Caspar Richter
ASV CDDCA1074 (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1999

This disc is an absolute must for newcomers to Korngold. Richter presents a beautifully rounded and balanced programme, headed by a virtuosic, highly charged account of the Prelude to Act 2 from the opera Die tote Stadt, with a finely sung, if brief contribution from soprano Karen Robertson. Although there's no film music by Korngold on this disc, the symphonic overture Sursum corda, with its uplifting, heroic themes, did eventually provide material for the film score to The Adventures of Robin Hood some 18 years later. Richter and his players deliver a wonderfully impassioned and incident-packed performance. The Baby Serenade was composed shortly after the birth of Korngold's second son Georg, and is a delightful five-movement suite describing a day in the life of his baby son. Korngold's perceptive and often humorous sketches are brilliantly matched in a performance that simply exudes affection and fun – check out the wonderfully characterised performances in the jazzy 'Baby tells a story', track 6. The disc is nicely rounded off with the orchestral Interlude from Das Wunder der Heliane – more voluptuous playing in what must be some of Korngold's most voluptuous music. Excellent sound: a disc not to be missed.

Suite, Op 23

Suite, Op 23. Piano Quintet in E, Op 15
Claire McFarlane, Jan Peter Schmolck vns Schubert Ensemble of London (Simon Blendis vn Douglas Paterson va Jane Salmon vc William Howard pf)
ASV CDDCA1047 (69 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997
Piano Quintet also available on ASV Platinum PLT8511 (coupled with Schauspiel Overture, Tomorrow and String Quartet No 2) Ⓜ

This supremely stylish interpretation of Korngold's Op 23 Suite (1930) has a very great deal to commend it, occupying a satisfying middle ground between the Czech Trio's endearingly homely view and the far more grandly virtuosic approach espoused by Sony's starry team. Not for the first time on disc, William Howard's decidedly superior brand of pianism is a very real boon, and the whole performance radiates an affection and gentle purposefulness that are genuinely appealing. Anyway, Korngoldians will surely want to acquire this ASV coupling for the marvellous Piano Quintet, which here receives a reading that marries refreshing spontaneity to notable architectural elegance. Dating from 1921 and composed just after Die tote Stadt, it's an exuberantly confident offering cast in three movements. These artists audibly revel in Korngold's taxing, yet sumptuously rewarding writing, and the recording is handsome and true.

Piano Trio in D, Op 1. Suite, Op 23
Jana Vlachová vn
Czech Piano Trio (Dana Vlachová vn Jan Páleníček vc Milan Langer pf)
Supraphon SU3347-2 (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997

Supraphon's well-recorded version of the Suite is remarkably fast. Where this Czech team scores over recorded rivals is in the 'Lied', which Korngold asks to be played Nicht zu langsam. Their timing is a nifty 3'09". The coupling is Korngold's outrageously precocious – and utterly unmissable – Op 1 Piano Trio. No other musical 12-year-old could have penned such a memorable – and meaningful – opening theme (a premonition of Korngold's film scores), not to mention the Scherzo's Trio and the brief Larghetto third movement. Astonishing! It is no surprise that, following the Trio's New York première, W J Henderson wrote (in the New York Sun), 'if we had a little boy of 12 who preferred writing this sort of music to hearing a good folk tune or going and out and playing in the park, we should consult a specialist.' Fortunate for us, folk tunes and football took second place to chronicling some quite marvellous musical ideas.

Violin Sonata

Violin Sonata in D, Op 6. Sonett für Wien, Op 41. Much Ado About Nothing – Dogberry and Verges; Intermezzo; Hornpipe; Bridal Morning. Das Wunder der Heliane – Gesang der Heliane. Der Schneemann – Serenade. Die tote Stadt – Glück, das mir verblieb; Mein Sehnen, mein Wähnen (all arr cpsr). Märchenbilder, Op 3 – The Gnomes (arr Révay)
Detlef Hahn vn Andrew Ball pf
ASV CDDCA1080 (70 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 2000 ●●

This is an indispensable disc gathering together the complete works for violin and piano – all superbly performed – including no fewer than three world-première recordings.

The disc opens with the remarkably early, but emotionally mature, Violin Sonata in D – a ravishing work that ranks among Korngold's major compositions. The Sonata is lyrical and expansive and has all the characteristics of Korngold's melodic and harmonic idiom – there's certainly nothing apprentice about this piece. Hahn and Ball give a beautifully crafted performance indeed and have truly absorbed the essence of this masterly score.

Korngold's suite of incidental music for Much Ado About Nothing has enjoyed a certain amount of currency in its original orchestral version, but less so in Korngold's own arrangement for violin and piano heard here. The transition works marvellously, being ideally suited to the intimacy of chamber music. The second movement, 'Dogberry and Verges', a grotesque march depicting the two drunken night-watchmen, pays passing homage to Korngold's childhood idol Gustav Mahler, and elsewhere in the suite there are constant intimations of the film scores of later years.

The remainder of the disc is devoted to smaller arrangements of works, including two extracts from the opera Die tote Stadt and one from Das Wunder der Heliane as well as the gorgeous song setting Sonett für Wien (In Memoriam), Op 41, the theme of which Korngold also used in the 1946 film Escape Me Never. The sound recording is excellent.

Vocal Works

Abschiedslieder, Op 14[a]. Tomorrow, Op 33[ac]. Einfache Lieder, Op 9[a]. Much Ado About Nothing, Op 11 – Overture; Maiden in the Bridal Chamber; Dogberry and Verges; Intermezzo; Hornpipe; Garden Music. Prayer, Op 32[bc]
[a]Gigi Mitchell-Velasco mez [b]Stephen Gould ten [a]Jochem Hochstenbach pf [c]Ladies of the Mozart Choir, Linz; Bruckner Orchestra, Linz / Caspar Richter
ASV CDDCA1131 (66 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded c2002 ●

Caspar Richter and his fresh-faced band give a polished and affectionate performance of the delightful suite Korngold drew from his 1918 incidental score to a Vienna Burgtheater production of Much Ado about Nothing. They include the fragrant (and previously unrecorded) 'Garden Music' that opens Act 3, the haunting main theme of which Korngold subsequently incorporated into the third movement of his violin and piano arrangement (beloved of such legendary fiddlers as Heifetz, Kreisler, Elman and Seidel).

Other rarities include the first recording of the Op 32 Prayer for tenor, female choir and organ, as well as a long-overdue digital successor to Charles Gerhardt's pioneering RCA performance of Tomorrow, a six-minute work for mezzo-soprano, female choir and orchestra which was originally written for the 1943 film The Constant Nymph.

Another first recording comes in the shape of the orchestral version of 'Nachtwanderer' from the six Einfache Lieder. Korngold orchestrated these songs in 1917, and in this guise most of the rest of the set has been recorded by Barbara Hendricks on EMI. Six years later, in 1923, Korngold orchestrated his masterly Abschiedslieder of 1920, whose demandingly wide-ranging melodic lines occasionally strain the otherwise appealing mezzo here, Gigi Mitchell-Velasco. That apart, these consistently communicative performances – captured in decent, truthfully balanced sound – arouse nothing but praise. A must for all Korngold fans.

Die Kathrin

Melanie Diener sop Kathrin; David Rendall ten François; Robert Hayward bass-bar Malignac; Lilian Watson sop Chou-Chou; Della Jones mez Monique
BBC Singers; BBC Concert Orchestra / Martyn Brabbins
CPO ③ CPO999 602-2 (162 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, text and translation included
Recorded 1997 ●

This is the first modern performance and recording of Korngold's last stage work. Die Kathrin is separated by 10 years from its predecessor, Das Wunder der Heliane. Between Heliane and Die Kathrin, Korngold's career had changed. From being the wunderkind of the 1910s, he had developed into the film composer and arranger of large-scale operettas. If Heliane is the most grandiose of his operas, Die Kathrin is the most unpretentious; Korngold had thought of labelling it a folk-opera. The story is simple. The hero, François, is a singer who has been conscripted into the army. He falls in love with Kathrin, leaving her pregnant. She loses her job, follows him to Marseilles, where in a vaguely Tosca-like plot-twist François is implicated in the murder of the villain, who has actually been shot by one of the cabaret girls. Five years pass, François returns to find Kathrin and his child. The opera ends with a rapturous love duet. The music is full of typically lush Korngold scoring. In the night-club scene, obligatory in any 1930s opera, there are two catchy numbers, and Korngold brings in such fashionably jazzy instruments as a trio of saxophones and a banjo. The cast is exceptionally strong. Diener has just the right weight of voice for Kathrin, and Rendall makes François into a very positive hero. Brabbins brings out the essentially Puccinian side of the score; in its structure the opera resembles La rondine more than a little: verismo didn't die with Turandot. Devotees of Korngold's music won't need any encouragement. Those with a taste for tuneful, Romantic opera, sometimes bordering on operetta, should give it a chance.

Fritz Kreisler

Austrian 1875-1962

GROVE After study at the Vienna Conservatory and the Paris Conservatoire Kreisler toured the USA (1888-89). Real recognition came in 1899, after a concert with the Berlin PO under Nikisch. His London début was in 1902 and in 1910 he gave the première of Elgar's Concerto. He lived in Berlin, 1924-34, and in 1939 settled in the USA, becoming an American citizen in 1943. His last concert was in 1947. Kreisler played with grace, elegance and a sweet, golden tone with a pronounced vibrato. His repertory included brief pieces of his own, some of them semi-pastiche pieces which he initially ascribed to composers such as Tartini and Pugnani, some of them sugary Viennese morsels, all beautifully written to display brilliant, subtle and expressive violin playing.

Compositions and Arrangements

Original Compositions and Arrangements – works by Kreisler and arrangements of works by Bach, Brandl, Dvořák, Falla, Glazunov, Heuberger, Poldini, Rimsky-Korsakov, Schubert, Scott, Tchaikovsky and Weber Ⓗ
Fritz Kreisler vn with various artists
EMI Références mono 764701-2 Ⓜ
(78 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1930-38 ●●

Kreisler Praeludium and Allegro in the style of Pugnani. Schön Rosmarin. Tambourin chinois, Op 3. Caprice viennois, Op 2. Précieuse in the style of Couperin. Liebesfreud. Liebesleid. La Gitana. Berceuse romantique, Op 9. Polichinelle. Rondino on a theme by Beethoven. Tempo di Menuetto in the style of Pugnani. Toy Soldier's March. Allegretto in the style of Boccherini. Marche miniature viennoise. Aucassin and Nicolette, 'Canzonetta medievale'. Menuet in the style of Porpora. Siciliano and Rigaudon in the style of Francoeur. Syncopation
Joshua Bell vn Paul Coker pf
Decca 444 409-2DH (63 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995

Years of 'encore' employment have guaranteed the cult longevity of Kreisler's music – certainly among violinists. The repertoire on Kreisler's disc consists of his own pieces and a large number of arrangements. Some of the latter are pretty feeble musically, yet the great violinist's unique artistry and magical tone-quality shine through. Sometimes he does not land right in the middle of a note, but always plays with the timing and phrasing of a great singer. Nothing is routine or set in his playing, which has a continual feeling of discovery and freshness. The transfers are excellent. Joshua Bell learned Kreisler from his teacher, the late Josef Gingold, and yet his approach is anything but 'old school'. He habitually avoids the pitfalls of imitation, flashiness and patronising overkill, preferring instead to revisit the music with modern ears. His Caprice viennois is light years removed from the composer's own, a fresh-faced, strongly characterised reading that trades sentimentality for just a hint of jazz. And of course there's that inseparable twosome, Liebesfreud and Liebesleid, the latter in particular displaying Bell's tone at its most alluring. The longest piece on the disc is the Praeludium and Allegro in the style of Pugnani which Bell gives 'the full treatment', deftly pointing the Allegro, relishing passagework and double-stopping with impressive accuracy. Some pieces seem indivisible from Kreisler's own very individual tone and phrasing, Polichinelle, for example, and Marche miniature viennoise, both of which paraded the sort of personalised rubato, timing and tone-production that have for so long seemed part of the music's very essence.

Bell's smooth, witty and keenly inflected readings make for elevated entertainment: they may not replace the composer's own, but they do provide a youthful and in many ways illuminating alternative. The recordings are excellent, but Coker's fine accompaniments occasionally seem overprominent.

Viennese Rhapsody

Albéniz/Kreisler Tango, Op 165 No 2
Dvořák/Kreisler Slavonic Dances – B78: No 2 in E minor; B145: No 2 in E minor Falla/Kreisler La vida breve – Danse espagnole Granados/Kreisler Andaluza, Op 37 No 5 Kreisler Caprice viennois, Op 2. Tambourin chinois, Op 3. Berceuse romantique, Op 9. Viennese Rhapsodic Fantasietta. Zigeuner-capriccio. La gitana. Polichinelle. Aucassin and Nicolette. Liebesleid. Liebesfreud. Slavonic Fantasie Scott/Kreisler Lotus Land, Op 47 No 1 Wieniawski/Kreisler Etude-Caprice in A minor, Op 18 No 4
Leonidas Kavakos vn Péter Nagy pf
BIS CD1196 (71 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 2000 ●●

Leonidas Kavakos's Kreisler is authentic in the best meaning of that term, namely a keen approximation both of the music's spirit and of the composer's inimitable playing style. Few Kreisler recitals have recalled, in so much minute detail, the warmth, elegance and gentlemanly musical manners of the master himself. It was an inspired idea to open the programme with that nostalgic evocation of Old Vienna, the eight-minute Viennese Rhapsodic Fantasietta, a Korngold sound-alike that cannot waltz without smiling wistfully or even shedding the odd tear. Kavakos has mastered that lilting 3/4 to a T. His tone is uncannily familiar – cooler and less vibrant perhaps than Kreisler's own during the earlier part of his recording career but with a similarly consistent (though never overbearing) vibrato. But don't imagine that these performances are mere imitations: an individual personality does come through, it's just that a Kreislerian accent has become part of the mix – at least for the purposes of this recital.

The programme has been very well chosen, ending with what are surely Kreisler's three most famous miniatures – Liebesleid, Liebesfreud and Caprice viennois. The Slavonic Fantasie after Dvořák is among the most interesting, incorporating as it does the first of the four Romantic Pieces. Cyril Scott's Lotus Land is haunting and exotic, while Kreisler's own Zigeuner-capriccio provides a fine example of Kavakos's slightly melancholy puckishness. Péter Nagy's stylish accompaniments add yet more flavour to the menu. All in all a super programme, beautifully recorded.

Johann Kuhnau German 1660-1722

GROVE German composer and theorist Kuhnau studied in Dresden and Zittau, where he briefly served as Kantor and organist, and then at Leipzig, where in 1684 he became organist at the Thomaskirche and, in 1701, Kantor. His secular vocal music is all lost, but many sacred works survive, mostly cantatas, anticipating the style of Bach, his successor: they show lyrical vocal writing, powerful fugues and dramatic contrasts of texure which stress the rhetorical sense. He published four sets of keyboard pieces, including two sets called Clavier-Übung (each with seven suites, one set in the major keys and one in the minor) and, his best-known work, the Biblical Sonatas, which describe in music, sometimes naively but with enterprising use of the harpsichord's resources, the emotional states aroused by particular stories from the Bible.

Tristis est anima

Ihr Himmel jubilirt von oben. Weicht ihr Sorgen aus dem Hertzen. Gott, sei mir gnädig nach deiner Güte. Wie schön leuchtet der Morgenstern. Tristis est anima mea. O heilige Zeit
Deborah York sop Gary Cooper org The King's Consort Choir; The King's Consort / Robert King
Hyperion CDA67059 (75 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1998

Johann Kuhnau was Cantor at St Thomas's, Leipzig until his death, crossing paths with Bach and inspiring the younger man to borrow the title Clavier-Übung for the prime repository for Bach's published keyboard works. This splendid and varied cross-section of his choral music leaves us in no doubt that Kuhnau is far more than merely a confident practitioner who followed the plot of changing fashion. Through a keen sense of assimilation comes a singular, mainly sober, yet highly accomplished church composer. Gott, sei mir gnädig is a fine, evocative work full of rhetorical detail and inference, whilst in Wie schön leuchtet der Morgenstern the declamation straddles the concentrated world of the Bach motet, Komm, Jesu, komm, yet punctuated by the secular ostentation and chuckling horns of another world.

Robert King and his consort of singers and players highlight the multi-layered references in Kuhnau's cantatas, from the graceful Bach-aria lilt of Weicht ihr Sorgen, with the sympathetic colouring, if questionable diction, of Deborah York offset by an affectionate and responsive band of strings and unison oboes, to the decidedly pietist world of the accompagnato recitative in Wie schön leuchtet.

The beguiling and antiquated Tristis est anima mea is worth its weight in gold. Vocally colourful (all the soloists are on fine form, especially Robin Blaze and Peter Harvey) and instrumentally outstanding, this is an important recording of a woefully neglected figure whose music has real stature.

György Kurtág Romanian 1926

GROVE Kurtág studied with Veress and Farkas at the Budapest Academy (1946-55) and with Milhaud and Messiaen in Paris (1957); in 1967 he began teaching at the Budapest Academy. His works are few and mostly short, suggesting a combination of the most abstract Bartók and late Webern, though with a strong lyrical, expressive force (and sometimes ingenious wit). Most of his compositions are for chamber forces, sometimes with solo voice. Among the best known are The Sayings of Péter Bornemisza (1968), a 'concerto' for soprano and piano in 24 short movements, and Messages of the Late RV Troussova (1980) for soprano and orchestra. Some of his pieces (eg 15 songs, 1982) use the cimbalom.

String Quartets

Aus der Ferne III. Officium breve, Op 28. Ligatura, Op 31*b*. String Quartet, Op 1. Hommage à Mihály András (12 Microludes), Op 13
Keller Quartet (András Keller, János Pilz vns Zoltán Gál va Ottó Kertész vc) Miklós Perényi vc
György Kurtág celesta
ECM New Series 453 258-2 (49 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995

This disc, devoted exclusively to Kurtág's music for string quartet, is of great significance, and both performance and recording are equal to the enterprise. The Keller Quartet have secure technique as well as emotional commitment, while ECM has provided a warm yet spacious acoustic for this expressive music. The journey begins with Kurtág's Op 1 of 1959, in a world, dominated by expressionistic fragmentation, of which he is clearly the master. Eighteen years later, in the Op 13 Microludes, Kurtág has perfected his own personal style, in which small, separate forms are linked together, and the music's allusions – to Bartók and Webern, in particular – are subsumed into a lyrical, dramatic discourse. The fruits of Kurtág's long apprenticeship are most evident here in the superb Officium breve of 1988-89, a miracle of textural imagination and musical thought whose richly varied language is distilled further into the two miniatures – Ligatura (also 1989) and Aus der Ferne (1991). By now Kurtág's music is characterised by a concentrated homogeneity, and by a harmony whose tensions, and stability, are the result of bringing convergence and divergence into confrontation. The result is memorable, and these fine recordings provide immensely rewarding listening.

Játékok

Játékok – excerpts from Books 1-5 and 8.
Transcriptions from Machaut to Bach – No 46, Gottes Zeit ist die allerbeste Zeit (Bach: BWV106); No 48, Aus tiefer Not (Bach: BWV687); No 50, Trio Sonata in E flat (Bach: BWV525/1); No 52, O Lamm Gottes unschuldig (Bach: BWV*deest*)
György Kurtág, Márta Kurtág pf duet
ECM New Series 453 511-2 (50 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996

If any contemporary composer can persuade the musical world that compositions of between 30 seconds and four minutes in length are the natural vehicle for progressive post-tonal music, that composer is Kurtág. This sequence of compositions, the longest of which lasts just over five minutes, offers a very special experience. The disc contains a selection from Kurtág's ongoing sequence of 'games' (Játékok) for solo piano and piano duet. They are a mixture of studies and tributes, not explicitly pedagogic in Mikrokosmos mode, but ranging widely in technical demands and style, from fugitive fragments, in which even the smallest element tells, to the extraordinary flamboyance of a Perpetuum mobile containing nothing but glissandos. Most are sombre in tone, and even the more humorous items have a bitter side to them. For access to another musical world, Kurtág has included four of his Bach transcriptions, music whose serenity and confidence speaks immediately of utter remoteness from the real present. Yet there is no nostalgia: Bach was then, and Kurtág is now.

The performances risk overprojection but they are supremely characterful, and the close-up recording reinforces the impression of music that is mesmerically persuasive in its imagination and expressiveness.

Edouard Lalo French 1823-1892

GROVE Lalo studied at the Lille Conservatory and in Habeneck's class at the Paris Conservatoire. As a violinist and teacher in Paris in the 1850s he showed an unfashionable inclination towards chamber music, playing Classical string quartets and composing string trios and a noteworthy quartet. During the 1870s he attracted attention for his instrumental works, especially for the Symphonie espagnole (1874), a five-movement violin concerto, and the powerful Cello Concerto (1877). After disappointment at the poor reception of his opera Fiesque (1866-67), he took up stage music again in 1875, winning success with Le roi d'Ys (1888), on which his operatic fame has rested; his ballet score Namouna (1881-82) became popular as a series of orchestral suites. Among the hallmarks of Lalo's music, the vigour of which stands in contrast to the style of Franck's pupils and the impressionists, are his strongly diatonic melody, piquant harmony and ingenious orchestration.

Cello Concerto

Lalo Cello Concerto in D minor[a]
Saint-Saëns Cello Concerto in A minor, Op 33[b]
Schumann Cello Concerto in A minor, Op 129[a]

János Starker vc London Symphony Orchestra /
[a]Stanislaw Skrowaczewski, [b]Antál Dorati
Mercury 432 010-2MM (65 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1962-64 ●●

Starker's playing is exemplified by a highly individual blend of intensity and specialised musical intelligence which has been misconstrued as cool detachment rather than interpretative integrity. His formidable intellectual, as well as technical assimilation of the Schumann Cello Concerto, presents it with rare ipso facto cogency. Starker's reading has an elemental pulse and fearless zeal; despite his dubious insertion of a cadenza, this remains a truly valiant performance. Lalo's Cello Concerto receives a similarly massive reading, and few recorded accounts can approach Starker's emphatic gravity in the opening Allegro maestoso, but the prelude, marked Lento, is simply over-dramatised. There are some fine woodwind contributions, too, in the central Intermezzo, and Starker moderates his vibrato to great effect in the dream-like Andantino sections, while his quicksilver brilliance in the finale could not offer greater contrast. Starker's reading of Saint-Saëns's First Concerto dates from 1964, and is in many ways exemplary in its studied clarity. The gripping urgency of the opening is well sustained, with only marginal repose found in the lyrical secondary theme, whilst the soloist's effortless facility in the difficult double-stopped passage later is also noteworthy. Here, then, are some highly individual, occasionally provocative, and yet never less than totally valid, accounts of three seminal cello works. That these performances are now almost 40 years old seems scarcely credible, given the transparency and range of the sound, while from a historical standpoint they form a vivid document of one of the great cellists of our time.

Lalo Cello Concerto
Massenet Fantaisie Saint-Saëns Cello Concerto No 1 in A minor, Op 33
Sophie Rolland vc BBC Philharmonic Orchestra / Gilbert Varga
ASV CDDCA867 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1993 ●

Sophie Rolland's performance of the Lalo Concerto is surely as fine as any recorded. It opens with great character, thanks to Gilbert Varga's strong accompaniment, and the solo playing is joyously songful. But Rolland is at her finest as she plays her introduction to the finale with commanding improvisatory spontaneity. The orchestra bursts in splendidly and she shows her technical mettle with some bouncing bowing in the attractive closing Rondo. The Saint-Saëns Concerto brings similar felicities. Massenet's Fantaisie opens dramatically and is rhythmically vital, flowing onwards boldly to produce a winningly sentimental yearning melody which the soloist clearly relishes. A cadenza then leads to a charming, very French Gavotte, and the piece ends jubilantly. It really is a find, and it could hardly be presented more persuasively. The recording is near perfect.

Cello Concerto in D minor[a]. Cello Sonata[b]. Chants russes, Op 29[b]
Maria Kliegel vc [b]Bernd Glemser pf
[a]Nicolaus Esterházy Sinfonia / Michael Halász
Naxos 8 554469 (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1998

Maria Kliegel views the Concerto as a strong, dramatic work, and she has just the qualities – impressive, powerful tone and brilliant technique – to bring it off. The early exchanges with the orchestra establish her heroic presence, which she then relaxes to give a soft, delicate account of the second theme. The orchestral interruptions sound suitably stern and implacable – although the many loud, staccato chords for full orchestra become somewhat wearisome. The finale is excellent; a robust, serious approach allied to energetic, bouncy rhythms. Throughout, the orchestra sounds warmly Romantic, the important solo wind parts full of character.

The Sonata, too, is well worth hearing. Written 20 years before the Concerto, it's still a fully mature work, mixing grand Lisztian gestures with classical formal outlines and ingenious, colourful harmony. Kliegel and Glemser play with fine style and intense commitment, encompassing the high Romanticism and, in the outer movement, Lalo's characteristically forceful rhythmic manner. Chants russes is an arrangement of the middle movement of the Concerto russe for violin – it's very effective as a cello piece. Kliegel's soft, refined sound near the end is especially memorable.

Violin Concerto

Violin Concerto in F, Op 20[a]. Concerto russe, Op 29[a]. Scherzo. Le roi d'Ys – Overture
[a]Olivier Charlier vn BBC Philharmonic Orchestra / Yan Pascal Tortelier
Chandos CHAN9758 (72 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1998

This collection opens splendidly with a spankingly good performance of the Overture to Le roi d'Ys, with its melodrama, brassy splashes and a rather memorable swooning cello solo. It has all the gusto and panache of a Beecham performance and is certainly the finest account on disc since Paray's old Mercury version. Then come the two concertante violin works, both written with Sarasate in mind (separated by the comparatively familiar Scherzo, given here with rumbustious zest). Why are they not better known? The Violin Concerto has plenty going for it, a nicely coloured palette, a disarmingly nostalgic lyrical melody to haunt the first movement, followed by a delightful, songful Andante, which Olivier Charlier plays with engaging delicacy. But the real surprise here is the Concerto russe, virtually another Symphonie espagnole, but with Slavic rather than Spanish ideas, and very good ones too. Its lovely slow movement, the 'Chant russe', opens with a chorale and the violin steals in with a genuine Russian folk tune, which (with its rhythmic snaps) is astonishingly reminiscent of the Bruch Scottish Fantasy. Charlier plays it most tenderly and the result is gently ravishing. The 'Intermezzo', with its off-beat timpani interjections and catchy main theme, is delicious, rhythmically sparkling in Charlier's hands, and there is another luscious secondary theme to come in the middle. The finale opens with a burst of sombre Slavonic passion from the strings, and another folk melody arrives. Soon the music quickens, culminating in a vivacious conclusion, with Charlier's contribution always lightly sparkling. Highly recommended.

Symphonie espagnole

Lalo Symphonie espagnole, Op 21[a]
Vieuxtemps Violin Concerto No 5 in A minor, Op 37[b]
Sarah Chang vn [a]Royal Concertgebouw Orchestra, [b]Philharmonia Orchestra / Charles Dutoit
EMI 555292-2 (52 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded [a]live in 1995, [b]1994

The Symphonie espagnole is a more ambitious piece than the Vieuxtemps, and Lalo's inventive Spanishry holds up well throughout the five movements. Dutoit's approach is full of impetus so that when the malagueña secondary theme arrives, it makes a shimmering contrast. The delicious piping woodwind crescendo and decrescendo which begins the finale sets the scene for scintillating salterello fireworks from the soloist. The dash into the home straight brings vociferous applause, which makes one realise that the concentration and spontaneity of the performance has been helped by the presence of an audience, who aren't apparent until this point. Certainly the splendidly resonant Concertgebouw sound and perfect balance would never have given the game away.

Vieuxtemps's Fifth Concerto opens disarmingly, but the tutti gathers strength in Dutoit's hands before Chang steals in silkily and proceeds to dominate the performance with her warm lyricism and natural, flowing rubato. In a performance like this it remains a small-scale work to cherish, for it hasn't a dull bar in it. The recording is warm and full, the balance treating the relationship between the violin and the Philharmonia Orchestra as an equal partnership.

Lalo Symphonie espagnole
Dvořák Violin Concerto in A minor, B108
Christian Tetzlaff vn Czech Philharmonic Orchestra / Libor Pešek
Virgin Classics 545022-2 (63 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1992-93 ●

This is a unique and generous coupling, and if Virgin Classics' decision to record Tetzlaff in Prague was dictated by the obvious advantage in having Dvořák's compatriots accompanying in his Violin Concerto, the Czech Philharmonic's playing under Pešek proves just as idiomatic in the Spanish dance rhythms of Lalo as in Czech dances, with crisp ensemble and rhythm deliciously sprung. What is especially remarkable about Tetzlaff's performances of the Symphonie espagnole as well as the Violin Concerto, is the quicksilver lightness of the passagework, which brings out the element of fantasy; in that he is helped by a recording balance which does not spotlight the soloist as sharply as in most other versions. In both works, Tetzlaff's concentration makes for a sense of spontaneity, leading one on magnetically. With delectable pointing of rhythm and phrase Tetzlaff makes the Lalo more subtly winning than it often is, helped by the extra transparency of textures.

Constant Lambert British 1905-1951

GROVE Lambert entered the Royal College of Music when he was 17, and was becoming well known by the time he was 20. He was the first English composer commissioned by Dhiagilev (Romeo and Juliet, 1926), initiating a lifelong association with ballet as a conductor and composer: he wrote Pomona (1927) for Nizhinska and Horoscope (1938) for the Vic-Wells Ballet, of which he was founder musical director (from 1931). But he also wrote concert pieces, preferring unconventional genres and anti-traditional tastes for jazz and Stravinsky: such works include The Rio Grande for piano, chorus and orchestra (1927), the Concerto for piano and nonet (1930-31) and the choral orchestral 'masque' Summer's Last Will and Testament (1932-5). He stood in sharp relief against the background of English musical life and had wide-ranging interests. A lively critic, he wrote the stimulating Music Ho! a Study of Music in Decline (1934).

Piano Concerto

Concerto for Piano and Chamber Orchestra[a]. Merchant Seamen Suite. Pomona. Prize-Fight
[a]David Owen Norris pf BBC Concert Orchestra / Barry Wordsworth
ASV White Line CDWHL2122 (66 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1998 ●●

More gaps in the Lambert discography are enterprisingly plugged by these sensitive and shapely performances, which display most agreeable dash and commitment. The Piano Concerto recorded here is not that unnervingly bleak 1930-31 creation for soloist and nine players but one from 1924 that remained in short score, never to be heard in the composer's lifetime. Not only is the concerto brimful of striking invention and tightly organised, it also plumbs expressive depths, not least in the Andante slow movement which contains music as achingly poignant as any Lambert penned. David Owen Norris does full justice to the glittering solo part, and he receives splendid support from Barry Wordsworth and the BBC Concert Orchestra.

Prize-Fight (Lambert's first ballet score) is earlier still, begun in 1923, completed the following year and overhauled one last time in 1927. It's a veritable romp, pungently scored in the manner of Satie and Milhaud, and with something of the anarchic spirit of Georges Auric's deliciously daft contributions to those glorious Ealing Comedies. In point of fact, Lambert had long been a connoisseur of the silver screen before he finally embarked on his first film score in 1940, for a flag-waving documentary entitled Merchant Seamen. Two years later, he compiled the present five-movement suite, and a superior specimen it is. Pomona, of course, we've had before. Wordsworth's spacious realisation occasionally lacks something in sheer effervescence and dry wit). But this is a most enjoyable and valuable compilation and the recording is vivid and truthfully balanced.

Tiresias

Tiresias. Pomona
English Northern Philharmonia / David Lloyd-Jones with ^{a}Michael Cleaver pf
Hyperion CDA67049 (72 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1998 ●

Constant Lambert's Tiresias was commissioned for the Festival of Britain in 1951 and the subject had been preoccupying the composer for over 20 years. In the event, the ailing Lambert struggled to meet his July deadline and called upon colleagues like Robert Irving, Alan Rawsthorne, Elisabeth Lutyens, Gordon Jacob, Denis Apivor, Humphrey Searle and Christian Darnton to help him finish the orchestration. Lambert directed eight performances in all, but the work was coolly received and he died the following month, just two days before his 46th birthday.

The instrumentation of Tiresias calls for neither violins nor violas and features a notably varied battery of percussion as well as an important role for piano obbligato (brilliantly played here by Michael Cleaver). The music has a dark-hued intimacy and at times starkly ritualistic demeanour which probably baffled that glitzy first-night audience. However, Lambert's achievement is ripe for reassessment, and David Lloyd-Jones's meticulously prepared realisation allows us to revel anew in the score's many effective set-pieces. Stravinsky and Ravel are prime influences, but the work is suffused with that distinctive mix of keen brilliance and bleak melancholy so characteristic of its creator. The present account is all one could wish for.

Pomona (1927) is much earlier and altogether lighter in tone. Deftly scored for a chamber orchestra of 34 instrumentalists, Pomona comprises eight delightfully inventive numbers whose neo-classical spirit breathes very much the same air as that of Stravinsky and Les Six from the same period. Again, the performance is first-rate and the sound quite admirable.

Romeo and Juliet

The Bird Actors. Pomona. Romeo and Juliet
Victoria State Orchestra / John Lanchbery
Chandos CHAN9865 (56 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1999 ●

The really good news here is the CD début of Romeo and Juliet, one of only two ballet scores that Diaghilev commissioned from British composers for his Ballets Russes (the other being Lord Berners' The Triumph of Neptune, also staged in 1926). It's a frothy romp firmly in the Stravinsky/Poulenc/ Milhaud mould – and a brilliantly confident achievement for a 20-year-old student – but, strange to relate, there's barely a glimpse of the sheer expressive scope of either Pomona or The Rio Grande (not to mention the Piano Concerto). We've long needed a worthy successor to Norman Del Mar's affectionate Lyrita version with the ECO (nla); happily, Lanchbery and company have plugged the gap with notable success. Not only does the orchestral playing evince infectious zest and unswerving dedication to the cause, Lanchbery directs with palpable relish throughout.

He also gives us an enjoyably lithe account of Pomona and a sparkling curtain-raiser in the guise of The Bird Actors. The sound throughout is lively and full-bodied, without perhaps being in the very top flight.

Rued Langgaard Danish 1893-1952

Aged 11 Langgaard made his début in Copenhagen as organist and improviser. A series of trips to Berlin led to the performance of his hour-long Symphony No 1 (1908-11) by the Berlin PO in 1913. The musical community in Denmark, however, regarded the highly productive but reserved and solitary composer with scepticism. After his opera Antikrist was turned down by Copenhagen's Royal Theatre in 1925, he turned his back on modernism and openly criticised Danish musical life and Nielsen's influence on it. His Straussian music, coloured by religion and symbolism, did not concur with the anti-Romantic and sober attitude dominant in Denmark around 1930. Interest in his work was reawakened in the 1960s, Music of the Spheres in particular being seen as anticipating the avant-garde music of the '60s.

Symphonies Nos 9-11

Symphonies – No 9, 'From Queen Dagmar's City', BVN282; No 10, 'Yon Hall of Thunder', BVN298; No 11, 'Ixion', BVN303
Danish National Radio Symphony Orchestra / Thomas Dausgaard
Dacapo 8 224182 (54 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Incalculability is essential for prolific symphonists – think of the diversity of Haydn or Shostakovich – but rarely so extreme as with Langgaard, neatly encapsulated in this new disc of three works written in just four years (1942-45). The style of the anachronistic Ninth is more in keeping with early Wagner (the opening movement sounds like Siegfried's Rhine Journey!). The scherzo looks to Tchaikovsky (filtered through early Sibelius), while the lowering Lento, 'Ribe Cathedral', starts with chords out of Don Giovanni. This eclecticism switches to Strauss and Mahler in No 10, another of his large-scale, nature-based orchestral fantasias and one of his best. Its title, Yon Hall of Thunder, hints at its grandiose character, but there is subtlety here too. The Danish Radio orchestra play with greater refinement for Dausgaard than for Ole Schmidt in the 1970s, the more tellingly as Dausgaard takes it at a ferocious pace in a compelling reading. No 11, Ixion, is one of the oddest works in Langgaard's symphonic canon. Running for some six minutes, it seems like a foreshadowing of Minimalism, albeit maximally orchestrated with four tubas adding their baleful tone to its monothematic round. As overture or finale it convinces, but a whole symphony? Dausgaard's accounts are superior to all rivals and excellently recorded. Eccentric but fascinating.

The End of Time

The End of Time, BVN243^{a}. From the Song of Solomon, BVN381^{b}. Interdikt, BVN335.
Carl Nielsen, Our Great Composer, BVN355^{c}
^{ab}Nina Pavlovski sop ^{ab}Stig Andersen ten
^{a}Per Høyer bar ^{b}Per Salo org
Danish National Radio ^{abc}Choir and Symphony Orchestra / Gennadi Rozhdestvensky
Chandos CHAN9786 (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1999

The End of Time, a concert suite dating from 1939-40, is based on the original 1921-23 version of the opera Antikrist. It's a cantata in four movements (a prelude and three self-contained 'arias') to which Langgaard made further revisions as he assembled it, the whole making a highly effective work that doesn't betray its origins. The text as retained also illustrates, in brief, the radical differences between the two versions of the opera. The shorter From the Song of Solomon (1949) is one of his last works, and typically strays very little from the Straussian opulence of the opening. There is more than a touch of Wagner in the latter stages. Langgaard's selective use of the Biblical text had a moralistic point that was aimed at what he felt to be the degenerate Danish society of the time. The orchestral Interdikt (1947-48) is targeted rather more personally; specifically, at the interdict he believed the Danish musical establishment had placed on him. It is quintessential Langgaard – eruptive, memorable and not a note too long. The role of the organist is an acute autobiographical touch. Carl Nielsen, Our Great Composer (1948; the title is also the complete text) presents the less attractive, paranoid side of his creative persona. This sarcastic little hymn is pure doggerel, attacking Nielsen's posthumous pre-eminence. Rozhdestvensky has the measure of Langgaard's idiom, and secures top-notch performances, while Chandos's sound quality is both rich and clear.

Music of the Spheres

Music of the Spheres. Four Tone Pictures
Gitta-Maria Sjöberg sop Danish National Radio Choir and Symphony Orchestra / Gennadi Rozhdestvensky
Chandos CHAN9517 (53 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996 ⊙

Music of the Spheres (1916-18) is probably Langgaard's most important – certainly most original – work. So radical did its sonic experiments seem even in the late 1960s that Ligeti no less, when inspecting the score, quipped that he had merely been a 'Langgaard imitator' all along. The manipulation of blocks of sound rather than conventional thematic development does have much in common with trends in post-Second World War avant-garde composition (though stemming from impressionism), but other contemporaries of Langgaard's, such as Schoenberg and Scriabin, had traversed similar terrain at least in part. The main difference between Langgaard and Ligeti lies in the former's reliance on a fundamentally tonal language, however eccentrically deployed, and Music of the Spheres seems in hindsight to be a bridge between two other highly virtuosic scores with celestial connotations: Holst's The Planets and Ligeti's Atmosphères. The Tone Pictures (1917) were written alongside this extraordinary work, yet possess none of its stature: four charming songs, they seem effusive and outmoded by comparison. Chandos's sound is superb.

Orlande de Lassus

Franco/Flemish 1532-1594

GROVE Lassus served Ferrante Gonzaga of Mantua from c1544, accompanying him to Sicily and Milan (1546-49). He worked for Constantino Castrioto in Naples, where he probably began to compose, then moved to Rome to join the Archbishop of Florence's household, becoming maestro di cappella of St John Lateran in 1553. After returning north, to Mons and Antwerp, where early works were published (1555-56), he joined the court chapel of Duke Albrecht V of Bavaria in Munich as a singer (1556). He married in 1558. Although a Catholic, he took over the court chapel in 1563 and served the duke and his heir, Wilhelm V, for over 30 years, until his death. In this post he consolidated his position by having many works published and travelling frequently (notably to Vienna and Italy, 1574-79), establishing an international reputation. The pope made him a Knight of the Golden Spur in 1574.

One of the most prolific and versatile of 16th-century composers, Lassus wrote over 2000 works in almost every current genre, including masses, motets, psalms, hymns, responsorial Passions and secular pieces in Italian, French and German. Most of his masses are parody masses based on motets, chansons or madrigals by himself or others; the large number of Magnificats is unusual. His motets include didactic pieces, ceremonial works for special occasions, settings of classical texts (some secular, e.g. Prophetiae Sibyllarum, 1600), liturgical items (offertories, antiphons, psalms, eg Psalmipoenitentiales, 1584) and private devotional pieces. He issued five large volumes of sacred music as Patrocinium musices (1573-76), and after his death in 1594 his sons assembled another (Magnum opus musicum, 1604).

Admired in their day for their beauty, technical perfection and rhetorical power, the motets combine the features of several national styles – expressive Italian melody, elegant French text-setting and solid northern polyphony – enhanced by Lassus's imaginative responses to the texts. His secular works reveal a cosmopolitan with varied tastes. The madrigals range from lightweight villanellas (Matona mia cara) to intensely expressive sonnets (Occhi, piangete); the chansons include 'patter' songs and reflective, motet-like works; and among the German lieder are sacred hymns and psalms, delicate love-songs and raucous drinking-songs. This versatility and this wide expressive range place Lassus among the most significant figures of the Renaissance period.

Lassus's sons Ferdinand (c1560-1609) and Rudolph (c1563-1625) also served the Bavarian court chapel and were responsible for assembling many of their father's works for publication. Ferdinand succeeded to his father's post at court; Rudolph composed much sacred music.

Lagrime di San Pietro

Ensemble Vocal Européen / Philippe Herreweghe
Harmonia Mundi HMX298 1483 (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1993 ●

Lassus completed his swan-song days before his death in 1594. The decision to set 20 stanzas from Luigi Tansillo's unfinished meditation on 'the tears of St Peter' must have been a highly personal one. The poet's portrayal of a man driven nearly insane with remorse allowed Lassus to exorcise the mental illness that engulfed him in his last years. The result is perhaps his most moving work, for there is in these madrigali spirituali a distilled mannerism that evokes the understated passion of late-period Brahms. Philippe Herreweghe captures the detached expression of pain that makes this music so haunting. This is partly a matter of vocal timbre: individually the singers' tone is a shade cool, but collectively they sound full-bodied. Their interpretative acuteness is best illustrated by their approach to rubato: Herreweghe ever so slightly stretches the pulse when the voices achieve a poignant inflexion or come to a standstill. Such moments acquire an intensity that clearly identifies them as the key moments in a psychological drama, making the cycle as a whole compulsive listening. Quite simply, Herreweghe's singers achieve something that is very, very special indeed.

Masses

Missa Entre vous filles. Missa Susanne un jour.
Infelix ego
Oxford Camerata / Jeremy Summerly
Naxos 8 550842 (68 minutes: DDD). Text and Ⓢ translation of Infelix ego included. Recorded 1993

The Masses Entre vous filles and Susanne un jour show Lassus at his best, full of variety and invention, music of an immediate impact; in fact, they display exactly the same qualities as the better-known motets. The Oxford Camerata has understood this well, taking considerable care with the nuances of the text and really enjoying the music's rich sonorities. Sometimes a slight imprecision in the playing of chords is detectable, but this is more than outweighed by the sense of melodic contour and the powerful, somewhat dark and austere sound which conveys so well the spirit of the music. With over 68 minutes of some of the finest 16th-century polyphony available at such a low price, no one should hesitate.

William Lawes

British 1602-1645

GROVE William Lawes, the younger brother of Henry Lawes, was probably a chorister at Salisbury Cathedral until the Earl of Hertford placed him under the tutelage of his own music master, John Coprario. In 1635 Lawes was appointed 'musician in ordinary for the lute and voices' to Charles I, though he was probably in Charles's service before then. In 1642 he enlisted in the royalist army and accompanied the king on campaigns; he was killed during the battle to relieve the garrison at Chester.

Lawes was a gifted, versatile and prolific composer. The stylised dance suite is the basic vehicle for his chamber music, often with a preceding fantasia or pavan. In his viol consorts he exhibited late Renaissance traits, but the larger part of his chamber music uses violins in the concertante style of early Baroque violin music with continuo. It includes the 'Harpe' consorts, a unique collection of variation suites for violin, bass viol, theorbo and harp. Of Lawes's vocal music, over 200 songs are extant, many of them composed for court masques and other theatrical entertainments. He is considered the leading English dramatic composer before Purcell. Much of his church music – c50 anthems and ten sacred canons or rounds – is also of high quality, The Lord is my Light being one of the finest verse anthems of its period.

Consort Setts

Consort Setts a 6 – in G; in C; in F; in B; in C.
Fantazy a 6 in F
Phantasm (Wendy Gillespie viol
Jonathan Manson, Varpu Haavisto tvios Susanne Braumann, Markku Luolajan-Mikkola bvios) /
Laurence Dreyfus viol
Channel Classics CCS17498 (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded c2001 ●●

Dreyfus writes passionately about the music, referring to 'a Dionysian frenzy hell-bent on breaking civilised taboos' and 'jubilant incantations'. So what do we hear? A subtly resonant, particularised landscape: in effect an Elysian soundscape. Gone is the corporate consort sound we learned to relish in former decades, replaced with rather more democratic textures. With seeming ease, the voice of each viol emerges and withdraws on cue as the music unfolds with sublime logic and unquestionable momentum.

The best setts are perhaps the two in minor keys, which offered Lawes a richer harmonic palette and the players greater expressive possibilities. The harmonically bizarre first Fantazy of the C minor Sett must have excited 17th-century ears, which – if they were lucky – were treated as we are here to an excitingly paced second Fantazy, then an 'Inomine' ('sinewy' and sustained at first, then quicker in the second section, the plainchant exquisitely interwoven and at the same time plain for all to hear), and finally a vibrant Aire, resplendent in its swaggering repeated notes and syncopated dash. Whether it would make so vivid an impression from another ensemble is doubtful. Dreyfus's unselfconscious hyperbolic enthusiasm aside, these are beautifully thought-out, sympathetic performances, worthy of a cultivated monarch and the composer's quatercentenary.

A superb disc – Phantasm is truly in a class of its own.

Royall Consorts

Royall Consorts – No 2 in D minor; No 4 in D; No 5 in D; No 8 in C; No 10 in B flat 🄿
The Greate Consort (Anne Schumann vn Emilia Benjamin, Reiko Ichise va da gambas Elizabeth Kenny, William Carter theorbos) / Monica Huggett vn
ASV Gaudeamus CDGAU147 (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996 ●

These formalised dances give us a less familiar view of this composer: the broody cavalier reflecting, in exquisitely fashioned thematic strains, the unequivocal decorum of musical conceits in Charles I's cultivated time-bomb of a court. The soft-grained and unforced string timbre of The Greate Consort is underpinned by delightfully subtle and undemonstrative theorbo playing. For some, the characterization in, say, the Aires of Consort No 4 will seem a touch under-explored but given the Pavan's wonderful concentration of seamless allusions, gently passed back and forth, the sense of an integral suite is strongly and vitally projected. Monica Huggett leads by example with tonal sweetness and exemplary musicianship. Rare qualities indeed, and treasure from which she has effected chamber music playing of the very highest quality.

Jean-Marie Leclair

French 1697-1764

GROVE French composer and violinist Leclair was initially a dancer. He lived from 1723 in Paris, where he became a prominent soloist and began producing violin sonatas (from 1723). He also appeared abroad, and in 1733 became ordinaire de la musique du roi at the French court. In 1738-43 he served the court of Orange in the Netherlands and (in 1740-43) Franc;ois du Liz at The Hague. He then lived mainly in Paris, where he was murdered (probably by his nephew).

Foremost in Leclair's output are over 60 solo, duet and trio sonatas for violin. In these he imbued the Italian style with French elements more successfully than most of his contemporaries, using short ornamented phrases and colourful harmonies; the idiom reflects his own virtuoso technique. He also composed concertos, minuets, suites etc, ballet music, an opera (Scylla et Glaucus, 1746) with many striking features and other vocal music. He was an influential teacher and is considered the founder of the French violin school.

Violin Concertos

Violin Concertos – Op 7: No 4 in F; No 6 in A. 🄿
No 2 in A, Op 10. Flute Concerto No 3 in C, Op 7.
Rachel Brown fl
Collegium Musicum 90 / Simon Standage vn
Chandos Chaconne CHAN0564 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1994 ●

Of the violin concertos here, Op 10 No 2 is the richest harmonically. The solo instrument in Op 7 No 3 is Leclair's stated alternative of flute, the only one of his 12 violin concertos to be so designed. Accordingly, it lacks the double-stopping so much favoured by this greatly admired violinist-composer. Otherwise it exploits the graceful sequential passagework found in the other concertos, though here with a fuller accompanying texture, with more movement in inner parts. Rachel Brown's playing throughout is deliciously cool and poised. Virtuoso violin fireworks abound in the vigorous first movements of the other two Op 7 concertos here and the ebullient finale of the A major: as expected, Simon Standage throws off their difficulties with panache and an apparent ease that allows him also to add stylish embellishments of his own. The extensive multiple-stopping on which the elegant minuet-like Aria of Op 7 No 6 relies is performed with well-nigh impeccable intonation.

Violin Concertos – Op 7: No 1 in D minor. 🅿
Op 10: No 3 in D; No 4 in F; No 6 in G minor
Collegium Musicum 90 / Simon Standage vn
Chandos Chaconne CHAN0589 (59 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995 ⊙

This disc contains Leclair's most vivacious and attractive works, played with great élan, sensitivity and neatness, and recorded with exemplary clarity and balance. The concertos represent a high-water mark in 18th-century violin technique, with extensive double-stopping, an extended range that soars up to heights scarcely ventured previously, rapid scales and flying arpeggios, and elaborate figurations of all kinds. To all of this Standage brings a seasoned virtuosity which he places totally at the service of the music's grace: his bowing in particular commands admiration. From the stylistic viewpoint these concertos are interesting for their mingling of French and Italian elements. There are Vivaldian unisons, but French dance forms for the middle movements – a pair of minuets in the D minor, minuets en rondeau in the G minor, a pair of gavottes with unusual interplay between solo and tutti in the F major, and an ornate solo line over supporting reiterated chords in the D major. Standage adds spontaneous embellishments of his own on repeats.

Violin Sonatas

Violin Sonatas, Op 1 – No 1 in A minor; 🅿
No 3 in B flat; No 8 in G; No 9 in A
François Fernandez vn Pierre Hantaï hpd
Philippe Pierlot va da gamba
Astrée Naïve E8662 (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995

Leclair's Op 1 set was so successful when it was first published in 1723 that it had to be reprinted four times. Though the technical demands it makes on the violinist are considerable, the composer himself was at pains not to employ virtuosity as an end in itself and to condemn the 'trivialisation' of players who exaggerated the speed of quick movements. Leclair also, like Couperin, was insistent that performers should not add ornamentation of their own – though in the four sonatas here only the initial Adagio of No 3 is much decorated. Rather did he place emphasis on 'le beau chant' – expressive cantabile, which is well exemplified in the first movements of Nos 1, 8 and 9. The crisp Allegro, with its rapid dipping across strings, and the Largo of No 3 make play with multiple stopping, including double trills, and there is vigorous cross-string work too in the ebullient Giga of No 1. Leclair shows himself fond of the rondeau form with long episodes, and the Sarabande of No 9 is a set of variations. This last has an athletic gamba line, as does the whole of the G major Sonata; and the alert and positive continuo playing here (from both gamba and harpsichord) is a special pleasure. But naturally the main spotlight falls on François Fernandez, whose lively, pointed bowing, delicate fast movements and graceful slow ones (like the gentle G major Musette) do full justice to Leclair's attractive invention.

Franz Lehár Austro/Hungarian 1870-1948

GROVE The son of a military bandmaster and composer, Lehár studied in Prague with Foerster and Fibich and followed his father in an army career. In 1902 he resigned to work in Vienna as a conductor and composer, notably of operettas, achieving spectacular international success with Die lustige Witwe (1905), Der Graf von Luxemburg (1909) and Zigeunerliebe (1910). These and others restored the fortunes of the Viennese operetta and opened the genre to a greater musical and dramatic sophistication. After World War One his time seemed to have passed, but then came new successes, many written for Richard Tauber: Paganini (1925), Der Zarewitsch (1927), Friederike (1928), Das Land des Lächelns (1929) and Giuditta (1934). His other works include waltzes, marches and songs.

Waltzes / Overtures

Gold und Silber, Op 79. Wiener Frauen – overture. 🅷
Der Graf von Luxemburg – Waltz; Waltz Intermezzo.
Zigeunerliebe – overture. Eva – Wär' es auch nichts als ein Traum von Glück; Waltz Scene. Das Land des Lächelns – overture. Die lustige Witwe – concert overture
Zurich Tonhalle Orchestra / Franz Lehár
Dutton mono CDBP9721 (66 minutes: ADD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1947 ⊙

These were the 77-year-old composer's last recordings. Most were reissued on LP (latterly on the Eclipse label), but here they are for the first time complete. Mostly the selections represent obvious items from Lehár's melodic output. However, the inclusion of the Wiener Frauen overture is an especial joy, representing Lehár at his less familiar but most melodic and inventive. The operetta's principal character was a piano tuner, and the overture includes an ingenious passage where one hears the piano being tuned up before launching into one of Lehár's most luxuriant and beautiful waltzes.

In his excellent notes Malcolm Walker aptly describes these recordings as, in a sense, Lehár's last will and testament. Slower and more indulgent than his earlier recordings they may be; but never for a moment the slightest bit ponderous. Rather they are full of nostalgia, wonder and joyful pride – lovingly caressed performances by a master melodist, master orchestrator and master conductor. The transfers have been excellently done from original shellac discs. Filtering may be required to minimise hiss; but it is more than worthwhile for uniquely beautiful recordings of some of the most heavenly melodies ever created.

Concertino for Violin and Orchestra

Tatjana – Prelude, Act 1; Prelude, Act 2; Prelude, Act 3; Russian Dances. Fieber. Il guado. Concertino for Violin and Orchestra in B flat minor. Eine Vision: meine Jugendzeit. Donaulegenden, 'An der grauen Donau'
Robert Gambill ten Latica Honda-Rosenberg vn Volker Banfield pf North German Radio Philharmonic Orchestra / Klauspeter Seibel
CPO CPO999 423-2 (70 minutes: DDD) Ⓑ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1996-97

Lehár's mastery of the orchestra has never been in doubt; and here is further evidence of his technical accomplishment. Such touches of the operetta composer as are here are of the more ambitious operetta scores such as Zigeunerliebe. More often it is Wagner, Richard Strauss and Korngold who come to mind. Throughout, the music is tastefully and evocatively written, and with a supreme confidence in the handling of a large orchestra. Tatjana was an early operatic attempt of which Lehár was especially fond, and its preludes and dances capture the starkness of its Siberian setting. Il guado ('The Ford') and the concert overture Eine Vision are works from the Lustige Witwe years, when Lehár was still seeking to determine in which direction his future lay. The former is a symphonic poem with some attractively rippling writing for the piano, the latter a recollection of the Bohemian countryside of his youth. The elegant Concertino for violin and orchestra, which has been recorded previously, is a student work that demonstrates his affection for his own instrument. Fieber is the starkest piece in the collection – a bitter First World War portrayal of a soldier in the throes of a deadly fever. Donaulegenden gives glimpses of the familiar waltz-time Lehár, but a Lehár looking back sadly at a bygone age. What other operetta or waltz composer could have written music as powerful, gripping and spine-tingling as this? Do try it!

Frühling

Frühling. Elfentanz. Hungarian Fantasy, Op 45[a]
Stefanie Krahnenfeld sop Hedwig;
Alison Browner sop Toni; Robert Wörle ten Lorenz;
Markus Köhler bar Ewald; [a]Mark Gothoni vn
Deutsche Kammerakademie Neuss / Johannes Goritzki
CPO CPO 999 727-2 (78 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, text and translation included

A completely unfamiliar Lehár operetta is a surprise indeed, and an utterly delightful treat it turns out to be. Set against the background of a Viennese housing shortage, it's a 'show-within-a-show' piece, featuring amorous goings-on between a composer, his librettist and two office typists. And it's the composer who gets the girl!

It's cast on an altogether smaller scale than usual for Lehár: just four soloists, without chorus, and for smaller orchestra. Though the style is unmistakable, the music is geared to a more intimate environment – no big, cloying waltzes, everything altogether more airy and light.

Actually the recording appears to be not so much of Frühling but its later manifestation Frühlingsmädel, produced in Berlin in 1928. For this the composer added brass instruments, composed one new number, inserted orchestral arrangements of three earlier piano compositions, and most importantly added a couple of popular dance numbers. The last two numbers – the syncopated 'Wenn eine schöne Frau befiehlt' and 'Komm, die Nacht gehört der Sünde' – show Lehár at his most seductive. The score also has a wonderful duet for the two male characters discussing the delights of a lady's wardrobe, as well as a typical Lehár march duet for the two lovers.

CPO have given the piece a winning performance, admirably capturing its lightheartedness and in splendidly clear sound. This CD is altogether a sheer delight.

Giuditta (sung in English)

Deborah Riedel sop Giuditta; Jerry Hadley ten Octavio; Jeffrey Carl bar Manuele Biffi, Antonio; Andrew Busher spkr Duke; Naomi Itami sop Anita; Lynton Atkinson ten Pierrino;
William Dieghan ten Sebastiano
English Chamber Orchestra / Richard Bonynge
Telarc CD80436 (78 minutes: DDD). Text included Ⓕ
Recorded 1996

Giuditta was Lehár's last stage work and the peak of his compositional development. Written for the Vienna State Opera, it is a highly ambitious score, containing some fiendishly difficult vocal writing and using a large orchestra featuring mandolin and other exotic instruments. For this recording some two hours of music have been compressed into 78 minutes by means of snips here and there and the omission of a couple of subsidiary numbers. The piece has a Carmen-like story, about the disenchanted wife of an innkeeper who persuades a soldier to desert, before eventually abandoning and ruining him as she goes from lover to lover. The best-known number is Giuditta's 'On my lips every kiss is like wine', here gloriously sung by Deborah Riedel; the leading male role was written for Tauber, and there are some marvellous and demanding tenor solos, equally superbly sung by the impressive Jerry Hadley. Despite writing for the opera house, Lehár remained faithful to his formula of interspersing the music for the principal couple with sprightly dance numbers for a comedy pair, here in the hands of Naomi Itami and Lynton Atkinson. Assisted by Richard Bonynge's lilting conducting, these contribute richly to the appeal of the recording.

Das Land des Lächelns

Anneliese Rothenberger sop Lisa; Harry Friedauer ten Gustl; Nicolai Gedda ten Sou-Chong; Renate Holm sop Mi; Jobst Moeller bar Tschang
Bavarian Radio Chorus; Graunke Symphony Orchestra / Willy Mattes
EMI ② 565372-2 (87 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1967 ●

The great glory of this Das Land des Lächelns, Lehár's portrayal of the clash of western and eastern cultures, is the singing of Nicolai Gedda, who brings off 'Dein ist mein ganzes Herz' and the other Richard Tauber favourites to quite splendid effect. Anneliese Rothenberger is on excellent form vocally and full of charm, and she and Gedda make an excellent partnership. Renate Holm is a smiling Mi and the other principals, chorus and orchestra all play their full parts. Willy Mattes is an experienced and sympathetic conductor of operetta. The score here is, of course, not identical with that given in London when the operetta was first produced there in 1931. Apparently, Tauber was in and out of the cast every other day, providing his understudy, Robert Naylor, with plenty of opportunities. The show only had a short run in London on its first appearance. It seems that it was Tauber rather than Lehár that people wanted to hear. This reissue should be in every Viennese operetta collection.

Die lustige Witwe

Cheryl Studer sop Hanna; Boje Skovhus bar Danilo; Bryn Terfel bass-bar Zeta; Rainer Trost ten Camille; Barbara Bonney sop Valencienne; Uwe Peper ten Raoul; Karl-Magnus Fredriksson bar Cascada; Heinz Zednik ten Njegus; Richard Savage bar Bogdanowitsch; Lynette Alcantara sop Sylviane; Philip Salmon ten Kromow; Constanze Backes mez Olga; Julian Clarkson bass Pritschitsch; Angela Kazimierczuk sop Praškowia
Wiener Tschuschenkapelle; Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Sir John Eliot Gardiner
DG 439 911-2GH (80 minutes: DDD). Notes, text and translation included. Recorded 1994 Ⓕ ●●

This is a truly great operetta interpretation. Gardiner's approach is on an altogether more inspired plane than his rivals. In the Viennese rhythms, he shows himself utterly at home – as in the Act 2 Dance scene, where he eases the orchestra irresistibly into the famous waltz. But there are also countless instances where Gardiner provides a deliciously fresh inflexion to the score. The cast of singers is uniformly impressive. If Cheryl Studer's 'Vilja' isn't quite as assured as some others, her captivatingly playful 'Dummer, dummer Reitersmann' is typical of a well-characterised performance. As Danilo, Boje Skovhus acquits himself well with a polished performance and he offers a natural, more human characterisation than his rivals, while Barbara Bonney is superb. Not the least inspired piece of casting comes with Bryn Terfel, who transforms himself outstandingly well into the bluff Pontevedran ambassador. As for Gardiner's personally selected chorus, they make Monteverdi to Montenegro and Pontevedra seem the most natural transition in the world. DG's recorded sound has an astonishing clarity and immediacy, as in the way the piccolos shriek out at the Widow's Act 1 entrance or in the beautiful pianissimo accompaniment to the 'Vilja-Lied'.

Die lustige Witwe Ⓗ
Dame Elisabeth Schwarzkopf sop Hanna; Erich Kunz bar Danilo; Anton Niessner bar Zeta; Nicolai Gedda ten Camille; Emmy Loose sop Valencienne; Josef Schmidinger bass Raoul; Ottakar Kraus bar Cascada
Philharmonia Orchestra and Chorus / Otto Ackermann
EMI mono 769520-2 (72 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1953 ●●●

This is a star-studded performance. Emmy Loose has exactly the right appealing kind of voice for the 'dutiful wife' who plays with fire, and Nicolai Gedda is a superb Camille, sounding extraordinarily like Tito Schipa at his best. His high notes ring out finely and his caressing lyrical tones would upset a far better-balanced woman than the susceptible Valencienne. These two sing their duets beautifully, both excelling in the second act duet, in which Gedda has the lion's share. Nothing in this recording, except Schwarzkopf's 'Vilia', is so ravishing as his soft tone in the second half of the duet ('Love in my heart is waking'), which begins 'Sieh' dort den kleinen Pavillon' ('See over there the little pavilion') which is perhaps the loveliest in the score. Erich Kunz has not the charm but more voice and a perfect command of the style the music requires; and he is very taking in the celebrated Maxim's song. He speaks the middle section of the little song about the Königskinder possibly because the vocal part lies uncomfortably high for him; and perhaps his rich laughter would not be considered quite the thing in the diplomatic service. But his is, in most ways, a very attractive and lively performance. The Baron's part was probably much written up for George Graves but here what little he has to do is done well by Anton Niessner.

Elisabeth Schwarzkopf sings Hanna radiantly and exquisitely. She commands the ensembles in no uncertain manner and makes it clear that the 20-million-francs widow would be a personage even if she had only 20 centimes. It is a grand performance, crowned with the sensuous, tender singing of the celebrated waltz in Act 3. The chorus singing is first-rate and its Viennese abandon sounds absolutely authentic, whatever its address. Otto Ackermann conducts with total understanding, and notable sympathy for the singers, and the members of the Philharmonia Orchestra play like angels for him. The recording is as good as one can reasonably expect and, very important in such a score, the string tone is lovely throughout.

Tatjana

Roland Schubert bass Sergej; Dagmar Schellenberger sop Tatjana; Herbert Lippert ten Alexis; Karsten Mewes bar Sasha; Carsten Sabrowski bass-bar Djerid, Nikolajev; Sebastian Bluth bar Pimen; Olaf Lemme bar Punin; Hanne Fischer mez Raisa; Dieter Scholz bass Starost von Uslon; Berlin Radio Chorus and Symphony Orchestra / Michail Jurowski
CPO ② CPO999 762-2 (122 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, text and translation included
Recorded 2001

Franz Lehár was a reluctant operetta composer. His ambitions lay in serious music. When his three-act Kukuška was produced in Leipzig in 1896 he promptly resigned his job as military bandmaster, only to resume the drudgery of military service when it failed. Not until 1902, when he was 32, did conducting and composition enable him to give up the uniform for good. He didn't abandon Kukuška but later revised the work as Tatjana, achieving productions in 1905 at Brno, and in 1906 at the Vienna Volksoper. By then Die lustige Witwe had begun its triumphant progress around the globe. Lehár conducted a Leipzig radio performance of Tatjana in 1937; but that was it until the Berlin Radio concert performance in April 2001 that is preserved on these two CDs.

The opera opens on the banks of the Volga in the 1840s, moves on to the mines of Siberia, and ends on the Russian steppes. There, in the snow, the lovers Alexis, a soldier, and Tatjana, the daughter of a Volga fisherman, die together.

Lehár's musical language is very much of its time. There are hints of Wagner, perhaps rather more of Tchaikovsky's own Tatyana in Eugene Onegin, and something of the ill-fated love-match of Puccini's Manon Lescaut. The setting reminds us specifically of Giordano's Siberia. Yet the composer the music most obviously evokes is Lehár himself – the orchestral master who so expertly captured local colour and who could weave instrumental strands into a ravishing orchestral whole. The performance is very capably done, if with the atmosphere of a concert performance rather than a full staging. Herbert Lippert's Alexis is sung with clarity and brilliance, if a touch short on true passion. Dagmar Schellenberger's Tatjana is a shade too mature, lacking purity in her upper ranges, and yet overall agreeably done. It remains a piece of beautiful lyrical writing, brilliant orchestral colouring and impassioned melody.

Jón Leifs

Icelandic 1899-1968

GROVE Leifs studied in Leipzig (1916-22) and conducted various German orchestras. He wrote orchestral, vocal and piano music based on Icelandic folk music, which he championed.

Organ Concerto

Concerto for Organ and Orchestra, Op 7^{a}. Dettifoss, Op 57^{b}. Fine II, 'Farewell to Earthly Life', Op 56^{c}. Variazioni pastorale, Op 8
^{a}Björn Steinar Sólbergsson org ^{b}Loftur Erlingsson bar ^{c}Reynir Sigurdsson vib
^{b}Hallgrím's Church Motet Choir; Iceland Symphony Orchestra / En Shao Ⓕ
BIS CD930 (56 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1998-99 ●

Well received at its 1935 première in a Nazi-arranged Nordic music festival, Leifs' Organ Concerto was execrated later once the Jewish connections of Leifs's wife had become known. A piece long heard-of but unheard, the present performance reveals the concerto to be a truly original utterance. Björn Steinar Sólbergsson gives a consummate rendition of what sounds like a monstrously difficult solo part.

The orchestra is given music of unusual delicacy (for this composer) in the Variazioni pastorale (on a theme from Beethoven's Serenade, also Op 8), though the pastoralism is more redolent of Roy Harris than Beethoven. In this work, also completed in 1930, Leifs's real voice again emerges gradually, and the return of Beethoven's theme at the close is wonderfully surreal – though the tonal framework remains more conventional than in the later works. Fine II (1963) is one of two orchestral endings Leifs penned for his unfinished Edda oratorio, Twilight of the Gods. Dettifoss (1964) is the third of Leifs's tone paintings (the others are Geysir and Hekla) of Icelandic natural wonders, though here he conceived of a dialogue between poet Einar Benediktsson and the huge waterfall rather than straight depiction. Thumpingly good performances from all concerned, captured in spectacular sound to match the landscape.

Hekla

Elegy, Op 53^{c}. Hekla, Op 52^{bc}. Icelandic Overture, Op 9^{ac}. Loftr-Suite, Op 6a^{c}. Réminiscence du Nord, Op 40^{c}. Requiem, Op 33b^{a}

[a]Hallgrím's Church Motet Choir; [b]Schola Cantorum; [c]Iceland Symphony Orchestra / En Shao
BIS CD1030 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1998-99

Hekla (1961) is, like The Rite of Spring, enormously complex in texture, such that it is practically impossible to achieve a truly definitive account in which everything can be heard. Highlight one passage and another is likely to be submerged. So it proves when comparing recordings of it. The bells that feature prominently early on do not ring out in this newcomer, although rather more other detail does than in the competitors. En Shao's is a more measured approach and the benefits of the slower speeds outweigh any minor losses. The rival accounts from Leif Segerstam and Paul Zukofsky are still very fine, but this new release is the one to have. It is a signal tribute to Leifs's growing popularity that all but one of the works here have alternatives to compare them with.

En Shao and Petri Sakari (Chandos) are fairly close in terms of expressive intent and tempo here, as indeed they are in the exuberant if loosely constructed Icelandic Overture (1926). The latter work and the extended and searching Réminiscence du Nord for strings (1952) have a flavour suggestive of Roy Harris about them, which is remarkable given that the Overture pre-dates the American's famous Third Symphony by some 12 years. The Elegy for strings (1961, in memory of his mother) and Requiem show the private side to Leifs not heard much in works composed in his more 'public' manner. The Elegy is less interesting, however deeply felt, than Réminiscence du Nord or Requiem (1947, to a non-liturgical text assembled by Leifs). The motet is without doubt a gem, a lullaby to a dead child whom the parent seems frightened to wake. Beneath the surface gentleness is an undertow of dissonance like a barely suppressed howl of anguish.

Kenneth Leighton British 1929-1988

GROVE Leighton studied at Oxford and with Petrassi in Rome, and in 1970 was appointed professor at Edinburgh University. His music is in a 12-note but fundamentally diatonic style; its romanticism is expressed in lyrical melody, instrumental colour and virtuoso solo writing. It includes Catholic church music, concertos, chamber and instrumental pieces.

Chamber Works

Piano Trio, Op 46[abc]. Partita, Op 35[ac].
Metamorphoses, Op 48[ab]. Elegy, Op 5[ac]
[a]Michael Dussek pf [b]Lorraine McAslan vn
[c]Andrew Fuller vc
Dutton Epoch CDLX7118
(77 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ

Although a fair amount of his music for voices has been recorded, Kenneth Leighton's orchestral and instrumental music is seriously under-represented in the catalogue. This most impressive disc gives a good idea of what we are missing: superbly crafted music of at times overwhelming intensity. The craft and the intensity are inseparable: there is as little here of mere technical cleverness as there is of self-indulgent emotional display; the emotion both needs and is concentrated by tight control.

The Piano Trio is a characteristic example of this, its first movement building from close working of a broad, sweeping theme and a more subdued and shadowy one to a bitter eloquence slightly reminiscent of Shostakovich before a shadowy, drained conclusion. Calm is eventually achieved, but not serenity. The Partita has similar energy but a less fraught quality; there is even a sort of bony wit, again recalling Shostakovich, to some of the variations of the finale.

Metamorphoses, although ostensibly a single 21-minute movement, could be read as a monothematic sonata, with a quite violent scherzo and a slow finale by turns poignant and ghostly. The very early Elegy reveals some of Leighton's English roots: descendants of its sustained lyrical theme can be heard in the later pieces, but there are some harmonic shifts that John Ireland would have approved.

The programme, in short, is an ideal introduction to this important but still under-rated composer. He is not underrated by these artists, however, who play with passionate conviction and splendid risk-taking attack; they are admirably recorded.

God's Grandeur

God's Grandeur. What love is this of thine?. Give me wings of faith[a]. Crucifixus pro nobis, Op 38[a]. Lully, lulla, thou little tiny child, Op 25*b*. Mass, Op 44[a]. Laudate pueri, Op 68
Finzi Singers / Paul Spicer with [a]Andrew Lumsden org
Chandos CHAN9485 (71 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1993

There is a fine unease in Kenneth Leighton, a sense that fulfilment, musical and spiritual, must be striven for, that nothing worthwhile is gained without what Hardy called 'a full look at the worst'. Every new phrase in these choral settings sounds like the outcome of innumerable rejections: nothing is facile. In several of them, comfort is found – in God's Grandeur 'There lives the dearest freshness', in What love is this of thine? 'Oh, that thy love might overflow my heart' – and with it a sweetness that means so much more when hard won out of bleakness. He is a composer for the pilgrimage – not joyless by any means, but serious. In this excellent programme never does anything compromise this integrity. The works range from a student composition, his fine, independent setting of the Coventry Carol, to the anthem, What love is this of thine?, written not very long before his death.

The performances have all that could be desired in textual responsiveness and technical control. Somewhere among the sopranos is a voice (or it may be two voices) which at a forte has a worn or otherwise obtrusive edge; but clearly all members are valuable singers, as is shown by the ample supply of soloists from the ranks. Most of the works here are sung a cappella, those that are not being accompanied with clarity and discretion by Lumsden. The acoustic of All Saints', Tooting, is resonant but not excessively so. This disc is a most welcome addition to the catalogue.

Ruggiero Leoncavallo

Italian 1858-1919

GROVE Italian composer and librettist Leoncavallo studied literature at Bologna University. The failure of an early opera, I Medici (1893), conceived as the first of a Renaissance trilogy (unrealised) and written for Giulio Ricordi who rejected it, prompted him, in a defiant quest for fame, to write the poem and music of Pagliacci (Milan, 1892), the single work for which he is widely known. In its economy and consistent impetus, notably with the commedia dell'arte playlet and the Zola-inspired prologue invoking naturalism, the opera represents a skilful exploitation of the 1890s verismo trend; it made Leoncavallo a celebrity overnight. That success was never repeated. However, he set La bohème (1897) in opposition to Puccini and the sentimental Zazà (1900) was favourably received. One of the first composers to become involved with gramophone records, he wrote the popular song Mattinata (recorded by Caruso,1904) and conducted Pagliacci (1907), both for the G and T Company.

Pagliacci

José Cura ten Canio; Barbara Frittoli sop Nedda; Carlos Alvarez bar Tonio; Simon Keenlyside bar Silvio; Charles Castronovo ten Beppe; Adrian Folea ten First Villager; Gert Jan Alders bass Second Villager; National Children's Choir; Netherlands Radio Choir; Royal Concertgebouw Orchestra / Riccardo Chailly
Decca 467 086-2DH (73 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1999 ○○○

The big point in favour of this version of Pagliacci is the glorious playing of the Royal Concertgebouw Orchestra under their long-time music director. If Riccardo Chailly in previous verismo opera recordings – with Italian opera orchestras – has tended to sound aggressive and paradoxically not fully Italianate, this is quite different. The opening orchestral prelude instantly alerts you to the refinement of the playing, not just in the polished ensemble but in the subtle shading of tone and dynamic. When speeds in ensembles are on the fast side, the results are never breathless. Rather, they tingle with excitement, and the scherzando wit of much of the writing comes over with new point.

Happily Decca has lined up a first-rate cast to match. José Cura's voice has not quite the glowing freshness it once had, having acquired something of a baritonal quality, but his feeling for detail as well as the heroic power of his voice make his reading of Canio strong and intense, far more than the loud rant it can become even with leading tenors. 'Vesti la giubba' is nicely shaped, moving without being too lachrymose, and Cura reserves his finest singing of all for the climactic 'No! Pagliaccio non son'.

Barbara Frittoli proves an excellent choice as Nedda, giving a finely detailed performance, with singing on almost every phrase showing that she has rethought the role and its implications, rather as Callas did in her classic performance, but with more sensuous, more beautiful tone. Another rising star, Carlos Alvarez, with his big heroic baritone, makes an impressive Tonio from the Prologue onwards, even if he does not sound as sinister as some in his menaces. He is well contrasted in scale and timbre with Simon Keenlyside as Nedda's lover Silvio, lighter and more lyrical. The pianissimo close to Silvio's big duet with Nedda could not be subtler from either singer, while Charles Castronovo as Beppe in the final Play scene sings with comparable refinement.

There are few digital versions of this perennially popular opera not marred by poor recording if not flawed singing, and so this new one is particularly welcome. Vintage versions may offer individual performances of each role which in various ways outshine these, but in the power, beauty and refinement of the Royal Concertgebouw's playing we have something incomparable, enhanced by Decca's rich, spacious and brilliant recording.

Pagliacci
Carlo Bergonzi ten Canio; Joan Carlyle sop Nedda; Giuseppe Taddei bar Tonio; Rolando Panerai bar Silvio; Ugo Benelli ten Beppe
Chorus and Orchestra of La Scala, Milan / Herbert von Karajan
DG The Originals 449 727-2GOR Ⓜ
(78 minutes: ADD). Notes, texts and translations included. Recorded 1965 ○○

Cav and Pag have been bedfellows for many years. Lasting for about 75 minutes each, both operas have similarities. Each concerns the passions, jealousies and hatred of two tightly knit communities – the inhabitants of a Sicilian town and the players in a travelling troupe of actors. Cavalleria rusticana ('Rustic chivalry') concerns the triangular relationship of mother, son and his rejected lover. Played against a rich musical tapestry, sumptuously orchestrated, the action is played out during the course of an Easter day. Bergonzi is a stylish, ardent Turiddu whose virile charms glitter in his every phrase and Fiorenza Cossotto makes a thrilling

Santuzza motivated and driven by a palpable conviction; her contribution to the well-known Easter hymn scene is gripping. But the real hero of the opera is Karajan, whose direction of this powerful work is magnificent. Conviction and insight also instil Pagliacci with excitement and real drama. A troupe of actors arrives to give a performance of a commedia dell'arte play. The illustration of real love, life and hatred is portrayed in the interplay of Tonio, Silvio, Nedda and her husband Canio. As the two rivals, Caro Bergonzi and Giuseppe Taddei are superb. Taddei's sinister, hunch-backed clown, gently forcing the play-within-the-play closer to reality until it finally bursts out violently is a masterly assumption, and Karajan controls the slow build-up of tension with a grasp that few conductors could equal. The Milan La Scala forces respond wholeheartedly and the 1965 recording sounds well. The third disc is filled by a selection of very rich, very soft-centred opera intermezzos.

Pagliacci H
Giuseppe di Stefano ten Canio; Maria Callas sop
Nedda; Tito Gobbi bar Tonio; Rolando Panerai bar
Silvio; Nicola Monti ten Beppe ●●

Mascagni Cavalleria rusticana
Maria Callas sop Santuzza; Giuseppe di Stefano
ten Turiddu; Rolando Panerai bar Alfio; Anna Maria
Canali mez Lola; Ebe Ticozzi contr Lucia
Chorus and Orchestra of La Scala, Milan /
Tullio Serafin
EMI mono ② 556287-2 (141 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ Notes,
texts and translations included
Recorded 1954

The sound here is much more confined than on the Karajan set, though more immediate. Serafin conducts swifter-moving performances, yet ones quite as notable as Karajan's for pointing up relevant detail. All four interpretations carry with them a real sense of the theatre and are quite free from studio routine. It is difficult to choose between the casts on these two sets. Callas lives the characters more vividly than anyone. The sadness and anguish she brings to Santuzza's unhappy plight are at their most compelling at 'io piango' in 'Voi lo sapete' and at 'Turiddu mi tolse' in her encounter with Alfio, where the pain in Santuzza's heart is expressed in almost unbearable terms. As Nedda, she differentiates marvellously between the pensiveness of her aria, the passion of her duet with Silvio, and the playfulness of her commedia dell'arte acting.

Her partner in both operas is di Stefano They work up a huge lather of passion in the big Cavalleria duet, and the tenor is wholly believable as the caddish Turiddu. In the immediacy of emotion of his Canio, it is the tenor's turn to evoke pity. Di Stefano does it as well as any Canio on record without quite having the heroic tone for the latter part of the opera. Panerai is a strong Alfio on the Serafin set, but Guelfi, with his huge voice, is possibly better suited to this macho part. It is impossible to choose between the two Tonios, both pertinently cast. Taddei plays the part a little more comically, Gobbi more menacingly. Callas or Karajan enthusiasts will have no difficulty making their choice. Others may be guided by quality of sound. With either you will be ensured hours of memorable listening.

Pagliacci (sung in English)
Dennis O'Neill ten Canio; Rosa Mannion sop
Nedda; Alan Opie bar Tonio; William Dazeley bar
Silvio; Peter Bronder ten Beppe
Geoffrey Mitchell Choir; Peter Kay Children's Choir; London Philharmonic Orchestra /
David Parry
Chandos Opera in English Series CHAN3003
(80 minutes: DDD). Notes and text included. Ⓕ
Recorded 1997

'Hello…Hello' is the neat rendition of 'Si può…si può'. 'A slice of life as we live it' replaces 'life with its laughter and sorrow', 'Will ye hear then the story?' becomes 'Now you know what we're here for', and 'Ring up the curtain' is now 'Bring up the curtain'.

The text is one thing, the performance another. Opera singers are trained to pronounce their words in a very pure English which nowadays sounds more upper-class than it did not so long ago when all 'official' pronunciation was 'pure' in this sense. The 'slice of life' involves travelling players and villagers, but they all sound like ladies and gentlemen: it takes some of the verity out of verismo. Dennis O'Neill's Canio is fine as to vocal resource and avoidance of cheapness; but 'Un tal gioco' wants ironical bite, 'Vesti la giubba' more sense of occasion, 'No, Pagliaccio non son' more tension, bitterness and (at one point) sweetness. Rosa Mannion is an admirable Nedda, and both baritones do well, Alan Opie excellent in the Prologue, William Dazeley a lyric baritone of pleasing quality and tasteful style. The off-stage serenade is nicely sung by Peter Bronder, and the chorus is fine. David Parry's conducting has grown in authority, and in the climax (menace in the accompaniment to 'No, Pagliaccio' for instance) more than fulfils expectations. With effective work by producer and sound engineers, this Pagliacci will much enhance appreciation of the opera.

Anatoli Liadov

Russian 1855-1914

GROVE Liadov, a pupil of Rimsky-Korsakov at the St Petersburg Conservatory, showed promise and developed a lasting interest in counterpoint; from 1878 he taught at the conservatory (Prokofiev and Myaskovsky were among his pupils), also making appearances as a conductor. In the 1870s he was associated with 'The Five', and in the 1880s with the Belyayev circle. Many of his pieces are based on pre-existing motifs (folksongs, other composers' themes, a cantus firmus) or rely on a programme, revealing his sense of orchestral colour and gift for musical characterization (notably in the orchestral orks Baba-Yaga, ?1891-1904, and Kikimora, 1909); later works, including the symphonic poem Skorbnaya pesn (1914), experiment with extended tonality. A series of charming piano miniatures is still in the repertory. Procrastination, indolence and self-doubt prevented him from completing a work of any size or scope.

The Enchanted Lake

Liadov The Enchanted Lake, Op 62
Mussorgsky Boris Godunov – I am sick at heart[a]
Tchaikovsky Marche slave, Op 31. Capriccio italien, Op 45. Eugene Onegin – Waltz; Polonaise
Kirov Theatre [a]Chorus and Orchestra / Valery Gergiev
Philips 442 775-2PH (54 minutes: DDD)
Recorded 1993. Includes a bonus sampler CD of previous recordings from the Kirov Theatre forces Ⓕ conducted by Gergiev

Liadov's orchestral pieces have always had a tenuous hold on the repertory, and afford glimpses of an exceptional talent. In the shifting harmonies and dissolving textures of The Enchanted Lake, which shimmers atmospherically, there is not only acknowledgement of Siegfried's Forest Murmurs but anticipation of Scriabin and even Schoenberg. It was a novel idea to have the Kirov orchestra's 'Russian Spectacular', the title of this disc, open to the rich aural canvas of Boris Godunov's 'Coronation Scene' as refashioned by Shostakovich, complete with tolling bells, weighty brass and generous cymbal spray.

The sound is big and generalised, the conducting more majestic than excitable – which usefully serves to minimise the contrast with Marche slave, a comparatively lyrical statement with a sad-eyed account of the principal theme and lightweight, almost balletic sequences thereafter. Gergiev never drives too hard, while his artful shaping of Eugene Onegin's 'Polonaise' incorporates sensitive handling of the central section. Capriccio italien is thoughtfully held together, with much deft passagework in the closing tarantella.

There's a bonus CD, made up of snippets from Gergiev's various Russian stage work recordings for Philips; nothing earth-shattering, but a nice cross-section. This is a good, well-planned (if hardly generous) programme, warmly recorded.

Gyorgy Ligeti

Hungarian 1923

GROVE Ligeti studied with Farkas, Veress and Járdányi at the Budapest Academy, where he began teaching in 1950. During this period he followed the prevailing Kodály-Bartók style in his works while also writing more adventurous pieces (First Quartet, 1954) that had to remain unpublished. In 1956 he left Hungary for Vienna. He worked at the electronic music studio in Cologne (1957-8) and came to international prominence with his Atmosphères (1961), which works with slowly changing orchestral clusters. This led to teaching appointments in Stockholm (from 1961), Stanford (1972) and Hamburg (from 1973).

Meanwhile he developed the 'cloud' style in his Requiem (1965) and Lontano for orchestra (1967), while writing an absurdist diptych for vocal soloists and ensemble: Aventures (1966) and Nouvelles aventures (1966). His interests in immobile drifts and mechanical processes are seen together in his Second Quartet (1968) and Chamber Concerto (1970), while the orchestral Melodien (1971) introduced a tangle of melody. The combination of these elements, in music of highly controlled fantasy and excess, came in his surreal opera Le grand macabre (1978). His subsequent output has been diminished by ill-health, although it includes a Horn Trio (1982) in which perverse calculation is carried into Romanticism. Other later works include Monument, Selbstporträt, Bewegung, for two pianos (1976), two pieces for harpsichord (1978), two Hungarian studies for chorus (1983) and a book of piano studies (1985).

Concertos

Awards 1995

Violin Concerto[a]. Cello Concerto[b]. Piano Concerto[c]
[a]Saschko Gawriloff vn [b]Jean-Guihen Queyras vc [c]Pierre-Laurent Aimard pf
Ensemble InterContemporain / Pierre Boulez
DG 439 808-2GH (67 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1992-93 ○○○

The Violin Concerto (1992) is music by a composer fascinated with Shakespeare's The Tempest: indeed, it might even prove to be a substitute for Ligeti's long-mooted operatic version of the play. There are plenty of 'strange noises', the result not just of Ligeti's latter-day predilection for ocarinas, but of his remarkable ability to play off natural and artificial tunings against each other. This work is superior to the Piano Concerto because the solo violin is so much more volatile and poetic as a protagonist, an animator who 'fires up' the orchestra, functioning as a leader at odds with the led. Saschko Gawriloff is a brilliantly effective soloist, and well served by a sharply defined yet expressive accompaniment – Boulez at his most incisive – and a totally convincing recording. The other works are played and recorded with similar success. The Cello Concerto (1966) is a particularly powerful reminder of the strengths of the earlier Ligeti, where simple, basic elements generate anything but minimal consequences.

Cello Concerto[b]. Violin Concerto[c]. Clocks and Clouds[a]. Sippal, dobbal, nádihegedüvel, 'With pipes, drums, fiddles'[d]
[d]Katalin Károlyi mez [c]Frank Peter Zimmermann vn [b]Siegfried Palm vc [d]Amadinda Percussion Group;

[a]Cappella Amsterdam; [abc]Asko Ensemble;
[abc]Schönberg Ensemble / [abc]Reinbert de Leeuw
Teldec 8573 87631-2 (67 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded c2001 ●

This CD forms an ideal overview of Ligeti's work and a great introduction to his music. The Cello Concerto (1966) juxtaposes the primary Ligetian musical 'types' of this period – frozen, imperceptibly changing planes of sound, and surreal gestures which collide in manic and unpredictable ways. Good that Siegfried Palm was able to record a work he himself premièred, in an account less perfectly realised but more characterful than that by Jean-Guihen Queyras (reviewed above). As the title implies, Clocks and Clouds (1973) superimposes rigour and freedom – with a nod towards Minimalist thinking of the period – to create the archetypal Ligeti composition. In what is surprisingly its first commercial recording, balance between voices and ensemble could have had greater spatial depth, but the ethereal nature of the soundscape comes through unimpeded.

In just a decade, the Violin Concerto has established itself as a modern classic, combining Ligeti's love of polyrhythmic interplay and varied tunings with a heady recall of his Bartókian heritage. Frank Peter Zimmermann yields to Saschko Gawriloff in the finely judged poise of the opening Vivacissimo and Intermezzo. Elsewhere, however, his greater immediacy pays off, with a visceral edge to the closing cadenza that is truly hair-raising. If marginally less accurate than Boulez in his handling of the orchestra, Reinbert de Leeuw is more alive to its extremes of emotional anguish and deadpan humour, bringing the music vividly to life.

With personable notes from the composer, this is certainly the Ligeti disc that should be in everyone's collection.

Piano Concerto[a]. Chamber Concerto. Melodien.
Mysteries of the Macabre[b] (arr Howarth)
[b]Peter Masseurs tpt [a]Pierre-Laurent Aimard pf
ASKO Ensemble; Schönberg Ensemble /
Reinbert de Leeuw
Teldec New Line 8573 83953-2 (64 minutes: DDD). Ⓕ
Recorded 1999 ●

It is good that Teldec has picked up where Sony left off in issuing a complete edition of Ligeti's authorised works. Melodien, in particular, has been ill-served on disc: surprisingly so, as its 13 minutes are a microcosm of Ligetian practice at its most refined and accessible, the transitions between apparent activity and real stasis magically effected. The ASKO Ensemble has greater dynamic nuance than the London Sinfonietta's pioneering account (Decca – nla), reaffirming just why this music has had such an impact on a generation of European (not least British) composers. The Chamber Concerto has been better represented. This paring down to essentials of the harmonic and textural mesh familiar from earlier works, out of which melodic lines can then reassert themselves, is deftly achieved with no little humour. Compared with Boulez, de Leeuw feels a shade deadpan, but 'Calmo' has real plangency and 'Movimento' is pungently mechanistic.

Whether through familiarity or a more integrated balance with the orchestra, Aimard does not quite recapture the sense of daring in his 1992 account of the Piano Concerto, notably the opening Vivace's freewheeling polyrhythms and the fractured energy of the fourth movement, where Boulez's precision still allows for a more spontaneous interplay. Yet the Lento's folk inflections are fervently expressive, and the overall impression is of a work that seems far more unsettling than it did a decade ago: a sure sign of interpretative flexibility and musical durability.

It was a neat touch to sign off with Elgar Howarth's Macabre paraphrase. Masseurs is as fully equipped as Håkan Hardenberger (Philips – nla) to deliver the necessary pyrotechnics, while this first recording with ensemble accompaniment gives the music a more strident feel, in keeping with its operatic context. Ligeti can feel well served.

Lontano

Lontano[a]. Atmosphères[a]. Apparitions.
San Francisco Polyphony[a]. Concert Românesc
Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra /
Jonathan Nott
Teldec 8573-88261-2 (55 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded in the Philharmonie, Berlin; [a]live between
December 13 and 16, 2001 ●

Here at last are the scores with which the composer first made his name in the early 1960s (Apparitions and Atmosphères); here also is Lontano (1967), one of the finest orchestral scores of the 20th century, and San Francisco Polyphony of 1974, which inaugurates the more self-consciously virtuosic and referential approach that characterises Ligeti's subsequent works for large forces (Le Grand Macabre, and the concertos for piano, violin and horn); and, as a postscript of sorts, an early score from the composer's pre-Western period. The latter has its first recording here; rather more incredibly (given its position in Ligeti's output), so does Apparitions. On the last count alone, this recording is simply a must for anyone interested in 'new music'.

The two premières here are studio recordings, whereas Atmosphères, Lontano and San Francisco Polyphony were recorded live. A previous recording of Atmosphères and Lontano with the Vienna Philharmonic under Claudio Abbado was also live, and unsatisfactory on a number of counts (not least unwanted audience 'participation'). Thankfully there are very few such problems here: the general accuracy is commendable, considering the difficulty of co-ordinating dozens of individual lines (for example, getting 80-odd instruments to attack pianissimo together at the beginning of Atmosphères: the Berliners just about manage it; at any rate, they are nearer the mark than any of the other recordings). The sound-quality has all the requisite impact and delicacy, and the orchestra's shaping of line and continuity (and, when required, their opposites) is equally persuasive.

String Quartets

String Quartets – No 1, 'Métamorphoses nocturnes'; No 2
Artemis Quartet (Heime Müller, Natalia Prischepenko vns Volker Jacobsen va Eckart Runge vc)
Ars Musici AM1276-2 (43 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1999 ●

Few string quartets of the late 20th century are as often performed as these, and it was only a matter of time before one of the up-and-coming younger ensembles took up the challenge thrown down by the Arditti Quartet in their recent re-recording of both pieces for Sony (their earlier reading on Wergo dates from the late 1970s). The First Quartet, Métamorphoses nocturnes, dates from Ligeti's Hungarian period, and the evident debt to Bartók notwithstanding, his approach to mass and textural transformation is recognisable to anyone familiar with his later music. To their credit, the Artemis let the music breathe, and make much of Ligeti's impish humour: both works are theatrical and benefit from being 'played up', which the Artemis do perhaps more freely than the Ardittis.

But the real test comes with the Second Quartet, where the Arditti's pre-eminence is more obvious and the composer's demands rather fiercer. Here the acoustic makes a perceptible difference. The Arditti's ambience is very resonant and has been recorded at a certain distance – presumably a lesson learnt from the Wergo session, which was miked so closely that one heard the players' tense breathing. This brings a psychological distance to the performance, and slightly blurs the sudden cuts and changes of texture on which the musical drama depends.

The Artemis are miked more closely than the Sony recording, but the sound still allows for some beautifully differentiated, 'atmospheric' timbres (like the 'organ-stops' of bar 71, first movement). There is also a more palpable sense of immediacy, and a more riotous climax in the most abrupt passages (the ferocissimo fourth movement, most obviously). The Artemis offer a sufficiently different view from the Ardittis to make for an unmissable alternative. First-time buyers may defer to the Arditti's pedigree but need not hesitate to start here.

Horn Trio

Horn Trio[a]. Six Bagatelles[b]. 10 Pieces[b]. Sonata for Solo Viola[c]
[a]Marie Luise Neunecker hn [a]Saschko Gawriloff vn [c]Tabea Zimmermann va [a]Pierre-Laurent Aimard pf [b]London Winds (Philippa Davies fl Gareth Hulse ob Michael Collins cl Robin O'Neill bn Richard Watkins hn)
Sony Classical SK62309 (71 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1994-96 ●

Those looking for a specific reason to buy this disc need look no further than the account of the Horn Trio, Ligeti's homage to Brahms, a work which has become a classic of its kind. What distinguishes this version is the astonishing horn-playing of Marie Luise Neunecker – the impression of near-effortlessness and breadth of dynamic range she conveys are unlikely to be bettered. As to her companions, they have both recorded the Trio before, and their experience is audible.

This interpretation is especially effective at projecting the music's multiple levels and layers. As to its expressive power, even those who find Ligeti's later music problematic can hardly deny the poignant, tragic beauty of the concluding Lamento. The two sets of wind pieces are given polished, bravura performances by London Winds. The Bagatelles are among the composer's most convincing music from his pre-Western period; as to the 10 Pieces, they plough the same furrow as those two masterpieces from the same year (1968), the Second String Quartet and Continuum for harpsichord; but they are altogether more lightweight, their brevity almost provocative when heard against the broader canvas of those other works. Provocative in a very different way is the Viola Sonata, completed in 1994. Listen to Tabea Zimmermann's commanding and expressive playing, and hear a composer for whom confounding the critics' expectations has always been second nature.

Etudes

Awards 1997

Etudes – Book 1; Book 2; Book 3. Musica ricercata
Pierre-Laurent Aimard pf
Sony Classical SK62308 Ⓕ
(65 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1995 ●●●

Let us salute Pierre-Laurent Aimard first – not just a modern music specialist but an artist of phenomenal gifts, and excellently recorded here. First impressions of the music are likely to be of its immediacy. The complexities are a problem only for the pianist – whatever the sources of Ligeti's inspiration, his ideas serve only a musical/poetic purpose. Central to these dazzling pieces is his longstanding interest in composing with layers of material in different metres or different tempos and in producing what he calls 'an illusion of rhythm'; evident, too, are his more recent preoccupations with modern mathematics, in particular the young science of dynamical systems which seeks to explain the precarious balance between pattern and chaos, order and disorder. Ligeti's powerful imagination is fuelled by many things, but there is no question of having to have a special key to enter his world. The music is enough. There are 15 Etudes so far, in two books plus the beginning of a third, and there is a good deal to be gained from hearing each book in sequence. When we reach the end of Ligeti's Book 2, apparently at the limits of pianistic possibilities and expression, there can be no doubt that Ligeti's Etudes belong with the greatest piano music of this or any other century. They are amazing.

Le grand macabre

Sibylle Ehlert sop Venus, Gepopo; Laura Claycomb sop Amanda; Charlotte Hellekant mez Amando; Derek Lee Ragin counterten Prince Go-Go; Jard van Nes contr Mescalina; Graham Clark ten Piet the Pot; Willard White bass Nekrotzar; Frode Olsen bass Astradamors; Martin Winkler bar Ruffiak; Marc Campbell-Griffiths bar Schobiak; Michael Lessiter bar Schabernack; Steven Cole ten White Minister; Richard Suart bass Black Minister
London Sinfonietta Voices; Philharmonia Orchestra / Esa-Pekka Salonen
Sony Classical Ligeti Edition ② S2K62312
(102 minutes: DDD). Text and translation included. Ⓕ
Recorded live in 1998 ●

Le grand macabre, a comedy about the end of the world, an elaborate game of musical time-travel, an ambiguous dance on the brink of an abyss, looks more and more like the key opera of the end of the 20th century. Direct comparison between this version and Elgar Howarth's splendid 1987 Wergo performance is difficult, because Ligeti extensively revised the score in 1996, and it is that 'final version', as he calls it, that is recorded here. He has made a number of cuts, a great deal of what was originally spoken dialogue is now sung and there have been many changes to the scoring, making it more practical but also thinning it out. The reduction of spoken dialogue and the lightening of the orchestral texture make life a little easier for the singers (though not for the soprano singing Gepopo, which Ligeti has described as an attempt to out-Zerbinetta Zerbinetta) and for the players. The whole performance is rather more assured than Howarth's and the score's beauties are more lovingly polished. It now sounds rather closer to a 'normal' opera and, perhaps inevitably, lacks a degree of Howarth's alarming impact.

Interestingly enough, it is Salonen's performance, sung in English to a French audience, that draws more laughs at the jokes. Sibylle Ehlert is spectacularly virtuoso and Willard White's gravity is effective in the role of Nekrotzar. Graham Clark is hugely exuberant as Piet the Pot, and Steven Cole and Richard Suart make a splendid double-act of the two Ministers. Jard van Nes and Frode Olsen are perhaps inhibited by the English language from making Mescalina and Astradamors as grotesque as they can be, though both sing well, as does every other member of the cast. The recording, like the performance, is a little more comfortable, rather less in-your-face, than Howarth's. This version is the one to have – Ligeti's revisions are all improvements, and the performance is a fine one – but the older one has a shade more of the quality that Ligeti says he has hoped for in stage productions of the opera, that of 'demoniacal farce'.

Further listening
Ligeti Aventures
Couplings: Nonsense Madrigals. Mysteries of the Macabre. Nouvelles Aventures. Der Sommer. Three Weores Songs. Five Arany Songs. Four Wedding Dances
Soloists; Philharmonia Orchestra / Salonen
Sony Classical SK62311 (72 minutes: DDD: 1/97) Ⓕ

A richly entertaining collection, a sort of autobiography, ranging from Ligeti's early folk-song arrangements to the 'non-tonal but diatonic' Nonsense Madrigals, which are hugely inventive and funny.

Magnus Lindberg

Finnish 1958

Following piano studies, Lindberg entered the Sibelius Academy where his composition teachers included Rautavaara and Heininen. Heininen encouraged his pupils to explore the works of the European avant-garde, and this led c1980 to the founding of the informal grouping known as the Ears Open Society, through which Lindberg and his contemporaries aimed to encourage a greater awareness of mainstream modernism. Lindberg's compositional breakthrough came with two large-scale works, Action-Situation-Signification (1982) and Kraft (1983-85). Action, the work in which Lindberg first turned to musique concrète, led to his founding with Esa-Pekka Salonen the experimental Toimii Ensemble. This group, in which he plays piano and percussion, has provided him with a laboratory for his sonic development. During the late 1980s Lindberg's music approached a new modernist classicism, in which many of the communicative ingredients of a vibrant musical language (harmony, rhythm, counterpoint, melody) were reinterpreted. Key scores in this period were the orchestral/ensemble triptych Kinetics (1988), Marea (1989-90) and Joy (1989-90), reaching fulfilment in Aura (1993-94) and Arena (1994-95). Recent works, including Feria (1997), Fresco (1997) Cantigas (1999) the Cello Concerto (1999) and most recently Gran Duo (2000) have established Lindberg's international reputation as one of Finland's leading orchestral composers.

Cello Concerto

Cello Concerto^{b}. Cantigas^{a}. Parada. Fresco
^{a}Christopher O'Neal ob ^{b}Anssi Karttunen vc
Philharmonia Orchestra / Esa-Pekka Salonen
Sony Classical SK89810 (80 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

A rebel whose early work was a poke in the eye for the Finnish musical establishment, Lindberg has repositioned himself in the mainstream with a series of pieces that depend less on the theatrics of live performance and more on traditional, 'classical' notions of virtuoso orchestral writing and long-range harmonic thinking. The idiom is very much his own but, if it helps, think Berio, Lutosławski, Sibelius and a lot of extra notes and apocalyptic drum thwacks.

Cantigas begins calmly, the interval of a perfect fifth permeating its opening oboe melody. The argument quickly turns dark, extravagant and very loud, with the exceptionally busy surfaces that are a hallmark of this composer's work. Some find the effect exhilarating. Others suspect that the near-constant presence of rapid figuration coruscating over slower-moving harmonies is driven by the availability of appropriate software. Wonderfully limpid passages, as exquisitely scored as anything in Oliver Knussen, coexist with near-cacophony. There may be a lack of heart, but, as in much of Lindberg's recent music, the musical current is immensely compelling.

While Parada's ravishing invention is easy to enjoy, this may or may not be the place to start for the uninitiated. If the Cello Concerto makes more sense, that isn't because its idiom is less advanced but because there is a central protagonist whose progress we can follow. And Lindberg provides Anssi Karttunen with some fantastical technical challenges along the way. One could not describe the results as emotionally compelling. Rather, they constitute an unmissable show. The performances are brilliant and the recorded sound top-notch.

Aura

Aura[a]. Engine[b]
[b]London Sinfonietta, [a]BBC Symphony Orchestra / Oliver Knussen
DG 20/21 463 184-2GH (51 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded [b]1997 and [a]1998 ●●

Back in 1985, Kraft defined an approach to the orchestra overflowing with new and challenging ideas. The intervening years saw those ideas streamlined, even simplified, but not compromised, so that the generous span of Aura, completed in 1994, forms the natural climax of an exploratory and liberating decade.

Playing for some 37 minutes, Aura falls into four continuous sections, defined as much by variety of incident as by contrast in character. A lengthy gathering of, and focusing on salient ideas leads to a powerfully sustained phase of monumental imagery and grandeur worthy of Bruckner, before a 'scherzo' of great cumulative energy overspills into a 'finale' which draws together the conflicting elements into a peroration of Sibelian inevitability.

Listening to this work in parallel with Per Nørgård's Fifth Symphony (Chandos) and its searing, masterly layering of harmonic and rhythmic densities, confirms that Lindberg is ghosting the medium rather than remaking it. Aura is gripping music even so, and Knussen's control over both the smallest detail and the broader soundscape, galvanising the BBC Symphony into playing of real class, makes the listening experience the more riveting.

Engine (1996) stands in absolute contrast: progressing in sharply defined textural blocks, with more than a hint of verse and refrain, this is Lindberg the constructivist, assembling a mosaic which resolves with satisfying unexpectedness. With first-rate playing from the London Sinfonietta, this is a disc which can only enhance Lindberg's stature.

Franz Liszt

Hungarian 1811-1886

GROVE Liszt was taught the piano by his father and then Czerny, establishing himself as a remarkable concert artist by the age of 12. In Paris he studied theory and composition with Reicha and Paer; he wrote an opera and bravura piano pieces and toured France, Switzerland and England before ill-health and religious doubt made him reassess his career. Intellectual growth came through literature, and the urge to create through hearing opera and especially Paganini, whose spectacular effects Liszt transferred to the piano in original works and operatic fantasias. Meanwhile he gave lessons and began his stormy relationship (1833-44) with the (married) Countess Marie d'Agoult. They lived in Switzerland and Italy and had three children.

The greatest pianist of his time, Liszt composed some of the most difficult piano music ever written and had an extraordinarily broad repertory, from Scarlatti onwards; he invented the modern piano recital. To help raise funds for the Bonn Beethoven monument, he resumed the life of a travelling virtuoso from 1839-47; he was adulated everywhere he went. In 1848 he took up a full-time conducting post at the Weimar court, where, living with the Princess Carolyne Sayn-Wittgenstein, he wrote or revised most of the major works for which he is known, conducted new operas by Wagner, Berlioz and Verdi and, as the teacher of Hans von Bülow and others in the German avant-garde, became the figurehead of the 'New German school'. In 1861-9 he lived mainly in Rome, writing religious works (he took minor orders in 1865); from 1870 he journeyed regularly between Rome, Weimar and Budapest. He remained active as a teacher and performer to the end of his life.

Two formal traits give Liszt's compositions a personal stamp: experiment with large-scale structures (extending traditional sonata form, unifying multi-movement works), and thematic transformation, or subjecting a single short idea to changes of mode, rhythm, metre, tempo or accompaniment to form the thematic basis of an entire work (as in Les préludes, the Faust-Symphonie). His 'transcendental' piano technique was similarly imaginative, springing from a desire to make the piano sound like an orchestra or as rich in scope as one. In harmony he ventured well beyond the use of augmented and diminished chords and the whole-tone scale; the late piano and choral works especially include a strikingly advanced chromaticism.

Piano works make up the greater part of Liszt's output; they range from the brilliant early studies and lyric nature pieces of the first set of Années de pèlerinage to the finely dramatic and logical B minor Sonata, a masterpiece of 19th-century piano literature. The piano works from the 1870s onwards are more austere and withdrawn, some of them impressionistic, even gloomy (Années, third set). Not all the piano music is free of bombast but among the arrangements, the symphonic transcriptions (notably of Berlioz, Beethoven and Schubert) are often faithful and ingenious, the operatic fantasias more than mere salon pieces.

Liszt invented the term 'sinfonische Dichtung' (symphonic poem) for orchestral works that did not obey traditional forms strictly and were based generally on a literary or pictorial idea. Whether first conceived as overtures (Les préludes) or as works for other media (Mazeppa), these pieces emphasize musical construction much more than story-telling. The three-movement Faust Symphony too, with its vivid character studies of Faust, Gretchen and Mephistopheles, relies on technical artifice (especially thematic transformation) more than musical narrative to convey its message; it is often considered Liszt's supreme masterpiece. Although he failed in his aim to revolutionise liturgical music, he did create in his psalm settings, Missa solemnis and the oratorio Christus some intensely dramatic choral music.

Piano Concertos

No 1 in E flat, S124; No 2 in A, S125; No 3 in E flat, S125a, Op Posth (ed Rosenblatt)

Piano Concertos Nos 1[a] and 2[a].
Beethoven Piano Sonatas Nos 10, 19 and 20
Sviatoslav Richter pf
London Symphony Orchestra / Kyrill Kondrashin
Philips 50 Great Recordings 464 710-2PM Ⓜ
(70 minutes: ADD)
Recorded [a]1961 and 1963 ●●●

These were recognised as classic performances virtually from their first appearance. They are characterised not only by the intense expressiveness of Richter's playing, but also by very careful balances of orchestral texture which hitherto had not been much apparent in recordings of these works. Throughout, the emphasis is on poetic insight, dramatic impact, and these interpretations have in these and other regards exerted a considerable influence. Yet even if sensitive readings of Liszt's concertos are now less rare, this in no way weakens the impression made by Richter's and Kondrashin's. In short, these are among the great Liszt recordings.

Piano Concertos Nos 1 and 2. Totentanz, S126
Krystian Zimerman pf
Boston Symphony Orchestra / Seiji Ozawa Ⓕ
DG 423 571-2GH (56 minutes: DDD) ●

This is playing in the grand manner. From the start of First Concerto you are aware of a consciously leonine approach. Zimerman even deliberately takes risks in a few technically perilous places where some of his colleagues, at least in the studio, play safe; and indeed his octaves in the opening cadenza are an example. The result sounds spontaneous and, yes, even brave. Ozawa and the orchestra are behind the soloist in all this. Not only do lyrical sections sing with subtlety, the big passages also are shapely. There is plenty of drive in this Concerto. In the Second Concerto Zimerman adopts a different approach; he evidently considers it a more poetic piece and the playing style, strong though it is, is to match. Finely though he handles the gentler music, there are odd sniffs and hums in the molto espressivo passage following the D flat major cello solo, and also in the last of the work's quiet sections. In the gorgeously grisly Totentanz, both the music and the playing should make your hair stand on end. The sound has a depth that suits the music and the piano is especially impressive. Zimerman's freshness (he reminds us that this is a young man's music), and the coupling, makes this disc a most desirable one.

Piano Concertos Nos 1 and 2. Totentanz
Alfred Brendel pf
London Philharmonic Orchestra / Bernard Haitink
Philips Silver Line 426 637-2PSL (56 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1976

Few pianists have ever made a more persuasive case for Liszt than Alfred Brendel. He penetrates far below the surface of the composer's emotional vortex and surface rhetoric. This set shows him at his very finest and Bernard Haitink conducts the London Philharmonic Orchestra with comparable distinction; indeed it is orchestral playing of the highest calibre. The disc opens with the Second Piano Concerto, sounding wonderful from the very first bar, and the coupling, the E flat Concerto and the rarer Totentanz, are hardly any less memorable, combining brilliance with warmth and subtlety of keyboard colouring. The recording, too, is very good, if not quite so richly textured as more modern recordings.

Piano Concertos Nos 1-3
Concerto Pathétique, S365a (orch Reuss).
Louis Lortie pf The Hague Residentie Orchestra / George Pehlivanian
Chandos CHAN9918 (69 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

This volume (No 3) triumphantly concludes Louis Lortie's Chandos cycle of Liszt's works for piano and orchestra. Once again his mastery is as fluent as it is scintillating. Less heart-stopping or intense than his finest rivals in the two concertos (Richter and Zimerman, and Argerich in No 1 only) his occasional distance lends enchantment, and his aristocratic brilliance brings a special distinction to pages inviting heaviness and theatricality.

He does all that is humanly possible with the Third Concerto, which received its première in 1990, yet even he, alive to moments of authentic Lisztian rhetoric, can do little to erase one's sense of music in urgent need of revision. Likewise the Concerto Pathétique, judiciously arranged from a variety of sources, storms and rants with the sort of self-conscious drama that often came too easily to Liszt; never more so than in the all-guns-blazing Allegro trionfante conclusion. But again, the performance is exemplary, the recordings of demonstration quality with a sensible rather than spectacular balance, and George Pehlivanian and The Hague Residentie Orchestra prove themselves admirable partners, even when they are hardly maestoso at the start of the First Concerto. A splendid conclusion to a most distinguished series.

Liszt Piano Concerto No 1
Chopin Piano Concerto No 1 in E minor, Op 11
Martha Argerich pf
London Symphony Orchestra / Claudio Abbado
DG The Originals 449 719-2GOR Ⓜ
(56 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1968 ●

These performances, in DG's beautifully refurbished sound, remain as fanciful and coruscating as the day they were made. Argerich's fluency and re-creative spark dazzle and dumbfound to a unique degree but, given her reputation for fire-eating virtuosity, it is perhaps necessary to say that both performances quiver with rare sensitivity as well as drama. Time and again she gives a telling and haunting poetic counterpoint to her, arguably, more familiar way of trailing clouds of virtuoso glory. Abbado partners his mercurial soloist as to the manner born, finding (in the Chopin in particular) a burgeoning sense of wonder where others sound dry and foursquare.

Additional recommendations

Piano Concertos
Couplings: Fantasia on Hungarian Folk Themes, S123 Chopin Andante spianato and Grande polonaise
in E flat, Op 22
Richter pf London Symphony Orchestra / Kondrashin
BBC Legends/IMG Artists mono BBCL4031-2 Ⓜ
(69 minutes: ADD: 4/00). Live recording

Richter's London début concerts in July 1961 were the sensation of the season, and the Liszt piano concertos at the Royal Albert Hall were the climax. Solos are miked very close by today's standards but only in this respect do the concertos yield to the famous Philips studio versions, made a little later during the same London visit.

Piano Concertos^{ab}
Couplings: Mephisto Waltz. Transcendental Study, S139 No 1^{c}. Grand Fantaisie de bravoure sur La Clochette de Paganini
Ogdon pf ^{a}Bournemouth Symphony Orchestra / Silvestri; ^{b}BBC Symphony Orchestra / C Davis
BBC Legends/IMG Artists ^{c}mono BBCL4089-2 Ⓕ
(73 minutes: ADD). Recorded live, 1967-1971

Ogdon plays here with all those characteristics inseparable from his genius: his improvisatory daring, his thrills, spills and poetry. An invaluable issue with excellent sound, Ogdon playing as if his life depended upon it.

A Dante Symphony

A Dante Symphony, S109^{a}. Années de pèlerinage – deuxième année, S161, 'Italie' – No 7, Après une lecture du Dante (fantasia quasi sonata)^{b}
^{a}Berlin Radio Women's Chorus; ^{a}Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Daniel Barenboim ^{b}pf
Teldec 9031-77340-2 (67 minutes: DDD). Ⓜ
Item marked ^{a} recorded live in 1992

This disc proves conclusively that the Dante Symphony (a contemporary of the Faust Symphony) is no longer one that needs its apologists. Tone, full and rounded, firm and true, and rock-steady pacing elevate the symphony's opening beyond its all too familiar resemblance to a third-rate horror-film soundtrack. As the symphony progresses, together with the countless examples of Berlin tone and artistry filling out, refining or shaping gestures in often revelatory ways, one becomes aware of Daniel Barenboim's skill in maintaining the large-scale tension he has created. And that is a very real achievement.

As for the final choral Magnificat, if Liszt owed Wagner a debt of gratitude for persuading him to conclude the symphony with the 'noble and softly soaring' bars that precede a more noisily affirmative appended coda, in Barenboim's Magnificat (and much else in the symphony), it is Wagner's debt to Liszt that is more readily apparent; the *Parsifal*ian radiance of these final pages is unmistakable. More importantly, for once they sound convincingly conclusive. The Dante Sonata was recorded with the kind of risk-taking abandon and occasionally less than perfect execution that you might expect from a live event. Improvisatory, impulsive and full of extreme contrasts, Barenboim's Dante Sonata is vividly pictorial. The instrument itself (closely miked and widely spaced) sounds larger than life. This recording is, in a word, riveting. The recording of the symphony is spacious, focused and expertly balanced.

A Faust Symphony, S108

A Faust Symphony
Kenneth Riegel ten
Tanglewood Festival Chorus; Boston Symphony Orchestra / Leonard Bernstein
DG The Originals 447 449-2GOR Ⓜ
(77 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1976 ●

David Gutman's absorbing booklet-note for the Leonard Bernstein release informs us that at a particular Tanglewood concert in 1941

(August 8) Bernstein scored a triumph in modern American repertoire and Serge Koussevitzky conducted the first two movements of A Faust Symphony. Some 20 years later Bernstein himself made a distinguished recording of the work, faster than this superb 1976 Boston remake by almost five minutes yet ultimately less involving. The passage of time witnessed not only an easing of tempo but a heightened response to individual characters, be it Faust's swings in mood and attitude, Gretchen's tender entreaties or the unpredictable shadow-play of 'Mephistopheles'. Orchestral execution is first-rate, the strings in particular really showing their mettle (such biting incisiveness), while Bernstein's pacing, although often slower than average, invariably fits the mood. The sound too is far warmer and more lifelike than its rather opaque New York predecessor, although when it comes to the tenor soloist in the closing chorus, Kenneth Riegel is rather strident.

A Faust Symphony
András Molnár ten
Hungarian State Choir; Orchestra of the Franz Liszt Academy / András Ligeti Ⓢ
Naxos 8 553304 (73 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1994

There's a lot right with this performance, not least being its outspoken acknowledgement of Faust's stormy character. Liszt's first-movement portrait receives zestful advocacy, less polished than some, perhaps, but fired by immense gusto. The recording, too, is endowed with plenty of body, while András Ligeti's vocal promptings vie with Toscanini's in La bohème! Gretchen is quite comely and Ligeti effectively traces both her darker moods and those passages associated with Faust's yearning. Mephistopheles is more angry than 'ironico' and if you want confirmation of Ligeti's Lisztian mettle, then try from 5'49" through the following minute or so: it is quite thrilling. True, woodwind pointing isn't as vivid as under, say, Leonard Bernstein, but there is certainly no lack of enthusiasm. The Orchestra of the Franz Liszt Academy gives its all and the Hungarian State Choir makes noble music of the final chorus, even though András Molnár's wobbly tenor proves to be something of a distraction. It's a compelling if flawed production, less carefully prepared than its best rivals but more spontaneous than most.

Hungarian Rhapsodies, S359

(Orch cpsr/Doppler) – No 1 in F minor (piano No 14); No 2 in D minor (piano No 2 in C sharp minor); No 3 in D (piano No 6 in D flat); No 4 in D minor (piano No 12 in C sharp minor). No 5 in E minor (piano No 5); No 6 in D, 'Carnival in Pest, (piano No 9 in E flat)

Hungarian Rhapsodies Nos 1-6
Budapest Festival Orchestra / Iván Fischer
Philips 456 570-2PH (60 minutes: DDD). Ⓕ
Recorded 1997 ●●

Fischer's idiomatic foray into this well-worn repertoire is distinguished by tonal lustre and high spirits, with the authentic gipsy violin of József 'Csócsi' Lendvay lending a touch of added spice to No 3 (i.e. the piano No 6) and a tangy cimbalom much in evidence throughout. Rubato is legion, though more improvisatory than schmaltzy. Even if you have never particularly liked Doppler's version of the Second, Fischer's performance is so vivid, so imaginative of phrasing, that you may well be won over. Charm is in generous supply everywhere. There is plenty of power, too, with meaty brass and growling crescendos at the start of No 4, and a riot of colour to close No 6. Fischer's Hungarian Rhapsodies are as frisky as foals and as flavoursome as goulash, as dashing and as dancing as anyone might want. They are further aided by excellent, full-bodied sound.

Symphonic Poems

Les Préludes, S97. Mazeppa, S100. Tasso, S96. Orpheus, S98. Mephisto Waltz No 2
Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchestra / Kurt Masur
EMI Encore 575623-2 (72 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
(75 minutes: DDD). Recorded late 1980s ●●

These are strong, exciting and idiomatic performances. Masur draws impassioned playing from the Gewandhaus orchestra in the best known of the tone poems, Les Préludes, but he drives the music along forcefully in Mazeppa's ride without the sense of self-indulgence that is a danger in such virtuoso romantic pieces: the energy is made to come from within, rather than being applied from without. Tasso is always described as rather a gloomy and unsatisfactory work; it can be made to hold together effectively, as here. So can Orpheus, which includes some of Liszt's most beautiful effects. These, as well as the vehemence of the playing in Mazeppa and Les Préludes, are well contained by the recording, even if once or twice there is some slightly artificial balance. But the disc is a safe recommendation for anyone who loves Liszt, and a fine introduction to some superb music for anyone who does not.

Ce qu'on entend sur la montagne, S95. Tasso, S96. Les Préludes, S97. Orpheus, S98. Prometheus, S99. Festklänge, S101. Mazeppa, S100
London Philharmonic Orchestra / Bernard Haitink
Philips ② 438 751-2PM2 (127 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1968-71

Héroïde funèbre, S102. Die Ideale, S106. Mephisto Waltz No 1, S514, 'Der Tanz in der Dorfschenke'; No 2, S110. Hungaria, S103. Hamlet, S104. Hunnenschlacht, S105. Von der Wiege bis zum Grabe, S107
London Philharmonic Orchestra / Bernard Haitink

Philips ② 438 754-2PM2 (131 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1968-71

The 12 'numbered' symphonic poems date from Liszt's rich maturity, with the lean, near-expressionist Von der Wiege bis zum Grabe ('From the Cradle to the Grave') following on after a period of some 25 years. Haitink's readings have an abundance of personality. In Héroïde funèbre, for example, his dangerously slow tempo exceeds Liszt's prescribed timing by some seven minutes: it is a terrifying vision, superbly sustained and beautifully played. He also copes manfully with the more explosive aspects of Hamlet, Prometheus and Hunnenchlacht, and his way with the scores' many reflective episodes is entirely winning.

Elsewhere, he sorts through the complexities of Liszt's colourful orchestration with a cool head and a warm heart, etching the frequent examples of 'nature music' much as he does Wagner's and keeping abreast of each tone-poem's narrative trail. True, some of Liszt's marcatos, impetuosos, appassionatos and agitatos are occasionally brought to heel, but then others aren't – and we have Liszt's blessing for flexibility in what he himself terms 'the degree of sympathy' that conductors employ for his work. What matters is that Haitink has us enter Liszt's world direct, rather than through the distorting mirror of the conductor's own ego. It is a volatile sequence, yes, and not without its longueurs, but it remains an essential musical confrontation for all students of the Romantic orchestra and an accurate pointer to where Tchaikovsky, Smetana and countless others found significant musical sustenance. The sound is excellent.

Tasso, S96. Trois Odes funèbres, S112
Berlin Radio Men's Chorus; Berlin Radio Symphony Orchestra / Karl Anton Rickenbacher
Koch Schwann 317682 (57 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1994

Rickenbacher's is a strong and sombre reading of Tasso that responds to the powerful opening – much the best music in a very uneven work – and does well with the minuet passage and with the later pages in which Liszt is at his most assertive and least creative. Nevertheless, the record has a claim on Lisztians for the inclusion, as what appears to be a first recording, of three very fine works that have lain neglected. Two are personal elegies, moving laments on the death of his son Daniel and his eldest daughter Blandine. 'Les morts', a so-called Oration for Orchestra for Daniel, makes use of a chorus to intone, during the work, words by the Christian thinker who at one stage profoundly affected Liszt, the Abbé Lammenais. 'La notte', for Blandine, is based on Il penseroso, from the Italian book of the Années de pèlerinage, but also includes some haunting Hungarian reminiscences. He asked for these two works to be played at his funeral. Dying half-ignored in Bayreuth, he went to his grave without any proper music. The Odes were not performed until 1912. The third is a kind of pendant to Tasso, and uses some of its themes. The Odes are strong and moving works, perhaps difficult to programme in concerts even individually. To have them available at last, in an ideal recording, in very sympathetic performances, is a cause for some gratitude.

Piano Sonata in B minor, S178

Liszt Piano Sonata. Hungarian Rhapsody No 6
Brahms Two Rhapsodies, Op 79
Schumann Piano Sonata No 2 in G minor, Op 22
Martha Argerich pf
DG Galleria 437 252-2GGA (64 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1963-72 ●●●

No one could accuse Martha Argerich of unstructured rêverie or dalliance and her legendary DG performance of the Liszt Sonata from 1972 suggests a unique level of both technical and musical achievement. Her prodigious fluency unites with a trail-blazing temperament, and Valhalla itself never ignited to such effect as at the central Andante's central climax. Both here and in the final Prestissimo there are reminders that Argerich has always played octaves like single notes, displaying a technique that few if any could equal. There are times when she becomes virtually engulfed in her own virtuosity yet this is a performance to make other pianists turn pale and ask, how is it possible to play like this?

Argerich's Schumann, too, is among her most meteoric, headlong flights. In terms of sheer brilliance she leaves all others standing yet, amazingly, still allows us fleeting glimpses of Eusebius (the poetic dreamer in Schumann, and one of his most dearly cherished fictions). The Brahms and Liszt Rhapsodies, taken from Argerich's very first 1963 DG disc, are among the most incandescent yet refined on record. The sound, when you bother to notice it, is excellent. (The Liszt and Brahms works, are also included in a compilation disc reviewed in the Collections section; refer to the Index.)

Piano Sonata. Nuages gris, S199a. Unstern: sinistre, disastro, S208. La lugubre gondola, S200, No 1a. R W – Venezia, S201[a]
Maurizio Pollini pf
DG 427 322-2GH (46 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Items marked [a] recorded live in 1988

No prizes for predicting that this Liszt B minor Sonata is technically flawless and beautifully structured. What may come as more of a shock is its sheer passion. To say that he plays as if his life depended on it is an understatement, and those who regularly accuse him of coolness should sit down in a quiet room with this recording, a decent hi-fi system and a large plateful of their own words. The opening creates a sense of coiled expectancy, without recourse to a mannered delivery, and Pollini's superior fingerwork is soon evident. His virtuosity gains an extra dimension from his ability at the same time to convey resistance to it – the double octaves are demonstrably a fraction slower than usual and yet somehow feel faster, or at least more urgent.

There is tensed steel in the very fabric of the playing. By the two-minute mark so much passion has been unleashed one is bound to wonder if it has not all happened too soon. But that is to underestimate Pollini's unerring grasp of the dramatic structure and its psychological progression from paragraph to paragraph; it is also to underestimate his capacity to find extra technical resources when it would seem beyond the power of flesh and blood to do so. Another contributing factor, is his determination to maintain the flow in lyrical paragraphs, at tempos slightly more forward-looking and with breathing-spaces slightly less conspicuous than usual. The final page is pure mastery, a fitting conclusion to a spell-binding performance. It seems not so much that Pollini has got inside the soul of the music but that the music has got inside him and used him, without mercy, for its own ends. In Pollini's hands Unstern certainly has a fine inexorable tread and La lugubre gondola and R W – Venezia are both beautifully weighted. The audience adds nothing to the sense of involvement in any of the three live recordings. The background ambience changes suddenly in La lugubre gondola. Still, after such a classic account of the Sonata, anything would have been an anti-climax.

Piano Sonata. Two Légendes, S175. Scherzo and March, S177
Nikolai Demidenko pf
Hyperion CDA66616 (67 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1992

Even in an impossibly competitive field Demidenko's Liszt Sonata stands out among the most imperious and articulate. His opening is precisely judged and once the Sonata is under its inflammatory way his virtuosity is of a kind to which few other pianists could pretend. The combination of punishing weight and a skittering, light-fingered agility makes for a compulsive vividness yet his economy in the first cantando espressivo, sung without a trace of luxuriance or indulgence, is no less typical. There are admittedly times when he holds affection at arm's length, but just as you are wondering why he commences the central Andante so loudly he at once withdraws into a wholly apposite remoteness or reticence. The final climax, too, is snapped off not only with a stunning sense of Lisztian drama but also with an even truer sense and understanding of Liszt's score and instructions.

Demidenko's couplings are no less autocratic, with a capacity to make seemingly arbitrary ideas sound unarguable. His Légendes are far from benign, yet his tautness and graphic sense of their poetic power carry their own authority. Finally, Demidenko is in his element in the Scherzo and March's diablerie, music which coming after the two Légendes, affects one like an upside-down crucifix, or some dark necromancy. The recording is outstanding.

Piano Sonata in B minor. Années de pèlerinage – Première année: Suisse – 'Vallée d'Obermann'. Two Concert Studies. Harmonies poétiques et réligieuses – No 3, 'Bénédiction de Dieu dans la solitude' Claudio Arrau pf
Philips 50 Great Recordings 464 713-2PM Ⓜ
(74 minutes: ADD) ●

Listening once more to Arrau's Liszt is to recollect those many occasions in the concert hall when he seemed like Atlas holding aloft the universe, absorbed in a gargantuan feat that left his audience limp with exhaustion. Opulent, magisterial and of a range that few other pianists would contemplate, Arrau's Liszt B minor Sonata remains a towering achievement. The build to the climax of the central Andante sostenuto seems so choked on its own emotion it can scarcely move and, love it or hate it, that stammering climb through the final Allegro moderato is pure Arrau; the playing of a man possessed and not given to half measures. The 'Bénédiction' is taken very slowly, yet the result – apart from a curiously choppy and didactic view of the central Andante or blessing – is ineffable rather than literal. No more subtly lit recording of 'Waldesrauschen' exists, and the final triumphant home-coming in 'Vallée d'Obermann' is overwhelming. In other words Arrau joins 'those who, by the dint of glass and vapour,/ Discover stars, and sail in the wind's eye.' (Byron).

Années de pèlerinage

Première année, S160, 'Suisse'; Deuxième année, S161, 'Italie'; Troisième année, S163

Années de pèlerinage – Première année[a]
Venezia e Napoli, S162[b]
Sergio Fiorentino pf
APR APR5583 (72 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded [b]1962 and [a]1963 ●

The third volume of Sergio Fiorentino's early Liszt recordings made during the 60s unites the contemplative (Volume 1) and the virtuoso (Volume 2). Fiorentino's performances are of a rare virtuosity and imaginative delicacy, and one doubts whether the sense of bells ringing gently and exultantly through the crystalline Swiss air in 'Les cloches de Genève' has often been caught more evocatively (con somma passione). He rightly makes the gloomy and Byronic 'Vallée d'Obermann' the nodal and expressive centre of the cycle, fully justifying and sustaining his audaciously slow tempo (it is, after all, marked lento) and, throughout, his performances are alive with the sort of fantasy and freedom that eluded Jorge Bolet in his more cautious Gramophone Award-winning Decca recording (12/84). Sadly Fiorentino recorded only one work from the official Italian Année ('Sposalizio') so this disc ends with its supplement, Venezia e Napoli, a garland of encores that show off his poetic resource and, in the 'Tarantella', quicksilver brilliance to perfection. Fiorentino's early Saga recordings often suggested an enviable, if occasionally flippant facility, but here he is at his finest; even when he playfully tampers with the score (in 'Les cloches de Genève) it is usually to Liszt's advantage. The transfers have come up trumps.

Années de pèlerinage – Première année; Deuxième année; Troisième année. Venezia e Napoli, S162
Lazar Berman pf
DG Collectors' Edition ③ 471 447-2GB3 Ⓜ
(176 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1977 ●

Liszt's three volumes of Années de pèlerinage are rarely recorded complete, largely because many pianists remain baffled by the dark-hued prophecy and Romanticism of the third and final book. Berman's resource here is remarkable and his performance of the entire book is hauntingly inward and sympathetic to both the radiance of 'Les jeux d'eau à la Villa d'Este' and to Liszt's truly dark night of the soul, and to his desolate lack of spiritual solace elsewhere. He is hardly less persuasive in the first two books. 'Chapelle de Guillaume Tell' is a true celebration of Switzerland's republican hero with alpine horns ringing through the mountains, while in 'Au lac de Wallenstadt' Berman's gently undulating traversal is truly pianissimo and dolcissimo egualamente. His 'Orage' is predictably breathtaking, and in the gloomy Byronic 'Vallée d'Obermann' the severest critic will find himself mesmerised by Berman's free-wheeling eloquence. These superb recordings have been finely remastered.

Additional recommendation
Années de pèlerinage – Deuxième année, S161: Après une lecture du Dante
Couplings: Valse oubliée No 4, S215. Mephisto Waltzes Nos 1, 2 and 4. Die Zelle in Nonnenwerth, S534bis. Ballade No 2 in B minor, S171. Harmonies poétiques et réligieuses, S173 – No 9, Andante lagrimoso Andsnes pf
EMI 570022-2 (74 minutes: DDD: 03/01). Ⓕ

Leif Ove Andsnes's Dante Sonata is outstandingly well paced and his Ballade excitingly coloured and powerfully projected.

12 Grandes Etudes, S137

Complete Solo Piano Music, Volume 34
Douze Grandes Etudes, S137
Morceau de salon, S142
Leslie Howard pf
Hyperion CDA66973 (76 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1994

In this first recording of the concert version of the Douze Grandes Etudes (1837), Leslie Howard brings his customary technical wizardry to bear on this outrageously difficult music in an arresting virtuoso display that demonstrates Liszt's consummate skill at transforming musical material. Moreover, despite Liszt's exhortation that only the later revisions of the studies should be played, there is a great deal to recommend the 1837 set, as these performances attest. The extreme technical demands of these pieces have led to critical scorn, but the challenges they contain are not designed merely for display, but are the result of the composer's comprehensive exploitation of the piano's expressive capabilities. Saint-Saëns said that 'in Art a difficulty overcome is a thing of beauty' and, in the present instance, Howard's own triumph over the monumental difficulties posed by these pieces reveals the astonishing beauty of Liszt's 'orchestral' use of tone colour and sparkling virtuosity.

19 Hungarian Rhapsodies, S244

No 1 in C sharp minor; No 2 in C sharp minor; No 3 in B flat; No 4 in E flat; No 5 in E minor, 'Héroïde-Elégiaque'; No 6 in D flat; No 7 in D minor; No 8 in F sharp minor, 'Capriccio'; No 9 in E flat, 'Carnival in Pest'; No 10 in E; No 11 in A minor; No 12 in C sharp minor; No 13 in A minor; No 14 in F minor; No 15 in A minor 'Rákóczy'; No 16 in A minor, 'For the Munkascy festivities in Budapest'; No 17 in D minor; No 18 in F sharp minor, 'On the occasion of the Hungarian Exposition in Budapest'; No 19 in D minor

---

Hungarian Rhapsodies Nos 1-19. Rhapsodie espagnole, S254
Roberto Szidon pf
DG ② 453 034-2GTA2 (156 minutes: ADD). Ⓜ
Recorded 1972 ●

This well-known set has been in and out of the catalogue a number of times, always to considerable acclaim. And the performances are every bit as good as everybody has always said. Although individual readings of isolated Rhapsodies may surpass Szidon's, taken as a whole this is certainly the most pleasurable set available. Szidon's technique is especially geared towards clarity of passagework and rhythmic precision and he also possesses a convincingly dreamy temperament that enables the slow passages to emerge with a rare distinction. His technical mastery is in no doubt and this is playing of great flair, with a natural feeling for rubato. The Rapsodie espagnole is a welcome bonus. The sound is sympathetic and vivid.

Hungarian Rhapsodies Nos 2 and 9. Ballade No 2 in B minor, S171. Bénédiction de Dieu dans la solitude, S173 No 3. Berceuse, S174. Polonaise in C minor, S223 No 1. Scherzo and March, S177 H
Louis Kentner pf
APR mono APR5514 (79 minutes: ADD). Ⓜ
Recorded 1937-41 ●●

This glorious recital is a timely reminder of

Louis Kentner's greatness, his richness and enterprise during his heyday. Here is playing which in its life-affirming sweep and opulence makes accusations concerning Liszt's theatricality doubly misleading. What expansiveness, what true molto espressivo Kentner achieves in the Second Hungarian Rhapsody, what poetic warmth and freedom in the more heartfelt, soaring melodies of the First Polonaise and Second Ballade. True, some may find him more luxuriant than devotional in the Bénédiction (a reminder, perhaps, that the temporal and spiritual aspects of Liszt's life were opposite sides of the same coin) but the personal charisma and magnetism are in any case a far cry from our own age where one pianist is so easily mistaken for another. In the Scherzo and March, where Liszt sardonically raises hell-fire, Kentner's mastery is unassailable, and his elegance in the ravishing Berceuse (so closely modelled on Chopin yet so far from his classic economy) again evokes a time when pianists were indeed kings of the keyboard. Above all, these performances show a patrician ease that makes you sit back and marvel, and forget a later period when Kentner's playing sadly became a parody of its former quality. Superb transfers.

Hungarian Themes ..., S242

Complete Solo Piano Music, Volume 29
Hungarian Themes and Rhapsodies, S242
Leslie Howard pf
Hyperion ② CDA66851/2 (159 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1993

When listening to these 22 pieces, officially entitled Magyar Dalok and Magyar Rapszódiák, you at once realise you've heard many a snatch of them before. And not surprisingly, for they are in fact the source of most of what eventually emerged as Liszt's world-wide best-sellers, the Hungarian Rhapsodies. The composer revels in the lavishly decorative, cimbalom-coloured, improvisational style of the gypsies, in the process making demands on the pianist variously described by Leslie Howard in his insert-notes as 'devil-may-care, frighteningly difficult, frenetic, hand-splitting' and so on. Whether because of Liszt's own waning interest in platform pyrotechnics, or the fact that only he could really bring them off, simplification seems to have been the primary aim when recasting these first flings as Hungarian Rhapsodies. But as Howard reveals, there are losses as well as gains in the maturer Liszt. Despite moments of protracted rodomontade there is a vast amount of enjoyment to be had.

Opera transcriptions / paraphrases

Oberon – Overture, S574 (Weber). Fantasia on themes from Le nozze di Figaro and Don Giovanni, S697 (Mozart). Ernani Paraphrase, S432. Miserere du Trovatore, S433. Rigoletto Paraphrase, S434. Réminiscences de Boccanegra, S438 (Verdi). Valse de concert sur deux motifs du Lucia et Parisina, S214/3 (Donizetti). Réminiscences de Robert le diable (Meyerbeer) – Cavatine; Valse infernale, S413. Les Adieux – Rêverie sur un motif de Roméo et Juliette, S409 (Gounod). Schwanengesang and Marsch from Hunyadi László, S405 (Erkel). Lohengrin – Elsa's Bridal Procession, S445/2; Two Pieces, S446. Fantasy on themes from Rienzi, S439 (Wagner)
Leslie Howard pf
Hyperion ② CDA66861/2 (153 minutes: DDD). Ⓕ
Recorded 1993

Liszt's operatic outings range from literal transcriptions, such as the opening Oberon Overture, to the most free fantasias, like that on motives from Rienzi at the end of the disc. The sequence is artfully planned to provide the maximum contrast between Liszt as lion and dove, with four of the 16 items earmarked as 'first recordings'. Of these, the Gounod Roméo et Juliette Rêverie is a tender, nocturne-like idyll that not for a second outstays its welcome. Liszt scholars may nevertheless be still more grateful for Howard's rescue of the other three, and first and foremost the nearly 22-minute long Fantasia on themes from Le nozze di Figaro and Don Giovanni. Though self-indulgently protracted (as Busoni surely realized when preparing his own shortened version), its thematic interweavings en route still take your breath away. With Verdi and Wagner we are on more familiar ground, where it goes without saying that Howard has formidable CD rivals. But throughout the disc there is a spaciousness in his characterization that far more often than not compensates for momentary technical strain or loss of finesse. His tonal range is certainly wide, ranging from the deep, dark, brooding intensity he finds for the Ernani and Il trovatore excerpts to his translucent delicacy in the upper reaches of Gounod's Rêverie. Apart from a slightly metallic touch above a certain dynamic level in the treble, the recorded sound quality can best be described in a nutshell as ripe.

Petrarch Sonnets

Complete Solo Piano Music, Volume 21
Soirées musicales, S424. Soirées italiennes, S411. Nuits d'été à Pausilippe, S399. Tre sonetti del Petrarca, S158. Venezia e Napoli, S159. La serenata e L'orgia (Grande fantaisie sur des motifs des Soirées musicales), S422. La pastorella dell'Alpi e Li marinari (Deuxième fantaisie sur des motifs des Soirées musicales), S423 Leslie Howard pf
Hyperion ② CDA66661/2 (157 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1991-92

The two discs comprising Vol 21 of Howard's enormous cycle remind us of the young Liszt's love affair with Italy, the spotlight now falling primarily on frolics with Rossini, Mercadante and Donizetti in lighter, lyrical vein. The special interest of the two original sets of pieces included, i.e. the three Sonetti del Petrarca and the four Venezia e Napoli, is that Howard introduces them as first written (*c*1839 and 1840 respectively) before Liszt's characteristically painstaking later revisions. There is much to enjoy in the playing itself, especially in simpler contexts when gondolas glide through calm waters, or lovers dream, or shepherds dance. Melody, so important throughout, is nicely sung.

Totentanz

Impromptu in F sharp, S191. Nuages gris, S199. La lugubre gondola, S200 Nos 1 and 2. Unstern: sinistre, disastro, S208. Totentanz, S525. Danse macabre (Saint-Saëns), S555. Réminiscences des Huguenots (Meyerbeer), S412
Arnaldo Cohen pf Ⓢ
Naxos 8 553852 (71 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1996

Arnaldo Cohen is as poetically and imaginatively intrepid as he is technically coruscating, and all these performances offer refinement and ferocity in equal proportion. Few pianists could identify or engage so closely with music which hovers on the edge of silence or extinction (Nuages gris, La lugubre gondola Nos 1 and 2), or which sparks and sports with a truly devilish intent (Danse macabre, Totentanz and so on). In the Danse macabre the music emerges from Cohen's fingers supercharged with malevolence. On the other hand he can send the F sharp Impromptu spiralling into a true sense of its ecstasy, or momentarily inflect Nuages gris in a manner that accentuates rather than detracts from its abstraction and economy. He makes something frighteningly bleak out of Unstern (or 'Evil Star'), with its savagely dissonant climax and its unresolved hymnal solace, yet is no less at home in Réminiscences des Huguenots, dismissing ambuscades of treacherous skips, octaves and every other technical terror with a telling mix of verve and nonchalance. These, then, are performances of rare lucidity, virtuoso voltage and trenchancy, and all quite excellently recorded.

Transcendental Etudes

12 Etudes d'exécution transcendante, S139
Jenö Jandó pf Ⓢ
Naxos 8 553119 (64 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1994

The 12 Transcendental Etudes are the ultimate test of quasi-orchestral virtuosity and of the capacity to achieve nobility and true eloquence. Jandó perhaps lacks diabolic frisson in the more ferocious numbers but his performances, overall, are not disfigured by wilful, sensational attributes or hysteria. No 1 is dramatically pointed, an impressive curtain-raiser, and he can hell-raise with assurance in 'Mazeppa'. His 'Feux follets' hardly sparks with the brilliance of, say, some of the full-blooded accounts of certain Russian artists, but even when it hardly modulates from study to tone-poem it is still more than capable (higher praise than you might think where such intricacy is concerned). He flashes an impressive rapier at the start of 'Eroica' and there is plenty of swagger and facility in the so-called 'Appassionata' étude. 'Chasse-neige', too, proceeds with a fine sense of its menacing start to a howling, elemental uproar before returning to distant thunder. Jandó is less assured in introspection, yet it has to be said that all-encompassing versions of the Transcendental Etudes are hard to come by. Jandó is impressively recorded.

Song transcriptions

Adelaïde, S466. Sechs geistliche Lieder, S467. An die ferne Geliebte, S469. Lieder von Goethe, S468 (Beethoven). Lieder, S547 (Mendelssohn). Lieder, S485 (Dessauer). Er ist gekommen in Sturm und Regen, S488. Lieder, S489 (Franz).Two songs, S554 (Rubinstein). Lieder von Robert und Clara Schumann, S569. Provenzalisches Lied, S570. Two songs, S567. Frühlingsnacht, S568. Widmung, S566 (Schumann)
Leslie Howard pf
Hyperion ② CDA66481/2 (147 minutes: DDD). Ⓕ
Recorded 1990

Few composers have ever shown a more insatiable interest in the music of others than Liszt, or devoted more time to transcribing it for the piano. Here Howard plays 60 of Liszt's 100 or so song transcriptions, including several by the lesser-known Dessauer, Franz and (as composers) Anton Rubinstein and Clara Schumann, alongside Beethoven, Mendelssohn and Robert Schumann. The selection at once reveals Liszt's variety of approach as a transcriber no less than his unpredictability of choice. Sometimes, as most notably in Beethoven's concert aria, Adelaïde, the keyboard virtuoso takes over: he links its two sections with a concerto-like cadenza as well as carrying bravura into an amplified coda. But after the dazzling pyrotechnics of many of his operatic arrangements, the surprise here is the self-effacing simplicity of so much included.

The five songs from Schumann's Liederalbum für die Jugend are literal enough to be played by young children. Even his later (1880) fantasy-type transcriptions of Rubinstein's exotic The Asra has the same potent economy of means. Howard responds keenly to mood and atmosphere, and never fails, pianistically, to emphasize the 'singer' in each song – in response to the actual verbal text that Liszt was nearly always conscientious enough to write into his scores. The recording is clean and true.

Christus, S3

Henriette Bonde-Hansen sop Iris Vermillion mez Michael Schade ten Andreas Schmidt bar Cracow Chamber Choir; Stuttgart Gächinger Kantorei Stuttgart Radio Symphony Orchestra /

Helmuth Rilling
Hänssler Classic Exclusive Series ③ CD98 121 Ⓕ
(162 minutes: DDD). Text and translation included
Recorded live in 1997

Christus is essentially a contemplative work and so could really be said to exist in a different time-scale to most music. Much of the opening part, the 'Christmas Oratorio', uses very simple melody and harmony, and is studiously undramatic. Helmuth Rilling does well not to charge it with too much colour, and, if listened to as meditation rather than drama, what can seem static takes on a positive atmosphere as a group of long reflections on the Christmas events. This is a far cry from the sensational Liszt of the early virtuoso years, not yet reaching the terse, inward pieces of the last years. There is greater drama in the middle part, 'After Epiphany', especially in the superb scene of Christ walking on the water. Although there is still the suggestion that a wonder is being contemplated, Liszt stirs up a terrific storm. This part also includes the beautiful setting of the Beatitudes, sung by Andreas Schmidt with a degree of uncertainty which he entirely sheds when he comes to pronounce the sentences in Part 3 ('Passion and Resurrection') for the scene of the Agony in the Garden. The long Stabat mater is beautifully controlled by Rilling. His soloists support him well, though Iris Vermillion can seem rather operatic; Henriette Bonde-Hansen sings with a beautiful, clear tone. The recording does excellent justice to Liszt's wide-ranging orchestration.

Henry Litolff

French 1818-1891

GROVE French composer and pianist. He was a concert artist, conductor, music publisher, festival organizer, piano teacher and salon composer but is remembered chiefly for his four piano concertos entitled concertos symphoniques (c1844-67); their conception as symphonies with piano obbligato greatly impressed Liszt (who dedicated his Concerto no.1 to Litolff), and their scherzos contain some of his most brilliant writing.

Concertos symphoniques

Concertos symphoniques – No 3 in E flat, Op 45; No 5 in C minor, Op 123
Peter Donohoe pf BBC Scottish Symphony Orchestra / Andrew Litton Ⓕ
Hyperion CDA67210 (66 minutes: DDD) ●

Litolff's dauntingly ambitious structures accommodate every possible style, looking forwards and backwards Janus-style, yet reaching out in the strange almost Alkanesque oddity of the Fifth Concerto's last two movements towards a more personal and distinctive style. Admired by Tchaikovsky, Liszt and Berlioz (though with some telling reservations), Litolff enjoyed a hectic career which is mirrored in writing of a formidable intricacy. So even if claims that he was 'the English Liszt' and that his development sections are similar to late Beethoven seem far-fetched, the sheer energy and resource of Litolff's writing are absorbing. Few pianists could approach, let alone top, Peter Donohoe's blistering virtuosity in these works. His performances throughout are as rock-steady as they are dazzling, sweeping aside torrents of notes with both affection and authority. Hear him in the exultant whirl which opens the Third Concerto's finale, and you can only marvel at such unfaltering command, ideally complemented by Andrew Litton and the BBC Scottish Symphony Orchestra. An invaluable issue for lovers of intriguing repertoire.

Pietro Locatelli

Italian 1695-1764

GROVE Locatelli studied the violin in Rome and in 1717-23 played in the basilica of S Lorenzo in Damaso. He was appointed to the Mantuan court in 1725 but gave concerts elsewhere (especially Germany), gaining a high reputation; his playing was noted for its virtuosity and sweetness. From 1729 he worked mostly as a teacher and orchestral director in Amsterdam. Locatelli wrote almost exclusively sonatas and concertos. The first of his four concerto grosso sets (1721) is the most Corellian (particularly its Christmas Concerto); his later music is more progressive. His influential L'arte del violino (1733) contains 12 solo violin concertos in a Venetian idiom like Vivaldi's and 24 caprices for solo violin. Among Locatelli's other works are solo and trio sonatas.

10 Sonatas, Op 8

Locatelli Trio (Elizabeth Wallfisch vn Richard Tunnicliffe vc Paul Nicholson hpd); Rachel Isserlis vn 🅿
Hyperion ② CDA67021/2 (116 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1994

There is a sense of the decadent about the music of Locatelli. But decadence, we all know, can be quite fun, and it would be an austere spirit that took little pleasure in these sonatas and especially the playing of them here. This two-disc set of his Op 8 (published in 1744) contains six violin sonatas and four trio sonatas, three for two violins and continuo and one using the much less common combination of violin, cello and continuo. A number of them have a slowish movement and most end with a quick triple-metre piece, again in brilliant violinistic style. The most attractive is No 5, with its interesting gestures and hints of wit in the second movement. The most demanding is No 6 with its final minuet with variations, quite breathtaking (and improbably set in E flat, a perverse gesture): here Elizabeth Wallfisch clambers unruffled through the technical thickets, which include an extraordinary variation with trills on one string and moving parts on another and dashes from one end of the compass to the other and back again, and much more besides. This is amazing violin playing of a kind of virtuosity rarely heard from a period instrument player. The three trio sonatas for two violins are not virtuoso music in quite the same way, and musically not generally very inventive. The performances are admirable; no one who admires good violin playing will want to miss Wallfisch's crisp, rhythmic playing.

Matthew Locke British 1621-1677

GROVE Locke was a chorister and secondary at Exeter Cathedral, where he became friendly with Christopher Gibbons. In 1653 he and Gibbons wrote the music for James Shirley's masque Cupid and Death and in 1656 he joined with others in writing the music (all lost) for Davenant's opera The Siege of Rhodes, in which he also sang. After the Restoration in 1660 he was awarded three posts at court, to which in 1662 he added that of organist to the queen (facilitated by his conversion to Roman Catholicism). He continued to write for the theatre and also engaged in a polemical exchange with Thomas Salmon over the latter's proposals for a new form of musical notation.

Locke's importance lies in his chamber music and dramatic music, which influenced Purcell's. His consort music and other ensemble works, mainly suites and separate dances, display robust and daring melody, harmony and form, as well as a conscious preoccupation with contrasting rhythms, tempos and dynamics. Although sometimes experimental, it is the work of a gifted and inspired craftsman. His extant sacred music, while not as maturely conceived, is often of high quality. His dramatic music, best represented by Cupid and Death, the masque in The Empress of Morocco (1673) and the vocal music for Psyche (1675), shows a sure dramatic instinct, especially in the recitatives and in several of the curtain tunes. Locke's other music includes the well-known pieces 'ffor His Majesty's Sagbutts and Cornetts', probably performed on the eve of Charles II's coronation, and Melothesia (1673), a collection of keyboard works with an important preface giving the first extant English rules for realising a figured bass.

Consort of Fower Parts

Consort of Fower Parts. Duos – No 1 in D; No 2 in C 🅿
Fretwork (Wendy Gillespie, Richard Campbell, William Hunt, Julia Hodgson, Susanna Pell, Richard Boothby viols);
Nigel North lte Paul Nicholson org/spinet
Virgin Classics Veritas 545142-2 Ⓕ
(67 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1990

Locke is capable of some exquisite music and Fretwork here are loving advocates. Experienced as they are in the performance of so much of the finest English consort music of the 17th century from Byrd to Purcell, Fretwork are particularly well placed to discriminate between the elusive properties in an age of subtle, abstract ideals. In the Ayre of No 4 and the equivalent in Suites Nos 2 and 6, there is a simplicity of utterance entirely appropriate to Locke's delightful tunefulness, as does the disarming warmth of expression in the opening movements of the major-key works. Fretwork's intonation is perfect. There is a considered and deft use of a variety of continuo instruments, not to mention two attractive Duos for bass viols, which break up the prevalent quartet texture. Locke's special language shines as brightly here as one can remember.

Consort of Fower Parts, Suites Nos 1-6. 🅿
The Flatt Consort – Suite No 1 in C minor
Phantasm (Laurence Dreyfus, Wendy Gillespie, Jonathan Manson, Markku Luolajan-Mikkola viols)
Global Music Network GMNC0109 Ⓕ
(55 minutes: DDD) ●

Matthew Locke, the irascible and xenophobic Anglo-Catholic, is usually remembered in the 'predecessor of Purcell' category, a classification that is easy to understand when listening to works such as the four-movement consort suites on this disc, composed around the 1650s. Each has an opening fantasie full of the brooding, angular and often dissonant expressiveness one associates with Purcell's own later viol fantasies, and Purcell is known to have admired Locke, composing an elegy on his death in 1677. But Locke had a personality of his own: the dances – courantes, ayres and sarabandes – that follow the fantasies in each suite have an idiosyncratic rhythmic snap to them that is guarantee of that. Writing in the booklet, Laurence Dreyfus also draws attention to Locke's 'striking muscularity' and also to his 'purest lyricism and…most generous warmth', dubbing his work 'true music of consolation'. Changeable and abrupt though it may at first seem, it is certainly music that grows on you with repeated listenings.

Phantasm play with their customary expertise. Their combination of vibrant tone quality and strong rhythmic attack allows them to make the most of Locke's mercurial musings, bringing lyrical gravity to the Fantasies and an exhilarating spring to the faster dances. A fairly close recording helps, giving them at times the clarity and substance almost of a string quartet. By comparison the equally accomplished Fretwork have a thinner and less defined sound, and their performances are less consistent in offering moment-to-moment excitement. Their generally more subdued approach has power to charm, as does their enlivening use of archlute, organ or spinet continuo in some of the suites, but for me it is Phantasm who tend to make more of this intriguing music.

It is a pity, though, that GMN have not provided better tracklistings.

Alonso Lobo

Spanish c1555-1617

GROVE Lobo, a choirboy at Seville Cathedral, studied at Osuna University and was a canon there by 1591. He assisted Guerrero at Seville Cathedral from 1591, becoming maestro de capilla of Toledo Cathedral in 1593 and of Seville in 1604. He published masses and motets, some for double choir (1602); many other sacred works are in MSS. Victoria esteemed him as an equal and he was long regarded as one of the finest Spanish composers.

Missa Maria Magdalene

Lobo Missa Maria Magdalene. O quam suavis est, Domine. Quam pulchri sunt. Ave regina caelorum. Versa est in luctum. Credo quod Redemptor. Vivo ego, dicit Dominus. Ave Maria
Guerrero Maria Magdalene
The Tallis Scholars / Peter Phillips
Gimell CDGIM031 (63 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included

Alonso Lobo has mainly become known for one work, his setting of the funerary Versa est in luctum. This is undoubtedly a masterpiece of its kind but to have it placed alongside other pieces from Lobo's 1602 collection affords a welcome chance to assess his composition skills more fully. Lobo's music is sonorous in a manner that is direct and unfussy in effect, though often highly expressive, and always structured with the utmost technical control. Take, for example, Lobo's Ave Maria, an 8-in-4 canon (in other words, four more voices are generated from the original quartet) which emanates a sense of absolute serenity. In fact, each of the motets explores a different aspect of the compositional techniques brought to the genre, and the Mass is equally fine, Lobo making the spacious textures of the motet, Maria Magdalene by his teacher Guerrero a distinguishing feature of his own setting of the Ordinary. The Tallis Scholars are on superb form, the overall sound vibrant and immediate with solo sections providing contrast through a more introspective approach. Even if you've never bought a CD of late-Renaissance polyphony, try this one. You'll be bowled over.

Carl Loewe

German 1796-1869

GROVE Loewe, a pupil of Türk at Halle, began composing songs and instrumental pieces at an early age, also singing his own ballads to great acclaim. Among his finest early solo vocal works are settings of Goethe's Erlkönig (1818) and Byron's Hebrew Melodies (Opp 4, 5, 13 and 14). He was a prolific composer in many media, but his other works, including the operas (notably Emmy, 1842) and oratorios, string quartets and piano works (in particular some programmatic sonatas and the tone poem Mazeppa, Op 27), were not as acclaimed as his narrative songs. Their accompaniments and modified strophic style, incorporating dramatic and lyrical passages, make a vivid impression (eg Archibald Douglas, Op 128); the fairy element in many of his folklore settings (eg Herr Oluf and Tom der Reimer) creates colour and melodic interest. From 1820 to 1865 Loewe worked in Stettin as a conductor, organist and teacher, yet it was through his recital tours that he won international fame; the Viennese called him 'the north German Schubert'.

Lieder

Drei Balladen, Op 1 – Edward; Erlkönig. Drei Balladen, Op 2 – Herr Oluf. Drei Balladen, Op 3 – Elvershöh; Die drei Lieder. Lieder, Gesänge, Romanzen und Balladen, Op 9 – Book 1: Wandrers Nachtlied; Book 3: Ich denke dein; Book 8: Türmwachter Lynkeus zu den Füssen der Helena; Lynkeus, der Türmer, auf Fausts Sternwarte singend; Gutmann und Gutweib. Drei Balladen, Op 20. Die Gruft der Liebenden, Op 21. Zehn Geistliche Gesänge, Op 22 – Book 1: Gottes ist der Orient!. Drei Balladen, Op 44 – Der getreue Eckart; Der Totentanz. Drei Balladen, Op 56 – Heinrich der Vogler. Drei Balladen, Op 59 – Der Schatzgräber. Zwölf Gedichte, Op 62 – Book 1: Süsses Begräbnis; Hinkende Jamben. Kleiner Haushalt, Op 71. Vier Legenden,Op 75 – Der heilige Franziskus. Sechs Gesänge, Op 79 – Frühzeitiger Frühling. Fünf Lieder, Op 81 – In Vorübergehen. Prince Eugen, Op 92 Drei Balladen, Op 97 – Der Mohrenfürst auf der Messe. Odins Meeresritt, Op 118. Drei Gesänge, Op 123 – Trommelständchen; Die Uhr. Archibald Douglas, Op 128. Drei Balladen, Op 129 – Der Nöck. Tom der Reimer, Op 135a. Fünf Lieder, Op 145 – Meeresleuchten. Canzonette. Freibeuter. Wenn der Blüten Frühlingsregen
Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau bar Jörg Demus pf
DG ② 449 516-2GX2 (156 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Texts and translations included
Recorded 1968-79 ◉◉

All the best-known ballads are included here, magnificently sung by a great artist at the height of his powers. Edward, Herr Oluf, Heinrich der Vogler, Prince Eugen, Der Zauberlehrling: these and others are sung with a wonderful sense of the graphic, conveyed through an appreciation of the colour of the words that never descends into overemphasis and that is beautifully attuned to Loewe's illustrative manner. Fischer-Dieskau and Demus are ideal partners, Demus responding quickly and with an ear for the sinister that often marks the piano writing and its subtle use of motive. Not just a composer of ballads, Loewe was also a Lieder writer in the great German tradition, and this is too often overlooked, but not by Fischer-Dieskau.

Two songs alone, from this magisterial collection, are witness to Loewe's stature. They are settings of the wonderful poems from the second part of Faust in which Lynceus, the lynx-eyed watcher on the tower, sees the magical appearance, of Helen of Troy herself. He, incarnating the gift of the perception of visual beauty, after a life of watching from his tower can conceive of nothing that could surpass this wonder; and, in the second song, hymns his gratitude to the gift of sight. Loewe's two settings are beautiful responses to the poetry of a great artist with the gift of an ideal simplicity. These two songs alone should persuade the responsive listener to make the exploration.

Paolo Lorenzani Italian 1640-1713

GROVE Lorenzani was a chorister in the Cappella Giulia in the Vatican and a pupil of Benevoli. After an early career as maestro di cappella in Rome and Messina, he fled during the wars of 1678 to Paris and became an important figure in the struggle to gain recognition for Italian music and thus to break Lully's monopoly. He gained the support of Louis XIV (who helped him become director of the queen's music) and leading aristocrats (who arranged performances of his dramatic music), but after Queen Marie-Thérèse's death in 1683 his influence waned, despite successful Roman-style oratory performances he arranged as maître de chapelle to the Theatine order (from 1685) and an opera, Orontée, given at Chantilly. In 1694 he returned to Italy as director of the Cappella Giulia. Although rooted in the Roman tradition, his style was readily adaptable to French taste, and the instrumental writing particularly shows Lully's influence. Among his surviving works are airs, cantatas, motets and a mass and Magnificat, both for two choirs.

Grands motets

Antienne à la Vierge. Motet pour l'élévation. Motet pour tous les temps. Dialogue entre Jésus et l'Ame. Motet pour les confesseurs. Litanies à la Vierge
Le Concert Spirituel / Hervé Niquet
Naxos 8 553648 (63 minutes: DDD). Texts and translations included. Recorded 1997 Ⓢ

Paolo Lorenzani was a Roman-born composer who towards the end of the 17th century spent 16 years in France, where he tried to raise the profile of Italian music. In this he had little success, especially as in doing so he inevitably came up against the machinations of the tyrannical Lully; indeed their rivalry seems to have become quite acrimonious, and eventually Lorenzani returned to Italy to finish his days as director of the Cappella Giulia at the Vatican. This rarity to the catalogue offers five of the grands motets for soloists, choir, violins and continuo which he published in Paris in 1693, plus a Litany of Our Lady for voices and continuo which he probably wrote when back in Rome. The lack of success the motets enjoyed at the time – for all that the King liked them and that they were very much in the French style – no doubt hastened Lorenzani's departure, but listening to them now, musico-political distractions put aside, it is hard to understand why they should have failed; this is highly attractive music, easily on a par with that of some of the better-known grand motet composers of the time, and there is some clever responsiveness to text as well.

The performances, too, are very enjoyable. Hervé Niquet's experience in this type of music pays off in a well-balanced and lithe ensemble, good stand-out solos, and an intelligent, quick-witted approach to the music's interpretation. Lorenzani may not be a forgotten genius exactly, but his music is well worth unearthing. Lully has plenty to answer for.

Antonio Lotti Italian c1667-1740

GROVE Lotti, a pupil of Legrenzi in Venice, became an organist at St Mark's in 1690, eventually becoming maestro di cappella (1736). He also taught at the Ospedale degli Incurabili (Galuppi was one of his pupils); he wrote sacred music for both institutions. From 1692 he composed operas, mostly serious: he presented c30, the last four (1717-19) in Dresden. His large output includes oratorios, secular cantatas, duets, madrigals, instrumental pieces and numerous masses, motets and psalms. Most of his sacred choral works have no orchestral accompaniment; many, such as a Miserere of 1733, remained in use long after his death. His output bridges the late Baroque and early Classical styles and his late works are notable for their elegance and skilful counterpoint.

Madrigals

Duetti, terzetti e madrigali a più voci, Op 1 – Inganni dell'umanità; Lamento di tre amanti; La vita caduca; Moralità d'una per la; Incostanza femminile; Lontananza insopportabile; Funerale della speranza; Crudeltà rimproverata; Giuramento amorosa; Querela amorosa; Incostanza della sorte Scherzo d'amore; Capriccio; Supplica ad amore
Il Complesso Barocco / Alan Curtis hpd
Virgin Classics Veritas 545221-2 (78 minutes: DDD) Texts and translations included. Ⓕ
Recorded 1996

A Venetian contemporary of Vivaldi, Lotti's association with St Mark's lasted all of his working life, nearly 60 years. The madrigal enjoyed a revival at the turn of the 18th century; what fascinates here is the music's hybrid nature and its flexibility. The texture is largely imitative, with each text-line having its own melodic point; but alongside this convention are Lotti's contemporary-sounding harmonic touches. They are a source of unexpected delight, especially in this vivacious and spirited interpretation. This is music of high vocal virtuosity, requiring the utmost agility in execution and deftness of characterization: on that count Il Complesso Barocco can hardly be faulted, though admittedly the higher voices are perhaps slightly less sure-footed in their extreme registers. The continuo, spearheaded by Curtis, is equally natural and unfussy (though in the more richly scored pieces the organ may be a touch obtrusive). There can be few better opportunities to broaden (or to make) one's acquaintance with Lotti.

Requiem

Requiem in F. Credo. Miserere
Balthasar-Neumann Choir and Ensemble / Thomas Hengelbrock
Deutsche Harmonia Mundi 05472 77507-2 Ⓕ
(68 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1998

Lotti's Requiem Mass in F major is considered by Thomas Hengelbrock the most important Requiem before Mozart's. The piece is full of expressive contrast and rendered the more fascinating by Lotti's affection for a quasi-Palestrina style on the one hand and his skill in deploying more up-to-date techniques on the other. This Requiem is essentially in the late Baroque idiom, occasionally recalling certain of Vivaldi's larger sacred vocal pieces. The sections differ from the sequence usually encountered in later 18th-century Requiem Masses. There is neither Sanctus, 'Benedictus' nor Agnus Dei, but instead a very extended 'Dies irae' as well as a much shorter 'Requiem aeternam', Kyrie and Offertory. Full of theatrical gestures, supple polyphony, warmly seductive harmony and some beautiful melodies, the Requiem holds attention from start to finish. The contrasts are often striking, as between the hushed opening section and the awesome introduction to the 'Dies irae'. The a cappella Miserere is sung with clarity and finesse. The five-movement Credo is a supple piece for choir and strings with some affecting, shimmering harmonies in the 'Crucifixus'. As well as full Mass settings, Lotti seems also to have favoured separate autonomous sections such as this, themselves subdivided into short units. The splendid performances bring this highly-charged music to life.

Jean-Baptiste Lully

Italian/French 1632-1687

A French composer of Italian birth, Lully was taken from Florence to Paris in 1646 by Roger de Lorraine, Chevalier de Guise, who placed him in the service of his niece, Mlle de Montpensier. At her court in the Tuileries Lully got to know the best in French music and, despite his patroness's dislike of Mazarin and her involvement in the Fronde, he was no stranger to Italian music either. After the defeat of the Frondists, Mlle de Montpensier was exiled to St Fargeau. Lully obtained release from her service and on the death of his friend Lazzarini, in 1653, was appointed Louis XIV's compositeur de la musique instrumentale. From 1655 his fame as dancer, comedian and composer grew rapidly, and his disciplined training of the king's 'petite bande' earned him further recognition. In 1661 he was made surintendant de la musique et compositeur de la musique de la chambre and in 1662 maître de la musique de la famille royale. By then he was a naturalised Frenchman, and in July 1662 he married Madeleine Lambert.

Lully then collaborated with Molière on a series of comédies-ballets which culminated in Le bourgeois gentilhomme (1670). After that he turned to opera, securing the privilege previously granted to Perrin and forestalling potential rivals with oppressive patents granted by the king. He chose as librettist Philippe Quinault, with whom he established a new and essentially French type of opera known as tragédie lyrique. Between 1673 and 1686 Lully composed 13 such works, 11 of them with Quinault.

During this time Lully continued to enjoy the king's support. His greatest personal triumph came in 1681 when he was received as secrétaire du Roi. After the king's marriage to Mme de Maintenon in 1683 life at court took on a new sobriety; it was perhaps in response to this that Lully composed much of his religious music. During a performance of his Te Deum in January 1687 he injured his foot with the point of a cane he was using to beat time. Gangrene set in, and within three months he died, leaving a tragédie lyrique, Achille et Polyxène, unfinished.

At his death Lully was widely regarded as the most representative of French composers. Practically all his music was designed to satisfy the tastes and interests of Louis XIV. The ballets de cour (1653-63) and the comédies-ballets (1663-72) were performed as royal entertainments, the king himself often taking part in the dancing.

The tragédies lyriques (1673-86) were kingly operas par excellence, expressing a classical conflict between la gloire and l'amour; Louis himself supplied the subject matter for at least four of them and certainly approved the political sentiments of the prologues. Lully's music was correspondingly elevated, in the stately overtures, the carefully moulded 'récitatif simple' and the statuesque choruses; many of the airs, too, draw as much attention to the galant mores of the court as to the stage action. Finally, the Versailles grand motet, of which the Miserere is an outstanding example, was designed to glorify the King of France as much as the King of Heaven.

Suites

L'Orchestre du Roi Soleil Ⓟ
Première Suite: Le bourgeois gentilhomme. Deuxième Suite: Le divertissement royal. Troisième Suite: Alceste
Le Concert des Nations / Jordi Savall
Alia Vox AV9807 (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1999 ●

Le Concert des Nations offers here a compendium of Lully's music from the heyday of the court of Louis XIV (widely assumed to have been at Versailles, but in fact from before the move from Paris). The pieces, drawn from a variety of Lullian sources to make up three entertainments (or divertissements), provide Savall with opportunities to present his musicians in Lully's spectrum of ensemble textures. The players respond to the rhythmic vitality of the music, adding ornamentation with tremendous precision and flair, but the secret of the obvious success of this recording is the rightness of the tempos, whether for a dance, a battle, a gust of wind or a funeral. Those who saw the film Tous les matins du monde will be familiar with Lully's 'March pour la Cérémonie turque' and will immediately hear the difference even a few years has made to Savall: the playing on this new recording more effectively captures the military character without caricaturing the janissary element. The real stars of the recording, however, are the percussion players, Michèle Claude and Pedro Estevan, whose command of the possibilities for accompanying this repertory would have impressed even Lully. Whole evenings of Lully are still an acquired taste, but a recording of highlights as good as this is something anyone who enjoys Baroque music would wish to own.

Acis et Galatée

Jean-Paul Fouchécourt ten Acis; Véronique Gens sop Galatée; Monique Simon sop Diane, Second Naiad; Jean-Louis Meunier ten Comus; Howard Crook ten Apollon, Télème, Priest of Juno; Françoise Masset sop Scylla, Dryad; Rodrigo del Pozo counterten Tircis; Mireille Delunsch sop Aminte, Abundance; First Naiad; Laurent Naouri bar Polyphème; Thierry Félix bar Neptune, Sylvan Choeur des Musiciens du Louvre; Les Musiciens du Louvre / Marc Minkowski P
Archiv Produktion ② 453 497-2AH2
(107 minutes: DDD). Notes, text and translation included. Recorded 1996 Ⓕ ●●

Acis et Galatée was Lully's last completed opera, and one of his greatest. A pastoral héroïque performed in 1686 to entertain the Dauphin during a hunting party at the Duc de Vendôme's château, it employs many features of his tragédies en musique – vocal ensembles, instrumental movements and an enhanced use of the orchestra in general; and each act contains a divertissement with choruses and dances. One of the glories of the score is the concluding passacaille, which with instrumental sections builds up from single voices to chorus. There is also a small but affecting chaconne for Galatea in Act 2; but another glorious moment is the lengthy scene in which she discovers the body of her lover and calls on her father, Neptune, who guarantees Acis immortality by transforming him into a river.

Marc Minkowski brings out all the drama of the work by thoughtful treatment of the verbal text, intelligent pacing and varied instrumental articulation and weight: especially striking are the rough sonorities of the march in which Polyphemus first appears, and the intensity of the lovers' angry confrontation in Act 2. Jean-Paul Fouchécourt projecting the image of an ardent youthful lover, and Véronique Gens that of a passionate goddess, are both excellently cast, but Laurent Naouri almost steals the scene from them with his fearsomely powerful Polyphemus: Howard Crook contributes valuably in various roles, though he is ill at ease in the very highest register.

There is considerable finesse in the chorus singing, and the theorbo continuo, working overtime, is admirable.

An altogether splendid performance of a masterpiece.

Witold Lutosławski

Polish 1913-1994

LutosLawski studied with Maliszewski at GROVE the Warsaw Conservatory (1932-37) and soon made his mark as a pianist and composer, though few works from before 1945 have been published. He then developed a clear, fresh tonality related to late Bartók displayed in the Little Suite for orchestra (1951), the Concerto for Orchestra (1954) and the Dance Preludes for clarinet and piano (1954). But that style was short-lived: in the late 1950s he was able to essay a kind of serialism (Funeral Music for strings, 1958) and to learn from Cage the possibility of aleatory textures, where synchronization between instrumental lines is not exact (Venetian Games for chamber orchestra, 1961). Most of his subsequent works were orchestral, fully chromatic, finely orchestrated in a manner suggesting Debussy and Ravel, and developed from an opposition between aleatory and metrical textures. These include his Second (1967), Third (1983) and Fourth (1993) symphonies, concertos for cello (1970) and for oboe and harp (1980), and settings of French verse with chorus (Three Poems of Henri Michaux, 1963), tenor (Paroles tissées, 1965) and baritone (Les espaces du sommeil, 1975). During this period he was also internationally active as a teacher and conductor of his own music.

Cello Concerto

Cello Concerto. Livre pour orchestre.
Novelette. Chain 3
Andrzej Bauer vc
Polish National Radio Symphony Orchestra / Antoni Wit Ⓢ
Naxos 8 553625 (73 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1995

This is an excellent disc; fine music, well played and recorded, and all at the special Naxos price. The earliest composition, Livre (1968), was the first work completed by Lutosławski after the Second Symphony, and it shows him at his freshest and boldest, as if relieved to be free (if only temporarily) from the burden of one of music's weightiest traditions. With its well-nigh surreal juxtapositions of strongly contrasted materials, and the unusual ferocity of its tone – the 'book' in question must have been of the blood and thunder variety – Livre reveals a Lutosławski quite different from the relatively benign, ironic master of the later works. Coming immediately after Livre, the Cello Concerto has an even wider expressive range: indeed, in the balance it achieves between lamenting melodic lines and mercurial scherzo-like writing, coupled with a tendency to home in on crucial pitch-centres, it sets out the basic elements of the composer's later style.

This performance owes a great deal to Antoni Wit's skilful shaping of the music's alternations between relatively free and precise notation, and this skill is even more evident in the remaining orchestral scores. Novelette, completed in 1979, is Lutosławski's response to his first American commission; it is far more cogent and concentrated than its title might lead you to expect. Chain 3 (1986) is one of the best later works, let down only by some rather perfunctory quasi-tonal harmony near the end. But this does not undermine the impression the disc as a whole conveys of some of the most characterful and individual music of the last 30 years.

Symphonies

Symphony No 1. Chantefleurs et Chantefables[a].
Jeux vénetiens. Postlude No 1. Silesian Triptych[a]
[a]Olga Pasiecznik sop Polish National Radio Symphony Orchestra / Antoni Wit
Naxos 8 554283 (73 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1996-97

Juxtaposing Lutosławski's early Symphony No 1 with the late Chantefleurs et Chantefables reinforces the fundamentally French associations of this composer's very personal musical voice; to contemplate how the symphony's exuberant embrace of a Roussel-like idiom was complemented, more than 40 years later, by the subtle Ravellian overtones of Chantefleurs et Chantefables is to recognize that the radical gestures of Jeux vénetiens (1961) have worn less well than Lutosławski's more 'conservative' qualities. Indeed, the wild piano cadenza in Jeux vénetiens now evokes the high jinks of Ibert's Divertissement rather than the liberated avant-garde ethos of more determinedly progressive musical minds. The downbeat ending is far more memorable.

Olga Pasiecznik's singing is outstanding, especially in Chantefleurs, where she easily surpasses Dawn Upshaw in subtlety and Antoni Wit turns in strongly characterised, well-shaped accounts of all the scores. The playing is eloquent as well as energetic, and although, as with earlier Naxos volumes, the recordings are rather glassy and generalised, the music's range of colour and variety of texture is never in doubt. With such a well-filled disc, why did Naxos decide to include the first of the Three Postludes? The composer himself was clearly happy for the piece to appear on its own, but in a series with pretensions to completeness the full set is surely a must.

Symphonies – No 1; No 2. Symphonic Variations.
Funeral music. Concerto for Orchestra. Jeux vénitiens. Livre pour Orchestre. Mi-parti
Polish National Radio Symphony Orchestra / Witold Lutosławski
EMI Double Forte ② 573833-2 Ⓑ
(149 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1976-77 ●

The works here illustrate Lutosławski's progress from relatively traditional to relatively radical styles. The Concerto for Orchestra fully deserves to stand alongside Bartók's slightly earlier, similarly exuberant essay in the genre, and this performance, by turns punchy and passionate, proves that Lutosławski was not always an overly reticent conductor of his own scores. The playing and recording lack some of the refinement of Barenboim's Chicago version, but it has an attractively raw energy, the composer contemplating 'youthful' excesses with enjoyment rather than embarrassment.

Hearing Jeux vénitiens immediately after the concerto supports the argument that Lutosławski's change of direction, around 1960, risked losing much that was most substantial in his earlier music. The aleatory jam sessions of Jeux vénitiens seem especially dated in this rather cluttered, airless recording, but at least the performance doesn't attempt to add spurious solemnity to a liberating jeu d'esprit. Livre and Mi-parti are both much finer works, and the blend of formal mastery with vivid, well-contrasted materials – especially in Mi-parti – offers one of the most satisfying and distinctive musical experiences of recent times.

The first two symphonies, Symphonic Variations and Funeral music share an acute sense of texture, with the Symphonic Variations (1938) serving as a sort of changing room where the composer busily experiments with all manner of musical dress.

The Funeral music for Bartók (1956-58) is a powerful synthesis of original thought and active homage, with plentiful reminders of the master himself. The real ground-breaker, however, is the Second Symphony, a seething, structured mass in two parts: the first, nervous and diffuse (with strikingly original passagework for piano and percussion), the second initially dense, but ultimately ethereal.

With performances that are authoritative and engaging, this bargain-priced reissue is an indispensable Lutosławski release.

Further listening
Szymanowski Symphony No 4, 'Symphonie Concertante'
Coupling: Symphony No 2, Op 19
Shelley pf
BBC Philharmonic Orchestra / Sinaisky
Chandos CHAN9478 (56 minutes: DDD: 10/96) Ⓕ

Bigness of gesture, one of Sinaisky's strong suits, fits this work well, and the growth from delicacy to eloquence in the slow movement is as well managed as the barbaric power that sweeps the finale to an exciting conclusion. A very fine performance from Howard Shelley, too.

Concerto for Orchestra

Concerto for Orchestra. Funeral Music. Mi-parti
BBC Philharmonic Orchestra / Yan Pascal Tortelier
Chandos CHAN9421 (55 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1993 ○○

Tortelier's virtues as a conductor – expressive warmth allied to a special rhythmic buoyancy – are generously apparent in a sizzling account of the Concerto for Orchestra. The musical flow is firmly controlled, yet the effect is never inflexible, and the technical precision and the alertness of the playing is something for the listener to revel in. The sound is bright, well differentiated dynamically, and even if the BBC's Manchester studio lacks some of the depth and atmosphere of Chicago's Orchestra Hall, as caught in Barenboim's version, this recording is generally more vivid, in keeping with a performance which has precisely the kind of bite and energy that the score demands. It is good that Chandos and Tortelier chose Mi-parti to complete the disc, since of all Lutosławski's later instrumental works this one makes out the best possible case for his radical change of technique around 1960.

Concerto for Orchestra. Symphony No 3
Chicago Symphony Orchestra / Daniel Barenboim
Warner Elatus 0927-49015-2 (58 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded live in 1992

Lutosławski's Third Symphony was commissioned by the Chicago SO and first performed by them under Sir Georg Solti in 1983, but only nine years later did the orchestra record the work. None of the versions made in the interim can equal Barenboim's blend of refined detail and cumulative power, and the Warner recording is also more faithful to the dynamics marked in the score. The Concerto for Orchestra, completed almost 30 years before the symphony, is comparatively conservative in style, but it possesses ample substance to match its panache. It also remains a formidable challenge to an orchestra. As with the symphony, Barenboim's strength is the large-scale creation and sustaining of tension, and the recording contains the heavy climaxes without draining them of clarity or impact.

Chantefleurs et Chantefables

Chantefleurs et Chantefables. Preludes and Fugue. Five Songs. Chain 1
Solveig Kringelborn sop Norwegian Chamber Orchestra / Daniel Harding
Virgin Classics 545275-2 (73 minutes: DDD). Ⓕ
Texts and translations included ○

Chantefleurs et Chantefables, Lutosławski's penultimate work, was heard as a late and exquisite flowering of lyricism, prompted in part by the French language, in part by the delicately fresh evocations of childhood wonder that he found in Robert Desnos's poems. It was by no means unheralded: it has obvious ancestors in the Five Songs to Polish texts that Lutosławski wrote over 30 years earlier but which have seldom been heard since, no doubt because of their language. They are very beautiful, with gratefully lyrical vocal lines over strikingly evocative orchestral textures that are complex in technique but lucidly 'readable' to the ear. Solveig Kringelborn, who gave the first performance of Chantefleurs et Chantefables under the composer's direction, sounds just as much at home in Polish as in French.

The two purely instrumental works here are quite as absorbingly coupled. The seven Preludes are played in the order in which they are printed in the score, but for all the disparate material they contain it is obvious that Lutosławski composed them so that they would make equal but different sense played in any order. The extended 'Fugue' (quotation marks inserted because although it isn't really a fugue it has the feeling of one), a remarkable work from 1972, is clearly an ancestor of the three Chains that followed in the 1980s. Chain 1, for 14 instruments, progresses from a sequence of crisp, lively, at times almost neo-Classical 'events' to a climax of density in which until the very last moment every line is clearly distinguishable. These are quite admirable performances and recordings; Daniel Harding's love for this music is apparent in his care for balance, vivid sonority and the sheer range of Lutosławski's lyricism.

Sergey Lyapunov

Russian 1859-1924

GROVE Lyapunov studied at the Moscow Conservatory but, attracted by the nationalism of the new Russian school, became a pupil of Balakirev, a dominating influence. He taught and conducted in St Petersburg, also appearing as a pianist and composing prolifically, often in the style of other composers (Schumann, Chopin, Mendelssohn, Balakirev and above all Liszt); his brilliant technical studies op.12 recall Liszt's Transcendental Studies. Besides piano showpieces (still in the repertory), he wrote distinctive, lyrical piano miniatures, orchestral works, notably the Solemn Overture on Russian Themes (1896), and many songs.

Piano Concertos

Piano Concertos – No 1 in E flat minor, Op.4; No 2 in E, Op 38. Rhapsody on Ukrainian Themes, Op 28
Hamish Milne pf BBC Scottish Symphony Orchestra / Martyn Brabbins Ⓕ
Hyperion CDA67326 (59 minutes: DDD) ○○

Hyperion celebrates the 30th release in its invaluable The Romantic Piano Concerto series with a disc of Lyapunov's works for piano and orchestra as beautiful as it is comprehensive.

Whether in Opp 4, 28 or 38, you could never fail to guess the composer's nationality, and even when you sense Balakirev's eagle-eyed scrutiny of the First Concerto or Liszt's influence in the Second, Lyapunov's style invariably transcends the sources of his inspiration. Indeed, it is no exaggeration to say, as Edward Garden does in his excellent accompanying essay, that the hushed nocturnal opening to the Second Concerto is among the loveliest in the repertoire, setting the stage for every starry-eyed wonder.

The writing is as lavish and ornate as even the most ardent lover of Russian Romantic music could wish – at 3'35" it's like some richly embroidered cloth winking and glinting with a thousand different lights and colours. More generally, everything is seen through such a personal and committed perspective that all sense of derivation or of a tale twice told is erased.

Such an overall impression would not, of course, occur if the performances were less skilful or meticulously prepared. Throughout, Hamish Milne holds his head high, lucidly and affectionately commanding cascades of notes, and he is stylishly partnered by Martyn Brabbins. There is competition in the Second Concerto from the urbane and scintillating Howard Shelley who is rather more immediately recorded on Chandos. But to have all three works on a single disc (the First Concerto receiving its first recording) is an irresistible bonus.

Symphony No 1

Symphony No 1, Op 12. Polonaise, Op 16
Piano Concerto No 2, Op 38[a]
[a]Howard Shelley pf BBC Philharmonic Orchestra / Vassily Sinaisky
Chandos CHAN9808 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded c2001/02

Sergei Lyapunov has always been a shadowy figure, his derivative yet distinctive voice drowned by his more celebrated compatriots and even by his contemporaries Taneyev, Liadov and Arensky. Yet hearing the First Symphony in a performance of this calibre you are reminded of the way Lyapunov's melodic appeal is complemented by brilliant craftsmanship.

The opening motif is sufficiently brief to invite elaboration and to play a key role in music as coherent as it is heartfelt. The chromatic undertow as the music eases into the poco più tranquillo, its mix of sweetness and unrest looks ahead to Rachmaninov's Second Symphony, and if the themes are less memorable than in that towering Romantic masterpiece they are marshalled and directed with great compositional skill. Vassily Sinaisky and the BBC Philharmonic Orchestra allow the long sinuous lines of the Andante sostenuto to unfold with an unfaltering tact and commitment, and in the balletic Scherzo, with its memories of Tchaikovsky, he realises all of the music's captivating grace and charm.

If Borodin is a key influence in the symphony then Liszt is central to the thinking behind the Second Piano Concerto. Lyapunov, after all, paid an eloquent tribute to Liszt in his 12 Transcendental Etudes for solo piano, a magnificent if uneven creation, and not surprisingly the lavish and intricate pianism in the Second Concerto is a Romantically inclined pianist's dream. Certainly its succulent themes and star-dust decoration could hardly be spun off more beguilingly than by Howard Shelley. His relaxed mastery and enviably elegant style inform every bar of this most seductive work.

The recordings are magnificent; no lover of Russian Romantic by-ways can afford to be without this.

Edward MacDowell

American 1860-1908

GROVE MacDowell studied the piano in Paris (with Marmontel), Wiesbaden and Frankfurt (Carl Heymann), as well as composition (with Raff, at the Hoch Conservatory in Frankfurt), taking his first post at the Darmstadt Conservatory. Liszt heard his First Modern Suite and First Piano Concerto and strongly encouraged him; by 1884 German firms had published 10 of his works. After several years in Wiesbaden he moved to Boston in 1888 to pursue a performing career. His Second Piano Concerto and First and Second Orchestral Suites won success there and in New York, and he was increasingly accepted as a leading figure in American musical life. Compositions of the Boston years included his popular Woodland Sketches, Sonata tragica and Sonata eroica and the Six love Songs. In 1896 he became the first professor of music at Columbia University; besides organizing the new department, he conducted a New York men's glee club and composed some of his best piano music – Sea Pieces, the Third and Fourth Sonatas, New England Idyls – and many male choruses. He left Columbia in 1904 but continued to teach privately; after his death his summer home at Peterborough, New Hampshire, was converted into an artists' colony (still active).

MacDowell was a Romantic by temperament, with a musical imagination shaped by nature and literature (notably poetry and Celtic and Nordic legends). His style derives largely from Schumann, Liszt, Wagner, Raff and especially Grieg and, though not innovatory, influential or distinctively American, retains a certain melodic freshness and attractive orchestral colouring.

Piano Concertos

Piano Concertos – No 1 in A minor, Op 15[a];
No 2 in D minor, Op 23[a]. Hexentanz, Op 17 No 2[a].
Romance for Cello and Orchestra, Op 35[b]
[a]Stephen Prutsman pf [b]Aisling Drury Byrne vc
National Symphony Orchestra of Ireland / Arthur Fagen
Naxos 8 559049 (56 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1999

Music of another time, another age, the MacDowell piano concertos can, in the right hands, seem more endearing than quaint or overblown. Both may satisfy conventional notions of dark and light, of tragedy and skittishness, but their heart-easing, lavishly decorated themes understandably attracted Liszt. Stephen Prutsman, a brilliant and versatile pianist, plays with ease and fluency, tossing aside the Presto movements from both concertos with an enviable sheen, though arguably without a necessarily committed or potent romanticism. Suave and engaging in the Grieg-haunted Andante tranquillo from the A minor Concerto, he loses his poise in the deeply welling più mosso, con passione from the D minor Concerto's first movement, and it is here, in particular, that one misses Van Cliburn's unforgettable warmth and virtuosity (RCA – nla). No pianist has played this concerto with such magisterial command or emotional generosity; indeed, it sounds as if it was written for him. Eugene List, too, shows a higher degree of involvement than Prutsman, though it must be admitted that the latter's occasional reticence results from Naxos's recessed sound, which irons out much sense of dynamic perspective or variety. Too often Prutsman is confined to the shadows when he should be centre-stage. The National Symphony Orchestra of Ireland has its uneasy moments, but world-première recordings of the Hexentanz, in an arrangement for piano and orchestra, and the Romance for cello and orchestra make this a tempting issue.

Six Poems after Heine, Op 31

Piano Sonata No 4 in E minor, Op 59, 'Keltic'. Forgotten Fairy Tales, Op 4. Six Poems after Heine, Op 31. 12 Virtuoso Etudes, Op 46
James Barbagallo pf Ⓕ
Marco Polo 8 223633 (65 minutes: DDD)

Edward MacDowell's star may have faded to near oblivion over the years. Yet even when his very personal and oddly touching voice seems stifled by deference to outmoded European ideals he still provides enough poetic and psychological interest to make James Barbagallo's affectionate tribute more than worthwhile. The rough-and-tumble of academic life, with its hard-nosed, political jockeying for position, was ill-suited to MacDowell's gentle nature and his professorship at Columbia was short-lived. The gems of this release are without doubt the six Op 31 Poems after Heine, their charm and piquancy evoking Scottish castles, nightingales and a shepherd boy 'crowned with golden sunshine'. The Forgotten Fairy Tales, too, have their moments but the 12 Virtuoso Etudes are somewhat less interesting than their title might imply: the 'Polonaise' is truly awful and the 'Valse triste' an unengaging mixture of whimsy and complacency. However, 'Wilde Jagd', with its sinister chromatic undertow, is effective and there is much homely lyricism elsewhere. Although the Keltic Sonata urges us on with instructions such as 'with tragic pathos', the music is overwhelmed by Grieg's influence and by too many tub-thumping, inflated gestures. Overall, Barbagallo is more persuasive in intimacy than in brilliance. That aside, he is unfailingly warm-hearted in his approach.

Guillaume de Machaut

French c1300-1377

GROVE Machaut entered the service of John of Luxembourg, King of Bohemia, as a royal secretary, c1323. The king helped him to procure a canonry in Reims, which was confirmed in 1335; Machaut settled there c1340, although he continued in royal service until the king's death (1346). He then served various members of the French high nobility, including John, Duke of Berry, his later years being dedicated to the manuscript compilation of his works.

With his prolific output of motets and songs, Machaut was the single most important figure of the French Ars Nova. He followed and developed the guidelines of Philippe de Vitry's treatise Ars nova and, in particular, observed Vitry's unprecedented advocation of duple time in many of his works, even in his setting of the Ordinary of the Mass. Only in some of his lais and virelais and the Hoquetus David did he consistently adhere to 13th-century rhythmic patterns and genres. His own rhythmic style is novel in its use of variety and motivic interest, particularly through syncopation, and in his development of isorhythmic techniques: all but three of his 23 motets, and four of the movements of the Messe de Nostre Dame –one of the earliest polyphonic settings of the Mass Ordinary – are isorhythmic. In secular music, Machaut set a wide range of poetic forms, all of which are illustrated in his long narrative poem, the Remede de Fortune (probably an early work). While the relationship between text and music is most closely observed in the monophonic lais and virelais, a highly flexible approach is adopted in the three-voice motets so that the subtle treatment of the text avoids the symmetricality of complete isorhythm. More progressive features of Machaut's style - an increased awareness of tonality, the use of unifying rhythmic motifs – are found in his polyphonic settings of rondeaux and ballades, while melodic considerations are to the fore in his virelais.

Messe de Nostre Dame

Messe de Nostre Dame. Je ne cesse de prier (Lai 'de la fonteinne'). Ma fin est mon commencement
Hilliard Ensemble / Paul Hillier
Hyperion CDA66358 (54 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included ●

Machaut's Messe de Nostre Dame is the earliest known setting of the Ordinary Mass by a single composer. Paul Hillier avoids a full reconstruction on this release: his deference to 'authenticity' restricts itself to the usage of 14th century French pronunciation of the Latin. His ensemble sings two to a part, with prominent countertenors. It is arguable whether the musicians sing the chant at too fast a tempo but they are smooth and flexible and the performance as a whole is both fluid and light in texture. Also included on this release are two French compositions. The wonderful Lai 'de la fonteinne' is admirably sung by three tenors and is pure delight – providing food for the heart as well as for the intellect. The rather more familiar Ma fin est mon commencement, with its retrograde canon, completes this admirable disc.

Songs

Tant doucement me sens emprisonnes. Comment puet on. De Fortune. Mors sui se je ne vous voy. Se quanque amours. Je ne cuit pas qu'onques. Liement me deport. Je puis trop bien. Certes mon oueil. En amer a douce vie. Hé dame de valour. Une vipere. Ma fin est mon commencement. De toutes flours
Orlando Consort (Robert Harre-Jones counterten
Charles Daniels, Angus Smith tens
Donald Greig bar)
Archiv Produktion 457 618-2AH (78 minutes: DDD)
Texts and translations included Ⓕ
Recorded 1997 ●

This is unique: a disc devoted entirely to Machaut's songs, all performed with voices alone. Only the texted line in the manuscripts is sung with text; the rest are vocalized. While this has been the accepted orthodoxy in many circles for some years, nobody has previously quite had the courage to do it for an entire 78 minutes. It works very well, not least because the sheer skill of the Orlando Consort leaves one speechless: everything is immaculately tuned, balanced and phrased; the music is flawlessly edited; absolutely nothing seems to impede the flow of the music. What some listeners may feel is that the texts are not quite sufficiently projected. Particularly in the four-voice pieces you need to listen carefully to distinguish the texted line, which is after all the 'main' voice in any of these songs. But that becomes a lot easier if you follow the texts in the booklet: suddenly the ear can focus on the texted line. And that seems important. The choice of works is also excellent, with an emphasis on pieces that are rarely heard.

Sir Alexander Mackenzie

British 1847-1935

GROVE Mackenzie studied in Germany and at the Royal Academy of Music, by 1865 becoming known in Edinburgh as a violinist and conductor. In the 1880s he won a reputation as one of England's leading composers, chiefly with the oratorio The Rose of Sharon (1884). From 1885 he lived in London, conducting the Novello Oratorio Concerts and, from 1888, serving as an influential principal of the RAM he also conducted for the Philharmonic Society (1892-9) and occasionally for the Royal Choral Society, making a tour of Canada in 1903. He received a knighthood (1895) and created KCVO (1922). A workmanlike composer, Mackenzie produced successful choral works, vocal settings (many of Scottish poets) and descriptive orchestral pieces, often imaginative and satisfying if also somewhat derivative.

Scottish Concerto

Mackenzie Scottish Concerto, Op 55
Tovey Piano Concerto in A, Op 15
Steven Osborne pf
BBC Scottish Symphony Orchestra / Martyn Brabbins
Hyperion CDA67023 (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1998

From the horns' call-to-arms at the outset of the piece to the irrepressible merrymaking of the closing pages, Edinburgh-born Sir Alexander Mackenzie's Scottish Concerto (1897) spells firm enjoyment, and it is astonishing that it is only here receiving its first recording. Cast in three movements, each of which employs a traditional Scottish melody, it is a thoroughly endearing and beautifully crafted work which wears its native colours without any hint of stale cliché or cloying sentimentality; indeed, the canny wit, genuine freshness and fertile imagination with which Mackenzie treats his material are in evidence throughout the work.

By contrast, Edinburgh-based Sir Donald Tovey's Piano Concerto (1903) exhibits a rather more formal demeanour, its three movements brimful of youthful ambition and possessing a very Brahmsian solidity and dignity. Tovey's idiomatically assured writing is not always entirely untouched by a certain academic earnestness, but on the whole any unwanted stuffiness is deftly kept at bay. In fact, repeated hearings only strengthen one's admiration for this work.

No praise can be too high for Steven Osborne's contribution, while the excellent Martyn Brabbins draws a splendidly stylish and alert response from his fine BBC group. Sound and balance are excellent too.

James MacMillan British 1959

GROVE MacMillan studied at Edinburgh University and then with Casken at Durham University. In 1990 he became affiliate composer of the Scottish Chamber Orchestra he has since become visiting composer for the Philharmonia (London) and artistic director of its Contemporary Music Series. His music is noted for its energy and emotional power, its religious and political content and its references to Scottish folk music. Recent works include The Beserking (1990), a piano concerto for Peter Donohoe; Sinfonietta (1991); and Veni, Veni, Emmanuel (1992), a percussion concerto for Evelyn Glennie.

Tryst

Tryst[a]. Adam's Rib[b]. They Saw the Stone had been Rolled Away[a]. Í (A Meditation on Iona)[a]
[b]Scottish Chamber Orchestra Brass; [a]Scottish Chamber Orchestra / Joseph Swensen Ⓕ
BIS CD1019 (59 minutes: DDD)

This is the third recording of Tryst – extraordinary for a contemporary orchestral work. But its individuality is still as striking now as when it first appeared more than 10 years ago: especially so in this taut, gripping version. MacMillan touches, as warmly and directly as Mahler. The sounds can be violent, acerbic or prickly (as indeed they can in Mahler!); the keening string lament at the heart of the work isn't always easy on the ear, and yet it all speaks – it is plainly the work of someone who urgently wants to tell us something. So too are the performances. Joseph Swensen brings the passionate enthusiasm to Tryst, and to Í, that has made his concerts with the Scottish Chamber Orchestra such events in Scotland. Í (pronounced 'ee') is a quite astonishing work. The subtitle, 'A Meditation on Iona', might suggest something romantically atmospheric, with soft, lilting Celtic accents. In fact this is hard, intense, sometimes eerie music: a tribute to St Columba, the muscular, fiercely contentious monk who brought Christianity to Scotland and founded the monastic college of Iona – perhaps also a reminder of St Paul's words about working out one's salvation with 'fear and trembling'.

Along with this come two short, brooding pieces, which are dominated by the sound of brass: Adam's Rib and They saw the Stone had been Rolled Away, the latter giving more than a foretaste of MacMillan's Symphony, Vigil – the concluding part of the trilogy Triduum. As with Triduum, the success is total: powerful, concise works, powerfully and understandingly performed, in crisp, clear recordings.

Veni, veni, Emmanuel

Veni, veni, Emmanuel[a]. After the tryst[b]. '... as others see us ...'[c]. Three Dawn Rituals[c]. Untold[c]
[a]Evelyn Glennie perc [b]Ruth Crouch vn [b]Peter Evans pf [ac]Scottish Chamber Orchestra / [a]Jukka-Pekka Saraste, [c]James MacMillan Ⓕ
Catalyst 09026 61916-2 (68 minutes: DDD) ●●

Taking the Advent plainsong of the title as his basis, MacMillan reflects in his continuous 26-minute sequence the theological implications behind the period between Advent and Easter. The five contrasted sections are in a sort of arch form, with the longest and slowest in the middle. That section, 'Gaude, Gaude', expresses not direct joy as the Latin words might suggest but a meditative calm, using the four relevant chords from the plainsong's refrain as a hushed ostinato. Over that the soloist on the marimba plays an elaborate but gentle and intensely poetic cadenza. The main sections on either side are related dances based on hocketing repeated notes and full of jazzy syncopations, with powerful sections for Advent and Easter respectively framing the work as a whole. The plainsong emerges dramatically as a chorale at the climax of the second dance-section, a telling moment.

The composer's notes are most helpful, but they deliberately keep quiet about the coda, where MacMillan brings off another dramatic coup. After the soloist has worked through the widest range of percussion in the different sections, there is a gap when players in the orchestra pick up and start playing little jingling bells, and the soloist progresses up to the big chimes set on a platform above the rest of the orchestra. The very close of the work brings a crescendo of chimes intended to reflect the joy of Easter in the Catholic service and the celebration of the Resurrection. Disappointingly though, the preparatory jingles are gentle and discreet, and even the final chimes are devotional rather than exuberant. Even so, this is a magnificent representation of one of the most striking and powerful works written by any British composer of the younger generation.

String Quartets

String Quartets – No 1, 'Visions of a November Spring'; No 2, 'Why is this night different?'. Memento. Tuireadh[a]
[a]Robert Plane cl Emperor Quartet
(Martin Burgess, Clare Hayes vns
Fiona Bonds va William Schofield vc) Ⓕ
BIS BIS-CD1269 (74 minutes: DDD) ●

Visions of a November Spring, James MacMillan's First String Quartet, was completed in 1988 and already bears many a stylistic trait of the composer who was to create such a stir two years later with The Confession of Isobel Gowdie, not least a mastery of the singing line and the distinctive, 'keening' quality of the string writing itself. The work is cast in two movements, the much lengthier second of which perhaps doesn't quite add up to the sum of its impressive parts.

No such reservations, however, apply to the Second Quartet from 1998, whose title, Why is this night different?, comes from the question posed by the youngest member of the family during the Jewish rite of Seder on the first night of Passover. The father answers by telling of the flight of the children of Israel from Egypt. The result is an arrestingly powerful and sure-footed masterwork, ideally proportioned, economically argued and always evincing a riveting narrative and emotional scope. Similarly, Tuireadh (Gaelic for 'lament') for clarinet and string quartet packs a wealth of pungent and varied expression into its single-movement frame. MacMillan wrote it in 1991 as a 'musical complement' to Sue Jane Taylor's sculpture in memory of the victims of the Piper Alpha oil rig disaster, having also been greatly moved by a letter from a grieving mother who recalled how, during the memorial service, 'a spontaneous keening sound rose gently from the mourners assembled on the boat'. Tuireadh is a deeply compassionate threnody, as is the much briefer, sparer and no less haunting Memento for string quartet (1994), which (as so often with this composer) shows the influence of the ancient oral tradition of Gaelic psalmody still practised in the Western Isles today.

Performances throughout are as superlatively disciplined as they are tirelessly eloquent; sound, balance and presentation are all beyond reproach. Another MacMillan/BIS triumph.

The Birds of Rhiannon

The Birds of Rhiannon. Magnificat. Exsultet.
Nunc dimittis. Mairi. The Gallant Weaver
BBC Singers; BBC Philharmonic Orchestra / James MacMillan
Chandos CHAN9997 (71 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded c2001 ●

MacMillan's colours can be garish, his gestures histrionic, but his is an art of passion and commitment: these are the effects of a composer seeking to make you feel and react strongly as well as think deeply. His admixture of Celtic cultural nationalism, leftist politics and Catholicism may be too rich for the blood of some 21st century connoisseurs, but it provides affecting and memorable listening experiences. This CD resolutely demonstrates the point.

The setting of Burns's Gallant Weaver (1997) is MacMillan at his gentlest and most intimate, but this only softens you up for Rhiannon (2001), inspired by a legend from the Mabinogion, Dark Age tales from which much of the 'Matter of Britain' arose. The Times described its Proms première as unwieldy and florid with overworked and impoverished motifs. Maybe the performance has since been refined: here it sounds polymorphous and full of incident. More importantly, there is a cogent musical argument, albeit not of the most sophisticated or subtle kind.

The Magnificat, a BBC Millennium commission heard here in the version for choir and orchestra, still includes an organ part which powers the violent ensemble interjections in the closing minutes.

He is already handsomely represented on disc, but this is as good an introduction as you'll get.

Mass

Mass[ab]. A New Song[ab]. Christus vincit[a].
Gaudeamus in loci pace[b]. Seinte Mari moder milde[ab]. A Child's Prayer[a]. Changed[ab]
[a]Westminster Cathedral Choir / Martin Baker with [b]Andrew Reid org
Hyperion CDA67219 (66 minutes: DDD). Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 2000 ●●

MacMillan's choral music is more often than not a direct response to his own Christian faith. The Mass recorded here was commissioned by Westminster Cathedral for the 'Glory of God in the Millennium Year of the Jubilee' and unlike MacMillan's two previous Masses, which were composed for congregational use, was specifically written for performance by a professional choir. It is through-composed and this provides a sense of structure, continuity and flow that greatly enhances its accessibility when heard out of context – on disc rather than celebrated. That MacMillan intended the Mass for practical use is apparent by his choice of vernacular rather than the Latin text. His often eclectic style is very much in evidence; the score glimmers with echoes of Howells and Duruflé, especially in the Kyrie and in his often quasi-orchestral organ writing, but in general it is MacMillan's own individual voice that shapes this impressive and deeply felt setting. The Gloria contains some particularly effective music, not least some marvellously atmospheric organ writing, and the crepuscular Agnus Dei lingers in the mind long after the final notes die away. Of the remaining works on the disc, A New Song and A Child's Prayer (dedicated to the victims of the Dunblane tragedy) stand out as particularly fine examples of MacMillan's choral writing. As an added bonus we are treated to the wonderfully translucent organ solo Gaudeamus in loci pace, beautifully performed by Andrew Reid. Performances throughout are exceptionally fine, the recorded sound radiantly atmospheric. A must.

Raising Sparks

Raising Sparks[a]. Piano Sonata. Barncleupédie.
Birthday Present. For Ian.
[a]Jean Rigby mez John York pf
[a]Nash Ensemble (Ian Brown pf Philippa Davies fl
Richard Hosford cl Marianne Thorsen, Elizabeth
Wexler vns James Boyd va Paul Watkins va Skaila Kanga hp) / Martyn Brabbins
Black Box BBM1067 (57 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Martyn Brabbins and the Nash Ensemble here offer a superb recording première of a major work by James MacMillan. Like much of his music, it has a religious base. The big difference this time is that whereas his source of inspiration generally lies at the heart of his Roman Catholicism, this time is it the Jewish tradition. Raising Sparks, a 35-minute cantata on the theme of creation and redemption, is inspired by a poem by Michael Symmons Roberts and by the writing of the Jewish author, Menahem Nahum; the work takes one inexorably through a kaleidoscopic sequence of symbolic images, with one vivid simile piled on another in Roberts's striking language. MacMillan, for whom the poems were written, responds to the poet's verbal colour with musical ideas, often onomatopoeic but always striking and dramatic, within a taut musical structure. The vocal line, though taxing, is more lyrical than in many new works, superbly sung by Jane Rigby, while the instrumental accompaniment is endlessly inventive, with the piano (the masterly Ian Brown) generally the central instrument in the ensemble, with the fifth of the songs accompanied simply by the occasional note sounded on the piano and no more. Otherwise Brown leads the Nash players in a totally committed performance, very well recorded.

The four piano works which come as coupling find the pianist John York just as dedicated. The Piano Sonata of 1985 in three movements is much the most demanding, far grittier than the rest, inspired by the extreme winter of that year. It remains so potent in MacMillan's mind that he used it as the basis for his Second Symphony of 1999. The first of the piano pieces, For Ian, then brings release into pure tonality and lyricism, a strathspey full of Scottish-snap rhythms. After that Birthday Present seems a sombre gift, musically striking nonetheless, and the final Barncleupédie (1990) rounds things off lightheartedly. Backing up a masterly major work, these are occasional pieces which readily earn their place.

Leevi Madetoja Finnish 1887-1947

GROVE Madetoja studied with Sibelius in Helsinki (1906-10), with d'Indy in Paris (1910-11), and in Vienna and Berlin (1911-12), then worked in Helsinki as a teacher, critic and composer. His works, often using Ostrobothnian folk music and French techniques, are skilfully orchestrated; they include the operas The Ostrobothnians (1923) and Juha (1934), three symphonies (1916, 1918, 1926) and much choral music.

Lieder

The Land in our song. Lieder, Op 2 – Since thou didst leave; Alone; Winter morning; Starry night. Dark-hued leaves, Op 19 No 1. Serenade, Op 16 No 1. Folk Songs from Northern Ostrobothnia, Op 18. Songs of Youth, Op 20*b*. Take up that fair kantele again. A flower is purest when opening. Lieder, Op 25 – From afar I hear them singing; Wintry road; Birthplace; Sometimes weeping in the evening. I would build a hut, Op 26 No 3. Song at the plough, Op 44 No 1. Lieder, Op 49 – Hail, O daylight in the North; Finland's Tree. Lieder, Op 60 – My longing; Evening. Lieder, Op 71 – I want to go home; The word of the Master. Song of the winter wind
Gabriel Suovanen bar
Gustav Djupsjöbacka pf
Ondine ODE996–2 (79 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, texts and translations included
Recorded c2002 ⦿

The 32 songs are chronologically laid out. After the late-Romantic elegiac lingua franca of the Op 2 set, the first of Op 9, 'Dark-hued leaves', startles with its affinities with Rachmaninov; this gem of a piece is on the short list for all Finnish song recitals. Composed in 1913, the first of the Songs of Youth, Op 20*b*, could not be published until Finland's independence from Russia after the First World War, which is no surprise, given that its text is demonstratively nationalistic ('Arise, O young sons of Finland…Saved and cherished shall our homeland soon be!') and its melody strong and catchy. This is an altogether impressive opus, whose concluding 'Christmas song' has become one of Finland's best-loved carols. With Op 25 we are back to the ecstatic tone of the earlier songs. Perhaps most impressive of this set is No 2, 'Wintry Road', with its tolling Brittenish ostinato and general air of painful asceticism.

Swedish-born baritone Gabriel Suovanen is well attuned both to the late-Romantic manner of Madetoja's early songs and to the ardent national-patriotic tone of his later ones. And his pianist, Gustav Djupsjöbacka, supplies stylish accompaniments. Recording quality is fine, and collectors of Nordic and/or song repertoire should not hesitate.

Albéric Magnard French 1865-1914

GROVE Magnard, of a serious disposition, produced severe, formalistic works – mainly orchestral and chamber music and operas – taking Wagner, Beethoven, Gluck and his teacher d'Indy as models. Canon and fugue pervade much of his output, though the Third Symphony (1896) and the opera Bérénice (1909), his masterpiece, show a refreshing clarity of scoring and a lyric simplicity.

Symphonies

Symphonies – No 1 in C minor, Op 4. No 2 in E, Op 6
BBC Scottish Symphony Orchestra / Jean-Yves Ossonce
Hyperion CDA67030 (67 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997 ⦿

Symphonies – No 3 in B flat minor, Op 11. No 4 in C sharp minor, Op 21
BBC Scottish Symphony Orchestra / Jean-Yves Ossonce
Hyperion CDA67040 (73 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997 ⦿

The name of Albéric Magnard began to impinge on the record public only 30 years ago, and there have been recordings of three of his symphonies, the opera Guercoeur, and a five-disc set of his chamber music and songs; but he seems doomed to be a composer whose music survives only via the gramophone: his impact on the concert life of this country has been virtually nil, and he has not been much better served in his native France. Not that he would have cared overmuch: during his life (brought to an abrupt end at the start of the First World War by German invaders who set fire to his country house) he made little attempt to get his music performed, being paranoically sensitive to any suspicion of nepotistic influence, as his father was a powerful newspaper proprietor. By all accounts he was a withdrawn and austere person, and perhaps in keeping with that image his music is not for the casual listener who looks for facile attractiveness, but in a somewhat Teutonic way is rewarding for the serious-minded in its skilfully crafted and thoughtfully lyrical character.

The First Symphony (1890) shows the unmistakable influence of Wagner in the religioso slow movement. Despite the adoption of the cyclic principle championed by his teacher Vincent d'Indy, under whose watchful eye the work was written and who must have smiled approvingly at his pupil's fluent contrapuntal technique, Magnard's proliferation of ideas threatens structural continuity, especially in the first movement. In contrast to that movement's initial brooding atmosphere, the Second Symphony begins more sunnily and spiritedly, and the following Scherzo (which replaced an earlier fugue) is a bucolic 'Danses' tinged with introspection. The emotional core of the symphony is the luxuriant Chant varié, and the work ends in an almost light-hearted mood. The Third Symphony's striking organum-like opening leads to an Allegro by turns vigorous and contemplative. Next comes a Scherzo headed 'Danses' (as in the previous symphony), a mocking soufflé with a wistful central section – an altogether captivating movement that is anything but austere. The movingly tense slow movement's long lines are subverted by menacing outbursts that build to a stormy climax before subsiding; and there is a finale which combines exuberance and lyricism with a return to the symphony's very first theme. This is certainly the work to recommend to newcomers to Magnard.

Several years elapsed before the appearance of his last symphony in 1913, and by then his overall mood had darkened. The turbulent passion that characterizes the first movement, presented in dramatically colourful orchestration, is also mirrored in the finale: between them come a highly individual Scherzo with strange oriental-type passages and a lengthy, anguished slow movement. The BBC Scottish Symphony Orchestra is on splendid form throughout and their efforts have been recorded in exemplary fashion.

Gustav Mahler

Austrian 1860-1911

GROVE From 1875 to 1878 Mahler was at the Vienna Conservatory, where he studied the piano, harmony and composition. After that he attended university lectures, worked as a music teacher and composed Das klagende Lied, a cantata indebted to the operas of Weber and Wagner but also showing many conspicuously Mahlerian features.

In 1880 he accepted a conducting post at a summer theatre at Bad Hall, and was engaged in a similar capacity in 1881 and 1883 at the theatres in Ljubljana and Olomouc. In autumn 1883, he became music director at Kassel. He found conditions uncongenial, but an unhappy love affair with one of the singers led to his first masterpiece, the song cycle Lieder eines fahrenden Gesellen, and the inception of the closely related First Symphony.

Early in 1885 Mahler secured the post of second conductor at the Neues Stadttheater in Leipzig, to begin in July 1886. The intervening year he spent at the Landestheater in Prague, where he had the opportunity of conducting operas by Gluck, Mozart, Beethoven and Wagner. At Leipzig, in January 1887, he took over the Ring cycle from Arthur Nikisch, who fell ill, and convincingly established among critics and public his genius as an interpretative artist. The following year he completed Weber's unfinished comic opera Die drei Pintos (its successful performances in 1888 made Mahler famous and provided a useful source of income) and fell in love with the wife of Weber's grandson. It was through the Webers that he discovered in 1887 the musical potential of Des Knaben Wunderhorn, a collection of folklike texts by Arnim and Brentano which provided Mahler with words for all but one of his songs for the next 14 years.

Disagreements with colleagues led to Mahler's resignation at Leipzig in May 1888 and to his dismissal a few months later from Prague, but within a few weeks he secured a far more important appointment at the Royal Opera in Budapest. His first year there was overshadowed by the illness and deaths of his parents and his sister. Though he was successful in bringing the opera house into profit and improving standards and repertory, the imminent appointment of an Intendant with artistic control made his situation untenable; he resigned and became first conductor at the Stadttheater, Hamburg. Despite a stifling artistic atmosphere and a heavy workload, Mahler returned to composition and at his summer retreat in the Salzkammergut completed the Second and Third Symphonies. 1895 brought both tragedy, when his youngest brother committed suicide, and success, with the première of the Second Symphony in Berlin in December. Now a conductor of international stature and a composer of growing reputation, he turned his attention to the Vienna Hofoper. The main obstacle was his Jewish origins; so he accepted Catholic baptism in February 1897 and was appointed Kapellmeister at two months later.

At Vienna Mahler brought a stagnating opera house to a position of unrivalled brilliance. In 1901 he had a villa built at Maiernigg on the Wörthersee in Carinthia, where he spent the summers composing. In 1902 he married Alma, daughter of the artist Emil Jakob Schindler, and though their life together was not untroubled the security benefited his creative life. At Maiernigg he completed Symphonies Nos 5-8 and in 1904 the Kindertotenlieder, settings of five poems by Rückert on the death of children. The death of Mahler's own elder daughter, Maria, from scarlet fever three years later left him distraught. In Vienna Mahler was surrounded by radical young composers, including Schoenberg, Berg, Webern and Zemlinsky, whose work he supported and encouraged. His propagation of his own music, however, aroused opposition from a section of the Viennese musical establishment, and when the campaign against him, led by an anti-semitic press, gained momentum he turned to New York, where he spent his last winters as conductor, first of the Metropolitan Opera and, from 1910, of the New York PO. He continued to spend the summers in Europe, where he undertook further conducting and completed the valedictory Ninth Symphony and Das Lied von der Erde. This last, a setting of six Chinese poems in German translation, took the shape of a large-scale symphony for two voices and orchestra but Mahler, whose fear of death and sense of fate had been intensified by the diagnosis of a heart condition in 1907, refused to number the work 10, citing Beethoven, Schubert and Bruckner. He did, however, start work on a 10th symphony, but died before he could complete it.

Although as a conductor Mahler achieved fame primarily in opera, his creative energies were directed almost wholly towards symphony and song. Even in the early Das klagende Lied, there are stylistic features to be found in his mature music, for example the combining of onstage and offstage orchestras, the association of high tragedy and the mundane, the drawing on folksong ideas and the dramatic-symbolic use of tonality. This last reappeared in his early masterpiece, the Lieder eines fahrenden Gesellen, which has an evolutionary tonal scheme paralleling the changing fortunes of the travelling hero. In the 1890s Mahler was much influenced by the Wunderhorn poems, in his symphonies as well as his songs, for he often used song to clarify an important moment in the structure of a symphony, for example 'Urlicht' in No 2, which he found himself unable to continue after writing the imposing first movement. No 3 is more idiosyncratic; again, its dramatic scheme evolved with recourse to song and chorus. No 4 returns to tradition, in a first movement of rare wit and subtlety; here the poetic idea is the progress from experience to innocence (with a Wunderhorn song finale). While No 2, 'The Resurrection', moves from C minor to E flat, No 4 goes from G major to the 'heavenly' E major. Parody, irony and satire are important in Mahler's thinking during these years, with popular invention (like the children's round in no.1 and the march tunes of No 3) and elements of distortion.

Nos 5, 6 and 7 are sometimes regarded as a trilogy, although No 5 is a heroic work, with a narrative running from its opening funeral march through the agitated Allegro to a Scherzo and a triumphant conclusion. The symphony moves from C sharp minor to D major. No 6, a tragic work – and in many musicians' view, his greatest symphony for its equilibrium between form and drama - begins and ends in A minor; the finale makes it clear that there is no escape for the implied hero and indeed his death is symbolically enacted in the movement's shattering climax. The shape of No 7, which moves from E minor to C major, is less satisfying; possibly, with its dark, nocturnal middle movement, it is consciously built round the poetic concept of darkness moving towards the light of the finale. The largest-scale of Mahler's symphonies is No 8, the so-called 'Symphony of a Thousand', in which the second part is a vast synthesis of forms and media embodying the setting of the final scene of Goethe's Faust as an amalgam of dramatic cantata, oratorio, song cycle, Lisztian choral symphony and instrumental symphony. This public pronouncement was followed by one of his most personal, Das Lied von der Erde, influenced in its vocal writing and woodwind obbligatos by Mahler's new interest in Bach. His last two symphonies return to the four-movement scheme of the middle-period ones, incorporating extensions of the character movements of his earlier works with the new type of slow first movement (followed up in the unfinished 10th) and ending with an Adagio in a mood of profound resignation. Mahler's extension of symphonic form, of the symphony's expressive scope and the use of the orchestra (especially the agonised timbres he obtained by using instruments, particularly wind, at the top of their compass) represent a pained farewell to Romanticism; different aspects were followed up by the Second Viennese School, Shostakovich and Britten.

Complete Symphonies

No 1 in D; No 2 in C minor, 'Resurrection'; No 3 in D minor; No 4 in G; No 5 in C sharp minor; No 6 in A minor; No 7 in E minor; No 8 in E flat, 'Symphony of a Thousand'; No 9 in D; No 10 in F sharp minor

---

Symphonies – No 1[a]; No 2[b] (with Cheryl Studer sop Waltraud Meier mez Arnold Schoenberg Choir); No 3[b] (Jessye Norman sop Vienna Boys' Choir; Vienna State Opera Chorus); No 4[b] (Frederica von Stade mez); No 5[a]; Nos 6[c] and 7[c]; No 8[a] (Studer, Sylvia McNair, Andrea Rost sops Anne Sofie von Otter mez Rosemarie Lang contr Peter Seiffert ten Bryn Terfel bass-bar Jan-Hendrik Rootering bass Tölz Boys' Choir; Berlin Radio Chorus; Prague Philharmonic Chorus) Nos 9[b] and 10[b] – Adagio [a]Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra; [b]Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra; [c]Chicago Symphony Orchestra / Claudio Abbado

DG ⑫ 447 023-2GX12 (718 minutes: ADD/DDD).
Texts and translations included. Ⓜ
Recorded 1977-94 OO

The current pre-eminence of Gustav Mahler in the concert hall and on disc is not something that could have been anticipated – other than by the composer himself. Hard now to believe that his revival had to wait until the centenary celebrations of his birth in 1960. And yet by 1980 he was more widely esteemed than his longer-lived contemporaries Sibelius and Strauss and could suddenly be seen to tower over 20th-century music much as Beethoven must have done in a previous age. By this time too, a new generation of conductors had come to the fore, further transforming our perceptions of the composer. Claudio Abbado is arguably the most distinguished of this group and, while his interpretations will not satisfy every listener on every occasion, they make an excellent choice for the library shelves, when the price is reasonably competitive and the performances so emblematic (and arguably central to our understanding) of Mahler's place in contemporary musical life.

Of the alternatives, Haitink's package has the fewest expressive distortions while Bernstein's is the most ceaselessly emotive of them all; neither has Abbado's particular combination of qualities. It is probably no accident that Donald Mitchell's notes for this set are focused on the nature of Mahler's 'modernity'. For it is that ironic, inquisitive, preternaturally aware young composer who haunts this conductor's performances. Not for Abbado the heavy, saturated textures of 19th-century Romanticism, nor the chilly rigidity of some of his own 'modernist' peers. Instead an unaffected warmth and elegance of sound allows everything to come through naturally – in so far as the different venues and DG's somewhat variable technology will permit – even in the most searingly intense of climaxes.

Abbado presents Mahler as a fluent classicist, and is less concerned to characterise the surface battle of conflicting emotions than to elucidate the underlying symphonic structure. The lack of Solti's brand of forthright theatricality can bring a feeling of disappointment. But even where he underplays the drama of the moment, sufficient sense of urgency is sustained by a combination of well-judged tempos, marvellously graduated dynamics and precisely balanced, ceaselessly changing textures. The propulsion comes from within.

It was in November 1907 that Mahler famously told Sibelius that 'the symphony must be like the world. It must embrace everything.' And perhaps it is only today that we see this as a strength rather than a weakness in his music. He wrote music that is 'about' its own past while at the same time probing into all our futures, music that is so all-embracing and communicates with such directness that we can make it 'mean' whatever we want it to, confident that we alone have really understood the code. Abbado lacks Bernstein's desire to explore these limitless possibilities, but some will count that as a blessing. These are committed and authoritative performances.

New York Philharmonic – The Mahler Broadcasts 1948-82 H

Symphonies – No 1 (recorded live in 1959)[ac]; No 2 (Kathleen Battle sop Maureen Forrester contr Westminster Choir; rec 1982)[afm]; No 3 (Yvonne Minton mez Camerata Singers; Little Church around the Corner Boys' Choir; Trinity Church Boys' Choir; Brooklyn Boys' Choir rec 1976)[adm]; No 4 (Irmgard Seefried sop rec 1962)[ah]; No 5 (rec 1980)[akm]; No 6 (rec 1955)[ag]; No 7 (rec 1981)[ae]; No 8 (Frances Yeend, Uta Graf, Camilla Williams sops Martha Lipton, Louise Bernhardt contrs Eugene Conley ten Carlos Alexander bar George London bass-bar Schola Cantorum; Public School No 12 Boys' Choir, Manhattan; rec 1950)[bj]; No 9 (rec 1962)[ac]; No 10 – Adagio; Purgatorio (rec 1960 and 1958)[ag]. Lieder eines fahrenden Gesellen (Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau bar rec 1964)[ai].

Das Lied von der Erde (Kathleen Ferrier contr Set Svanholm ten rec 1948)[bl]

[a]New York Philharmonic Orchestra, [b]Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra of New York / [c]Sir John Barbirolli, [d]Pierre Boulez, [e]Rafael Kubelík, [f]Zubin Mehta, [g]Dimitri Mitropoulos, [h]Sir Georg Solti, [i]William Steinberg, [j]Leopold Stokowski, [k]Klaus Tennstedt, [l]Bruno Walter

New York Philharmonic mono/[m]stereo

⑫ NYP9801/12 (903 minutes: ADD). Also contains interviews and reminiscences about Mahler

Available at $225 (plus postage and packing) at selected Tower Records stores or by mail order; in North America call (toll free) 1-800-557-8268; worldwide 1-317-781-1861; Ⓕ

web: www.newyorkphilharmonic.org ●●

Not your average collection of Mahler symphonies, but one which, with pride, charts in words and music, the impact of the composer's final two years (1909-11) in and on New York and the important part the city's orchestra subsequently played in spreading the Mahler message. Consideration was given, when choosing what to include, to the New York players' own views and memories of the concerts or conductors; and to featuring symphonies from conductors who never took them into the studio. Bernstein is conspicuous by his absence, but it would seem that rights are not currently available for the release of his Mahler broadcast tapes. We hear, though, from the man whose Mahler was Bernstein's model; and Mitropoulos's 1960 Sixth Symphony must have been a hard act for Bernstein to follow. Mitropoulos delivers the symphony's integrity and unpalatable truths with a grim and arguably more compelling single-mindedness. Apart from the slow movement (placed second, and gloriously played), there is little relief from the symphony's battering march to tragedy.

Latterly interpreters have also been more protean in the Eighth's expansive Faust fantasy, and it would be idle to pretend that other conductors don't make more than Stokowski of the contrasts explicitly indicated in Mahler's score. Stokowski in 1950 opted for an unusually moderate range of tempos (starting with a swift Andante), and it is impossible to say whether he was playing safe, attempting to dignify the folksy inspiration, or bringing us something of the manner in which Mahler himself conducted the work (Stokowski was present at the Eighth's Munich world première in 1910). Whatever the case, along the way there are as many attractions as there are inevitable insecurities, and it is worth hearing, not least for the First Part of the symphony, which bears the unmistakable stamp of greatness, and the sound is a marvel for its years.

The earliest recording here is a vital, controlled and incisive 1948 Das Lied von der Erde from Walter, with Kathleen Ferrier making her American début. Set Svanholm tends to press ahead of the beat, but it is a rare pleasure to hear the tenor songs as resolutely conquered and characterised. As for Ferrier's contribution, there is little to choose between this and her famous 1952 Decca Vienna account made with a more relaxed Walter. The later recording perhaps presents the richer portrait of a unique vocal phenomenon, and a cathartic release of emotion in the final pages not matched in New York. Aptly enough for this enterprise, applause has been retained at the end of the works, even if, in the case of Das Lied, one wishes that the audience had waited a few seconds longer. But audience noise during the music can be frustrating. Time may well be standing still at the start of Barbirolli's 1959 First Symphony, but the audience is still finding its way to the seats.

Matters improve, possibly because, as one of the concert's critical notices informs us, only part of the audience stayed to the end. And the part that did was witness to some engaging features, such as the pronounced, and for the time, deeply unfashionable string portamentos, and a Scherzo with big boots and rustic charm laid on by the barrow-load. The Scherzo of Barbirolli's 1962 New York Ninth Symphony is of a consistently coarser cut than his 1964 Berlin studio recording for EMI, and arguably benefits from it, though there is little evidence for the booklet's general assessment of the Berlin Ninth as 'rather disengaged from the work's churning emotions'. And the brightly analytical (and stereo) Berlin recording does allow clearer perception of the details of – future archival revelations apart – Barbirolli's finest taped Mahler symphony interpretation. Solti's Fourth Symphony (also 1962), as we know from his two Decca studio recordings, was unexpectedly graceful, with a long-breathed slow movement, and admirable discipline and refinement, even if that refinement streamlines the work's bolder colours and sardonic edge.

All the New York recordings enjoy good balances; those already mentioned are all in very decent, if occasionally pale, mono sound. The stereo tapings aren't ideally flattering to New York's violins, but benefit from a wider dynamic range. For a live recording, the deployment of the various on- and off-stage forces in Mehta's 1982 Second is a major achievement. This was a special occasion for all involved (the orchestra's 10,000th concert), and although Mehta's is neither a particularly lofty nor radical view of the work, the excitement in the hall has transferred to disc admirably. The pleasures of Boulez's 1976 performance of the Third Symphony include a typical (and often very sensuous) cultivation of inner workings, concern for outer structure, very precisely graded dynamics, and a strikingly individual rubato. Rarely has the sudden tumult and its immediate aftermath at the end of the third movement – proclamatory brass receding over shimmering strings – cast such a spell.

Tennstedt had the ability, at the moment of performance, to persuade listeners that the music could and should sound no other way, and his 1980 New York Fifth Symphony runs the full gamut of 'no tomorrow' intensity, intervention, riotous colour and perfectly formed details.

In contrast, the years between Kubelík's Bavarian Radio Seventh (recorded for DG in 1970) and this 1981 New York account appear to have prompted a radical rethink. Or maybe Kubelík is responding to the extra heft of the New York orchestra and ephemeral concert conditions to push out the boundaries. Still recognisable, if moderated, are the sharp features and deliberately soured tone lending menace to both the second and third movements, and an Andante amoroso cajoled into a diversion of wonderfully graceful, fresh-voiced charm. But the much broader manner maximises the far-flung sonorities, in the first movement, at the expense of line and general decorum.

Naturally there are fluffs, early entries and an occasional rubato prompting untidiness, but the vast majority demonstrates a level of professionalism and innate ability to produce the right sort of sound at the right time that have made and maintained the orchestra as one of the world's ideal Mahler instruments. As to the two-hour-long sequence of audio interviews by William Malloch, 'I Remember Mahler' (New York players' first-hand experiences under Mahler, recorded in the early 1960s), these undoubtedly benefit from editing, but their complete presentation here corresponds with the comprehensive nature of the project, and allows a few more anecdotes currency as cherishable Mahler memorabilia.

Symphonies – Nos 1 and 2 (Elly Ameling sop Aafje Heynis contr Netherlands Radio Chorus); No 3 (Maureen Forrester contr St Willibrord Church Boys' Choir; Netherlands Radio Chorus); No 4 (Ameling); Nos 5-8 (Ileana Cotrubas, Heather Harper, Hanneke van Bork sops Birgit Finnila mez Marianne Dieleman contr William Cochran ten Hermann Prey bar Hans Sotin bass St Willibrord and Pius X Children's Choir; Collegium Musicum Amstelodamense; Amsterdam Toonkunst Choir; Amsterdam Stem des Volks Choir); No 10 – Adagio
Concertgebouw Orchestra / Bernard Haitink
Philips Bernard Haitink Symphony Edition
⑩ 442 050-2PB10 (692 minutes: ADD). Ⓜ
Recorded 1962-71 ●

If space is at a premium, this set is undeniably attractive, though the multilingual illustrated booklet dispenses with texts and translations, and several symphonies are awkwardly spread between discs. For a generation of record buyers it was these sane, lucid, sometimes insufficiently demonstrative Concertgebouw readings that represented a way into music previously considered unacceptable in polite society. Haitink's phrasing has an appealing natural simplicity, his rhythmic almost-squareness providing welcome reassurance. The preoccupation with conventional symphonic verities of form and structure does not preclude striking beauty of sound and the recordings have come up well in the remastering. There is some residual hiss.

Haitink's early No 1 (1962), his first taping of a Mahler symphony, is usually reckoned the least satisfactory of his career. True, the third movement doesn't quite work: Haitink's attempts at 'Jewishness' are so self-conscious that the results sound rhythmically suspect, not quite together rather than convincingly ethnic. The real problem is the boxed-in sound, uncharacteristically rough-and-ready with none of the cool tonal lustre which characterized subsequent LPs from this source.

The Fourth receives a similarly straightforward account with a wonderfully hushed Poco adagio and few if any of the aggressive mannerisms which have marred more recent versions. The restraint can border on inflexibility at times. The first movement lacks a certain element of fantasy with everything so very accurate and together, and, while Elly Ameling makes a lovely sound in the finale, the orchestra's animal caricatures are not really vulgar enough, the sense of wonder and awe in the face of heaven rather muted at the close. Though inevitably lacking the gut-wrenching theatricality and hallucinatory colour of Bernstein, the Seventh has none of the staidness and rigidity that occasionally prompts doubts about Haitink's Mahlerian credentials. It emerges here as a high point of the series, second only to the celebrated Ninth. The opening is deceptively cool and brooding; thereafter the interpretation is unexpectedly driven and intense, even if Mahler's fantastical sonorities are left to fend for themselves. Only those who feel the nth degree of nightmarish 'exaggeration' to be vital to the expression of the whole need have any doubts. The finale is effectively held together but should perhaps sound more hollow than this.

To sum up: if you must have the Mahler symphonies under a single conductor, Haitink could arguably be the man to go for. His objectivity will not spoil you for alternative readings. Nevertheless you would not want to miss out on Bernstein, unrelenting in his desire to communicate the essentials of these scores, taking his cue from Mahler's remark that 'the symphony must be like the world. It must be all-embracing'. Haitink is more circumspect, the music's vaunting ambition knowingly undersold.

Symphony No 1

Symphony No 1. Lieder eines fahrenden Gesellen
Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau bar Bavarian Radio Symphony Orchestra / Rafael Kubelík
DG The Originals 449 735-2GOR (67 minutes: ADD).
Text and translation included. Ⓜ
Recorded 1967 ●

Rafael Kubelík is essentially a poetic conductor and he gets more poetry out of this symphony than almost any other conductor who has recorded it. Although he takes the repeat of the first movement's short exposition, it is strange that he should ignore the single repeat sign in the Ländler when he seems so at ease with the music. Notwithstanding a fondness for generally brisk tempos in Mahler, Kubelík is never afraid of rubato here, above all in his very personally inflected account of the slow movement. This remains a delight. The finale now seems sonically a little thin, with the trumpets made to sound rather hard-pressed and the final climax failing to open out as it can in more modern recordings. The orchestral contribution is very good even if absolute precision isn't guaranteed.

Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau's second recording of the Lieder eines fahrenden Gesellen has worn rather less well, the spontaneous ardour of his earlier performance (with Furtwängler and the Philharmonia – now reissued on EMI) here tending to stiffen into melodrama and mannerism. There is of course much beautiful singing and he is most attentively accompanied, but the third song, 'Ich hab' ein glühend Messer', is implausibly overwrought, bordering on self-parody. By contrast, Kubelík's unpretentious, Bohemian approach to the symphony remains perfectly valid. A corrective to the grander visions of those who conduct the music with the benefit of hindsight and the advantages of digital technology? Perhaps.

Symphony No 1
Concertgebouw Orchestra / Leonard Bernstein
DG 427 303-2GH (56 minutes: DDD). Ⓕ
Recorded live in 1987 ●●

Bernstein's basic view of the First Symphony underwent very little change over the years. How acutely he hears Mahler's early-morning silence. The rising sixth for two oboes in bar 15 is like a deep intake of breath from this rapt observer; the richly harmonised horns some bars later are truly espressivo, their dreamy rêverie broken only by the sudden ff pizzicatos (like a startled animal) which Bernstein points up so vividly a bar later.

All this is most beautifully and subtly chronicled by the Concertgebouw players. How warmly and generously their strings phrase the wayfarer's music: it takes a great Mahler orchestra and a great Mahler conductor to imply so much suppleness and freedom within the bar without actually labouring the rubato. Their exhilaration in the coda (the euphoric explosion of brass fanfares is hair-raising) is second to none, and again it is the way in which the phrasing spontaneously sings that proves so uplifting. Needless to say, Bernstein gilds the proverbial lily somewhat in the Trio: 'Viennese' isn't the word, and he obviously believes (and why not?) that Mahler simply felt it unnecessary to mark in all the portamento – the opening violin phrases being one case in point.

There has never been an account of the finale like this one. Masterly control and abandon (such as could only happen in a live performance) go hand in hand: the ferocious onslaught of the opening pages, the touch of rhetoric in the brass declamations of bars 6 and 19, the intense energy in the strings. Then, in repose, the lovingly attended second subject where Bernstein's light and shade in phrasing and dynamics is uniquely affecting. And so on to the tumultuous conclusion. Impressively recorded, this is an almost impossible act to follow.

Symphony No 2

Arleen Auger sop Dame Janet Baker mez
City of Birmingham Symphony Chorus and Orchestra / Sir Simon Rattle
EMI ② 747962-8 (86 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ Text and translation included
Recorded 1986 ●●●

Where Simon Rattle's interpretation is concerned, we must go into the realm of a giant Mahlerian like Klemperer. For we are dealing here with conducting akin to genius, with insights and instincts that cannot be measured with any old yardstick. Rattle's sense of drama, of apocalyptic events, is so strong that at the final chords one is awed. None of this could have been achieved, of course, without the CBSO, which here emerges as an orchestra of world class. With such supple and rich string-playing, such expressive woodwind and infallibly accurate and mellow-toned brass, could anyone, coming upon this recording unawares, be blamed for identifying these players as belonging to Vienna, Berlin or Chicago? Attention to dynamics is meticulous throughout and contributes immeasurably to the splendour of the performance. A double pianissimo is really that, so when triple forte comes along its impact is tremendous. Some of the outstanding features of the performance can be pinpointed: the haunting beauty of the portamento horn-playing and the strings' sensitive and perfectly graded glissandos at fig 23; the magical entry of flute and harps just after fig 3 in the second movement; and the frightening eruption of the two fortissimo drum notes just after fig 51 in the same movement. Dame Janet Baker is at her most tender in 'Urlicht', with Arleen Auger as the soul of purity in the finale. The CBSO Chorus is magnificent. Indeed the whole finale is an acoustic triumph. This in a spiritual class of its own and the recording is superb.

Symphony No 2
Elisabeth Schwarzkopf sop Hilde Rössl-Majdan mez Philharmonia Chorus and Orchestra / Otto Klemperer
EMI Great Recordings of the Century Ⓜ
567235-2 (72 minutes: ADD)
Text and translation included ●

You emerge from Klemperer's first movement unharrassed, unsettled in the knowledge that this extraordinary music has something much more to yield. You miss those elements of high-risk, the brave rhetorical gestures, the uncompromising extremes, in Klemperer's comparatively comfortable down-the-line response. He knocks minutes off most of the competition (yes, it is a fallacy that Klemperer was always slower), paying little or no heed to Mahler's innumerable expressive markings in passages which have so much to gain from them. Take, for example, the magical shift to remote E major with the ppp emergence of the second subject where Klemperer allows himself no lassitude whatsoever in the rubato despite Mahler's explicit requests to the contrary. Likewise the grisly procession of cellos and basses which begins the approach to the awesome climax of the development. How little Klemperer makes of their cadaverous first entry or Mahler's long backward glance just prior to the coda. But then, come the deceptive second movement minuet, something happens, the performance really begins to find its space. Klemperer's scherzo is ideally big-boned with fine rollicking horns and a lazy trio with lovely old-world close-harmony trumpets. And the finale, growing more and more momentous with every bar, possesses a unique aura. Not everyone is convinced by Klemperer's very measured treatment of the Judgement Day march. The grim reaper takes his time but the inevitability of what is to come is somehow the more shocking as a result. Klemperer's trumpets peak thrillingly in the bars immediately prior to the climax itself – and what a seismic upheaval he and his orchestra pull off at this point. The rest is sublime: marvellous spacial effects, off-stage brass and so on, an inspirational sense of the music burgeoning from the moment the chorus breathe life into the Resurrection Ode. It is a pity that in those days so many technical blemishes were allowed to make it to the final master, though EMI's digital remastering of this almost legendary reading is superb.

Symphony No 3

Norma Procter contr Wandsworth School Boys' Choir; Ambrosian Singers; London Symphony Orchestra / Jascha Horenstein
Unicorn-Kanchana Souvenir ② UKCD2006/7
(97 minutes: ADD). Text and translation included Ⓜ
Recorded 1970 ●

Horenstein's interpretation of the Third Symphony is an outstanding example and its reissue on CD at mid-price is a major addition to the Mahler discography. No other conductor has surpassed Horenstein in his total grasp of every facet of the enormous score. Even though the London Symphony Orchestra strings of the day were not as powerful as they later became, they play with suppleness and a really tense sound, especially appropriate in the kaleidoscopic first movement, where changes of tempo and mood reflect the ever-changing face of nature. Horenstein gives the posthorn solo to a flügelhorn, a successful experiment. His light touch in the middle movements is admirable, and Norma Procter is a steady soloist in 'O Mensch! Gib acht!', with the Wandsworth School Boys' Choir bimm-bamming as if they were all Austrian-born! Then comes the Adagio finale, its intensity sustained by Horenstein without dragging. The recording is not as rich as more recent ones, but is still a classic.

Symphony No 3. Four Rückert Lieder.
Kindertotenlieder
Martha Lipton mez Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau bar
Women's chorus of the Schola Cantorum; Boys' Choir of the Transfiguration; New York Philharmonic Orchestra / Leonard Bernstein
Sony Classical ② SM2K61831 (142 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1962

Few who experienced Bernstein's passionate advocacy of Mahler's musical cause in the 1960s were left untouched by it. These recordings date from those years and the flame of inspiration still burns brightly about them almost 40 years later. The CBS recordings were clearly manipulated, but the sound – at best, big and open but trenchant and analytically clear – suited Mahler's sound world especially well. Bernstein's account of the Third Symphony is as compelling an experience and as desirable a general recommendation now as when it first appeared. The New Yorkers are on scintillating form under the conductor they have most obviously revered in the post-war period. This is a classic account, by any standards. Bernstein himself is a subtle and self-effacing pianist. Fischer-Dieskau scales the musical heights in several of the Rückert Lieder.

Symphony No 4

Symphony No 4[a]. Lieder eines fahrenden Gesellen[b]
[a]Judith Raskin sop [b]Frederica von Stade mez
[a]Cleveland Orchestra / George Szell; [b]London Philharmonic Orchestra / Sir Andrew Davis
Sony Classical Essential Classics SBK46535 Ⓑ
(75 minutes: ADD/DDD). Recorded 1966 ●●

Collectors who waited for years in anticipation of the reappearance on CD of Szell's famous Cleveland Fourth Symphony will not be disappointed. Sony Classical has come through with a pristine digital remastering of the open and exceptionally well-balanced Columbia original. Some hardening of tone under pressure was always a problem, even on LP, but on the whole you would never credit that this was a 1960s recording. As to the performance, the assurance and precision of its execution is something quite remarkable – an orchestra in the very peak of condition: ensemble absolutely unanimous, rubato finely turned to a man, not a blemish in earshot. There is no better tribute to Szell's achievements in Cleveland. Some people have found it dispassionate and calculated in effect and would willingly sacrifice some of the precision for a greater sense of spontaneity at the moment of performance (Szell was always at his best in the concert hall). That's a very subjective reaction, of course, and the cool, pellucid beauty of Szell's Cleveland strings in the slow movement is beyond dispute. The Lieder eines fahrenden Gesellen are strong and characterful readings which will provide much pleasure. They sound fresh and alert, and the tone colouring is quite beautifully controlled.

Symphony No 4
Kathleen Battle sop
Philharmonic Orchestra / Lorin Maazel
Sony Classical SMK39072 (61 minues: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1983 ●●

Kathleen Battle sings the symphony's rapt coda in a consciously intimate manner which might roughly be dubbed the 'Listen with Mother' style. By that, no offence is intended. Maazel's version is a very inward-looking one, and in saying that we merely point to the fact that it is a very Viennese performance; in Vienna, Mahler's Vienna or Maazel's introspection is an unavoidable condition of being. What's more, only in Vienna will you hear string and, in its special way, wind playing such as is provided here for Maazel in the long-drawn slow movement – it is simply 22-and-a-half minutes of unadulterated pleasure. Maazel has always conducted the symphony's first movement in a relaxed, springy, Bruno Walter-ish way. Away from the score, the ear that is innocent of Mahler's many abstruse changes of tempo may think them rather artificial; but the playing of the VPO is such that one listens, hypnotized. It is difficult not to be tempted by the general ease, introspection and near-morbid nostalgia of the Maazel. The sound, as you would expect of a recording made in Vienna's Musikvereinssaal, is very satisfying.

Symphony No 4 in G[a]. Das Lied von der Erde[c] 🄷
Symphony No 2 in C minor, 'Resurrection'[a]; Lieder aus 'Des Knaben Wunderhorn'[b] – Wer hat dies Liedlein erdacht?; Wo die schönen Trompeten blasen. Rückert-Lieder – No 1, Ich atmet' einem linden Duft[b]
[b]Maria Cebotari, [a]Hilde Güden sops [c]Kathleen Ferrier, [b]Rosette Anday contrs [c]Julius Patzak ten
[b]Vienna State Opera Chorus; Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Bruno Walter
Andante mono ④ 4973 (201 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Texts and translations included. Recorded live at the Musikverein, Vienna on [b]May 15, 1948, [c]May 17, 1952, [a]November 6, 1955 ●

Of the several Mahler disciples whose recordings provide us with a line back to Mahler himself, none is more important than Bruno Walter. He was 18 when Mahler engaged him as an assistant at the Hamburg Opera in 1894. The following year, he attended the première of the Second Symphony in Berlin and was himself destined to conduct the posthumous premières of the Ninth Symphony and Das Lied von der Erde, both of which he recorded for 78s and LP. He also made influential post-war studio recordings of the First, Second, Fourth and Fifth symphonies.

So what is special about this latest anthology, given the fact that the readings are already 'known' quantities? Rather a lot, is the short answer. Had copyright considerations allowed the publication of these live Vienna radio recordings of Das Lied von der Erde and the Fourth Symphony at the time they were made, they would have become overnight library recommendations. Walter's 1946 New York account of the Fourth Symphony is very fine. Yet the string playing alone puts this 1955 Vienna Philharmonic performance into a different league. In the slow movement in particular, it is more tender, more inward, more purely beautiful and – since this is still recognisably the 'old' Vienna Philharmonic Walter remembered from his Mahler-inspired youth – more authentic. Significantly, the occasion itself was special, an unrepeatable, memory-laden concert which took place in the Musikverein the morning after the post-war re-opening of the Vienna Opera.

As usual, the 'heavenly' finale brings us down to earth with a bump when the human voice enters and Mahler humours us with his child's view of the afterlife; but Hilde Güden is an agreeable soloist and the end is properly magical. The mono recording – cleared by Walter himself for release by Philips, a deal vetoed by CBS – is first-rate.

The live 1952 account of Das Lied von der Erde – in effect, the concert version of the celebrated Decca recording with Patzak and Ferrier which was being made at the same time – is as a reading identical with that on the studio recording. What is different can best be described as a certain airiness and ease due to the natural rhythms of the live performance and to the altogether more natural balance of the radio sound, something that benefits Patzak, Ferrier and the orchestra whose playing is superbly concentrated and sure-footed.

Ferrier is phenomenal, and benefits more than anyone from the more natural balance of the radio recording. Already in thrall to the condition which would end her life, she sings with line and beauty, great intensity and huge courage. The voice never did convey a sudden shiver on 'ein kalter Wind' in 'Der Einsame im Herbst' but what she does with 'gold'nen Blätter' and the fire-and-ice intensity of the line about the drying of bitter tears more than compensates. In the 'Abschied' her singing is fragile and vulnerable in human terms yet thrillingly secure musically. Her rendering of the recitative-like passage in which the friend arrives to take his last farewell removes Mahler's writing into the realm of Passion-music. In the closing pages, her singing is a miracle of quiet transfigured beauty, perfectly paced by Walter and supremely well accompanied.

The 1948 Mahler Second has been on CD before, more a yellowing newspaper clipping for one's scrapbook than a volume for one's library, though Andante's technical and editorial presentation is vastly superior to that of any of its predecessors. The second and third movements are all wistfulness and charm though something like the cry of disgust at fig 49 (8'12") of the St Antony Scherzo is plain enough. Rosette Anday gives a graphic account of the 'Urlicht', after which the end is vivid and uplifting, despite the restricted nature of the recording. This is a set no Mahlerian will want to live without.

Symphony No 4
Amanda Roocroft sop
City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra / Sir Simon Rattle
EMI 556563-2 (59 minutes: DDD). Ⓕ
Recorded 1997

Rattle springs two big surprises in the first four bars. The first tempo might initially strike you as *over*cautious, but check Mahler's score, and note the words: Bedachtig – Nicht eilen ('Cautious; prudent – don't hurry'). In keeping with the accepted view among seasoned Mahlerians that the poco ritard in the third bar does not apply to the sleigh bells, Rattle then effects a fleeting moment of disarray as the bells jangle roughshod over this elegant turn into the first theme. A gauche, childlike moment. But then comes the real surprise. The tempo for this charming theme-with-airs (marked gemächlich – 'leisurely') is faster, not slower, than the opening tempo. Leisurely, yes, but eager too. The adventure playground of Mahler's youth is up and running. The benefits of this become plainer as the movement unfolds. The second subject sounds completely new (the CBSO cellos manage to persuade us that they've only just discovered it). The first horn is youth's magic horn, the woodwinds beckon raucously. And all the while those startling swings of mood and manner just happen – no rhyme, no reason; just a child's fancy. But beware the bogeyman fiddler. His dance of death – all the sharper, all the more sour for being so flatly dispatched – comes as a timely reminder that childhood fears are no less real for being the stuff of fairy-tales. Rattle contrasts this beautifully with the rubicund Trio. The transfiguration at its heart, swathed in woozy portamento, is quite simply gorgeous. So, too, the opening of the slow movement, the cellos' legato so fine as to suggest little or no contact with the strings. Rattle's reading is perhaps the most inquisitive (and therefore the most intriguing) of recommendable versions.

Symphony No 4
Dame Margaret Price sop;
LPO / Jascha Horenstein
Classics for Pleasure 5 74882-2 Ⓑ
(59 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1970

The Mahler Four with Horenstein is a must-have, a version at last reissued on CD. Its shortcomings as a recording are of little account; the sound does lack depth but in a reading of such distinction the ear compensates. The LPO play beautifully, and with Margaret Price as the singer in the finale this is more than a good introduction to the Symphony; it is a performance of uncompromising integrity, brilliant colour, pinpoint vividness, and a blend of tenderness and strength that seems to go to the heart of the matter. When first issued in 1971, it cost 89p. Snap it up now.

Symphony No 5

Symphony No 5 in C sharp minor
Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra /
Sir Simon Rattle
EMI 557385-2 (69 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded live in 2002 ●●●

Mahler's Fifth is a terror to bring off but, brought off, is a joy beyond measure. It made a fine nuptial offering for Rattle and the Berliners on September 7 2002 – festive yet challenging, a tragi-comic revel and a high-wire act to boot. 'The individual parts are so difficult,' wrote Mahler, 'they call for the most accomplished soloists.' Rattle brought the prodigious first horn to the apron of the stage for his obbligato contribution in the Scherzo. Mengelberg's conducting score, which Mahler used for the work's Amsterdam première in 1906, has an annotation to this effect, and the practice was followed at the work's English première in 1945, but I am left wondering what would have happened had Rattle not brought the player forward. EMI's recording is splendidly explicit, but the horn section, which plays a crucial role at key moments in the symphony, seems oddly distant on CD.

The tutti sound Rattle draws from the orchestra is clean and sharply profiled, not unlike the Mahler sound Rafael Kubelík tended to favour. Rattle's tempo for the Adagietto is a good one by modern standards (not too slow) and the string playing has a lovely diaphanous quality, but you may find the playing over-nuanced.

Nowadays it is not unusual to hear rhythm and line sacrificed to detail and nuance as old-established symphony orchestras are made to re-think their readings by conductors schooled in the arcana of ancient performance practice. Rattle has done his fair share of this. What is interesting about this live Mahler Fifth is the degree to which the detail is absorbed and the line maintained.

Like most latter-day conductors, Rattle tends to underplay the march element in the first movement. Mahler in his 1905 piano roll, Walter, and Haitink in his superb 1969 Concertgebouw recording all preserve this. Some may find the approach too dry-eyed in the long-drawn string threnody at fig 2. But an excess of feeling can damage both opening movements (the second is a mirror of the first) if the larger rhythm is obscured. Rattle, like Barbirolli and Bernstein in his superb Vienna Philharmonic recording, treats the threnody more as a meditation than a march but the pulse is not lost and the attendant tempi are good. The frenzied B flat minor Trio is particularly well judged. The second movement is superb (the diminished horn contribution notwithstanding) and none but the most determined sceptic could fail to thrill to the sense of adventure and well-being Rattle and his players bring to the Scherzo and finale, even if Barbirolli (studio) and Bernstein (live) both reach the finishing line in rather more eloquent and orderly fashion that this talented but still occasionally fragile-sounding Berlin ensemble.

As a memento, the CD is undoubtedly a triumph of organisation and despatch. As a performance and as a recording, it has rather more character and bite than Abbado's much admired 1993 Berlin version. Indeed, it can safely be ranked among the half-dozen or so finest performances on record. It is not perfect, but do you know of one that is?

Symphony No 5
New Philharmonia Orchestra / Sir John Barbirolli
EMI Great Recordings of the Century 566910-2 Ⓜ
(74 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1969 ●●

Sir John Barbirolli's Fifth occupies a special place in everybody's affections: a performance so big in spirit and warm of heart as to silence any rational discussion of its shortcomings. Some readers may have problems with one or two of his sturdier tempos. He doesn't make life easy for his orchestra in the treacherous second movement, while the exultant finale, though suitably bracing, arguably needs more of a spring in its heels. But against all this, one must weigh a unity and strength of purpose, an entirely idiomatic response to instrumental colour and texture (the dark, craggy hues of the first two movements are especially striking); and most important of all that very special Barbirollian radiance, humanity – call it what you will. One point of interest for collectors – on the original LP, among minor orchestral mishaps in the Scherzo, were four bars of missing horn obbligato (at nine bars before fig 20). Not any more! The original solo horn player, Nicholas Busch, has returned to the scene of this momentary aberration (Watford Town Hall) and the absent bars have been ingeniously reinstated. There's even a timely grunt from Sir John, as if in approval. Something of a classic, then; EMI's remastering is splendid.

Symphony No 5
Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Leonard Bernstein
DG 423 608-2GH (75 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded live in 1987 ●●

Bernstein's tempo for the Funeral march in the first movement of the Fifth Symphony became slower in the 23 years that separated his New York CBS recording from this one, made during a performance in Frankfurt. The strings only passage at fig 15 in the first movement is exquisitely played, so is the long horn solo in the Scherzo. And there is one marvellously exciting moment – the right gleam of trumpet tone at one bar before fig 29 in the second movement. Best of all is Bernstein himself, here at his exciting best, giving demonic edge to the music where it is appropriate and building the symphony inexorably to its final triumph.

Thanks to a very clear and well-balanced recording, every subtlety of scoring, especially some of the lower strings' counterpoint, comes through as the conductor intended. One is made aware of the daring novelty of much of the orchestration, of how advanced it must have sounded in the early years of this century. Here we get the structure, the sound and the emotion. The Adagietto is not dragged out, and the scrupulous attention to Mahler's dynamics allows the delightfully silken sound of the Vienna strings to be heard to captivating advantage, with the harp well recorded too. Bernstein is strongest in Mahler when the work itself is one of the more optimistic symphonies with less temptation for him to add a few degrees more of Angst.

Symphony No 5
Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Claudio Abbado
DG 437 789-2GH (69 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded live in 1993 ●●

The Adagietto is suddenly, almost imperceptibly, there. It is the hallmark of any great performance of the symphony, and Abbado is in among the very select few as these magical bars materialise. It might even be the most beautiful, the most subtly inflected account of the movement we have yet heard on disc. How spontaneously the restless heart leaps with Mahler's central diversion; the breathless pianopianissimo to a barely grazed glissando towards the close is out of this world. So too the huge central Scherzo, another of those testing movements separating natural Mahlerians from the would-bes. The key here is patience – respect for space, silence, atmosphere. And the charm. Not even Bernstein quite matches Abbado's relish of the finale's airborne fantasy: it's that delicate balance between tip-toeing sweetness and light and inherently rugged, foot-stomping good humour. Abbado takes an appreciably more dispassionate view of the first movement than Bernstein (doesn't everybody?). Abbado steps back from the tragedy, his funeral march determined to keep up appearances, maintain dignity, the voice (so to speak) cracking only under the stress of Mahler's accentuation. There's a suitably rash development and a splendidly morbid military wind band sound when the march returns centre-stage. Bernstein is at his most wilfully exciting in the second movement. And fine though Abbado is, no one peaks at the climax – the shining trumpet-led premonition of the finale's chorale – quite like Bernstein. Both are special performances (nothing less could challenge the supremacy of Bernstein), both conductors and both orchestras right inside the spirit and sound of this score.

Symphony No 6

Symphony No 6 in A minor
San Francisco Symphony Orchestra / Michael Tilson Thomas
SFS Media/Avie ② 821936-0001-2 Ⓜ
(87 minutes: DDD). SACD/CD player compatible
Recorded live on September 14, 2001 ●

This recording of Mahler's Sixth Symphony was made from performances planned long before the events of September 11 gave the San Francisco Symphony's choice of repertory extraordinary resonance. And it is a credit to both Michael Tilson Thomas and the orchestra that this ferocious performance is carried out without hysteria or self-indulgence. Tempos are judiciously chosen. In the first movement, for example, Tilson Thomas's Allegro energico, ma non troppo is only a hair's breadth slower than Bernstein's in his Vienna Philharmonic recording, yet the difference is enough to give proper weight to the march. Indeed, the SFS strings dig very deep to produce a dark, throaty tone of startling vehemence. Ardently played and generously phrased, the 'Alma' theme provides welcome consolation – and how longingly Tilson Thomas clings to the final peaks of its melody.

Gunshot-like sforzandi from the timpani introduce the scherzo, sharply-etched here with stinging dotted rhythms. The trios are similarly pointed – though affectionately grazioso, as Mahler requests – and rather deliberately paced, like a long-forgotten dance now remembered in slow motion. The Andante moderato is also treated expansively, but the tension never sags. Tilson Thomas mis-steps only once in the sprawling finale, pressing too hard at the end of the introduction so that the orchestra arrives prematurely at the main tempo – a minor flaw and quickly forgiven.

A more impressive start to Tilson Thomas and the SFS's Mahler cycle is difficult to imagine. Less mannered than Bernstein, and more emotionally engaged than Karajan, this is an exceptionally intense and, under the circumstances, remarkably coherent performance that is not to be missed. Very good sound quality, too, from the orchestra's new in-house label.

Symphony No 6. Kindertotenlieder
Thomas Hampson bar Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Leonard Bernstein
DG ② 427 697-2GH2 (115 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded live in 1988 ●

Mahler's tragic Sixth Symphony digs more profoundly into the nature of man and Fate than any of his earlier works, closing in desolation, a beat on the bass drum, a coffin lid closing. Bernstein's reading was at a concert, with all the electricity of such an occasion, and the VPO responds to the conductor's dark vision of Mahler's score with tremendous bravura. Fortunately, the achingly tender slow movement brings some relief, but with the enormous finale lasting over 30 minutes we must witness a resumption of a battle to the death. The coupling is a logical one, for the Kindertotenlieder takes up the theme of death yet again. But it is in a totally different, quieter way: these beautiful songs express a parent's grief over the loss of a child, and although some prefer a woman's voice, the sensitive Thomas Hampson makes a good case here for a male singer. The recording of both works is so good one would not know it was made 'live', particularly as the applause is omitted.

Symphony No 6[a]. Kindertotenlieder[b]
Rückert-Lieder[c]
[bc]Christa Ludwig mez Berlin [a]Philharmonic Orchestra / Herbert von Karajan
DG The Originals ② 457 716-2GOR2 Ⓜ
(129 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1974-75 ◉◉

Karajan's classic Sixth confirmed his belated arrival as a major Mahler interpreter. Only Bernstein, in his more emotive, less consciously beautifying way, left recorded performances of comparable strength and conviction. Karajan's understanding of Mahler's sound world – its links forward to Berg, Schoenberg and Webern as opposed to retrospective links with Wagner – is very acute. Combining this with a notable long-term control of rhythm, Karajan is sustains not only the composer's lucidly stated tragic case but also Mahler's exploration of materials drawn from different sound worlds and even, in the Scherzo, from different areas of the inherited musical tradition. This Scherzo is a masterly achievement by composer, conductor, and orchestra alike. Also, the engineers have tidied up the very end of the symphony, where the bass tuba's entry over drum and ff pizzicato basses no longer betrays quite so obviously its origin as part of a separate take. The Rückert Lieder are memorably sung by Christa Ludwig who is eloquently supported by the Berlin wind players who are recorded with gratifying immediacy.

Symphony No 7

Chicago Symphony Orchestra / Claudio Abbado
DG Masters 445 513-2GMA (79 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1984 ◉◉

Abbado's account of Mahler's Seventh was always a highlight of his cycle and remains the ideal choice for collectors requiring a central interpretation in modern sound. Steering a middle course between clear-sightedness and hysteria, and avoiding both the heavy, saturated textures of 19th-century romanticism and the chilly rigidity of some of his own 'modernist' peers, he is, as the original review reported, 'almost too respectable'. That said, it is all to the good if the forthright theatricality and competitive instincts of the Chicago orchestra are held in check just a little. Even where Abbado underplays the drama of the moment, a sufficient sense of urgency is sustained by a combination of well-judged tempos, marvellously graduated dynamics and precisely balanced, ceaselessly changing textures. For those put off by Mahler's supposed vulgarity, the unhurried classicism of Abbado's reading may well be the most convincing demonstration of the music's integrity. This is a piece Abbado continues to champion in concert with performances at the very highest level.

Symphony No 7
New York Philharmonic Orchestra / Leonard Bernstein
Sony Classical Bernstein Century Edition
SMK60564 (80 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1965 Ⓜ

We are often assured that great conductors of an earlier generation interpreted Mahler from within the Austrian tradition, encoding a sense of nostalgia, decay and incipient tragedy as distinct from the in-your-face calamities and neuroses proposed by Leonard Bernstein. Well, this is one Bernstein recording that should convince all but the most determined sceptics. It deserves a place in anyone's collection now that it has been transferred to a single disc at mid-price. The white-hot communicative power is most obvious in the finale which has never sounded more convincing than it does here; the only mildly questionable aspect of the reading is the second Nachtmusik, too languid for some. The transfer is satisfactory, albeit dimmer than one might have hoped. It sounds historic, but historic in more ways than one.

Symphony No 7
City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra / Sir Simon Rattle
EMI 754344-2 (77 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded live in 1991 ◉

You may wonder about the choice of venue – The Maltings, Snape: a great sounding hall – one of the most natural and focused in the world – but for Mahler? Well, there are times here where the hefty tuttis of the outer movements sound fit to burst at the seams. The tonal quality is first-class, the immediacy is to some extent exciting; one can see right into the phantasmagorical scoring of the inner movements – a clear, gently ambient sound serving both intimacy and atmosphere. Last things first. The finale is for once a sensation. From the quasi-Baroque splendour of the opening procession right through to a coda which truly flings wide its glorious excess, the adrenalin really pumps. Rattle pulls off a mad kind of coherence, a wholeheartedly vulgar apotheosis of Viennese dance with no apologies for Mahler's seemingly irrational changes of gear and direction. Even the most unruly transitions are met head-on with ferocious energy, episodes falling over each other in the jostling for centre-stage. The characterisation is acute, the colours wonderfully garish. Mahler was not one to mince his notes, and neither is Rattle.

Not even Bernstein is as uncompromising in the Scherzo. The nightmare comes quickly into focus: the shrieking glissando on two clarinets at 00'28" is at once surreal, a flash of grinning skull behind the face. Rapier violin sforzandos claw the texture, an emaciated string bass slithers from behind a bellowing tuba and the strings really relish their grotesque waltz. The dynamic extremes are vicious. Rattle is unique in making it sound thus. On either side of these grisly goings on, the two Nachtmusiks could hardly be more beguiling. Only the first movement slightly disappoints – there isn't the almost euphoric release that one experiences with Bernstein. But trombones proudly take command in the coda and the first trumpet's fearless ascent to his high-stopped f into Tempo 1 brings a genuine tingle of excitement. Few orchestras play the score this well; few conductors have explored it so exhaustively. Against these considerations, any reservations count for little.

Symphony No 8, 'Symphony of a Thousand'

Heather Harper, Lucia Popp, Arleen Auger sops Yvonne Minton mez Helen Watts contr René Kollo ten John Shirley-Quirk bar Martti Talvela bass Vienna Boys' Choir; Vienna State Opera Chorus; Vienna Singverein; Chicago Symphony Orchestra / Sir Georg Solti
Decca 460 972-2DM (80 minutes: ADD). Text and translation included. Recorded 1971 Ⓜ ●●

Of the so-called classic accounts of the Eighth Symphony, it is Solti's which most conscientiously sets out to convey an impression of large forces in a big performance space, this despite the obvious resort to compression and other forms of gerry-mandering. Whatever the inconsistencies of Decca's multi-miking and overdubbing, the overall effect remains powerful even today. The remastering has not eradicated all trace of distortion at the very end and, given the impressive flood of choral tone at the start of the 'Veni creator spiritus', it still seems a shame that the soloists and the Chicago brass are quite so prominent in its closing stages. As for the performance itself, Solti's extrovert way with Part 1 works tremendously without quite erasing memories of Bernstein's ecstatic fervour. In Part 2, it may be the patient Wagnerian mysticism of Tennstedt that sticks in the mind. Less inclined to delay, Solti makes the material sound more operatic. Yet for its gut-wrenching theatricality and great solo singing, Solti's version makes a plausible first choice – now more than ever. Also, it has been squeezed onto a single CD, albeit at full price.

Awards 1987

Symphony No 8
Des Knaben Wunderhorn[a]
Elizabeth Connell, Edith Wiens, Dame Felicity Lott sops Trudeliese Schmidt, Nadine Denize contrs Richard Versalle ten Jorma Hynninen bar Hans Sotin bass [a]Lucia Popp sop [a]Berndt Weikl bar Tiffin Boys' School Choir; London Philharmonic Choir and Orchestra / [a]David Hill, Klaus Tennstedt
EMI Double Forte ② 575661-2 (DDD) Ⓜ
Notes included. Recorded 1986 ●●●

Mahler's extravagantly monumental Eighth Symphony, which is often known as the Symphony of a Thousand, is the work that raises doubts in even his most devoted of admirers. Its epic dimensions, staggering vision and sheer profligacy of forces required make it a 'difficult work'. Given a great live performance it will sway even the hardest of hearts; given a performance like Tennstedt's, reproduced with all the advantages of CD, home-listeners, too, can be mightily impressed (and so, given the forces involved, will most of the neighbourhood!) – the sheer volume of sound at the climax is quite overwhelming. The work seeks to parallel the Christian's faith in the power of the Holy Spirit with the redeeming power of love for mankind and Tennstedt's performance leaves no doubt that he believes totally in Mahler's creation. It has a rapt, almost intimate, quality that makes his reading all the more moving. The soloists are on excellent form and the choruses sing with conviction.

Symphony No 8 H
Joyce Barker, Beryl Hatt, Agnes Giebel sops Kerstin Meyer mez Helen Watts contr Kenneth Neate ten Alfred Orda bar Arnold Van Mill bass BBC Chorus; BBC Choral Society; Goldsmith's Choral Union; Hampstead Choral Society; Emanuel School Boys' Choir; Orpington Junior Singers; London Symphony Orchestra / Jascha Horenstein
BBC Legends/IMG Artists ② BBCL4001-7 (101 minutes: ADD). Recorded live in 1959 Ⓜ
Includes an interview with Jascha Horenstein

This is the first official release of Jascha Horenstein's celebrated Royal Albert Hall concert of March 20, 1959. The work had been given before in the UK under Sir Henry Wood and Sir Adrian Boult, but it was the present performance that began the indigenous Mahler boom, transfixing not only the nearly 6000 enthusiasts who packed the hall but a wider listenership beyond. Not that Horenstein was a Mahlerian of the modern age. A conductor steeped in the German tradition, he made his début in the 1920s with the Vienna Symphony Orchestra in a programme that included Mahler's First Symphony. He brings to his readings of the composer a weight and certainty that can initially disappoint those accustomed to a more thrustful approach. In other words, don't be put off by the apparently lukewarm opening, the English choral society coloration of the choirs and the dodgy contribution of the second soprano. The performance quickly finds its feet and acquires its own metaphysical brand of tension. Part 2 is if anything even finer. The orchestral preamble is superbly wrought.

There are some incidental problems, but these are scarcely worth mentioning when the cumulative power of the final build-up is so immense and the recording expands so impressively, encompassing an authentic blaze of choral sonority. For once the Royal Albert Hall really comes into its own, and the transfer is better than one dared hope. The coughers are sometimes intrusive, yet there are aspects of Horenstein's performance that no studio-made version can quite rival. This was his finest hour and happily the two-CD set includes a vintage interview to put the achievement in context.

Symphony No 9

Awards 1984

Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Herbert von Karajan
DG ② 410 726-2 Ⓕ
(85 minutes: DDD)
Recorded live in 1982 ●●●

Awards 1981

Five Symphony No 9. Kindertotenlieder. Five Rückert-Lieder
Christa Ludwig mez Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Herbert von Karajan
DG Double ② 453 040-2GTA2 Ⓜ
(132 minutes: ADD)
Recorded 1979-80 ●●●

Mahler's Ninth is a death-haunted work, but is filled, as Bruno Walter remarked, 'with a sanctified feeling of departure'. Rarely has this symphony been shaped with such understanding and played with such selfless virtuosity as it was by Herbert von Karajan and the BPO. Choice between the 1982 Karajan classic and the analogue studio recording is by no means easy. Both versions won Gramophone Awards in their day, but, whereas the low-profile, mid-price reissue of the analogue LP has Christa Ludwig's magisterial Kindertotenlieder and Rückert-Lieder, the live account preserves the look and price bracket of the original package. There is no extra music. The performance remains a remarkable one, with a commitment to lucidity of sound and certainty of line. There is nothing dispassionate about the way the Berlin Philharmonic tears into the Rondo-Burleske, the agogic touches of the analogue version ironed out without loss of intensity. True, Karajan does not seek to emulate the passionate immediacy of a Barbirolli or a Bernstein, but in his broadly conceived, gloriously played Adagio the sepulchral hush is as memorable as the eruptive climax. The finesse of the playing is of course unmatched.

For this Karajan Gold reissue, the tapes have been picked over to open up the sound and do something about the early-digital edginess of the strings. There is still some occlusion at climactic points; and if those strings now seem more 'plasticky' than fierce, it is impossible to say whether the conductor would have approved. Karajan came late to Mahler and yet, until the release of his (rather more fiercely recorded) 1982 concert relay, he seemed content to regard his earlier studio performance as perhaps his finest achievement on disc.

The attraction is greatly enhanced by Christa Ludwig's carefully considered Mahler performances of the mid-1970s. The voice may not be as fresh as it was when she recorded the songs in the late 1950s, but there are few readings of comparable nobility. Ludwig articulates the text with unrivalled clarity and 'In diesem Wetter' at least is positively operatic. How much of the grand scale should be attributed to Karajan? It is difficult to say; the voice is sometimes strained by the tempos. This collection is not to be missed.

Symphony No 9
Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Claudio Abbado
DG 471 624-2GH (81 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded live at the Philharmonie, Berlin in 1999 ●●

Claudio Abbado began his career with Mahler and has been conducting the composer for his entire professional life. The Ninth and, above all, the Seventh, have consistently brought out the best in him.

Abbado's previous recording of No 9, taped live in Vienna, is now only available in his boxed set of the complete symphonies (DG, reviewed above). Much acclaimed as an interpretation, its airless sound wasn't to all tastes. This account is another multi-miked extravaganza with sonic shortcomings that are immediately apparent. The opening bars establish a wide open sound stage (complete with hiss) that implodes with the appearance of the harp. That harp is always on the loud side, trumpets are almost always too reticent, the bass feels synthetic and there are troublesome changes of perspective. None of which is enough to nullify the obvious sincerity and conviction of a performance that simply gets better and better as it proceeds. This really is live music-making (the last big first movement climax at 16'54" is not together), but the inner movements are beyond reproach, ideally paced and characterised and superbly realised. The finale is content to plumb the depths in its own way – as sensitive as any of its celebrated rivals if without the point-scoring you may be used to.

Where some interpreters feel bound to choose between structural imperatives and subjective emotions, proffering either proto-Schoenbergian edginess or late Romantic excess, Abbado has the confidence to eschew both the heavily saturated textures of his predecessors and the chilly rigidity of some of his own 'modernist' peers. Instead, his unaffected warmth allows everything to come through naturally. There remains something self-effacing about his musical personality. And yet there is sunlight – and a certain tenderness – in this account of the Ninth that you won't find anywhere else, a fluency and ease that is something to marvel at. For those put off even now by the composer's supposed vulgarity, Abbado's readings constitute a convincing demonstration of the music's integrity. Long may he continue to champion these scores!

The awed silence that greets the expiration of the Ninth may or may not be stage-managed: it didn't seem fake to me.

Mahler Symphony No 9
R Strauss Metamorphosen, AV142
Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Sir Simon Rattle
EMI ② 556580-2 (108 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded live in 1993 and 1997

This may not be a Mahler Ninth for all seasons and all moods, but how thrilling it is to hear the score projected at white heat! Even if Sir Simon Rattle is less frankly emotive than a Barbirolli or a Bernstein, his is still a performance that goes for broke – fidgety, raw and intense. Listeners exclusively committed to the eloquent lucidity of Karajan should perhaps give it a wide berth. This is at various times the loudest, softest, fastest and slowest Mahler Ninth on disc. There are passages where the nuancing is echt-Viennese (with some pronounced string portamentos), others where the music is driven forward harshly and with surprising rigidity. There are big rhetorical effects which threaten to reduce a glorious symphonic canvas to a series of neurotic episodes, others where the power and commitment of the playing take the breath away.

Test the waters – if you can – with the first movement. This is overwhelming, edge-of-the-seat stuff, yet ultimately a little monochrome. Despite the impulsive, agitated approach, the mood of brutal obstinacy is oppressively sustained. In music that responds equally to the tragic subjectivity of a Bernstein and the elevated sense of eternal calm evoked by Karajan, Rattle continues to press home the attack, conveying rather an unquenched commitment to life. Nor does he seek the kind of linear clarity delivered by Bruno Walter, whose remastered stereo recording is much more revealing than its previous LP incarnations.

If in the final analysis, the vehemence of execution is not always allied to the generosity of spirit you find in the great performances of the past, is that any more than a recognition that we live in different times? There is little space to discuss the Strauss, except that there is a sense in which it tells the same story, abandoning the familiar berth of Karajan-inspired smoothness for altogether choppier seas. Rattle's music-making lives in the here and now and the immediacy of the performance – passionate but dry-eyed – is gripping.

Symphony No 9 🏵
Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Sir John Barbirolli
EMI Great Recordings of the Century 567925-2 Ⓜ
(78 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1964 ●●
Also available on HMV Classics HMV5 74364-2 Ⓑ

This remastered transfer to CD supports the views of those who regard it as one of the classic interpretations, worthy to be ranked with Walter's and Karajan's. There is an almost imperceptible tape hiss to remind us of the recording's age; otherwise the late Kinloch Anderson's sensitive production wears well. The rapport between Sir John and the Berliners is obvious in the warmth, flexibility and richness of the playing, with the principal horn in particular movingly expressive. Barbirolli's shaping of the great first movement, like a broad arch, has all the intensity that one so admired in his conducting and also an architectural structure for which he did not always receive full credit. The savagery of the Rondo Burleske is a feature of this performance with Mahler's scoring sounding years ahead of its time. Barbirolli takes fewer than 23 minutes over the Adagio-finale, with the result that the melodic pulse never falters. The string playing here is wonderfully heartfelt.

Additional recommendation
Symphony No 9 Ⓗ
Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Walter
Dutton Laboratories mono CDBP9708 (71 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1938 Ⓢ ●●

This is a historic document – the Ninth's first commercial recording conducted by its dedicatee. Few modern performances offer more intensity in the first movement (Rattle and Bernstein perhaps excepted). But don't be taken aback by the technical lapses of the VPO; this is music-making in which scrappiness and fervour are indissolubly linked. The original surface noise is filtered to near-inaudibility – Dutton's restoration is a must-have.

Symphony No 10

Awards 2000

Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Sir Simon Rattle
EMI 556972-2 (77 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded live in 1999 ●●●

Rattle previously recorded Deryck Cooke's performing version of Mahler's incomplete 10th in June 1980 and the passionate sensitivity of his reading helped win over a sceptical public at a time when we were much less keen to tamper with the unfinished works of dead or dying artists. These days, it's almost as if we see in their unresolved tensions some prophetic vision of the life to come. Over the years, Rattle has performed the work nearly 100 times, far more often than anyone else. Wooed by Berlin, he repeatedly offered them 'Mahler ed Cooke' and was repulsed. He made his Berlin conducting début with the Sixth. But, after the announcement in June 1999 that he had won the orchestra's vote in a head-to-head with Daniel Barenboim, he celebrated with two concert performances of the 10th. It's a composite version that is presented here. As always, Rattle obtains some devastatingly quiet string playing, and technical standards are unprecedentedly high in so far as the revised performing version is concerned. Indeed, the danger that clinical precision will result in expressive coolness is not immediately dispelled by the self-confident meatiness of the violas at the start. We are not used to hearing the line immaculately tuned with every accent clearly defined. The tempo is broader than before and, despite Rattle's characteristic determination to articulate every detail, the mood is, at first, comparatively serene, even Olympian. Could Rattle be succumbing to the Karajan effect? But no – somehow he squares the circle. The neurotic trills, jabbing dissonances and tortuous counterpoint are relished as never before, within the context of a schizoid Adagio in which the Brucknerian string writing is never undersold.

The conductor has not radically changed his approach to the rest of the work. As you might expect, the scherzos have greater security and verve. Their strange hallucinatory choppiness is better served, although parts of the fourth movement remain perplexing despite the superb crispness and clarity of inner parts. More than ever, everything leads inexorably to the cathartic finale, brought off with a searing intensity that has you forgetting the relative baldness of the invention.

Berlin's Philharmonie is not the easiest venue: with everything miked close, climaxes can turn oppressive but the results here are very credible and offer no grounds for hesitation. In short, this new version sweeps the board even more convincingly than the old. According to reports of the first night, Rattle was called back and accorded two Karajan-style standing ovations after the orchestra had left the stage. There is no applause here, but it is not difficult to imagine such a scene. Rattle makes the strongest case for an astonishing piece of revivification that only the most die-hard purists will resist. Strongly recommended.

Symphony No 10 in F sharp minor (ed Cooke)
Berlin Symphony Orchestra /
Kurt Sanderling
Berlin Classics 0094422BC (74 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded in 1979 ●●

Sanderling's own pioneering account of the 10th is – or ought to be – a classic, representing as it does a crucial stage in its performance history. Chronologically speaking, it comes after the analogue LP versions of Eugene Ormandy and Wyn Morris, but predates Sir Simon Rattle's much-praised first (Bournemouth) set, let alone the piece's wider acceptance as a repertoire staple. Sanderling made his recording 18 months after conducting the East German première in May 1978. Astonishingly, it wasn't released in the UK until 2001.

Though other conductors of his generation rejected the whole notion more or less out of hand, Sanderling has suggested that while we cannot know how Mahler would have said it, we can feel what it is he wished to say. He pored over the 'completion' for more than a year, perhaps looking for a way to hold everything together in 'classical' balance without neglecting the more disruptive elements of Mahler's invention; he also exchanged ideas with project veteran Berthold Goldschmidt. The result is tremendous – a balder sort of reading than we are used to, still hugely emotive but with slightly faster speeds, fewer subtle inflections and a radically altered text. There can be nothing wrong in principle with such tinkering – Cooke's confederates have continued their search for an ideal version ever since his death – and, although it is sometimes claimed that Cooke added nothing of his own save patches of instrumentation, there are portions of the score that call for something more if they are going to be played at all. Several of the changes unveiled by Sanderling were taken up by colleagues.

That said, Sanderling stands apart from the minimally interventionist tradition of Rattle and Chailly. He not only preserves some of the speculative scoring suggested and then abandoned by Cooke, such as the xylophone in the second Scherzo, but also appends additional percussion throughout, lending the music an uncomfortable edge reminiscent of Hindemith or Weill. While such micro-surgery is fascinating in itself, it's the visceral conviction and rigorous continuity that impress just as much. The recording, almost too immediate, with hard-working strings miked close, remains vivid and true. The less-than-prestigious Berlin orchestra is even better prepared than the Bournemouth Symphony, engagingly 'provincial' horns and all. Inevitably, Sir Simon's Berlin Philharmonic sounds more refulgent than either. This recording of the Tenth may well be Sanderling's finest hour.

Symphony No 10 (ed Cooke)
Berlin Radio Symphony Orchestra /
Riccardo Chailly
Decca 466 955-2DH (79 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1986 ●

This, the third incarnation of Riccardo Chailly's 1986 studio recording, is the first to fit its 79 minutes onto a single sound carrier. In terms of recorded sound, Chailly is ahead on points: his orchestra (and inevitably you'll notice his violas) may lack the deep-pile of the Berlin Philharmonic, but his strings are sympathetically laid out in the warm acoustic of the Jesus-Christus Kirche.

Interpretatively speaking, Chailly is, unsurprisingly, on the cool side, though one never has the feeling that he is merely going through the motions. The reticence is of a piece with what we know of Chailly's subsequent Mahler conducting. And part of the collectability of Chailly's reading, for admirers of Mahler ed Cooke, will be the many points at which he departs from Rattle's solutions and/or follows the score published in 1976 as opposed to the 1989 revision of it.

Thus, where Rattle enlivens the denouement of the first Scherzo with a cymbal clash, Chailly in the mid-'80s is being literal: the effect was not restored until the 1989 edition. On the other hand, Chailly gives us the chance to hear xylophone and side drum parts subsequently excised from the fourth movement. Rattle, like Sanderling, cuts out a (not-so-muffled) drum stroke to pass seamlessly from the fourth to the fifth movement; this isn't explicitly authorised score-wise, although it has made such good sense in performance that unsuspecting listeners might attribute an editing fault to the Chailly. In the finale, the Italian is not among those who underwrite the return of the Adagio's dissonant 'break-down' chords with added percussion, and he surely has a point.

Swings and roundabouts? Even for those not interested in the minutiae, this represents a worthwhile addition to the collection – a 10th to live with perhaps.

Das Lied von der Erde

Violeta Urmana mez Michael Schade ten
Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Pierre Boulez
DG 469 526-2GH (61 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included. Recorded 1999 ●●●

This performance can be welcomed as something quite out of the ordinary, indeed a reading to place among the best the piece has ever received. Never has the score sounded so precisely articulated, so finely balanced or so translucent. For this, equal praise should go to Boulez, to the Vienna Philharmonic and to the recording team working in the Musikvereinssaal. To that, one should add Boulez's customary command of structure and his perhaps more recently acquired ability to expound a work in hand with all his own clarity of thought while retaining its emotional content. Here, at speeds closer to those of Walter than of most modern conductors, he allows the music to speak for itself, at the same time quite avoiding the tendency to sentimental lingering inherent in slower performances.

The other overwhelming asset is Violeta Urmana's marvellous realisation of the mezzo songs. Not since Ludwig for Klemperer has one experienced the feeling of being enveloped by a tone at once refulgent and warm, a style well-nigh ideal in line and breath control yet at the same time deeply expressive. She may not bring quite the emotional charge of Ferrier, even more Baker (for Leppard), to the songs but she runs them pretty close, and the great Farewell is simply heart-rending as delivered by her, Boulez and the VPO.

Schade compensates us for his slightly dry tone by his sensitive projection of the text. He is more in the vein of the incomparable Patzak for Walter and Richard Lewis for Reiner than the sappy-toned but slightly less characterful Wunderlich for Klemperer (though I still find his tempos sluggish by comparison with Walter and Reiner). Come the last song, though, Klemperer and Ludwig, and Baker with Leppard still hold sway. In any case if you want state-of-the-art sound, rather important in this work, there is no contest: Boulez wins hands down and, with the Vienna Phil playing the work as to the manner born, this is a winner.

Das Lied von der Erde 🅗
Kathleen Ferrier contr Julius Patzak ten
Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Bruno Walter Ⓜ
Decca Legends 466 576-2DM (ADD).
Recorded 1952 ●●●

Astonishingly, one might be in the hall with the VPO and these remarkable artists. If what we hear on this transfer from the master tapes in the fifth song is significantly different from what Bruno Walter heard as tenor, solo violin and flute raptly commune, it would be surprising. Equally astounding is the way the transferred recording conveys the weight and body of the VPO's tone. How easily can we now appreciate the passion, drive, and guile of Walter's conducting, with its subtle colourings and barely perceptible rubatos. The post-war VPO winds, the oboe especially, may strike some as curiously nasal. Yet it is the very complexity and idiosyncrasy of the orchestral timbres which help give this reading its special interest. No one has conducted or played the elusive third movement better; the pace is ideal, and Patzak outpoints every rival except possibly Wunderlich on the Klemperer recording. Beyond this there is Ferrier, an artist born to sing this music and singing it here at a time so close to her own death as to make this a truly harrowing song of farewell.

Das Lied von der Erde
Christa Ludwig mez Fritz Wunderlich ten
Philharmonia Orchestra, New Philharmonia Orchestra / Otto Klemperer
EMI 566892-2 (64 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1964-66 ●●

In a famous BBC TV interview Klemperer declared that he was the objective one, Walter the romantic, and he knew what he was talking about. Klemperer lays this music before you, even lays bare its soul by his simple method of steady tempos (too slow in the third song) and absolute textural clarity, but he doesn't quite demand your emotional capitulation as does Walter. Ludwig does that. In the tenor songs, Wunderlich cannot match Patzak, simply because of the older singer's way with the text; 'fest steh'n' in the opening song, 'Mir ist als wie im Traum', the line plaintive and the tone poignant, are simply unsurpassable. By any other yardstick, Wunderlich is a prized paragon, musical and vocally free. So natural is the sound on the revived EMI that it easily beats the mono Decca. With voice and orchestra in perfect relationship and everything sharply defined, the old methods of the 1960s have nothing to fear here from today's competition.

These two old recordings will never be thrust aside; the Walter for its authority and intensity, the feeling of being present on an historic occasion, the Klemperer for its insistent strength and beautiful singing.

Additional recommendations
Das Lied von der Erde
Baker mez King ten Concertgebouw Orchestra / Haitink
Philips 432 279-2PSL (66 minutes: ADD:10/76^{R}). Ⓜ
Also on Philips Duo, coupled with Symphony No 9: ② 462 299 2PM2 (146 minutes: DDD: 4/99) Ⓑ
and on Eloquence 468 182-2 Ⓢ

The most compellingly individual reading of the contralto songs ever put on record, matched by Haitink's deeply felt conducting. For Janet Baker fans it will be first choice.

Coupling: Symphony No 5
Baltsa mez König ten London Philharmonic Orchestra / Tennstedt
EMI Double Forte ② 574849-2 (DDD) Ⓜ

The LPO play with alternating intensity and delicacy throughout, and Klaus König proves one of the best tenor soloists on disc. A bargain.

King ten Fischer-Dieskau bar
Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Bernstein
Decca Legends 466 381-2DM
(67 minutes: ADD: 5/89^{R}) Ⓜ

An interpretation to make the nerve-ends tingle, with some extraordinary emotional insights. Fischer-Dieskau sings magnificently and the Vienna Phil responds to Bernstein's impassioned direction with superfine playing.

Hodgson contr Mitchinson ten BBC Northern Symphony Orchestra / Horenstein
BBC Legends/IMG Artists BBCL4042-2
(73 minutes: ADD: 4/00: recorded live) Ⓜ

Horenstein gives us a deeply eloquent, valedictory reading. Its sustained intensity, revelatory attention to orchestral detail and wonderful overview of the work make it a classic worthy to be set alongside readings by Walter, Klemperer and Reiner.

Das klagende Lied

Das klagende Lied[a] (complete version including 'Waldmärchen'). Kindertotenlieder. Rückert-Lieder. Lieder eines fahrenden Gesellen. Lieder aus Des Knaben Wunderhorn – Das irdische Leben; Des Antonius von Padua Fischpredigt; Urlicht
Brigitte Fassbaender mez [a]Markus Baur treb [a]Susan Dunn sop [a]Werner Hollweg ten [a]Andreas Schmidt bar, [a]Städtischer Musikverein, Düsseldorf, Radio Symphony Orchestra, Berlin; Deutsches Symphony Orchestra, Berlin / Riccardo Chailly
Double Decca ② 473 725-2 (DDD) Ⓜ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1988-89 ●

Few would realise that Das klagende Lied is the work of a teenager. Mahler's first significant work is as self-assured as anything he was to write in later life. Indeed enthusiastic Mahlerians will recognise here passages which crop up in other works, most notably the Second Symphony. Those same Mahlerians might not recognise much of this recording, however, since only two movements of Klagende Lied are usually performed: the 30-minute first movement is considered too rambling. But no one could arrive at that conclusion from this tautly directly, electrifying performance, and it contains wonderfully imaginative music, including some delightful forest murmurs.

For this movement alone this CD is a must for any Mahler fan, but more than that this is a spectacular recording of a one-in-a-million performance. The soloists, choir and orchestra achieve near perfection under Chailly's inspired direction, and the decision to substitute for the marvellous Brigitte Fassbaender a boy alto (Markus Baur) to represent the disembodied voice of the dead brother is pure genius. His weird, unnatural voice provides a moment of sheer spine-tingling drama.

Similar characteristics inform a deeply eloquent interpretation of Kindertotenlieder. The world-weary tone and verbal illumination in the first song catch at the heart and suggest the personal responsibility for the children's deaths on the part of the protagonist. Baker/Barbirolli, with the singer in lovely voice, must be a 'safer' recommendation than the more daring Fassbaender, but the latter is an inviting proposition – and a searing experience.

Fassbaender's emotionally charged way of singing is ideally matched to Mahler yet she is just as able to smile and sing gently, wittily. It is in the dramatic declamation, however, that the true flavour of her singing is caught. Throughout the Fahrenden Gesellen it is the immediacy, the fearlessness of attack and her particular intensity, that make these readings so arresting. The swiftish speeds throughout keep sentimentality at bay; so does Chailly's and the orchestra's biting precision and light touch.

Des Knaben Wunderhorn

Des Knaben Wunderhorn – Revelge[b]. Das irdische Leben[a]. Verlor'ne Müh[ab]. Rheinlegendchen[a]. Der Tamboursg'sell[b]. Der Schildwache Nachtlied[ab]. Wer hat dies Liedlein erdacht?[a]. Lob des hohen Verstandes[b]. Des Antonius von Padua Fischpredigt[b]. Lied des Verfolgten im Turm[ab]. Trost im Unglück[ab]. Wo die schönen Trompeten blasen[a]
[a]Elisabeth Schwarzkopf sop [b]Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau bar London Symphony Orchestra / George Szell
EMI Great Recordings of the Century 567236-2
(50 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Texts and translations included
Recorded 1968 ●●●

EMI's classic recording made in 1968 by Schwarzkopf, Fischer-Dieskau and Szell more or less puts all rivals out of court. Even those who find Schwarzkopf's singing mannered will be hard pressed to find more persuasive versions of the female songs than she gives, while Fischer-Dieskau and Szell are in a class of their own most of the time. Bernstein's CBS version, also from the late 1960s but with less spectacularly improved sound than EMI now provide, is also very fine, but for repeated listening Szell, conducting here with the kind of insight he showed on his famous Cleveland version of the Fourth Symphony, is the more controlled and keen-eared interpreter. Also, few command the musical stage as Fischer-Dieskau does in a song like 'Revelge' where every drop of irony and revulsion from the spectre of war is fiercely, grimly caught. Strongly recommended.

Lieder aus Des Knaben Wunderhorn
Jard van Nes contr John Bröcheler bass
Arnhem Philharmonic Orchestra / Roberto Benzi
Ottavo OTRC79238 (55 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts included. Recorded 1992

Jard van Nes is a natural for Mahler, vocally and interpretatively. Particularly admirable is her fresh, spontaneous approach, free from both the shadow of past performance or awe before such familiar songs. She catches ideally the folk-like charm of 'Rheinlegendchen' and 'Wer hat dies Liedlein erdacht?'. She is also appropriately earthy in 'Das irdische Leben', then marvellously tender as the distant lover in 'Des Schildwache Nachtlied'. Her unadorned mastery of word and tone cannot be praised too highly – listen to the keck delivery of 'Verlor'ne Muh': just right – and she crowns her performance with her grave utterance in 'Urlicht'. Bröcheler is among the best, characterising 'Lob des hohen Verstandes' with vivacity and revelling in St Antony's sermon.

Benzi and his orchestra never make the mistake of over-egging the pudding. Although the detail is all clearly projected and keenly played, in a perfectly balanced recording, the music is kept on the move.

Kindertotenlieder / Rückert-Lieder

Kindertotenlieder[a]. Rückert-Lieder[b]
Lieder eines fahrenden Gesellen[a]
Dame Janet Baker mez [a]Hallé Orchestra,
[b]New Philharmonia Orchestra / Sir John Barbirolli
EMI 566981-2 (65 minutes: ADD). Ⓕ
Texts and translations included ●

The songs of the Lieder eines fahrenden Gesellen ('Songs of a Wayfarer') are quoted from Mahler's First Symphony and the fresh, springtime atmosphere is shared by both works. The orchestration has great textural clarity and lightness of touch. The Kindertotenlieder, more chromatically expressive than the earlier work, tap into a darker, more complex vein in Mahler's spiritual and emotional make-up. The Rückert-Lieder are not a song-cycle as such but gather in their romantic awareness and response to the beauties of the poetry a unity and shape that binds them. Baker and Barbirolli reach a transcendental awareness of Mahler's inner musings.

Barbirolli draws from the Hallé playing of delicacy and precision, establishing a clear case for having this CD in your collection.

Mahler Rückert-Lieder – Ich atmet' einem linden Duft; Liebst du um Schönheit; Blicke mir nicht in die Lieder; Ich bin der Welt abhanden gekommen. Lieder und Gesänge – No 1, Frühlingsmorgen; No 2, Erinnerung; No 3, Hans und Grethe; No 7, Ich ging mit Lust durch einen grünen Wald; No 11, Ablösung im Sommer; No 12, Scheiden und Meiden.
Marx Hat Dich die Liebe berhürt. Maienblüten. Und gestern hat er mir Rosen gebracht. Venetianisches Wiegenlied. Wofür
R Strauss Acht Lieder aus Letzte Blätter, Op 10 – No 3, Die Nacht; No 8, Allerseelen. Sechs Lieder aus Lotusblättern, Op 19 – No 4, Wie sollten wir geheim sie halten; No 6, Mein Herz ist stumm. Vier Lieder, Op 27 – No 1, Ruhe, meine Seele; No 4, Morgen. Nachtgang, Op 29 No 3. Meinem Kinde, Op 37 No 3. Begegnung, AV72
Katarina Karnéus mez Roger Vignoles pf
EMI Debut 573168-2 (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓑ
Recorded 1998 ●●

This is an outright winner. Karnéus's absolutely natural voice has an ideal warmth of tone and she connects completely with the text. In the Mahler, there's ebullience and good humour, even a smile in the voice, in 'Ich ging mit Lust' and 'Hans und Grethe', a rich vein of heartfelt, inner feeling so appropriate to 'Liebst du um Schönheit' and 'Ich bin der Welt'. Though in the latter song one misses the orchestral clothing usually encountered, Vignoles consoles us for its absence with his subtle, soft-grained, finely judged playing. Her rich, even tone and response to the texts add an extra dimension to one's pleasure. Her Strauss singing confirms her as an ideal interpreter of Strauss Lieder. The sincere simplicity evinced in 'Morgen' and 'Ruhe' is so much more relevant and moving, especially when the phrasing and the German is, as everywhere on the issue, so exemplary, the movement between notes, using gentle portamento, so admirable. The recording is well balanced. The only drawback is that to get texts and translations you are directed to EMI's web site, but don't let that stop anyone acquiring this recital, a real 'must buy' for Lieder lovers.

Gian Francesco Malipiero

Italian 1882-1973

GROVE Malipiero studied with Bossi at the Licei Musicali in Venice (1899-1902) and Bologna (1904-5), and began transcribing the music of Monteverdi and other early Italians in 1902; he also learnt much from serving as amanuensis to Smareglia. In 1913 he visited Paris, where he formed a lasting friendship with Casella and heard The Rite of Spring: he then suppressed everything he had previously written. The influences of Stravinsky and particularly Debussy were to remain fundamental, and they gave rise to his first masterpieces: the orchestral Pause del silenzio I (1917), the ballet Pantea (1919, perf.1932) and the seven miniature operas Sette canzoni (1919).

In 1924 he retired to Asolo in the Veneto and in 1926 embarked on his complete Monteverdi edition, while continuing to compose copiously. Archaic and contemporary elements were combined in the operas, his main works of the 1920s, including San Francesco d'Assisi (1922) and Torneo notturno (1931). His enormous later output includes more operas, orchestral music, eight string quartets and vocal pieces. He was the most original and inventive Italian composer of his generation.

Il Capricci di Callot

Martina Winter sop Giacinta; Markus Müller ten Giglio; Gro Bente Kjellevold mez La Vecchia Beatrice; Bernd Valentin bar Il Principe Travestito da Ciarlatanto; Burkhard Ulrich ten Il Poeta; Jörg Sabrowski bar Una Maschera; Kiel Philharmonic Orchestra / Peter Marschik
CPO ② CPO999 830-2 (93 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, text and translation included
Recorded live at the Kiel Opera House in 1999

At last! Gian Francesco Malipiero was one of the most original and provocative operatic composers of the 20th century, but with the exception of that weird, impressive trilogy L'Orfeide, not one of his major full-length operas (there are 23 of them) has been recorded until now. I Capricci di Callot was a good choice: it is relatively brief, musically easy of access (its characteristic tone is gracefully lyrical, at times oddly close to Vaughan Williams) and absolutely typical of Malipiero's anti-realistic dramaturgy. We receive warning of this when an elegantly neoclassical seven-minute overture is followed by a nine-minute danced prologue: nobody sings a note until more than one-sixth of this opera's duration has passed, and there are long mimed scenes later.

The plot concerns a poor seamstress, Giacinta, who loses her own personality when she tries on a sumptuous dress that she has been making and becomes, in her imagination, a Princess. The most lyrical and moving music comes in a mad scene where Giacinta imagines herself in a fabulous palace waiting for the magical arrival of her imaginary Prince. The world of masks, illusions and ambiguities was central to what Malipiero called 'my opera', and the serene beauty of this scene is due to it. In many of his operas the most exquisite moments are the most perplexingly irrational ones. Or rather those where he casts his strange spells: the passage in which Giacinta puts on the fabulous dress and her friend Beatrice exclaims in wonder and fills the room with lighted candles. Or the gentle flute solo that accompanies the smashing of a doll representing the mythic Princess; it is followed by a curiously formal and haunting funereal dance.

All the singers are good, Peter Marschik clearly understands Malipiero's alluring oddness and projects the score strongly. The live recording is very close, which adds a touch of gawkiness to the strings at times, but in what sounds like a small auditorium the voices gain from not needing to force. An accomplished issue, and an important one.

Marin Marais French 1656-1728

GROVE Marais, the central figure in the French bass viol school, spent his life in Paris, much of it in royal service. A pupil of Sainte-Colombe and protégé of Lully, he composed four operas (1693-1709 - notably Alcione, 1706, famous for its storm scene) that form an important link between Lully and Campra. But his greatest significance lies in his five collections of music for one to three bass viols (1686-1725), comprising over 550 pieces. As well as the usual dances, they include character pieces that are among his finest works, and they possess an eloquence and refinement of line and richness of ornamental detail that perfectly display the qualities of his instrument. The Pieces en trio (1692) are recognised as the first appearance of the trio sonata in France.

Alcyone – Suites

Le Concert des Nations / Jordi Savall 🅿
Astrée Naïve ES9945 (53 minutes: DDD). Ⓜ
Recorded 1993 ●

As one of the greatest exponents of the solo viol tradition perfected by Marais, Savall focuses his insights upon this music and interprets the scoring as Marais might have done. He experiments with all the chamber-music combinations of the day and, typically, hazards some of his own, particularly in the Chaconne. Occasionally, Savall uses winds and sometimes miscalculates his effects, as in the 'Bourrée pour les Bergers et Bergères'.

His command of Maraisian ornamentation is, however, everywhere evident and indeed very welcome because of the constant melodic echoes of the solo repertoire in the opera score. With chamber music come more transparent textures, revealing the harmonic and textural richness of the post-Lullian style; cross-rhythms, syncopations and sequences have more impact.

By contrast, the opera performances can often sound sluggish and four-square. Savall also includes music that was left out of the opera recording, including the delicately syncopated 'Air pour les Faunes et les Driades' from the Prologue, the exquisitely scored Sarabande, with its beautifully shaded cadences, and the Gigue from Act 1 as well as the 'Sarabande pour les Prêtresses de Junon' from Act 2. In the Prologue and the March and Air 'pour les Matelots' in Act 3, Savall orchestrates passages that were once vocal solos to maintain the proportions of the movements.

Pièces de viol

Le labyrinthe & autres histoires P
Pièces de viole – Deuxième livre: Cloches ou carillon; La polonaise; Sarabande à l'espagnol; Chaconne en rondeau; Troisième livre: Plainte; La musette; La guitarre; Quatrième livre: Rondeau Le bijou; Le tourbillon; Le labyrinthe; Cinquième livre: Le tombeau pour Marais le cadet; La georgienne dite La maupertis; Le jeu du volant; Prélude en harpegement; Marche persane dite La sauvigny
Paolo Pandolfo bass viol Mitzi Meyerson hpd
Thomas Boysen theorbo/gtr
Glossa GCD920404 (67 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1999 ●●

Paolo Pandolfo stands alone in his generation as the master of his instrument and of a repertory that depends upon a deep affinity with its socio-historical context. Labyrinths form the theme of this recording: Louis XIV's passion for them, the monumental Labyrinthe Marais composed to amuse him, and the labyrinthine character of Marais' output when taken as a whole. Pierre Jacquier has contributed a thought-provoking essay and Pandolfo (rather courageously) offers notional monologues related to the pièces he selected to represent a hypothetical route through Marais' musical maze. The CD begins, appropriately enough, with a freely expressed prélude that sets the tone for the recording and ends with a playfully unstuffy performance of a chaconne. Along the way there are spine-tingling allusions to a harp, bells, a musette and a guitar; a yearning polonaise, a lascivious sarabande and a pompous Persian march. But in Pandolfo's hands none eclipse the dramatically conceived and passionately realised Labyrinthe itself.

It isn't simply that Pandolfo is completely at ease with the instrument and the idiom; he creates new sounds and new combinations of effects with his continuo forces (in Cloches ou carillon and La musette) – sounds and effects not precisely notated in the music and probably unimagined by Marais, but within the scope and idiom of the instruments. Pandolfo himself can play so softly, almost without attack, so clearly, so quickly and yet so apparently effortlessly. He can play a chord a dozen different ways, and he appears to relish the 'growl-ish' effects the lower strings of the bass viol can produce, making them sound truly beautiful and even exotic.

So expertly has the ensemble been recorded that for once the CD listener can truly imagine himself among the privileged few invited to the king's private rooms at Versailles. This is a thrilling disc.

Pièces de viole, Livre 2 – Part 1: Ballet en rondeau; Couplets de folies; Prélude; Cloches ou carillon. Part 2: Prélude lentement; Chaconne en rondeau; Tombeau pour M de Ste Colombe; Prélude; Allemande; Courante; Pavan selon de goût des anciens compositeurs de luth; Gavotte; Rondeau en vaudeville; Gigue; Chaconne; Fantaisie P
Markku Luolajan-Mikkola, Varpu Haavisto vas da gamba Eero Palviainen lte Elina Mustonen hpd
BIS CD909 (73 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1997 Ⓕ

The most substantial pieces here are the set of variations of La folia, and the Tombeau pour M de Ste Colombe in memory of Marais's mentor. His idiom embodies a paradox that is peculiarly French, in that it demands a very high technical standard, yet its proper expression requires the utmost restraint. The young Finnish viol-player, Markku Luolajan-Mikkola, is a founder-member of Phantasm. Here he holds his own with elegance and reserve, although in the slower pieces one might have wished for more rhythmic flexibility. The continuo section consists of another viol-player, and a theorbo or harpsichord (though in the variations on La folia, the two are combined). This works well for the most part, though the high partials of the harpsichord tend to drown the viols: the lute is far less obtrusive. The problem of balance also intrudes when the soloist is in the lower range. But as an introduction to Marais's art this is hard to fault – try his Pavan 'in the style of the bygone lute composers': a real treat.

Pièces de viole, Quatrième Livre – Marche tartate; Sarabande; La tartarine; Les fêtes champêtres; Gigue la fleselle; Rondeau le bijou; Le tourbillon; L'uniforme; Allemande pour le sujet; Gigue pour la basse; Allemande l'asmatique; Muzette; Caprice ou Sonate; Le labyrinthe; Allemande la bizare; La minaudiere; Allemande la singuliere; L'arabesque; Allemande la superbe; La reveuse; Marche; Gigue; Le badinage; Deux Allemandes P
Christophe Coin, Vittorio Ghielmi bass viols
Christophe Rousset hpd Pascal Monteilhet theorbo/gtr
L'Oiseau-Lyre 458 144-2OH (78 minutes: DDD). Ⓕ
Recorded 1996

To bring the subtleties of music intended to be perceived as in a goût étranger to life, a performer must first master the traditional French Baroque style. Christophe Coin has done that, both technically and musically, to a degree matched by few other viol players. This recording encompasses an astonishing range of moods and effects: he sings ('Fêtes champêtres'), he swaggers ('La fleselle'), he soars ('Caprice'). He revels in the resonance of Marais's exquisite chordal writing ('Sarabande' and 'Muzette') and takes time when it suits the music – always just the right amount (too much would sap the music, too little would betray a lack of sensibilité and too frequent would render his performances clichéd). He can be rhetorical ('Fêtes champêtres') but is equally at home with the saucy 'Tartarine'.

Central to French viol playing is mastery of the melancholy; so much of the repertory is in minor keys and within the range of the human voice. For performers it is the most revealing of all musical 'affects' and Coin has the character and conviction never to allow it to degenerate into self-indulgence. In his hands such pieces as the rondeaux popularised in the film, Tous les matins du monde ('L'arabesque', 'Le reveuse' and 'Le badinage'), and 'Le bijou' are elegant and poetic. With a fine team of accompanists, Coin provides entertainment you will want to revisit again and again, and sets new standards for viol players today.

Further listening

Tous les matins du monde (soundtrack) Ⓟ
Music by Couperin, Lully, Marais and Sainte-Colombe
Various soloists; Le Concert des Nations / Savall va da gamba
Alia Vox AV9821 (76 minutes: DDD; recorded 1991) Ⓕ

This disc occupies the more inward world of the solo gamba repertoire, taking in moving and thoughtful compositions such as Marais' 'La rêveuse' and Sainte-Colombe's deeply moving Les pleurs. Savall shows himself throughout to be a master worthy of these great viol-playing composers. A magical disc.

Luca Marenzio

Italian 1553/4-1599

GROVE Possibly a pupil of Contino in Brescia, Marenzio moved to Rome in c1574 and served cardinals and other wealthy patrons (including Luigi d'Este) until 1586. During these years he published copiously and gained an international reputation. He travelled in 1587, visiting Verona, and briefly served Ferdinando de' Medici in Florence, where in 1589 he composed intermedi for the ducal wedding festivities. He returned to Rome later that year, residing with the Duke of Bracciano untilc 1593, when he entered Cardinal Cinzio Aldobrandini's service; he held a Vatican apartment in 1594. In 1595-6 he visited the Polish court, returning to Rome in 1598.

One of the most prolific madrigalists of the period, Marenzio published over 400 madrigals and villanellas in at least 23 books (1580-99). They range widely, from light pastorals to serious sonnets (these mostly from later years), and are notable for their striking mood- and word-painting. They long remained popular in Italy and elsewhere, especially England. His motets, though less well known, also feature much verbal imagery and religious symbolism.

Madrigals

Madrigali a 4vv ... libro primo
Concerto Italiano (Rossana Bertini sop Claudio Cavina counterten Giuseppe Maletto ten Sergio Foresti bass Mara Galassi hp Andrea Damiani lte) / Rinaldo Alessandrini
Opus 111 OPS30-117 (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1994 ●

What Concerto Italiano reveals to us is that four-part writing in this expressive and varied milieu makes a virtue out of its limitations: Marenzio capitalises on exposed dialogues between voices and textural brittleness. Classicism (in the broadest musical sense synonymous with four-part writing long before Bach chorales or Haydn quartets) is what Alessandrini is seeking to impart in this clear juxtaposition of fluent canzonets with intimate rhetoric. The music is so subtly shaded, both by Marenzio and the singers, that unless you are a reincarnated madrigalist this should be experienced in small doses. There is just the same commitment and concentration to the extensive detail in the music. Just observe how much care has gone into Chi vol udire i miei sospiri in rime with its beautifully paced crescendo on the word 'sospiri' (sighs), the almost imperceptible sketching of the pulse and other wonderful liberties with rhythmic inflexion. So much of this innate understanding is of course expressed through the singers' native tongue. None of this would count for much were the ensemble not highly refined in purely abstract terms and this is perhaps the best yet in that respect. Only rarely does the soprano's rich and penetrating tone cause one to worry and when it does this is usually because of a slight tendency to flatness. A small concern in a very fine release.

Awards
2002

Madrigals – Book 1: Così moriro i fortunati amanti; Deh rinforzate il vostro pianto; Dolorosi martir, fieri tormenti; Frenò Tirsi il desio; Liquide perle Amor da gl'occhi sparse; Per duo coralli ardenti; Tirsi morir volea; Book 2: Là dove sono i pargoletti Amori; E s'io doglio, Amor; Fuggi speme mia, fuggi; Vaghi e lieti fanciulli; Book 4: Caro Aminta pur voi; Donne il celeste lume; Nè fero sdegno mai donna mi mosse; Non può Filli più; Book 5: Basciami mille volte; Consumando mi vo di piaggia in piaggia; Book 6: O verdi selv'o dolci fonti o rivi; Udite, lagrimosi; Book 7: Cruda Amarilli; Ma grideran per me le piagge; Book 9: Cosí nel mio parlar; Et ella ancide, e non val c'huom si chiuda Philips Tirsi morir volea Terzi Intavolatura di liuto, libro primo – Liquide perle Amor, da gl'occhi sparse
Il Concerto Italiano / Rinaldo Alessandrini hpd
Opus111 OP30245 (74 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ ●

Marenzio's music was known throughout Europe during his lifetime; its success was based on what one contemporary identified as its 'new, fresh style, pleasing to the ear, with some simple counterpoint and without excessive artifice', a characterisation that applies more to the earlier books than to the late ones. It is this style which lies at the heart of Rinaldo Alessandrini's selection, (though there are plenty of pieces from the later books as well), and the performances nicely capture its essential spirit, its communicability and transparent craftmanship occasionally disturbed (as in 'Dolorosi martir') by more serious intent. These beautifully paced and architecturally controlled performances, many of which make intelligent and appropriate use of added continuo instruments, present the most persuasive argument for understanding the reasons for Marenzio's enormous reputation, throughout Italy and beyond, at the start of the 1580s. Highly recommended.

Il sesto libro de Madrigali
La Venexiana (Valentina Coladonato, Nadia Ragni sops Paola Reggiani mezz Sandro Naglia, Giuseppe Maletto tens Andrea Favari, Daniele Carnovich basses Gabriele Palomba, Franco Pavan ltes) / Claudio Cavina counterten
Glossa GCD920909 (54 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translations included ●

La Venexiana have already successfully explored the world of Marenzio's late madrigals with their quite stunning recording of the Ninth Book . The overall style of the Sixth Book is quite different; the most important trend here is towards a declamatory style which critically depends upon a new kind of rhetoric. The group is superbly equipped to elucidate the details of intimate music-text relations without resorting to over-mannered gestures. The overall tone of the Sixth Book is pastoral-elegiac, and the group responds with a sense of pacing that is gentle and spacious, allowing the music plenty of opportunity to speak clearly. Accurate tuning and carefully balanced chording, backed up by exquisite phrasing, are the keys to La Venexiana's delicate interpretations of some of the most poetic music written by one of the most important Italian madrigalists before Monteverdi. This is a must.

Frank Martin

Swiss 1890-1974

Martin, the son of a Calvinist minister, was deeply impressed by a performance of the St Matthew Passion he heard at the age of 10. He studied with Joseph Lauber and worked from 1926 with Jaques-Dalcroze, then in his Piano Concerto no.1 (1934) and Symphony (1937) adopted Schoenbergian serialism while retaining an extended tonal harmony that looked to Debussy: the mature fusion of these elements into a style marked by dissonant chords, smooth part-writing and 'gliding tonality' did not come until the dramatic chamber oratorio Le vin herbé (1941), soon followed by two larger oratorios, In terra pax (1944) and Golgotha (1948), as well as by the Petite symphonie concertante for harp, harpsichord, piano and strings (1945) and the Sechs Monologe aus 'Jedermann' (1943, orchestrated 1949). In 1946 he moved to the Netherlands; he also taught at the Cologne Musikhochschule (1950-57). His later works include the operas Der Sturm (1956, Vienna Staatsoper) and Monsieur de Pourceaugnac (1963, Geneva), a large-scale Requiem (1972) and many concertante pieces, among them concertos for violin and harpsichord (both 1952) and a second for piano (1969).

Piano Concertos

Piano Concertos – No 1^{a}; No 2^{b}. Ballade^{a}
Danse de la peur^{ab}
^{a}Sebastian Benda, ^{a}Paul Badura-Skoda pfs
Svizzera Italiana Orchestra / Christian Benda
ASV CDDCA1082 (74 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

What Martin's music needs is performances of understanding but also affection, and ASV deserves congratulation for the shrewd casting of this disc. Sebastian Benda was a composition pupil of Martin's, and once recorded the Ballade with him conducting. The Second Piano Concerto was written for Paul Badura-Skoda, and he too recorded it with the composer. The conductor here is too young to share the two pianists' warm memories of Martin, but he is Sebastian Benda's son, and the sense of all three collaborating in a tribute is strong.

Martin is often described as a serialist, but this is not true. He used 12-note rows, but only to discipline his melodic language, which is tonal, strong and lyrical. The First Concerto might just as well have been subtitled 'The Dramatic' and Benda plays it with flair and great enjoyment, as he does the gentler but no less varied Ballade. The Second Concerto, a late work, is one of Martin's finest, with a profusion of bold, striking ideas and opportunities for grand rhetoric. Badura-Skoda plays it as though he were delighted to make its acquaintance again.

Perhaps the orchestra could have done with two or three extra desks of strings, but the recording is excellent and the performances all that could be desired.

Maria-Triptychon

Der Sturm – Overture; Mein Ariel, hast du, der Luft nur ist; Ein feierliches Lied; Hin sind meine Zauberei'n. Maria-Triptychon. Sechs Monologe aus Jedermann
Linda Russell sop David Wilson-Johnson bar
Duncan Riddell vn London Philharmonic Orchestra / Matthias Bamert
Chandos CHAN9411 (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1994

The Maria-Triptychon was written in the late 1960s in response to a request from Wolfgang Schneiderhan for a work for violin, soprano and orchestra that he could perform with his wife, Irmgard Seefried. Although their recording under the composer himself emanating from a Swiss Radio tape is authoritative, it does not match this Chandos recording in sheer beauty of sound. Linda Russell sings the solo part with great sympathy and intelligence, and Duncan Riddell assumes the mantle of Schneiderhan with no mean success. The transparency of texture that Chandos achieves shows this visionary score in the most favourable light. It makes a stronger impression than in any earlier performance, thanks to the dedication of the LPO and its conductor. Bamert distils a strong atmosphere and sense of mystery in all these scores. Wilson-Johnson is on impressive form in the Jedermann Monologues (one of the great song-cycles of the century). His is as perceptive and moving an account as any – and he is no less impressive in the magical Der Sturm.

Mass for Double Choir

Awards 1998

Martin Mass for Double Choir. Passacaille
Pizzetti Messa di requiem. De profundis
Westminster Cathedral Choir / James O'Donnell org
Hyperion CDA67017 (71 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included
Recorded 1997 ●●●

These are magnificent performances. Written in 1922, the Agnus Dei being added four years later, the Mass is one of Martin's most sublime compositions. Surprisingly it gains enormously from using boys' rather than female voices; it is a measure of James O'Donnell's achievement with Westminster Cathedral Choir that the gain in purity and beauty is at no time at the expense of depth and fervour. This is an altogether moving and eloquent performance, often quite thrilling and always satisfying. This disc brings us a fine performance by O'Donnell of the Passacaille and the Pizzetti Messa di Requiem, also composed in 1922. The received wisdom is that it is in his a cappella music that Pizzetti is at his finest and in his 1951 monograph Guido Gatti spoke of his setting as 'the most serene and lyrical of all ... from Mozart's to Gabriel Fauré's'. Serene and lyrical it most certainly is, and it will come as a revelation to those encountering it for the first time. There is a fervour and a conviction about the Westminster performances of the Requiem and the 1937 De profundis. The luminous tone this choir produces in both these inspired works will ring in your ears long after you have finished playing this splendidly recorded disc.

Requiem

Elisabeth Speiser sop Ria Bollen contr Eric Tappy ten Peter Lagger bass Lausanne Women's Chorus; Union Chorale; Ars Laeta Vocal Ensemble; Suisse Romande Orchestra / Frank Martin
Jecklin Disco JD631-2 (47 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included. Recorded live in 1973

Astonishingly, this beautiful score still remains grievously neglected – it deserves to be heard as often as the Fauré Requiem. It is a work of vision and devotion of spirit, and casts a strong spell. It is one of those pieces that leaves you with a feeling of enormous tranquillity. The musical language is familiar enough, for there are the same subtle shifts of colour and harmony that you will find in Martin's Petite Symphonie concertante. However, there is a dramatic power (Dies irae) and a serenity (In Paradisum) that are quite new. The short In Paradisum is inspired and has a luminous quality and radiance that are quite otherworldly. Martin certainly put all his consummate musical skills into this score with organ and orchestra of equal importance. He conducts a completely dedicated and authoritative performance: it might well be improved upon in one or two places in terms of ensemble or security, but the spirit is there. The Swiss Radio recording is eminently truthful and well balanced, and offers a natural enough acoustic.

Bohuslav Martinů Bohemian 1890-1959

GROVE Martinu studied at the Prague Conservatory (1906-10), then worked as a teacher and orchestral violinist before going to Paris in 1923. There he studied with Roussel and developed a neo-classical style, sometimes using jazz (La bagarre, 1926; Le jazz, 1928, both for orchestra). He began to apply himself to Czech subjects (ballet Špalícek, 1933; operas The Miracles of Mary, 1935, Comedy on the Bridge, 1937; Field Mass for male voices, wind and percussion, 1939), but not exclusively: this was also the period of his fantasy opera Julietta (1938) and of numerous concertos. In 1940 he left Paris, and the next year arrived in New York, where he concentrated on orchestral and chamber works, including his first five symphonies. From 1948 his life was divided between Europe and the USA: this was the period of his Sixth Symphony (1953), Frescoes of Piero della Francesca for orchestra (1955) and opera The Greek Passion (1961). He was one of the most prolific composers of the 20th century, imaginative in style, with energetic rhythms and powerful, often dissonant harmony, but uneven in quality.

Symphonies

Symphonies Nos 1 and 2
Bamberg Symphony Orchestra / Neeme Järvi Ⓕ
BIS CD362 (61 minutes: DDD)

Symphonies Nos 3 and 4
Bamberg Symphony Orchestra / Neeme Järvi Ⓕ
BIS CD363 (63 minutes: DDD)

Symphonies Nos 5 and 6
Bamberg Symphony Orchestra / Neeme Järvi Ⓕ
BIS CD402 (59 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1988 ●

Despite his travels throughout his formative years as a composer, Martinů remained a quintessentially Czech composer and his music is imbued with the melodic shapes and rhythms of the folk-music of his homeland. The six symphonies were written during Martinů's

America years and in all of them he uses a large orchestra with distinctive groupings of instruments which give them a very personal and unmistakable timbre. The rhythmic verve of his highly syncopated fast movements is very infectious, indeed unforgettable, and his slow movements are often deeply expressive, most potently, perhaps, in that of the Third Symphony which is imbued with the tragedy of war. The Bamberg orchestra plays marvellously and with great verve for Järvi, whose excellently judged tempos help propel the music forward most effectively. His understanding of the thrust of Martinů's structures is impressive and he projects the music with clarity. The recordings are beautifully clear, with plenty of ambience surrounding the orchestra, a fine sense of scale and effortless handling of the wide dynamic range Martinů calls for. It is enthusiastically recommended.

Symphony No 4. Memorial to Lidice. Field Mass[a]
[a]Ivan Kusnjer bar Czech Philharmonic [a]Chorus and Orchestra / Jirí Bělohlávek
Chandos CHAN9138 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included ◉

It is doubtful whether the luscious, intricately-scored pages of the big-hearted Fourth Symphony have ever sounded more opulent. This is, for the most part, glorious playing, intoxicating in its richness (what strings!) and sure-footed poise. Bělohlávek has an unexpectedly playful, almost balletic way with the Scherzo; the trio section, too, has a most appealing delicacy and engaging sense of innocence. Reservations? Well, greater bite and tighter focus to Chandos's reverberant sound picture would have been better. More crucially, though, there is some lack of intensity and temperament: you just don't sense the anguish behind the engulfing climax of the slow movement, while the finale could certainly do with more unbuttoned exuberance and head-spinning exhilaration. Järvi has the more winning rhythmic flair, though in terms of orchestral polish he honestly can't hold a candle to Bělohlávek's super-refined ensemble. In other words, we still await a truly convincing modern recorded account of this wonderful symphony. Bělohlávek's account of the Field Mass, on the other hand, is an undoubted success. It is wonderfully fervent, boasting a noble-toned, impassioned contribution from the baritone, Ivan Kusnjer, and disciplined, sonorous work from the men of the Czech Philharmonic Chorus. Chandos's recording captures it all to perfection: blend and focus impeccably combined. The moving Memorial to Lidice completes this ideally-chosen triptych. Bearing a dedication 'To the Memory of the Innocent Victims of Lidice', Martinů's score was written in response to the mass-destruction of that village by the Nazis in June 1942. One of the composer's most deeply-felt creations, this is an eight-minute orchestral essay of slumbering power, incorporating at its climax a spine-chilling quotation from Beethoven's Fifth. It, too, receives sensitive advocacy here.

Chamber works

Piano Quartet. Quartet for Oboe, Violin, Cello and Piano. Viola Sonata. String Quintet
Joel Marangella ob Isabelle van Keulen, Charmian Gadd, Solomia Soroka vns Rainer Moog, Theodore Kuchar vas Young-Chang Cho, Alexander Ivashkin vcs
Daniel Adni, Kathryn Selby pfs
Naxos 8 553916 (73 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1994 Ⓢ

The Quartet for oboe, violin, cello and piano is a highly attractive piece in the busy yet unfussy neo-classical style that Martinů made so much his own. Its opening theme is quite captivating, but all three movements have charm. The other music is hardly less delightful. The Viola Sonata is an eloquent work from the mid-1950s, composed three years after the Rhapsody-Concerto for the same instrument and orchestra. These were vintage years in Martinů's creativity. The String Quintet is the earliest work, dating from his Paris years, and shows the influence of Roussel. Although the first movement is perhaps not top-drawer Martinů, the slow movement is most imaginative. The performances are often touched with distinction and are never less than eminently serviceable. Adni could perhaps be a little more supple in the Piano Quartet of 1942 though in general he plays with spirit. There is plenty of air round the players and the recording is lifelike and well balanced.

Duo for Violin and Viola, H331. Duos for Violin and Cello – No 1, H157; No 2, H371. Three Madrigals. Piece for Two Cellos, H377. String Trio No 2, H238
Pavel Hula vn Josef Kluson va
Michal Kanka vc
Praga Digitals PRD250 155 (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

It doesn't look promising: a whole disc of string duos and trios by a composer that even his warmest admirers admit was both over-prolific and uneven. Maybe it has something to do with the fact that Martinů was a string player himself, but the level of invention here is very high, and it often emerges in the forms of nervous, energetic toccata and folk-rooted lyricism that those admirers will recognise as 'real Martinů'. The Three Madrigals, for the apparently austere combination of violin and viola, in fact combine both those veins with such a sheer enjoyment of virtuoso string technique that you will be convinced that at least four players are involved. In the central movement an archetypal Martinů melody blissfully emerges from clouds of trills and double-stopping, while in the third he delightedly manages to suggest that Domenico Scarlatti was very probably born in Moravia.

There are pleasures like those in most of the movements here. Martinů quite often, notably in his only surviving String Trio, rewards his players for negotiating his energetic toccatas with brilliant but never merely showy cadenzas, and these fine players respond with ample tone and real sympathy for his idiom and for the touching nostalgia that often underlies it. The recording is satisfyingly full. Warmly recommended.

Works for Violin and Piano, Volumes 1 and 2
Volume 1: Sonatas – C, H120; D minor, H152; No 1, H182. Concerto, H13. Elegy, H3. Impromptu, H166. Five Short Pieces, H184.
Volume 2: Sonatas – No 2, H208; No 3, H303. Sonatina, H262. Seven Arabesques, H201. Ariette-Vocalise, H188a. Czech Rhapsody, H307. Sept études rythmiques, H202. Intermezzo, H261. Five Madrigal Stanzas, H297
Bohuslav Matoušek vn Petr Adamec pf
Supraphon ② SU3412-2 (121 and 111 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1996 and 1997 Ⓕ ●

A handsome undertaking, which gathers together all 16 of Martinů's compositions for violin and piano. Supraphon's decision to present the music in more or less chronological order makes it all the easier to chart a fascinating stylistic journey spanning some 36 years. The 19-year-old Martinů wrote his impassioned Elegy in 1909, and the comparatively straightforward violin writing contrasts dramatically with the piano's big-boned, unashamedly dramatic contribution. Strangely, the following year's Concerto proves to be anything but. Indeed, one wonders whether its title was a leg-pull on the young composer's part, for its 27-minute progress totally eschews any ostentatious display in favour of a sunny simplicity and open-hearted playfulness. With the ambitious Sonata in C from 1919, we encounter an increasing confidence and fluency, though there's still little sign of the composer's mature voice.

Volume 2 kicks off with the winsome bonne-bouche of 1930, the Ariette-Vocalise, while the following year saw the creation of the concise and poised Second Violin Sonata. The 1937 Sonatina radiates a treasurable serenity and joy. Composed in New York during 1943, the Five Madrigal Stanzas bear an inscription to a certain amateur violinist by the name of Professor Albert Einstein.

The more meaty Third Sonata, written towards the end of 1944, possesses a pungent emotional scope that relates it to his Symphonies Nos 3-5 from the same period. Matoušek and Adamec form a consistently stylish partnership, and the recordings are rich and airy to match. A truly notable achievement.

Piano Sonata

Bagatelle, H323. Dumka No 3, H285bis. Fantasie a toccata, H281. The Fifth Day of the Fifth Moon, H318. Piano Sonata, H350. Eight Préludes, H181
Eleonora Bekova pf
Chandos CHAN9655 (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997-98

Martinů hardly wrote the sort of music where every note is worth its weight in gold. Criticized for his failure to sense that 'all kinds of heterogeneous elements mixed together do not constitute an independent style', he unsettlingly reminds you of an actor happiest when adopting a wide variety of masks but uncomfortable when compelled to be himself. Yet, as the powerful Sonata and Fantasie a toccata show, Martinů was capable of a genuine eloquence and stature beyond a merely elegant and impersonal expertise.

As Graham Melville-Mason tells us in his notes, the Sonata was much admired by Rudolf Serkin, who programmed it alongside Beethoven's Hammerklavier Sonata.

Eleonora Bekova's performances show a uniform and unswerving command. Her full-blooded sonority and technique proclaim her Moscow training and, musically enriched by her success in chamber music, she makes light of every difficulty. Whether in chic Parisian asides directed at jazz and ragtime (the First and Second Préludes), in the greater weight and substance of the Sonata (which has, perhaps surprisingly, failed to enter the mainstream repertoire beside the sonatas of, say, Copland, Janáček, Barber and Dutilleux, for example) or in a garland of encores including the perky Bagatelle, her performances are exemplary. Chandos's excellent sound, too, makes this a prime issue.

The epic of Gilgamesh

Eva Depoltová sop Stefan Margita ten Ivan Kusnjer bar Ludek Vele bass Milan Karpíšek spkr
Slovak Philharmonic Choir and Orchestra / Zdeněk Košler
Marco Polo 8 223316 (56 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Translation included. Recorded 1989 ●

This is one of Martinů's greatest works, completed in 1955, a month or so before the three Frescoes of Piero della Francesca. It tells how Gilgamesh, King of Uruk, hears about the warrior Enkidu, a primitive, at home among the works of nature with only animals as friends. He sends him a courtesan to whom he loses his innocence; the King then befriends him but they fight before their friendship is really cemented. The second and third parts of the oratorio centre on the themes of death and immortality; the second tells of Enkidu's death and Gilgamesh's grief, his plea to the gods to restore Enkidu and his search for immortality, and the third records his failure to learn its secrets. It is almost impossible to hear the chilling episode of the last words of Enkidu's ghost ('Yes, I saw') with its subtly changing vocal colours without a feeling of awe.

With its evocation of a mysterious past, use of spoken narrative and distinctive sound world, it is inevitable that it should be compared with Honegger's Le roi David. But Gilgamesh is far stronger and its invention far more sustained and powerful. The performance is in Czech as is the narration, which should not limit the dissemination of this disc, for the music deals with universal themes and is Martinů at his most profound and inspired.

There are no weaknesses in the cast (the Gilgamesh of Ivan Kusnjer is very impressive), and the chorus and orchestra respond very well to Zdeněk Košler's direction. The recording maintains a natural balance, and the resonant acoustic is used to good advantage.

Steve Martland British b1959

Martland studied at Liverpool University, then with Louis Andriessen at the Hague Conservatory. Though he later followed his teacher's example in rejecting the orchestra on social grounds (he is a very political animal), an early work includes the large-scale orchestral Babi Yar (1983); works typical of his later style – Principia (1989) and Dance Works (1993) – are written for amplified, wind-dominated ensembles. More recently, The Steve Martland Band has become the principal exponent of his work (from 1992).

Horses of Instruction

Horses of Instruction. Kick. Beat the Retreat. Mr Anderson's Pavane. Principia. Thistle of Scotland. Eternal Delight. Re-Mix. Terminal
The Steve Martland Band Ⓕ
Black Box BBM1033 (70 minutes: DDD) ●

This is a superb disc, an indispensable guide for anybody who wishes to get to know Steve Martland's music or to hear the unmistakable sound of his marvellous band. There is playing on this recording of such virtuosity that it really beggars belief, particularly in Beat the Retreat and Terminal. The title work, Horses of Instruction, is a must. It's one of those works that never fails to arouse a sense of eager anticipation, that you're about to hear something truly pleasurable, a feeling that you might expect for Four Last Songs but one that is all too rare for contemporary music. The Steve Martland Band play the piece unconducted and you sense it has become almost an emblem of the group's identity.

The composer writes movingly in the CD booklet text about his ensemble. He states that these recordings 'could not be achieved without the faith, commitment or, indeed, criticisms of a group of people whose individual and collective musicianship makes me humble'.

In a sense, Martland is right to show humility. He writes music with a directness and single-mindedness that is both its greatest strength and a potential cause of exasperation for the unconvinced listener. You hear the joins in his music and when they don't work, there's no hiding place.

What's special about the Steve Martland Band is the extent to which individual members assert ownership over the music, something symbolised by the aforementioned unconducted performance of Horses of Instruction. Take for instance Re-Mix, a transcription of viol music by Marin Marais. It's always seemed a rather shoddy piece of work on Martland's part, but the performance here, replete with klezmer-like yowling from the saxes and braying brass, is quite simply a tour de force. The same could be said for the exceptional rhythm guitar and soprano sax playing which so beguiles the ear in Terminal, a work originally composed for the rock band Spiritualized.

This recording recaptures the energy of the Steve Martland Band's performance at the Queen Elizabeth Hall in 1997, which was quite simply one of the best concerts ever.

Giuseppe Martucci Italian 1856-1909

GROVE Martucci studied at the Naples Conservatory. As a touring piano virtuoso, he won praise from Liszt and Anton Rubinstein in 1874, but from 1880-81 was professor of the piano (in 1902, director) at the Naples Conservatory. He was an enthusiastic conductor of the German (sometimes English and French) repertory in Naples and Bologna, where he was director of the Liceo Musicale (1886-1902). Besides piano music, he composed distinctive chamber works, often Schumannesque or Elgarian in their gentle lyricism and caprice (eg the popular Notturno, Op70 No 1, and Novelletta, Op 82 No 2); his attractive Second Symphony has been called 'the starting point of the renaissance of non-operatic Italian music'.

Nocturne

Martucci Nocturne, Op 70 No 1.
La canzone dei ricordi Respighi Il tramonto
Brigitte Balleys mez Lausanne Chamber Orchestra / Jésus López-Cobos
Claves CD50-9807 (51 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1997

Martucci, once director of conservatoires in both Bologna and Naples, and conductor of the first performance in Italy of Tristan, is a curious case of a composer totally unfamiliar to the UK's concert life but surprisingly well represented on disc. His warmly nostalgic and tender Nocturne would make a worthy alternative to the Mahler Adagietto or Barber's overplayed Adagio; and the seven poems of his elegiac cycle, La canzone dei ricordi are haunting examples of a refined Italian lyricism a world away from his contemporary, Puccini. The setting of Shelley's Il tramonto by Martucci's pupil Respighi is suitably poignant but more lush in texture.

The admirable Brigitte Balleys sings with her accustomed artistry, but from time to time her voice 'catches' the mike: the playing of the Lausanne Chamber Orchestra is seductively affectionate.

Pietro Mascagni Italian 1863-1945

Mascagni studied with Ponchielli and Saladino at the Milan Conservatory (1882-84), then worked as a touring conductor and wrote Guglielmo Ratcliff (c1855). His next opera was the one-act Cavalleria rusticana, which was staged in Rome in 1890 and won him immediate international acclaim: it effectively established the vogue for verismo. None of his later operas was anything like so successful, though some numbers from L'amico Fritz (1891) and the oriental Iris (1898) have survived in the repertory. Later works include the comedy Le maschere (1901), the unexpectedly powerful Il piccolo Marat (1921) and Nerone (1935), this last testifying to his identification with fascism.

Cavalleria rusticana

Renata Scotta sop Santuzza; Plácido Domingo ten Turiddu; Pablo Elvira bar Alfio; Isola Jones mez Lola; Jean Kraft mez Lucia
Ambrosian Opera Chorus; National Philharmonic Orchestra / James Levine
RCA Red Seal 74321 39500-2 (71 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Notes, text and translation included
Recorded 1978 ●

This was a strong contender in an overcrowded field when it was first released. You would be hard pressed to find either a more positive or a more intelligent Turiddu or Santuzza than Domingo or Scotto. Scotto manages to steer a precise course between being too ladylike or too melodramatic. She suggests all the remorse and sorrow of Santuzza's situation without resorting to self-pity. Her appeals to Turiddu to reform could hardly be more sincere and heartfelt, her throbbing delivery to Alfio, 'Turiddi mi tolse l'honore', expresses all her desperation when forced to betray her erstwhile lover, and her curse on Turiddu, 'A te la mala pasqua', while not resorting to the lowdown vigour of some of her rivals, is filled with venom. Domingo proved how committed he was to his role when the part was first given to him at Covent Garden in the mid-1970s. He gives an almost Caruso-like bite and attack to Turiddu's defiance and (later) remorse, and finds a more appropriate timbre than Bergonzi (for Karajan, reviewed under Leoncavallo). He also delivers the Brindisi with an appropriately carefree manner, oblivious of the challenge awaiting him. Pablo Elvira's Alfio is no more than adequate, and the other American support is indifferent.

Levine's direction, as positive as Karajan's, is yet quite different. He goes much faster, and time and again catches the passion if not always the delicacy of Mascagni's score. He is well supported by the superb National Philharmonic Orchestra. With a bright and forward recording, this reading of the work is wholly arresting.

Cavalleria rusticana (sung in English)
Nelly Miricioiu sop Santuzza; Dennis O'Neill ten Turiddu; Phillip Joll bar Alfio; Diana Montague mez Lola; Elizabeth Bainbridge mez Lucia
Geoffrey Mitchell Choir; London Philharmonic Orchestra / David Parry
Chandos Opera in English CHAN3004
(79 minutes: DDD). Notes and text included. Ⓕ
Recorded 1997

One of the most magical beginnings in opera is beautifully played here, and at this early stage one is not getting restive over the slow speeds. Dennis O'Neill sings his siciliana like a lover, with touches of an imaginative tenderness that are rare if not unique in this music. His voice distances effectively, and very effective too is the mingling of the church bells with the singing of the off-stage chorus. Santuzza, Nelly Miricioiu, must have been born in another village, but that doesn't matter; her voice has some raw patches but that also troubles less than it might as she brings such concentrated feeling to the part. On the other hand, when the Alfio arrives one can't go on saying that it doesn't matter: it does. We want a vibrant Italianate voice if possible, and a firm one at least. Elizabeth Bainbridge is a vivid Mamma Lucia, but Diana Montague, immensely welcome as a singer, has quite the wrong voice-character for Lola, who should be either the local Carmen or a shallow, pert flirt. Still, for those collecting Chandos's Opera in English series this is not to be missed. The drama keeps its hold, the grand old melodies surge, the score reveals more of its inspired detail, and the English language does itself worthwhile credit.

Jules Massenet French 1842-1912

Massenet entered the Conservatoire at the age of 11 as a piano pupil of Adolphe Laurent. He later studied harmony with Reber and composition with Ambroise Thomas, winning the Prix de Rome in 1863. In Rome he got to know Liszt and, through him, Constance de Sainte Marie, who became his pupil and, in 1866, his wife. The following year his opera La grand'tante was given at the Opéra-Comique, and in1873 Marie-Magdeleine at the Théâtre de l'Odéon initiated a series of drames sacrés based on female biblical characters. Many of his secular operas, too, are in effect portraits of women.

In 1878 Massenet was made a teacher of composition at the Conservatoire, where he remained all his life, influencing many younger French composers, including Charpentier, Koechlin, Pierné and Hahn. In his own music he began to move away from the suave, sentimental melodic style derived from Gounod and to adopt a more Wagnerian type of lyrical declamation. The change is apparent in Manon (1884), which placed Massenet in the forefront of French opera composers, and still more in Werther (1892). But as early as 1877, in Hérodiade, Massenet had begun to modify the symmetry and loosen the syntax of his melodies to give them a more speaking, intimate, conversational character. Repetitions are usually masked or transferred to the orchestra while the voice takes a lyrical recitative line in the Wagnerian manner; literal repetitions are carefully calculated to provide an insistent, emotional quality. Often his melodies have a swaying, hesitant character. By Werther, the relationship of voice and orchestra is more sophisticated, and that opera contains clear examples of Massenet's dissolution of formal melody into rhapsodic recitative-like writing as evolved by Wagner. Massenet's music is harmonically conservative, rarely venturing beyond modest chromaticisms; rhythmically, it is original in the variations he uses to give the melody a more caressing, intimate character. He had a characteristically French ear for orchestral nuance. Though primarily a lyrical composer, he was also a master of scenes of action, as for example at the opening of Manon.

After Sapho (1897) Massenet scored few major successes. His conception of opera became outdated long before his death and his position as France's leading opera composer was finally challenged when Debussy's Pelléas et Mélisande was given at the Opéra-Comique in 1902.

Ballet music

Massenet Le Cid. Scènes pittoresques. La vierge – le dernier sommeil de la vierge. Saint-Saëns Wedding Cake
City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra / Louis Frémaux
EMI Encore 575871-2 (72 minutes: ADD) Ⓑ
Recorded c1971 ●

Frémaux's Massenet collection provides most enjoyable listening. This is highly tuneful music, and it is directed with appropriate vigour and refinement as the individual numbers require. The ballet music from Le Cid is full of the authentic rhythms of Spain, and there is real excitement in such numbers as the 'Aragonaise', where the members of the CBSO respond most admirably to Frémaux's demands for dynamic variation and instrumental shading. At the quieter end of the spectrum, the delightful 'Madrilène', with its solos for cor anglais and flute, is most charmingly done. Similar sensitivity is shown throughout the contrasted Scènes pittoresques. The further inclusion of the 'Last Sleep of the Virgin' – once a Beecham lollipop – was an inspired idea. The recorded sound throughout is spacious and well balanced.

Arias

Amoureuse: Sacred and Profane Arias
La Grand' Tante – Je vais bientôt quitter. Marie Magdeleine – O mes soeurs. Eve – O nuit. La Vierge – O mon fils; Rêve infini. Hérodiade – Il est doux, il est bon. Le Cid – Plus de tourments; Pleurez mes yeux. Sapho – Ce que j'appelle beau; Solitude-demain, je partirai; Vais-je rester ici? Grisélidis – Loÿs! Loÿs! Chérubin – Vous parlez de péril. Ariane – Avec tes compagnes guerrières; Je comprends un héros! Un roi; Ils mentaient! A quoi bon. Songs – Sainte Thérèse prie; Amoureuse
Rosamund Illing sop Australian Opera and Ballet Orchestra / Richard Bonynge
Melba Recordings 301080 (75 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, texts and translations included

Most of the items here are rarities, some unpublished, all attractive. The performances are excellent: Rosamund Illing is a soprano well-known over here, but never heard on records to better advantage, and Richard Bonynge's convinced advocacy and feeling for style constitute another guarantee of value. To this should be added a proviso. Everything is tuneful in the grand, late-19th-century understanding of the word; but everything is also rather sweet on the palate. Still, for anyone in the least interested it's not a record to miss.

Among the operas, Sapho will still be unfamiliar to most, and Ariane to practically all. The three excerpts here are arias for Ariadne herself, and include the final pages with the call of the Sirens and a hauntingly plaintive B minor melody for the dying heroine, who descends into the sea holding a high A natural of heavenly softness, firm to the end.

These roles were written for a diverse range of singers, but the Australian soprano adapts easily and, except on a few slightly worn fortissimo high notes, sings most beautifully. The orchestra is recorded with vivid immediacy and makes the most of Massenet's imaginative scoring. One for the shopping list.

Don Quichotte

Don Quichotte[a]. Scènes alsaciennes[b]
Nicolai Ghiaurov bass Don Quichotte; Régine Crespin sop Dulcinée; Gabriel Bacquier bar Sancho Panza; Michèle Command sop Pedro; Annick Dutertre sop Garcias; Peyo Garazzi ten Rodriguez; Jean-Marie Fremeau ten Juan
[a]Suisse Romande Chorus and Orchestra / Kazimierz Kord; [b]National Philharmonic Orchestra / Richard Bonynge
Decca ② 430 636-2DM2 (133 minutes: ADD).
Notes, text and translation included. Ⓜ
Recorded 1978 ●

This heroic comedy was Massenet's last big success (in 1910, when he was 68). People who think of him as only a salon composer should listen to the start of Act 1, set in a Spanish town square at fiesta time; the opening music bursts out of the loudspeakers like that of Verdi's Otello, although here the mood is joyous, with tremendous rhythmic verve and gusto. In fact, this opera is closer to Verdi's Falstaff, with the same admixture of gentler serious moments amidst the comic bustle and intrigue, and of course, here again the central character is a comic yet lovable figure. The recording, made in 1978, still sounds well although orchestral detail could be clearer. As for the performance by mainly Swiss forces under Kazimierz Kord, and with a Bulgarian bass in the title-role, one can only praise it for its idiomatic realisation of a 'Spanish' opera by a gifted French composer for the theatre. Though Régine Crespin may be too mature vocally for Dulcinée, she sings splendidly and few will find this a serious weakness. Nicolai Ghiaurov rightly makes Quixote himself a real person, touching and dignified as well as comic, and Gabriel Bacquier gives a rounded portrayal of his servant Sancho Panza, so that Quixote's death scene in the company of his old friend comes across as particularly strong. The lively and tuneful Scènes alsaciennes with Bonynge make a fine fill-up.

Hérodiade

Nadine Denize mez Hérodiade; Cheryl Studer sop Salomé; Ben Heppner ten Jean; Thomas Hampson bar Hérode; José van Dam bass-bar Phanuel; Marcel Vanaud bar Vitellius; Jean-Philippe Courtis bass High Priest; Martine Olmeda mez Young Babylonian; Jean-Paul Fouchécourt ten Voice in the Temple
Toulouse Capitole Chorus and Orchestra / Michel Plasson
EMI ③ 555378-2 (166 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, text and translation included
Recorded 1994 ●

Written in 1880, Hérodiade is typical of the early grand operas with which Massenet courted popularity. It offers five magnificent roles to singers who have the wherewithal to make the most of them, with some glorious show-pieces which are – as always with Massenet – gratefully written for the voice.

Michel Plasson conducts the opera uncut and has the advantage of a good studio recording. He is not one for taking an objective view of the music and there are times when he rushes frenetically ahead, as if he is as possessed by the lurid goings-on in the drama as the characters on stage. The sense of atmosphere is palpable. In Plasson's hands the heavy chords at the opening of Act 3 resound with a potent mysticism that presages Klingsor's castle (Massenet knew his Wagner too). In fact, we are at the dwelling of Phanuel the sorcerer, a less threatening proposition. José van Dam is marvellous in this big solo, leaning on the opening words of 'Dors, ô cité perverse' with a sinister gleam in his voice that sends shivers down one's back. Silvery pure in tone, Studer's Salomé throws herself into the drama with lustful abandon and Heppner phrases the music with remarkable breadth and seems to have heroic top notes to spare.

Manon

Massenet Manon[a] Berlioz Les nuits d'été, Op 7[b] 🄷
Debussy La damoiselle élue[c]
Victoria de los Angeles sop Manon; [c]Carol Smith mez; [a]Henri Legay ten Des Grieux; [a]Michel Dens bar Lescaut; [a]Jean Borthayre bass Comte des Grieux; [a]Jean Vieuille bar De Brétigny; [a]René Hérent ten Guillot; [a]Liliane Berton sop Poussette; [a]Raymonde Notti sop Javotte; [a]Marthe Serres sop Rosette; [c]Radcliffe Choral Society; Boston Symphony Orchestra / Charles Munch; [a]Opéra-Comique Choir and Orchestra / Pierre Monteux
Testament mono ③ SBT3203 (213 minutes: ADD). Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded in 1955 ●●

As EMI now has its highly praised new set of Manon with Gheorghiu and Alagna, it has fallen to Testament to bring back this earlier HMV set. Compared to its previous CD release, the sound here has been carefully restored with greatly reduced hiss, a less wiry treble and firmer bass – a successful facelift for a Manon who no longer sounds her age.

Recorded in mono in 1955, the set fell at a unique point in the opera's history on disc. Previous recordings from the 78rpm era had captured the special Opéra-Comique spirit for posterity, but they hold limited sonic appeal to present-day collectors; later recordings have up-to-date sound, but their international casts generally cannot claim the same sense of style. Only with this 1955 set do we get the best of both worlds.

Already at the time a practised exponent of Manon on stage, de los Angeles makes a vivid heroine, allowing us to see every expression passing across her face, almost as if we were watching a video. Maybe the role lies a little high for her, but de los Angeles surprised herself on the day of recording by hitting the high D in the Cours-la-Reine scene. Monteux's skill in his native French repertoire is second to none, and he brings exemplary sparkle to the music. It would be possible to find fault with various members of the supporting cast, but that is to miss the point. They sing with a grace and wit that nobody from outside the Opéra-Comique tradition can replicate easily. Henri Legay did not have a great tenor voice, but the poetry and the passion of Des Grieux come as second nature to him. Michel Dens' lively Lescaut and Jean Borthayre's serious Comte des Grieux are no less idiomatic; and the delectably perfumed Guillot of René Hérent is a collector's item in the best sense of the term, as he had been singing this role with the company since his début in 1918.

There is now a clear choice between this reissue and EMI's fine new Pappano set. Opera collectors will probably want both.

Manon
Angela Gheorghiu sop Manon; Roberto Alagna ten Des Grieux; Earle Patriarco bar Lescaut; José van Dam bass-bar Comte des Grieux; Nicolas Rivenq bar De Brétigny; Gilles Ragon ten Guillot; Anna Maria Panzarella sop Poussette; Sophie Koch mez Javotte; Susanne Schimmack mez Rosette; Nicolas Cavallier bar Innkeeper;

Chorus and Symphony Orchestra of La Monnaie / Antonio Pappano
EMI ③ 557005-2 (163 minutes: DDD). Ⓕ
Notes, text and translation included.
Recorded 1999 ○○○

EMI has had the good sense to build this set around Pappano's own company at La Monnaie, a Francophone group of singers who give an authentic flavour that non-French-speaking performers cannot hope to match. The piece is given absolutely complete, including the ballet (splendidly played).

Nothing of the myriad character of Massenet's popular work escapes Pappano's eye and ear. He has a near-perfect idea of how to pace the score and he persuades his orchestra and chorus to play and sing with the utmost respect for pertinent detail, so important in Massenet, and to follow, as do the soloists, the many expressive markings demanded by the composer.

Gheorghiu's is a Manon to savour in practically every respect. Suitably coquettish in her first solo, she turns ruminative, plangent for her second, 'Voyons, Manon'. The farewell to her little table is inward and pensive, tone subtly shaded with the 'larmes dans la voix' so admired in native French singers. To the Gavotte and the recitative preceding it, Gheorghiu brings the outward aplomb and, in the second verse, the hint of sadness required. The prayer at St Sulpice has all the urgency and the sense of apprehension as to how Des Grieux, now a servant of the church, will respond to her. Throughout these solos, Gheorghiu prudently follows Massenet's scrupulous instructions as to dynamics and phrasing with unforgettable results, not to mention the sheer glory of her singing, outclassing her compatriot, the sensitive Ileana Cotrubas, who recorded the role for Plasson too late in her career.

If Alagna doesn't quite equal his wife's example, he is an ardent, French-sounding Des Grieux, always suggesting the Chevalier's obsessive love for his 'Sphinx étonnant'. The Dream, finely phrased as it is, hasn't quite the individuality that Ansseau, Heddle Nash (in the famous pre-war broadcast now on Dutton) or Gedda and others, brought to it, mainly because his tone has become a shade occluded. At St Sulpice, it rings out more truly. 'Ah fuyez, douce image' begins in nicely reflective fashion and the B flat climaxes are suitably impassioned. In most respects he surpasses the ageing Kraus for Plasson, even when he isn't quite as elegant.

Earle Patriarco, a young American baritone, proves an excellent Lescaut, keen with the text and properly cynical in manner. Still better is José van Dam as Le Comte (he sang the part for Plasson), words shaped so meaningfully onto tone, his spoken contribution faultlessly timed.

All the smaller parts are enthusiastically taken, small decorations on a masterly interpretation. Given an exemplary recording for balance and presence, this set is about as good as you'll get today (or maybe any day) of this adorable piece.

Many will have an affection for the 1956 EMI set with Victoria de los Angeles's nonpareil of a Manon and Monteux as her elegant conductor, but the work is cut, the recording is dated. This new version is the one to introduce a new generation to a work of which Beecham declared: 'I would give up all the Brandenburgs for Manon and would think that I had profited by the exchange.'

Manon

Ileana Cotrubas sop Manon; Alfredo Kraus ten Des Grieux; Gino Quilico bar Lescaut; José van Dam bass-bar Comte des Grieux; Jean-Marie Frémeau bar De Brétigny; Charles Burles ten Guillot; Ghyslaine Raphanel sop Poussette; Colette Alliot-Lugaz sop Javotte; Martine Mahé mez Rosette; Jacques Loreau bar Innkeeper Toulouse Capitole Chorus and Orchestra / Michel Plasson
EMI ③ 749610-2 (154 minutes: DDD). Notes, Ⓕ
text and translation included. Recorded 1982

Plasson's version of Massenet's most popular opera would be hard to improve upon. The performance is a genuine piece of company-work, particularly welcome as the company is French and can call upon such gifted singers as Colette Alliot-Lugaz and Charles Burles to take principal supporting roles. Excellent are the brother and father, frequently underestimated as both singing and acting parts but here played with distinction of voice and style by Gino Quilico and José van Dam. It is with the two leading roles that some qualifications have to be introduced among the general praise. Manon and Des Grieux, whatever their sins, have youth on their side, which is something Ileana Cotrubas and Alfredo Kraus in 1982 could not quite claim. Kraus is still marvellously clear in tone, firm in production and resonant throughout his extensive range, but he has developed a way of allowing the emotion to take too external a form of expression and occasionally the music requires a somewhat richer timbre. Cotrubas is usually fine until a high note approaches, affecting the ease and steadiness – and sometimes the charm – of her singing. Even so, both give deeply felt, extressively nuanced performances, presenting genuine characers and not stereotypes. Plasson conducts a performance that is both vigorous and delicate, and production and recorded sound are excellent.

Thaïs

Renée Fleming sop Thaïs; Thomas Hampson bar Athanaël; Giuseppe Sabbatini ten Nicias; Estefano Palatchi bass Palémon; Marie Devellereau sop Crobyle; Isabelle Cals mez Myrtale; Enkelejda Shkosa mez Albine; Elisabeth Vidal sop La Charmeuse; David Grousset bass Servant; Bordeaux Opera Chorus; Bordeaux-Aquitaine National Orchestra / Yves Abel
Decca ② 466 766-2DHO2 (147 minutes: DDD). Ⓕ
Text and translation included
Recorded 1997-98 ○○

At last – a modern recording of Thaïs with a soprano who can sing the title-role. Heaven knows why it took so long. All we need on disc is a soprano with a fabulously beautiful voice, idiomatic French, a sensuous legato, pure high notes up to a stratospheric top D, and the ability to leave every listener weak at the knees. Where was the problem?

Renée Fleming makes it all sound so easy. Her success a couple of years ago at the Opéra Bastille in Paris with Massenet's Manon showed that she has an affinity for this composer. As Thaïs, a role with a similar vocal profile, she proves equally well cast. Within minutes of her entrance it is clear that neither of the other sets from the last 25 years will be able to touch her. Fleming simply has a vocal class that puts her in a different league from the unsteady Beverly Sills on Maazel's EMI set or the outrageously voiceless Anna Moffo on the now long-forgotten set from RCA (nla). There is just enough individuality in her singing to give Fleming's Thaïs a personality of her own, and vocal loveliness brings a bloom to her every scene.

The Athanaël she leaves behind is Thomas Hampson, who is her match in sensitivity and roundness of tone. Their duet at the oasis in the desert is beautifully sung, every word clear, every phrase shaped with feeling. If only Hampson were equally good at getting beneath the skin of the operatic characters he plays. In the case of Athanaël there is plenty of psychological complexity down there to uncover, but Hampson seems unwilling to engage the character's dark side.

Occasionally, one regrets that Abel does not have the New Philharmonia at his disposal, as Maazel does, but the subtlety of colour and accent that he draws from the Orchestre National Bordeaux-Aquitaine are a world apart from Maazel's constant up-front aggression. The famous 'Méditation', elegantly played by the young French violinist Renaud Capuçon, and featuring swoony background chorus is a dream. Add in a first-class Decca recording and it will be clear that this new Thaïs has pretty well everything going for it.

Werther

José Carreras ten Werther; Frederica von Stade mez Charlotte; Thomas Allen bar Albert; Isobel Buchanan sop Sophie; Robert Lloyd bass Bailli; Malcolm King bass Bailli's friend; Paul Crook ten Bailli's friend; Linda Humphries sop Kätchen; Donaldson Ball bar Brühlmann

Royal Opera House Orchestra, Covent Garden; Children's Choir / Sir Colin Davis

Philips ② 416 654-2PH2 (131 minutes: AAD/ADD) Ⓕ

Notes, text and translation included

Recorded 1980 ●●●

The ebb and flow of word and music, the warm, tremulous life of the string playing, and the pacing of each tableau vivant is handled so superbly by Sir Colin Davis that there is not a single moment of longueur. The Royal Opera House orchestra plays at its very best: the solo detail and the velocity of its every response to Massenet's flickering orchestral palette operates as though with heightened awareness under the scrutiny of the laser beam. The casting polarizes this Werther and this Charlotte. José Carreras is very much a Werther of action rather than of dream, of impetuous self-destruction rather than of brooding lyricism. The real élan he brings to lines like 'Rêve! Rêve! Extase! Bonheur!' is more impressive than the conjuring of 'l'air d'un paradis', where the voice can be over-driven at the top. So far as style, line and inflection are concerned, Frederica von Stade's performance can hardly be faulted. Her voice is the very incarnation of Charlotte's essential simplicity of character; but there are times when one could perhaps wish for a darker tinta to find the shadows in the role, and to bring a greater sense of the undercurrent of emotional conflict as it grows towards the last two acts. Thomas Allen finds unusual breadth in this Albert, noting the slightest giveaway flutter in the line: when he sings 'j'en ai tant au fond du coeur' one does actually begin to believe that there may be depths there of which one is too often kept ignorant. Isobel Buchanan's is a small-scale and a straightforward Sophie, a real 'oiseau d'aurore'.

Werther

Patricia Petibon sop Sophie; Angela Gheorghiu mez Charlotte; Roberto Alagna ten Werther; Jean-Paul Fouchécourt ten Schmidt; Thomas Hampson bar Albert; Jean-Philippe Courtis bass Magistrate; Jean-Marie Frémeau bass Johann

London Symphony Orchestra / Antonio Pappano

EMI ② 556820-2 (128 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Notes, text and translation included ●

Alagna is the first French-speaking tenor to record the role for a long time and his diction throughout is clear and full of emotion. At the climax of his big aria, 'Pourquoi me reveiller?' in Act 3, he sings 'O souffle du printemps?' with a beautiful head tone. And he can't resist singing it full out the second time around – just as Alfredo Kraus and many others often did.

Whether or not Angela Gheorghiu would be suitably cast as Charlotte on stage, she makes a vivid impression on disc. The obvious comparisons with Gheorghiu are two other sopranos who have recorded the part, Ninon Vallin in the historic set under Cohen, and Victoria de los Angeles in the Prêtre version, itself now sounding close to historic. But both Vallin and de los Angeles were also Carmens – on disc at least – and both sound more mature as characters than Gheorghiu does.

The sound on this new recording is fine, the conducting of Pappano taut and passionate. But, oh dear, what a lot of recordings of Werther there are now to choose from. The historic Cohen is probably the most completely satisfying version. Not everyone, however, wants to listen to historic mono. Amongst the new Werthers the Pappano scores mostly because of Alagna's heroic assumption of the title-role.

Werther

Jerry Hadley ten Werther; Anne Sofie von Otter mez Charlotte; Gérard Théruel bar Albert; Dawn Upshaw sop Sophie; Jean-Marie Frémeau bar Magistrate; Gilles Ragon ten Schmidt, Brühlmann; Frédéric Caton bass Johann; Geneviève Marchand sop Kätchen

Chorus and Orchestra of the Opéra National de Lyon / Kent Nagano

Erato ② 0630-17790-2 (121 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ

Notes text and translation included. Recorded 1995

The opening scene of this recording promises very well; the orchestra certainly knows how to play Massenet, and Nagano avoids the extremes of quasi-verismo style that can mar this essay in masochistic, unrequited passion. Jerry Hadley suggests convincingly the impulsive, romantic young poet. As Charlotte, Anne Sofie von Otter has just the right balance between sounding young (she's meant to be 20) but emotionally mature. She and von Stade (Davis) are among the finest interpreters of the role. Dawn Upshaw makes a very positive, flirty Sophie and Gérard Théruel a good Albert. There is a grandeur about the Davis recording which this version doesn't quite attain. However, von Otter and Hadley sound every bit as dramatic, but in a more intimate, neurotic way.

Nicholas Maw

British 1935

GROVE Maw studied with Berkeley at the Royal Academy of Music (1955-58) and Boulanger and Deutsch in Paris (1958-59). He has taught in England and the USA. His music represents the extension of a solid tonal tradition, traceable back through Britten, Tippett, Bartók and Strauss, all influences on a style of fresh vigour. Among his works are two comic operas, One Man Show (1964) and The Rising of the Moon (1970), orchestral pieces and chamber music. His monumental orchestral work Odyssey was given in 1987.

Violin Concerto

Joshua Bell vn

London Philharmonic Orchestra / Sir Roger Norrington Ⓕ

Sony Classical SK62856 (42 minutes: DDD) ●

For over a quarter-of-a-century, Maw has been investigating those lines of musical development that were left dangling when modernism cut them. He's not so much writing 'neo-Brahms' or 'neo-Strauss' as exploring the enticing paths that they opened up but which post-Schoenbergians have not pursued. The enormous orchestral Odyssey that he began in the early 1970s (impressively recorded by Sir Simon Rattle and the City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra on EMI) has had many satellites and successors, but the roots of his mature style have never been clearer than in this concerto, written for a virtuoso of the most archetypally romantic instrument of them all. It is a concerto that Joseph Joachim would have loved as much as Joshua Bell so evidently does. Full of warmly eloquent melody, the concerto is fundamentally lyrical in all four of its movements, but there is vital energy too, plentiful opportunity for sparkling virtuosity, many beautifully expressive orchestral solos and, in the Scherzo and finale especially, magnificently rich multi-layered climaxes. The performance is remarkably fine, the recording clean but not clinical. A violin concerto for all who love the violin and its music.

Hymnus

Hymnus[a]. Little Concert[b]. Shahnama[b]

[a]Oxford Bach Choir; [a]BBC Concert Orchestra, [b]Britten Sinfonia / Nicholas Cleobury Ⓕ

ASV CDDCA1070 (74 minutes: DDD).

Hymnus is firmly rooted in the tradition of large-scale English choral works, full of luminous harmonies, rich choral textures and fine, eminently singable lines. The music is compelling, accessible and distinctive and the choral writing clearly designed to be demanding yet well within the scope of a large amateur choral society. Maw wrote it in 1996 to mark the centenary of the 200-voice Oxford Bach Choir and, as it was intended primarily to display a large chorus, there are no solo parts and the orchestral accompaniment is relatively discreet. The net result of this is that the choir has virtually no respite throughout the work's 33-minute duration, which probably accounts for the sense of tiredness and strain that permeates this recording. Climaxes (and there are a great many of those in the work) appear to overstretch the choir while the gentler passages fail to exhibit the kind of precision and polish which characterises the choir's live performances. The BBC Concert Orchestra also seems to be lacking that final polish, but much of this may well be attributed to a strangely boxy and claustrophobic recording. It is a splendid work and there are some worthy performers, all of which deserve rather better than this.

The other two works on the disc more than compensate for any shortcomings to be found in Hymnus. Nicholas Daniel produces an amazing range of moods and colours – from the exquisitely lyrical to the robustly athletic – in the Little Concert for oboe, two horns and strings, while the atmospheric and evocative Shahnama, nine brief movements inspired by an 11th-century Persian epic, is beautifully captured in Nicholas Cleobury's nicely spaced and tautly directed performance.

La Vita Nuova

Ghost Dances. La Vita Nuova. Roman Canticle
Carmen Pelton sop William Sharp bar
Twentieth Century Consort / Christopher Kendall
ASV CDDCA999 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1995

Maw's originality may not be the kind that leaps up and yells in your face; but original he certainly is. He can draw on influences as diverse as Britten and Richard Strauss in La Vita Nuova, blend elements of Schoenberg's Pierrot and Stravinsky's Petrushka with the sounds of Latin American and African folk instruments in Ghost Dances, and still come up with something that feels like nobody else. The sound of the soprano's sultry tonal phrases in La Vita Nuova is a long way from the eerie tone of the African Kalimba at the end of Ghost Dances – beautifully described by Malcolm MacDonald in his notes as 'like a phantom piano played with a bony finger'. And yet in context they are obviously the same composer: a romantic with a fertile imagination and a superb technical palate, who clearly delights in enticing and surprising the ear. The performances are of outstanding warmth and finesse. The sound world of La Vita Nuova emerges with such richness and depth that it's hard to believe that only 10 instruments are playing and Carmen Pelton has a strong sense of the way the vocal lines soar and dip over long periods. William Sharp is eloquent and quite distinct throughout the short Roman Canticle. And everything in Ghost Dances seems as clear as it should be, with no loss of atmosphere – an excellent recording. It adds up to a perfect introduction to a composer who offers genuine, long-term rewards, not instant, transient gratification.

Billy Mayerl

British 1902-1959

Mayerl studied in the junior department of Trinity College of Music (1914-19) and worked as a pianist for silent filme and in hotel bands playing American popular music. His first composition Egyptian Suite was published in 1919. In 1921 he joined Bert Ralton's band (later called the Savoy Havana Band) which regularly broadcast in the early years of the BBC. In 1926 he left that band for the music hall and founded his own school of music which pioneered teaching by post, using records. With Nippy (1930) his career moved to music theatre and he composed and directed several musical comedies which were successful at the time. He was a regular broadcaster before World War Two but the War marked the end of his celebrity. He continued as a performer despite ill health and was editor of The Light Music Magazine (1957-58).

Solo keyboard works

Mayerl Crystal Clear. Orange Blossom. Piano Exaggerations. Pastorale Exotique. Wistaria. Canaries' Serenade. Shy Ballerina. Puppets Suite, Op 77. Piano Transcriptions – Body and Soul; Deep Henderson; Tormented; Sing, you sinners; Cheer up; Have you forgotten?; The object of my affection; Is it true what they say about Dixie?; I need you; Love was born; I'm at your service Parkin Mayerl Shots, Sets 1 and 2. A Tribute to Billy Mayerl
Eric Parkin pf
Priory PRCD544 (80 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995

Nobody since the master himself has come anywhere near Parkin's easy technical mastery and fastidious musicianship in this delightful music. Some pianists hit the more demanding pieces quite hard: Parkin, like Mayerl, knows better and his playing is consistently light and subtle. This has always been his approach, allied to a faultless sense of pace and rhythm. However, Mayerl, apart from perfecting the piano novelty, also contributed to the English pastoral tradition, which Parkin knows equally well. Shy Ballerina is charmingly done with rubato which would be quite out of place in Mayerl's numbers. The three-movement Puppets Suite is a tour de force.

As a bonus on this generous CD Parkin adds two sets of his own pieces called Mayerl Shots. He explains that, as a result of practising lots of Mayerl, further ideas surfaced spontaneously in a similar idiom. These are all fluent tributes and there are even quotations for the specialists. The piano sound is sharp and clear. Essential listening.

Mayerl Scallywag. Jasmine. Oriental. Minuet for Pamela. Fascinating Ditty. Funny Peculiar. Chopsticks. Carminetta. Mignonette. Penny Whistle. Piano Transcriptions – Me and my girl; Blue velvet; Sittin' on the edge of my chair; The pompous gremlin; My heaven in the pines; Alabamy bound; Stardust; Please handle with care; Two lovely people; Two hearts on a tree; You're the reason why. Studies in Syncopation, Op 55 – Nos 7, 10, 14, 15 and 18
Parkin Mayerl Shots, Set 3
Eric Parkin pf
Priory PRCD565 (76 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995

This release, 'Scallywag', has its own discoveries, notably the Studies in Syncopation, which parallel Bartók's Mikrokosmos in this field. There are three books of six pieces each, dating from 1930-31, and Parkin plays five of them, proving that they are not just exercises but real music. There are gems in the transcriptions – Carmichael's Stardust, Mayerl's own 'You're the reason why' from his 1934 show Sporting Love, and a forgotten but lovely tune by Peter York called Two hearts on a tree. The Spanish Carminetta is Mayerl's equivalent of Joplin's Solace. And there is real comedy – totally appreciated and effectively realized by Parkin – in Chopsticks and Penny Whistle.

In addition, Eric Parkin gives us his own response to Mayerl in a similar idiom – a third set of his Mayerl Shots. The recording is adequate although there is occasionally some background noise.

Piano Transcriptions, Volume 3

There's a small hotel; The mood that I'm in; So rare; I'm always in the mood for you; Turkey in the straw; For only you; Thanks for the memory; The Highland Swing; I got love; Amoresque; There's rain in my eyes; Patty cake, patty cake, baker man; Blame it on my last affair; I have eyes; Like a cat with a mouse; Phil the Fluter's Ball; Fools rush in; Peg o' my heart; All the things you are; The Musical Earwig; Transatlantic Lullaby; Tell me I'm forgiven; Japanese Juggler; Poor little rich girl
Eric Parkin pf
Priory PRCD468 (63 minutes: DDD). Ⓕ
Recorded 1993

This is pure 1930s music. This is not Mayerl as the lightning-fingered whizz-kid of the 1920s, although many of the transcriptions are tricky enough: it's the style he taught through the Billy Mayerl School of Music, a success story here and abroad until the war. These transcriptions – popular songs of the period arranged in Mayerl's inimitable English accent – are a wonderful encapsulation of an era and they transcend it – as long as they are played like this. The demands on the performer are similar to studying the style of the period at any time. Classically trained pianists have to work hard to play Joplin, Gershwin and Mayerl. But Mayerl belongs to them, as long as their left hand is strong enough, because this is basically a notated tradition rather than an improvised one. Parkin understands it all – the effortless lilt, the light touch, not too much pedal, nothing overdone, everything speaking for itself.

John McCabe British 1939

GROVE McCabe studied at the Royal Manchester College and with Genzmer in Munich, then returned to England to work as a pianist, critic and composer; in 1983 he became director of the London College of Music. His works, in an extended tonal style relating to Hartmann and Nielsen, include three symphonies (1965, 1971, 1978), much other orchestral music, chamber and keyboard pieces.

Edward II

Royal Ballet Sinfonia / Barry Wordsworth
Hyperion ② CDA67135 (114 minutes: DDD). Ⓕ
Recorded 1999 ●

Commissioned by the Stuttgart Ballet, choreographed by David Bintley and first given in April 1995, Edward II is the third of McCabe's ballet scores and draws its story-line from Christopher Marlowe's eponymous drama and the medieval courtly satire, Le roman de Fauvel. Quite apart from the meaty intrigue, complex character relationships and psychological pathos of the plot, McCabe's music communicates with an expressive fervour that is captivating. It's not just the superbly judged orchestration (colourful extras include triple woodwind and electric guitar) and wealth of memorable invention that impress. Above all, it's McCabe's ability to forge his tightly knit material into a dramatically convincing and organically coherent whole that marks him out as a composer of exceptional gifts. No praise can be too high for Barry Wordsworth's fluent, pungently theatrical direction, not to mention the unstinting application of the excellent Royal Ballet Sinfonia (which has truly assimilated McCabe's idiom into its bloodstream). Tony Faulkner's excitingly truthful Walthamstow sound allies razor-sharp focus to a most pleasing bloom, too.

Symphony No 4

Symphony No 4, 'Of Time and the River'
Flute Concerto[a]
[a]Emily Beynon fl BBC Symphony Orchestra / Vernon Handley Ⓕ
Hyperion CDA67089 (56 minutes: DDD) ●

John McCabe's Fourth Symphony, some half an hour in duration, has something Sibelian about its utterly inevitable, ever-evolving progress. Behind the frequently prodigal surface activity, one is acutely aware of the inexorable tread of a grander scheme – a preoccupation with time mirrored in Thomas Wolfe's novel Of Time and the River, from which the work derives its subtitle. The very opening idea is momentarily reminiscent of Britten, and there's a magnificent passage in the second movement that recalls Vaughan Williams at his visionary best. Yet McCabe's score possesses a strong individuality, formal elegance and abundant integrity too. With dedication and scrupulous perception, Handley secures a disciplined and alert response from the BBC SO. The engaging Flute Concerto composed for James Galway in 1989-90 proves both resourceful and communicative. There is much that genuinely haunts here, not least the gently lapping opening idea (inspired by watching the play of waves on a Cornish beach), the ravishing dialogue between the soloist and orchestral flutes and the delightful emergence soon afterwards of an entrancingly naive, folk-like theme (heard again on alto flute at the pensive close, magically fading into the ether). Emily Beynon gives a flawless account of the demanding solo part, and is immaculately partnered by Handley and his BBC forces.

String Quartets

String Quartets Nos 3-5
Vanbrugh Quartet (Gregory Ellis, Elizabeth

Charleson vns Simon Aspell va Christopher Marwood vc)
Hyperion CDA67078 (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1998

John McCabe's Third Quartet has both fastidious craft and satisfying logic to commend it, its five movements laid out to form an elegant arch in three parts. The sheer resourcefulness with which McCabe handles his material calls to mind the towering example of such figures as Bartók, Bridge, Britten and Simpson (yes, the music really is that rewarding!), while anyone who loves the Tippett quartets will surely recognise a kindred humanity and tumbling lyricism in, say, the memorable Lento episode which launches the 'Passacaglia' finale.

The Fourth Quartet dates from three years later (1982) and was composed in joint celebration of two birthdays, namely the Delmé Quartet's 20th and Joseph Haydn's 250th. Cast in one movement and lasting just under 20 minutes, the spectral unison theme heard at the outset fuels nine formidably inventive and contrasting variations, whose ever-evolving progress and ambitious emotional scope again repay the closest scrutiny (an enormous pleasure in a performance as cogent as the present one).

A viewing of Graham Sutherland's The Bees (a series of copper etchings) provided the impulse for McCabe's Fifth Quartet (1989). Uncompromising in its relentless organic growth, the Fifth none the less yields a most ingratiating lyrical flow and vaulting grace. It is, in fact, the most immediately approachable of Hyperion's valuable clutch and, like its colleagues, must be deemed a major addition to the catalogue. The Cork-based Vanbrugh Quartet proves to be an inspirational protagonist, its performances being both flawlessly prepared and magnificently authoritative.

Nikolay Medtner

Russian 1880-1951

GROVE Medtner studied the piano under Safonov at the Moscow Conservatory (1897-1900) and had composition lessons with Arensky and Taneyev, though was mostly self-taught. In 1921 he left Russia. He settled in Paris (1925-35), but was out of sympathy with musical developments there and found a more receptive audience in London, where he spent his last 16 years. He belonged in the line of Russian composer-pianists, though his music is close too to the Schumann-Brahms tradition. His works include three piano concertos (1918, 1927, 1943), much solo piano music, three violin sonatas and songs.

Piano Concertos

No 1 in C minor, Op 33; No 2 in C minor, Op 50; No 3 in E minor, Op 60

Piano Concerto No 1. Piano Quintet in C, Op posth
Dmitri Alexeev pf
New Budapest Quartet (András Kiss, Ferenc Balogh vns Laszlo Barsony va Karoly Botvay vc)
BBC Symphony Orchestra / Alexander Lazarev
Hyperion CDA66744 (59 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1994

For Dmitri Alexeev the First Concerto is Medtner's masterpiece, an argument he sustains in a performance of superb eloquence and discretion. Even the sort of gestures later vulgarized and traduced by Tinseltown are given with an aristocratic quality, a feel for a love of musical intricacy that takes on an almost symbolic force, but also for Medtner's dislike of display. Time and again Alexeev makes you pause to reconsider Medtner's quality, and his reserve brings distinctive reward. The early Abbandonamente ma non troppo has a haunting improvisatory inwardness and later, as the storm clouds gather ominously at 11'55", his playing generates all the necessary electricity. How thankful one is, too, for Alexeev's advocacy of the Piano Quintet where, together with his fully committed colleagues, the New Budapest Quartet, he recreates music of the strangest, most unworldly exultance and introspection. Instructions such as poco tranquillo (sereno) and Quasi Hymn take us far away from the turbulence of the First Concerto (composed in the shadow of the First World War) and the finale's conclusion is wonderfully uplifting. The recordings are judiciously balanced in both works, and the BBC Symphony Orchestra under Lazarev are fully sympathetic.

Awards 1992

Piano Concertos Nos 2 and 3
Nikolai Demidenko pf BBC Scottish Symphony Orchestra / Jerzy Maksymiuk
Hyperion CDA66580 (74 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1991 ○○○

This splendid disc is given a fine recording, good orchestral playing from a Scottish orchestra under a Polish conductor and, above all, truly coruscating and poetic playing from the brilliant young Russian pianist Nikolai Demidenko. Medtner was a contemporary and friend of Rachmaninov; he settled in Britain in the 1930s, and like Rachmaninov he was an excellent pianist. But while the other composer became immensely popular, Medtner languished in obscurity, regarded as an inferior imitation of Rachmaninov who wrote gushing music that was strong on gestures but weak on substance. The fact is that he can be diffuse (not to say long-winded) and grandiose, and memorable tunes are in short supply, so that his music needs to be played well to come off. When it is, there is much to enjoy, as here in Demidenko's hypnotically fiery and articulate accounts.

Piano Concertos Nos 2 and 3 H
Arabesque in A minor, Op 7 No 2.
Fairy Tale in F minor, Op 26 No 3

Nikolay Medtner pf
Philharmonia Orchestra / Issay Dobrowen
Testament mono SBT1027 (77 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1947

The strong Russian flavour of the ornate writing is evident, as is the composer's masterly understanding of the piano. Listening to the composer himself in the Second's first molto cantabile a tempo, ma expressivo or the Third's dolce cantabile is to be made doubly aware of his haunting and bittersweet lyricism. The streaming figuration in the Second Concerto's Romanza is spun off with deceptive ease, a reminder that while Medtner despised obvious pyrotechnics he was a superb pianist. Two exquisitely played encores are included (the ambiguous poetry of the A minor Arabesque could be by no other composer), and the 1947 recordings have been superbly remastered.

Piano Concertos – No 1 in C minor, Op 33;
No 3 in E minor, Op 60
Konstantin Scherbakov pf Moscow Symphony Orchestra / Vladimir Ziva
Naxos 8 553359 (70 minutes: DDD). Ⓕ
Recorded 1996 ●

With this recording Naxos completes its Medtner concerto cycle with Scherbakov. To have such Romantic richness – once the province of specialists – offered on a bargain label is cause for celebration in itself; to have it performed and recorded with such tireless commitment is a double blessing. That said, the performances on the first disc suffered from the soloist's poetic parsimony and an oppressive ill-balance from Naxos. But this second disc is successful on all counts. Scherbakov, praised by Richter and recently hailed as a 'modern Rachmaninov', is now more attuned to Medtner's widely fluctuating idiom, complementing his unquestioned virtuosity with inwardness and conviction. Sample the passage beginning at 6'30" in the Third Concerto's finale and you will hear the sort of eloquence that warms the hearts of all true Russians.

Commissioned by Moiseiwitsch, an early and courageous champion of Medtner's genius, the Third Concerto, subtitled 'Ballade', flows like some primeval river of the imagination, its burgeoning course inspired by Lermontov's Water Spirit, while the First Concerto's often epic gestures blend a bittersweet Russian Romanticism with themes of an almost Elgarian cut. Scherbakov's agility at, say, the con moto (8'38") is never at the expense of a composer whose bravura is always poetically motivated, and so all lovers of Romantic piano concertos need look no further.

There is stiff competition from Alexeev in the First Concerto, to an even greater extent from the Gramophone Award-winning Demidenko in the Third (both Hyperion) and, of course, from the composer himself in the Second and Third Concertos. Yet even at this exalted level Scherbakov more than holds his own.

Violin Sonatas

No 1 in B minor, Op 21; No 2 in G, Op 44;
No 3 in E minor, Op 57, 'Epica'

Violin Sonatas Nos 1 and 2
Lydia Mordkovitch vn Geoffrey Tozer pf
Chandos CHAN9293 (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1993 ●

Mordkovitch's readings emphasise a lyrical and relaxed approach, and this is particularly so in the lyrical first movement of the short, attractive First Sonata – a little too relaxed perhaps in the outer sections of the lilting second movement 'Danza'. Elsewhere (for instance the Allegro appassionato and Finale-Rondo of the Second Sonata), Mordkovitch has an intuitive grasp of structure, allowing the music to unfold with a high degree of ease and direction. These artists are persuasive interpreters of these works and can be strongly recommended to the first-time explorer. Recorded sound is warm and balanced.

Medtner Violin Sonata No 3
Ravel Violin Sonata
Vadim Repin vn Boris Berezovsky pf
Erato 0630-15110-2 (61 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996

Of Medtner's three sonatas this is perhaps the most intricately worked and, at over 40 minutes, certainly the most substantial. At times it seems almost too long for its own good and for that reason it needs a very persuasive and masterly performance in order to project its strengths. Fortunately this one is about as persuasive as you can get – Repin is lyrical and passionate and has plenty of fiery temperament for this music, and he is ideally complemented by Berezovsky's equally splendid playing. Much is made of the sonata's lyrical and melodic abundance (the Scherzo is delivered with great panache) and Repin's choice of tempo for all movements is expertly judged. In the Ravel, Repin and Berezovsky are perhaps even more impressive. As a vehicle for Repin's talent it shows what a marvellous colourist he is, what exceptional subtlety and nuance he brings to the music and, in the 'Blues' movement especially, the sheer frisson he is capable of generating. One cannot understate the superb ensemble playing either, with Berezovsky perfectly attuned to every twist and turn of Repin's playing. The sound is very realistic and naturally balanced.

Eight Mood Pictures

Eight Mood Pictures, Op 1. Three Improvisations, Op 2. Three Novelles, Op 17. Improvisation, Op 31 No 1. Etude 'of medium difficulty'. Three Hymns in Praise of Toil, Op 49
Geoffrey Tozer pf
Chandos CHAN9498 (70 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995

Dithyramb in E flat, Op 10 No 2. Fairy Tale in F minor, 'Ophelia's song', Op 14 No 1. Sonatas, Op 25 – No 1 in C minor, 'Sonata-Skazka'; No 2 in E minor, 'The Night Wind'. Sonate-Idylle in G, Op 56
Geoffrey Tozer pf
Chandos CHAN9618 (72 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995

Medtner's piano music contains glories and riches indeed – an unending sense of intricacy from Russia's most subtle and recondite composer. Even when Medtner reminds you of his debt to others (to, say, Brahms and Schumann) he remains inimitably himself, ranging effortlessly from lyric to epic and essaying everything in between. Take the 'Prologue', from Op 1, composed when Medtner was 18 and prefaced by some lines from Lermontov telling of a soul carried to earth by an angel. Such serenity and other-worldly preoccupation are expressed in music of rippling complexity, soaring to declamatory heights before resuming its pensiveness and quiet ecstasy. In total contrast The Night Wind Sonata is among the most daunting of all sonatas; of heroic length and ambition. The Improvisation, Op 31 No 1, is another of Medtner's finest, most imaginative offerings, and if the Dithyramb exults in Brahmsian fullness, its final pages, which seem to engulf the entire keyboard, are of a vehemence peculiar to Medtner.

Playing throughout with an enviable strength, grace and subtlety and with an unfailingly beautiful sonority, Geoffrey Tozer is more than equal to every occasion. Hearing him, for example, in the Sonata, Op 25 No 2 or in the slow movement from the Sonata-Skazka (complete with a melody he describes in his excellent notes as 'one of the loveliest Medtner ever wrote'), you will be made more than aware of his warmth and affection as well as his imperturbable fluency and skill. The recordings are of the highest quality.

Piano Works

Sonata in F minor, Op 5. Two Fairy Tales, Op 8. Sonata Triad, Op 11. Sonata in G minor, Op 22. Sonatas, Op 25 – No 1 in C minor, 'Sonata-Skazka'; No 2 in E minor, 'The Night Wind'. Sonata-Ballade in F sharp, Op 27. Sonata in A minor, Op 30. Forgotten Melodies – Set I, Op 38; Set II, Op 39. Sonata romantica in B flat minor, Op 53 No 1. Sonata minacciosa in F minor, Op 53 No 2. Sonate-Idylle in G, Op 56
Marc-André Hamelin pf
Hyperion ④ CDA67221/4 (279 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1998 ●

With this classic recording of the 14 piano sonatas, Medtner's star soared into the ascendant. Superlatively played and presented, it effects a radical and triumphant transition from years of indifference to heady acclaim. True, Medtner was celebrated by Rachmaninov as 'the greatest composer of our time' and championed by pianists such as Moiseiwitsch, Horowitz and Gilels, yet his music fell largely on deaf ears. Such irony and enigma lie in the music itself, in its distinctive character, colour and fragrance. Listeners were understandably suspicious of music that yields up its secrets so unreadily, almost as if Medtner wished it to remain in a private rather than public domain. Moments of a ravishing, heart-stopping allure, and heroics on the grandest of scales are apt to occur within an indigestible, prolix and recondite context. On paper everything is comprehensible, yet the results are never quite what you expect. Much of the writing, too, is formidably complex, with rhythmic intricacies deriving from Brahms and whimsicalities from Schumann supporting a recognisably Slavic yet wholly personal idiom.

Such writing demands a transcendental technique and a burning poetic commitment, a magical amalgam achieved with delicacy, drama and finesse by Marc-André Hamelin. Interspersing the sonatas with groups of miniatures containing some of Medtner's most felicitous ideas, he plays with an authority suggesting that such music is truly his language. Hamelin achieves an unfaltering sense of continuity, a balance of sense and sensibility in music that threatens to become submerged in its own passion. Readers uncertain of Medtner's elusive art should try the Forgotten Melodies (and most of all 'Alla reminiscenza'). Such heaven-sent performances will set you journeying far and wide, their eloquence accentuated by Hyperion's sound.

Two Pieces for Two Pianos, Op 58[a].
Sonatina in G minor. Morceaux, Op 4 – Moment musical; Prelude. Sonata in C minor, 'Sonata-Skazka', Op 25 No 1. Piano Quintet in C, Op posth[b]
Hamish Milne, [a]Boris Berezovsky pfs [b]Kenneth Sillito, [b]Malcolm Latchem vns [b]Robert Smissen va [b]Stephen Orton vc
CRD CRD3515 (70 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

What a rich and fascinating miscellany Milne presents, offering us music which ranges from Medtner's teenage years (the Sonatina) to old age and, finally, to a work (the Piano Quintet) which occupied him throughout a life dogged by ill fortune and lack of recognition. For Medtner the Quintet was his summa, his 'hymns of old Russia' dedicated to God. The echoes of others, most notably Brahms, criss-cross its deeply affecting pages, whether giving us a 'serene variant' on the Dies irae, the modal harmonies of the Russian Orthodox Church or a finale concluding in a whirl of defiance and exultance.

At the other end of the scale, Milne's performance of the Sonatina is as crystalline and sensitive as even the most ardent Medtnerian could wish. Milne's robust partners in the Quintet are the Pro Arte Piano Quartet, and although he is less fowardly balanced than Dmitri Alexeev in his Hyperion disc with the New Budapest Quartet his performance has all of his instinctive quality and commitment, most notably a capacity to allow the composer his own voice and to present his music with affection and clarity. Finally, Milne is joined by Boris Berezovsky in the Op 58 'Round Dance' and 'Knight Errant' for two pianos, both performed with total authority and conviction. Medtner and Moiseiwitsch, who recorded the 'Round Dance', would surely have been among the first to applaud.

Dithyramb in E, Op 10 No 3. Two Fairy Tales, Op 20. Four Lyric Fragments, Op 23. Four Fairy Tales, Op 26. Theme and Variations in C sharp minor, Op 55. Fairy Tale in G minor, Op 48 No 2. Two Elegies, Op 59
Geoffrey Tozer pf
Chandos CHAN9899 (63 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 2000

Medtner's moods, particularly in this seventh volume of Tozer's cycle, are primarily introspective, whether simply or floridly expressed. Most of the ideas, too, bear a family likeness suggesting a continuous return to a fabric or dreamscape of happier times and places; nostalgia was always central to Medtner's haunting genius.

Tozer's long and complex journey through these pages is always a labour of love rather than duty. For him the Third Dithyramb is 'a hymn of angels' and the third of the Op 26 Fairy Tales 'perfection'. His verbal tribute is ideally matched in performances of unfailing mastery and warmth. His tempo for the second of the two Op 20 Fairy Tales allows every note of its menacing tread or chime to be heard. The delightfully ornate Op 55 Variations are spun off with a true sense of their greater accessibility and the Op 59 Elegies – rich, powerful, disconsolate and with a Brahmsian textural density – provide a magnificent close to his programme.

Songs

The Angel, Op 1a. Winter Evening, Op 13 No 1. Songs, Op 28 – No 2, I cannot hear that bird; No 3, Butterfly; No 4, In the Churchyard; No 5, Spring Calm. The Rose, Op 29 No 6. I loved thee well, Op 32 No 4. Night, Op 36 No 5. Sleepless, Op 37 No 1. Songs, Op 52 – No 2, The Raven; No 3, Elegy; No 5, Spanish Romance; No 6, Serenade. Noon, Op 59 No 1. Eight Songs, Op 24
Ludmilla Andrew sop Geoffrey Tozer pf
Chandos CHAN9327 (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1993

Musical Opinion, reviewing the newly published Op 52 in 1931, concluded that, Medtner could hardly be considered 'a born song writer'. It says something for the achievement of Ludmilla Andrew that the 'unvocal' character of Medtner's writing is hardly evident at all, though, to be fair, the first three songs from Op 52 are perhaps the very ones in which the voice is most hard-pressed and in which it is even possible to feel that they might do very well as piano solos. In the 'Serenade' (No 6), the piano part is an accompaniment, and the singer brings to it a charm and delicacy worthy of its dedicatee, Nina Koshetz. Geoffrey Tozer is an excellent accompanist. His playing of 'Winter Evening', with its evocative rustling start, is superb; but always, along with the sheer virtuosity, there is a responsive feeling for mood and coloration. There are songs in which the piano takes over. Yet in many the interest is evenly distributed, and these are among the most delightful in the repertoire.

Fanny Mendelssohn-Hensel

German 1805-1847

Sister of Felix Mendelssohn, Fanny was a gifted pianist and composer of songs (some published under her brother's name), piano music and a few large-scale dramatic works. In the 1830s she became the central figure in a flourishing salon, for which she created most of her compositions and where she performed on the piano and conducted. Her diary and correspondence provide vivid and essential material on the musical life of her time.

Lieder

Lieder – Opp 1, 7, 9 and 10. Ich wandelte unter den Bäumen. Die Schiffende. Traum. Suleika. Dämmrung senkte sich von oben. Nach Süden. Mendelssohn Italien, Op 8 No 3
Susan Gritton sop Eugene Asti pf
Hyperion CDA67110 (72 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1999 ●

A few single songs by Mendelssohn's sister Fanny have appeared in concert programmes and have registered as pleasant, delightful even, but rather too comfortable and conventional to reward any more sustained attention. This is now proved to be untrue. Heard in sequence, as here, the songs reveal their strength. The melodies are more athletic, the piano parts more varied, the modulations more expressive than one may have thought. The choice of text – more of Goethe than of any other poet – challenges thoughtfulness. There is also a curious feature of the music: though the excellent commentary on the songs often suggests a reminiscence on Fanny's part (of Bach or Schubert or Schumann), the associations in a present-day listener's mind are likely to be forward as often as back. Die frühen Gräber (Op 9 No 4), for instance, is compared to 'a Bach organ chorale'; and yet as one searches in the mind to identify a kinship for that unusually deep-toned piano writing, the name which surfaces is not Bach but Brahms. In less sensitive hands than Eugene Asti's this could sound muddy; but his clarity and feeling for rhythm and harmony obviate that. Similarly, a springlike voice such as Susan Gritton's could have confirmed the impression that pleasantness was all, whereas she is remarkably good at deepening the colours (as in Der Ersehnte, Op 9 No 1) and concentrating the mind (as in Im Herbste, Op 10 No 4). An excellent record: enterprising programme, fresh young artists, fine presentation.

Felix Mendelssohn German 1809-1847

GROVE Mendelssohn came from a distinguished intellectual, artistic and banking family in Berlin (the family converted from Judaism to Christianity in 1816, taking the additional name 'Bartholdy'). He studied the piano with Ludwig Berger and theory and composition with Zelter, producing his first piece in 1820; thereafter, a profusion of sonatas, concertos, string symphonies, piano quartets and Singspiels revealed his increasing mastery of counterpoint and form. Besides family travels and eminent visitors to his parents' salon, early influences included the poetry of Goethe (whom he knew from 1821) and the Schlegel translations of Shakespeare; these are traceable in his best music of the period. His gifts as a conductor also showed themselves early: in 1829 he directed a pioneering performance of Bach's St Matthew Passion at the Berlin Singakademie, promoting the modern cultivation of Bach's music.

A period of travel and concert-giving introduced Mendelssohn to England, Scotland (1829) and Italy (1830-31). In 1833 he took up a conducting post at Düsseldorf, concentrating on Handel's oratorios. Among the chief products of this time were The Hebrides, the G minor Piano Concerto, Die erste Walpurgisnacht, the Italian Symphony and St Paul. But as a conductor and music organizer his most significant achievement was in Leipzig (1835-47), where to great acclaim he conducted the Gewandhaus Orchestra, championing both historical and modern works, and founded and directed the Leipzig Conservatory (1843).

Composing mostly in the summer holidays, he produced Ruy Blas Overture, a revised version of the Hymn of Praise, the Scottish Symphony, the Violin Concerto Op 64 and the fine Piano Trio in C minor (1845). Meanwhile, he was intermittently (and less happily) employed by the king as a composer and choirmaster in Berlin, where he wrote highly successful incidental music, notably for A Midsummer Night's Dream (1843). Much sought after as a festival organiser, he was associated especially with the Lower Rhine and Birmingham music festivals. His death at the age of 38, after a series of strokes, was mourned internationally.

With its emphasis on clarity and adherence to classical ideals, Mendelssohn's music shows alike the influences of Bach (fugal technique), Handel (rhythms, harmonic progressions), Mozart (dramatic characterisation, forms, textures) and Beethoven (instrumental technique), though from 1825 he developed a characteristic style of his own, often underpinned by a literary, artistic, historical, geographical or emotional connection; indeed it was chiefly in his skilful use of extra-musical stimuli that he was a Romantic. His early and prodigious operatic gifts, clearly reliant on Mozart, failed to develop, but his penchant for the dramatic found expression in the oratorios as well as in Ruy Blas Overture, his Antigone incidental music and above all the enduring Midsummer Night's Dream music, in which themes from the overture are cleverly adapted as motifs in the incidental music. The oratorios, among the most popular works of their kind, draw inspiration from Bach and Handel and content from the composer's personal experience, St Paul being an allegory of Mendelssohn's own family history and Elijah of his years of dissension in Berlin. Among his other vocal works, the highly dramatic Die erste Walpurgisnacht, Op 60 (on Goethe's poem greeting springtime) and the Leipzig psalm settings deserve special mention; the choral songs and lieder are uneven, reflecting their wide variety of social functions.

After an apprenticeship of string symphony writing in a classical mould, Mendelssohn found inspiration in art, nature and history for his orchestral music. The energy, clarity and tunefulness of the Italian have made it his most popular symphony, although the elegiac Scottish represents a newer, more purposeful achievement.

In his best overtures, essentially one-movement symphonic poems, the sea appears as a recurring image, from Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage and The Hebrides to The Lovely Melusine. Less dependent on programmatic elements and at the same time formally innovatory, the concertos, notably that for violin, and the chamber music, especially some of the string quartets, the Octet and the two late piano trios, beautifully reconcile classical principles with personal feeling; these are among his most striking compositions.

Of the solo instrumental works, the partly lyric, partly virtuoso Lieder ohne Worte for piano (from 1829) are elegantly written and often touching.

Piano Concertos

No 1 in G minor, Op 25; No 2 in D minor, Op 40; A minor (piano and strings); E; A flat (both two pianos)

Piano Concertos – Nos 1 and 2. Capriccio brillant in B minor, Op 22. Rondo brillant in E flat, Op 29. Serenade and Allegro giocoso, Op 43
Stephen Hough pf City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra / Lawrence Foster
Hyperion CDA66969 (75 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997 ●●

With Stephen Hough's Mendelssohn we enter a new dimension. The soft, stylish arpeggios that open the first work here, the Capriccio brillant, announce something special. But this is just a preparation for the First Concerto. Here again, 'stylish' is the word. One can sense the background – especially the operatic background against which these works were composed. The first solo doesn't simply storm away, fortissimo; one hears distinct emotional traits: the imperious, thundering octaves, the agitated semiquavers, the pleading appoggiaturas. The revelation is the First Concerto's slow movement: not a trace of stale sentimentality here, rather elegance balanced by depth of feeling. Some of the praise must go to the CBSO and Foster; after all it's the CBSO violas and cellos that lead the singing in that slow movement. Foster and the orchestra are also effective in the opening of the Second Concerto – too often dismissed as the less inspired sequel to No 1. The first bars are hushed, sombre, a little below the main tempo, so that it's left to Hough to energize the argument and set the pace – all very effective.

Piano Concerto in A minor. 🅿
Concerto for Violin, Piano and Strings in D minor
Rainer Kussmaul vn Andreas Staier fp
Concerto Köln
Teldec Das Alte Werk 0630-13152-2 Ⓕ
(72 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1996 ●

These two works, dating from Mendelssohn's early teens, make an excellent coupling. Given that these works were first heard in the Sunday salons at the Mendelssohns' home, it is logical that they should be recorded here not just on period instruments but with a small band of strings, in places one instrument per part. What is less welcome is that the strings of Concerto Köln adopt what might be regarded as an unreconstructed view of period string-playing, so that the orchestral tuttis are rather trying, not least in slow movements, even on an ear well adjusted to period performance.

The soloists, both outstanding, provide a total contrast, and there the violinist, Rainer Kussmaul, is if anything even more impressive than Andreas Staier, for many years the harpsichordist of Concerto Köln and here the director as well as soloist. Throughout the Double Concerto Kussmaul plays with rare freshness and purity, allowing himself just a measure of vibrato, and if Staier takes second place, that is not just a question of balance between the violin and an 1825 fortepiano by Johann Fritz of Vienna, but of the young composer's piano writing, regularly built on passagework, often in arpeggios, rather than straight melodic statements. No doubt that had something to do with the pianos of the day, with their limited sustaining power. That applies to the piano writing in the Piano Concerto too, and it is striking that though each work is astonishing from a composer so young, the Double Concerto, written just a year later, reveals a clear development. The material is not as memorable in either work as it is in such a masterpiece as the Octet of two years later, yet in every movement, and not least the finales of both works, the composer is clearly identifiable as Mendelssohn.

Double Piano Concertos – E; A flat
Benjamin Frith, Hugh Tinney pfs
RTE Sinfonietta / Prionnsías O'Duinn
Naxos 8 553416 (74 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1995

Mendelssohn was 14 when he completed his first two-piano Concerto in E major, and still only 15 when he followed it with a considerably longer (rather too long) and more ambitious second in A flat. Both concertos were first heard at the family's Sunday morning music parties, with the composer's sister Fanny at the second piano. As her talents were akin to his own, the two solo parts are indistinguishable in their challenges. And it is to the great credit of Benjamin Frith and Hugh Tinney that without a score at hand, you would be hard-pressed to guess who was playing what.

You will be as impressed by their attunement of phrasing in lyrical contexts as by their synchronisation in all the brilliant semiquaver passagework in which both works abound. Their uninhibited enjoyment of the imitative audacities of the later work's finale is a real tour de force.

Under Prionnsías O'Duinn the RTE Sinfonietta plays with sufficient relish to allow you to forget that the recording is perhaps just a little too close. In short, a not-to-be-missed opportunity to explore the young Mendelssohn at bargain price.

Violin Concerto in E minor

Mendelssohn Violin Concerto
Bruch Violin Concerto No 1 in G minor, Op 26
Schubert Rondo in A, D438
Kennedy vn
English Chamber Orchestra / Jeffrey Tate
EMI 749663-2 (71 minutes: DDD)
Recorded 1987 Ⓕ

These are exceptionally strong and positive performances, vividly recorded. When it comes to the two main works, Kennedy readily holds his own against all comers. His view of the Mendelssohn has a positive, masculine quality established at the very start. He may at first seem a little fierce, but fantasy goes with firm control, and the transition into the second subject on a descending arpeggio (marked tranquillo) is radiantly beautiful, the more affecting by contrast with the power of what has gone before.

Kennedy is unerringly helped by Jeffrey Tate's refreshing and sympathetic support. Though it is the English Chamber Orchestra accompanying, there is no diminution of scale. With full and well-balanced sound, the piece even seems bigger, more symphonic than usual. In the slow movement Kennedy avoids sentimentality in his simple, songful view. The coda is always a big test in this work, and Kennedy's and Tate's reading is among the most powerful and exciting on record.

The Bruch brings another warm and positive performance, consistently sympathetic, with the orchestra once more adding to the power. Kennedy is more than a match for rival versions, again bringing a masculine strength which goes with a richly expressive yet totally unsentimental view of Bruch's exuberant lyricism as in the central slow movement. In short, thoroughly recommended.

Additional recommendation

Violin Concerto in E minor

Couplings: Berg Violin Concerto Bruch Violin Concerto No 1 in G minor, Op 26

Josef Suk vn Czech Philharmonic Orchestra / Ančerl

Supraphon SU3663-2 (79 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ

Recorded 1966-68

Josef Suk gives an outstanding performance of the Mendelssohn – there's nothing routine about his playing, which combines his usual technical polish and fine tone with unaffected expression. But a large part of the effect is due to the orchestra's exemplary internal balance and rhythmic poise. The Bruch has similar virtues, and there's more great music-making in the Berg. The sound has been remastered and is uncommonly clear: highly recommended.

String Symphonies

String Symphonies Nos 1, 6, 7 and 12

Nieuw Sinfonietta Amsterdam / Lev Markiz Ⓕ

BIS CD683 (70 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1994

Amazing stuff, brilliantly performed. The first of the symphonies fair bursts from the staves, with a chuckling finale that would surely have delighted Rossini. And although the Sixth Symphony's finale harbours hints of miracles to come, Mendelssohn's mature personality is more comprehensively anticipated in the Seventh. Again, the finale suggests the ebullient, life-affirming manner of the orchestral symphonies, albeit sobered by a spot of fugally formal writing later on. The 12th Symphony opens with a Handelian sense of ceremony, goes on to incorporate a characteristically tender Andante and ends with a finale that, to quote Stig Jacobsson's enthusiastic notes, 'dies away to pizzicato and a subsequent accelerando which recalls Rossini'. This is truly delightful music, the playing both sensitive and exciting, while BIS's sound is impressively full-bodied.

Symphonies / Overtures

Symphonies – No 1 in C minor, Op 11; No 2 in B flat, Op 52, 'Hymn of Praise'; No 3 in A minor, Op 56, 'Scottish'; No 4 in A, Op 90, 'Italian'; No 5 in D, Op 107, 'Reformation'.

Overtures – Die Hochzeit des Camacho, Op 10; A Midsummer Night's Dream, Op 21; The Hebrides, Op 26, 'Fingal's Cave'; Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt, Op 27; The Fair Melusina, Op 32; Athalie, Op 74; Ruy Blas, Op 95

Symphonies Nos 1, 2[a] and 3-5. Overtures – The Hebrides; A Midsummer Night's Dream; The Fair Melusina. Octet in E flat, Op 20 – Scherzo

[a]Elizabeth Connell, [a]Karita Mattila sops

[a]Hans-Peter Blochwitz ten

London Symphony Orchestra / Claudio Abbado

DG ④ 415 353-2GH4 (245 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Recorded 1984-85 ○○

Claudio Abbado gives us a comprehensive collection of the mature symphonies plus three overtures and the orchestral arrangement (in shortened form) of the Scherzo from his String Octet, which at the first British performance in 1829 of the Symphony No 1 Mendelssohn substituted for the Minuet third movement.

The wide-ranging sound comes out most strikingly in Symphony No 2. Abbado conveys a keen sense of joy with a wide expressive range. The yearning 6/8 movement is haunting at Abbado's quite slow speed, and though this speed for the Andante religioso brings dangers of sweetness and sentimentality, he avoids them with his warm but unmannered phrasing. Again, in the choral finale Abbado's speeds tend to be relaxed and the sense of joyful release is all the keener, when in response to the tenor's calls of 'Hüter, ist die Nacht bald hin?' the soprano gives her radiant call of 'Die Nacht ist vergangen'. Elizabeth Connell is the more tenderly affecting by being placed slightly at a distance. Hans-Peter Blochwitz's tenor may be on the light side for the key tenor part, but the tonal beauty and natural feeling for words and phrasing are a delight. So is the singing of the London Symphony Chorus.

It is that avoidance of Victorian blandness which is striking in Abbado's accounts of Nos 1 and 5. In No 1 he is tough and biting in the C minor first movement, slower and simpler in the second, returning to a tough, dark manner for the Minuet and finale. This performance has one marvelling that Mendelssohn could have ever have countenanced the idea of the Octet Scherzo as substitute, a piece so different in mood.

The first movement of the Reformation (No 5) finds Abbado biting and dramatic, and crisper and again quicker in the second movement Allegro vivace. In both the Scottish and Italian Symphonies Abbado's earlier versions clearly come into contention (recorded in 1968 for Decca), but where in the Scottish the differences of interpretation are relatively unimportant those in the Italian are more striking. Here the outer movements are fractionally faster than before, but that difference brings just a hint of breathlessness in the playing of the LSO, where before it was so sparking. By contrast the noticeably faster speed for the second movement Andante this time sounds fresher, and the marginally faster speed for the third movement is preferable. As for the overtures, they too bring fresh and attractive performances, very fast and fleet in the fairy music of A Midsummer Night's Dream and with the contrast between first and second subjects of The Hebrides underlined.

Symphonies Nos 3 and 4

London Symphony Orchestra / Claudio Abbado

DG 3-D Classics 427 810-2GDC (71 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ

Recorded 1984 ○○

Abbado's coupling of the Scottish and Italian Symphonies makes a pretty clear first choice for those wanting these works paired together (the full set is reviewed above). The sound is fresh within a pleasing ambience and the performances show this conductor at his very finest. Allegros are exhilarating, yet never sound rushed, and the flowing Adagio of the Scottish is matched by the admirably paced Andante in the Italian, with the mood of the 'Pilgrim's March' nicely captured. The Scherzo of the Scottish is a joy, and the recording clarifies textures that can often sound muddled, especially at the exuberant horn arpeggios. Both first-movement exposition repeats are included.

Symphonies Nos 3 and 4 🄿
London Classical Players / Sir Roger Norrington
Virgin Classics 561735-2 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1989 ●

Schumann Symphonies – No 3 in E flat, 'Rhenish', Op 97; No 4 in D minor, Op 120 🄿
London Classical Players / Sir Roger Norrington
Virgin Classics 561734-2 (57 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1989 ●

Issued originally in 1990 and 1991, both these discs represented an extension of repertory for Norrington and the London Classical Players, moving a stage further in period performances of the central romantic repertory. If in Beethoven Norrington has always been wedded to the doctrine of obeying the composer's challengingly fast metro-nome markings, it is different here. Both in Mendelssohn and in Schumann the outer movements at least are relatively unrushed. It is a special delight to hear textures so lightened and clarified in both the Mendelssohn symphonies – the first movement of the Italian skipping infectiously, and the flute articulation wonderfully clean in the Saltarello finale.

Here and elsewhere it helps to have a rather less resonant body of strings, so giving extra prominence to brass and woodwind. The different entries in the Scherzo of the Scottish Symphony are given extra clarity, while the great horn entry in the coda of the finale is gloriously resonant (track 4, 8'05"), a moment to send you heavenwards.

If Mendelssohn as an orchestrator has always been counted a master of transparency, it is so different with Schumann. Yet Norrington in these exhilarating performances – like Gardiner in his set of the Schumann symphonies – demonstrates that period performance alongside skilful balancing can undermine the old myth, with textures at least as clear as you would expect in Brahms. Again speeds are unexaggerated, even if the three middle movements of the Rhenish Symphony flow rather faster than in most performances with modern instruments. The second and third movements become interludes, but the fourth loses none of its gravity, thanks largely to heightened dynamic contrasts. The Fourth Symphony in its revised version brings similar qualities, with the successive accelerandos in the coda to the finale clear and unexaggerated, full of excitement but without hysteria. Two welcome reissues at mid-price.

Symphony No 3. Overture – The Hebrides; A Midsummer Night's Dream. Incidental music, Op 61: Scherzo; Nocturne; Wedding March 🄷
London Symphony Orchestra / Peter Maag
Decca The Classic Sound 443 578-2DCS Ⓜ
(76 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1957-60 ●●

The Hebrides and the Scottish Symphony offer 'Classic' Decca engineering at its best: airy 1960 Kingsway Hall sound with a real sense of perspective drawing the ear in (woodwind set behind strings but without loss of clarity), pinpoint instrumental positioning yet no impression of instruments sealed off from each other, and, for the pre-Dolby period, a remarkable dynamic range, accomplished with low hiss levels and no audible overloading. There is, perhaps, a slight thinness of tone in the middle register, a characteristic that is far more pronounced in the 1957 Midsummer Night's Dream excerpts, but the high-key clarity and fizzing presence readily compensate. Maag's intelligent balancing of the orchestra and gauging of the work's proportions and rhetoric do not preclude imaginative handling of their illustrative poetry; in other words, he is a superb Mendelssohnian stylist. Personal rhythmic and dynamic inflexions abound (no doubt eyebrows will rise at such things as his sudden broad delivery of the Mechanicals' clowning in the Midsummer Night's Dream Overture). Singing lines are all beautifully wrought, especially that of the symphony's Adagio, and its 'martial' sections benefit from discreetly balanced timpani. In The Hebrides, the balance and range of the sound allow all those swells (superbly observed) to register in proper proportion – here is both delicate impressionism and all the stormy drive and drama that you could want, putting many more recent rivals in the shade. At the heart of this disc's success is, of course, the playing of the revitalized LSO, responding to some challenging tempos with mainly knife-edge precision of ensemble and superb attack – truly vintage LSO champagne.

A Midsummer Night's Dream

Overture and Incidental Music to A Midsummer Night's Dream, Opp 21 and 61

A Midsummer Night's Dream. Symphony No 4
Kenneth Branagh spkr Sylvia McNair sop Angelika Kirchschlager mez Women of the Ernst-Senff Chorus; Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Claudio Abbado
Sony Classical SK62826 (78 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text included. Recorded live in 1995

It makes an attractive package having Mendelssohn's A Midsummer Night's Dream music, dramatically presented (with Kenneth Branagh taking every role from Titania to Puck), very generously coupled with Mendelssohn's most popular symphony. Sony has managed to squeeze in 50 minutes of the Midsummer Night's Dream music, which means only a few minor omissions. Some may resist Branagh's style – burring his 'r's for a Mummerset Puck, coming near to an Olivier imitation in Oberon's final speech – but in his versatility he is very persuasive. Having speech over music in melodrama certainly makes sense of the more fragmentary passages of the score. Abbado's performances are a delight, fresh and transparent in the fairy music, with generally fast speeds made exhilarating, never breathless. The chorus is atmospherically balanced, with the two excellent soloists, Sylvia McNair and Angelika Kirchschlager, set more forwardly. The recording, made in the Philharmonie in Berlin, is rather more vivid, a degree less recessed than in the symphony, where the orchestra is placed at a slight distance, an effect one gets used to. In the Italian Symphony Abbado's reading has changed little since his earlier LSO version, though here and there, as in the third movement, the phrasing is this time a little more moulded. By any reckoning he remains one of the most persuasive interpreters of this delectable work.

Additional recommendation
A Midsummer Night's Dream
Watson sop Wallis mez
London Symphony Orchestra / Previn
EMI Encore 574981-2 (57 minutes: ADD) Ⓑ

Previn draws first-class contributions from soloists and chorus; a wonderfully refreshing account of the complete score at an unbeatable price.

Octet in E flat, Op 20

Octet. String Quintet No 2 in B flat, Op 87
Academy of St Martin in the Fields Chamber Ensemble
Philips 420 400-2PH (63 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1978

The glorious Octet is a work of unforced lyricism and a seemingly endless stream of melody. The Academy Chamber Ensemble, of fine soloists in their own right, admirably illustrates the benefits of working regularly as an ensemble for they play with uncommon sympathy. The string quintet is a work of greater fervour and passion than the Octet, but it is characterized by the same melodiousness and unfettered lyricism with plenty of opportunities for virtuoso playing, which are well taken. The recordings give a pleasant and warm sheen to the string colour.

String Quintets

String Quintets – No 1 in A, Op 18[a]; No 2 in B flat, Op 87[b]
Raphael Ensemble (Anthony Marwood, Catherine Manson vns Timothy Boulton, Louise Williams vas [a]Andrea Hess, [b]Michael Stirling vcs)
Hyperion CDA66993 (58 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997 ●

These quintets – both masterpieces – emanate from opposite ends of Mendelssohn's career, Op 18 being much of a piece with the Overture to A Midsummer Night's Dream, Op 87, presenting more ardent lyricism. The Raphael Ensemble's smoothly mellifluous performances and ecstatic involvement is tellingly exemplified in the first movement of Op 18, where converging string lines set up gloriously full textures, whereas the Scherzo's contrapuntal scurryings inspire quiet-voiced virtuosity. Both performances convey the shimmer and bustle of Mendelssohn's string writing without forcing the issue and score full marks for imagination, tonal integration and musicality. The recordings are well-nigh ideal.

String Quartets

String Quartets – No 3 in D, Op 44 No 1; No 4 in E minor, Op 44 No 2; No 5 in E flat, Op 44 No 3
Talich Quartet (Jan Talich Jr, Petr Macecek vns Vladimir Bukac va Petr Prause vc)
Calliope CAL9302 (80 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 2000 ●●

Here is a set of brilliant but not dazzling performances of Mendelssohn's Op 44 Quartets: that is to say, they illuminate the music but never blind the listener with empty demonstration of the players' virtuosity. Certainly the speeds are fast, but the fingerwork is so deft and the textures (helped by excellent recording) so lucid that everything Mendelssohn asks for is clear. Of the three works in this marvellous set, it is the third, in E flat (No 5), which stands highest, with one of the finest of all his first movements and an Adagio of a pensiveness that the players reflect in their just tempo and in a slight greying of tone. The scherzo and the finale (Allegro con fuoco) are classic examples of how the rigorous contrapuntal teaching which Mendelssohn received in his youth from old Carl Zelter gave him the technique for music of not merely pace but of wit and ingenuity. It is music to enliven the spirit, and so is this performance of it.

The quartet's sense of tempo serves them well in the D major Quartet, Mendelssohn's own favourite, with a Menuetto whose harmonic originality encourages a wistfulness in the playing, and in the E minor Quartet with an Andante that keeps gently moving. One might regret that none of the first movement repeats are observed, but as there is already 80 minutes' music here, such a complaint would be unreasonable. Altogether an outstanding issue.

String Quartets – E flat (1823); No 1 in E flat, Op 12; No 2 in A minor, Op 13; No 3 in D, Op 44 No 1; No 4 in E minor, Op 44 No 2; No 5 in E flat, Op 44 No 3; No 6 in F minor, Op 80. Andante, Scherzo, Capriccio and Fugue, Op 81 Nos 1-2

Melos Quartet (Wilhelm Melcher, Gerhard Voss vns Hermann Voss va Peter Buck vc)
DG ③ 415 883-2GCM3 (199 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1976-81 ●●

The familiar and misleading cliché of Mendelssohn as the cheerful chappie of early Romanticism vanishes at the sound of the F minor Quartet, Op 80. Here is the intensity, anguish and anger that everyone thought Mendelssohn incapable of. His beloved sister Fanny died in May 1847 (his own death was merely months away), and the ensuing summer saw him leave Berlin for Switzerland, where he began to 'write music very industriously'. And what remarkable music it is. Right from the opening Allegro assai one senses trouble afoot, an unfamiliar restlessness mixed in with the more familiar busyness. Furthermore the second movement is surely the most fervent and punishing that Mendelssohn wrote – wild, insistent and unmistakably tragic in tone. This gradual intensification and darkening that occurs throughout Mendelssohn's quartet cycle makes it a most revealing guide to his creative development. But much of the earlier music is profoundly 'Mendelssohnian' in the accepted sense of that term: fresh, dynamic, light-textured, beautifully crafted and full of amiable melodic invention.

The very early E flat Quartet, Op posth (composed when Mendelssohn was only 14), although fashioned in the style of Haydn and Mozart, points towards imminent developments – a song-like A minor Quartet, already taking its lead from late Beethoven in the same key, the E flat, Op 12, with its delightful Canzonetta and the eventful Op 44 set, three of Mendelssohn's most concentrated full-scale works. And DG also adds the four separate pieces, Op 81, thus treating us to the entire Mendelssohn string quartet canon.

The Melos Quartet comes up trumps with a really superb set of performances – technically immaculate, transparent in tone and full of enthusiasm. The recordings have presence and clarity.

String Quartets – No 1 in E flat, Op 12[a];
No 2 in A minor, Op 13[b]
Alban Berg Quartet
(Günther Pichler, Gerhard Schulz vns Thomas Kakuska va Valentin Erben vc)
EMI 557167-2
(51 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
[a]Recorded live in 1999; [b]in 2000

These are live performances; no audience noise, apart from applause at the end of Op 13, and any tiny imperfections are outweighed by a strong sense of immediacy. Partly this comes from the way the music is shaped and articulated. The ABQ are less interested than others in smooth, sustained phrasing: in the Adagio of Op 13, for instance, they make little gaps – breathing places – and more prominent local dynamic variations. The speaking quality this gives to their performance is clear from the opening bars of Op 12. They bring winning charm and sweetness to the Allegrettos that take the place of Scherzos in the two works; the faster, fairyland middle sections of both movements are done with delightful lightness. Although ABQ's tempo changes aren't always entirely persuasive, they are at their best in the passionate, Beethoven-inspired outer movements of Op 13, where their vocal, rhetorical manner rivals the intense commitment of the Leipzig Quartet.

If you love this music, you're bound to enjoy this splendid disc.

Piano Trios

Piano Trios – No 1 in D minor, Op 49;
No 2 in C minor, Op 66
Prague Guarneri Trio (Ivan Klánsk´y pf Ceněk Pavlík vn Marek Jerie vc)
Praga Digitals PRD250 154 (56 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 2000

Fifty-five and a half minutes for a full-price CD is less than generous in terms of quantity. But quality is a different matter. For this maturely musical, 1986-formed Czech trio, not widely known on these shores, has the power to make you enjoy these two trios more than any other recording to date. The pianist's role in both trios demands scarcely less virtuosity than in Mendelssohn's two earlier piano concertos. So let's start by saluting Ivan Klánský, who throughout dispatches a multiplicity of notes at dare-devilishly fast tempos with a delectably light-fingered fluency, clarity and immediacy that never for a moment flags. All this without 'prettification' of the music, not even among the supernatural sprites of both Scherzos. The con fuoco Mendelssohnian drive is never forgotten, especially in the higher, Beethoven-inspired voltage of the later work with its triumphant chorale-infused C major homecoming.

Both violinist and cellist play glowingly mellow-toned Guarneri instruments with intuitively affectionate phrasing – not least in the two unassumingly songful slow movements. Ensemble and balance throughout are excellent.

Cello Sonatas

Cello Sonatas – No 1 in B flat, Op 45; No 2 in D, Op 58. Variations concertantes, Op 17. Assai tranquillo. Song without words, Op 109 🅿
Steven Isserlis vc Melvyn Tan fp
RCA Red Seal 09026 62553-2 (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1994 ●

Isserlis and Tan offer idiomatic, well-turned performances full of freshness and vigour. Try the First Sonata in B flat major (which Mendelssohn wrote for his brother, Paul, in 1838), where the second movement's dual function as scherzo and slow movement is convincingly characterised, and the music's passionate outbursts sound arrestingly potent. Isserlis's and Tan's fine blend of subtlety and panache affectingly conveys the nostalgic mood of the Variations concertantes, and culminates powerfully in the work's conclusion. In the D major Second Sonata, Isserlis's and Tan's spontaneity and energy in the outer movements, skilfully controlled variety of timbre and touch in the Scherzo, and dramatic opposition of chorale (piano) and recitative (cello) in the third movement sound immensely compelling. In the Assai tranquillo, as in the charming Song without words, Op 109, sympathetic tonal balance between cello and fortepiano in the softly lit recording brings out the music's sentiment. Isserlis and Tan effectively draw out the work's inconclusive ending to create a telling analogy of the eternal nature of friendship. Excellent balance and crisp, restrained recording helps vividly to evoke this music's Romantic atmosphere.

Variations sérieuses

Variations sérieuses in D minor, Op 54. Piano Sonata in E, Op 6. Three Preludes, Op 104*a*. Three Studies, Op 104*b*. Kinderstücke, Op 72, 'Christmas Pieces'. Gondellied in A. Scherzo in B minor
Benjamin Frith pf
Naxos 8 550940 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1994-95

The multiplicity of notes in Mendelssohn's piano music sometimes lays him open to the charge of 'note-spinning'. So what higher praise for Benjamin Frith than to say that thanks to his fluency, not a single work outstays its welcome here. The unchallengeable masterpiece, of course, is the Variations sérieuses, so enthusiastically taken up by Clara Schumann, and still a repertory work today. Frith characterises each variation with telling contrasts of tempo and touch without sacrificing the continuity and unity of the whole. Equally importantly, never for a moment does he allow us to forget the sérieuses of the title.

No less impressive is his sensitively varied palette in the early E major Sonata (unmistakable homage to Beethoven's Op 101) so often helped by subtle pedalling. But surely the recitative of the Adagio at times needs just a little more intensity and underlying urgency. Of the miniatures the six Kinderstücke ('Christmas Pieces' – written for the children of a friend) emerge with an unforced charm. As music they lack the romance of Schumann's ventures into a child's world, just as the Three Studies do of Chopin's magical revelations in this sphere. However, Frith's fingers never let him down. In the first B flat Study he even seems to acquire a third hand to sustain its middle melody. For sheer seductive grace, the independent Gondellied haunts the memory most of all.

With pleasantly natural sound, too, this disc is quite a bargain.

Lieder

Lieder – Op 8: No 4, Erntelied; No 8, And'res Maienlied. Op 9: No 6, Scheidend. Op 19*a*: No 1, Frühlingslied; No 2, Das erste Veilchen; No 3, Winterlied; No 4, Neue Liebe; No 5, Gruss; No 6, Reiselied. Op 34: No 1, Minnelied; No 2, Auf Flügeln des Gesanges; No 3, Frühlingslied; No 6, Reiselied. Op 47: No 1, Minnelied; No 2, Morgengrüss; No 3, Frühlingslied; No 4, Volkslied; No 6, Bei der Wiege. Op 57: No 1, Altdeutsches Lied; No 2, Hirtenlied; No 4, O Jugend; No 5, Venetianisches Gondellied; No 6, Wanderlied. Op 71: No 1, Tröstung; No 3, An die Entfernte; No 4, Schilflied; No 5, Auf der Wanderschaft; No 6, Nachtlied. Op 84: No 1, Da lieg' ich unter den Bäumen; No 3, Jagdlied. Op 86: No 1, Es lauschte das Laub; No 4, Allnächtlich im Traume; No 5, Der Mond. Op 99: No 1, Erster Verlust; No 5, Wenn sich zwei Herzen Scheiden. Op posth.: Das Waldschloss; Pagenlied; Der Blumenkranz; Warnung vor dem Rhein; Schlafloser Augen Leuchte.
Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau bar
Wolfgang Sawallisch pf
EMI ② 764827-2 (95 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Texts included. Recorded 1970

Mendelssohn's Lieder offer a challenge all their own, and Fischer-Dieskau takes it up with characteristic alacrity. As the majority of these songs are primarily accompanied melody, with little inherent teasing out or biting on the words, the singer is presented with a comparatively empty stage for his recreative imagination to design and pace. There are passing moments (in the Op 47 Morgengrüss, for example) when the simplicity and ingenuousness of Mendelssohn's settings seems to frustrate Fischer-Dieskau. These moments, though, are rare.

His voice, here in its prime, can draw on an extraordinarily wide palette of colour within the legato of the most timeworn strophic song. Both Fischer-Dieskau and Sawallisch, whose light-filled piano playing shows his real sympathy and understanding for this composer, know just when to move into the salon with Mendelssohn. The four Lenau settings and the little drama of mortality offered in Das erste Veilchen are re-created with a perfectly-scaled sense of fleeting ardour and melancholy. Best of all are those little vignettes of the dark mythology of the German folk-soul, those diabolic night rides into the forest which find Mendelssohn at his witchy best, and Fischer-Dieskau at his most virtuosic.

Lieder – Op 8: No 8, And'res Maienlied. No 10, Romanze. Op 9: No 1, Frage; No 5, Im Herbst; No 7, Sehnsucht; No 8, Frühlingsglaube; No 9, Ferne; No 10, Verlust; No 12, Die Nonne. Op 19a: No 3, Winterlied; No 4, Neue Liebe. Op 34: No 2, Auf Flügeln des Gesanges; No 3, Frühlingslied; No 4, Suleika; No 5, Sonntagslied. Op 47: No 3, Frühlingslied; No 5, Der Blumenstrauss; No 6, Bei der Wiege. Op 57 No 3, Suleika. Op 71: No 2, Frühlingslied; No 6, Nachtlied. Op 86: No 3, Die

Liebende schreibt; No 5, Der Mond. Op 99: No 1, Erster Verlust; No 5, Wenn sich zwei Herzen Scheiden; No 6, Es weiss und rät es doch keiner. Pagenlied, Op posth
Barbara Bonney sop Geoffrey Parsons pf
Teldec 2292-44946-2 (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1991

The charm of these songs lies in their simple style and almost endless stream of delightful melody. Unlike other Lieder composers Mendelssohn avoided blatant word-painting or vivid characterisations and the most satisfying songs here tend to be settings of texts which do not on the surface offer much scope for musical expression. But while this disc may not give us the very best of Mendelssohn, or indeed the finest examples of 19th-century Lied, the singing of Barbara Bonney makes this a CD not to be missed. Here is a rare example of a singer caught on record at the very height of her technical and artistic powers, able to exercise seemingly effortless vocal control in portraying the subtle colours and understated moods of each songs. The partnership with that ever-sensitive accompanist Geoffrey Parsons is inspired. Listen to how Bonney seems to float ethereally above the rippling piano figures in that most famous of all Mendelssohn songs, Auf Flügeln des Gesanges ('On wings of song') – a performance which can surely never have been bettered on record.

Elijah

Awards 1993

Elijah (sung in German)
Helen Donath, Kerstin Klein sops
Jard van Nes contr Donald George ten
Alistair Miles bass Leipzig Radio Chorus; Israel Philharmonic Orchestra / Kurt Masur
Teldec ② 9031-73131-2 Ⓕ
(110 minutes: DDD). Text and translation included
Recorded live in 1992 ●●●

This is a tremendous performance on almost every count. Never before on disc had the work been treated with such an accent on vivid drama: the Old Testament text and its setting sounds as if it had been created on the spot, all Victorian plush and sentiment disposed of. Nor had any previous recording anything like the immediacy, both choral and orchestral, as this one. The choral singing is fiery, yet disciplined. They sound wholly confident in tone, articulation and accent, responsive to all the roles they have to play, obedient to Mendelssohn's dynamic markings, and totally committed to the discipline imposed on them by Masur's incisive beat.

The pace of his reading can be judged by the fact that it takes some 110 minutes over the score as compared with the customary, say, 125. No doubt the live recording has something to do with the sense of electricity in the performance. Chorus and conductor seem to have struck up an ideal rapport with the Israel Philharmonic, on home ground here in every sense. It plays with verve allied to a technical skill capable of keeping up with Masur's exigent demands. In consequence, sections (especially in Part 2) that can seem weak or uninspired in other hands here have a dynamic, driving force that carries all before it. Masur also gains credit for choosing soloists rather than the choir as demanded by Mendelssohn for the trios, quartets and double quartets.

Most of the solo singing is worthy of what surrounds it. With a voice of the right weight and timbre for the part, Alistair Miles sings an honest, strongly limned Elijah. He, more than the other soloists, would sometimes like a little more time than Masur permits him to phrase with more meaning, especially in 'Es ist genug': by and large he stands up well to current competition, both in voice and in delivery. Helen Donath is rightly urgent as the grieving widow, though one or two high notes discolour, and mostly belies her years. Jard van Nes makes a fiery Queen and sings her solos gravely but without any hint of sentimentality. The only blot on the escutcheon is the wiry tenor and tight vibrato of Donald George, whose voice does not record well. Otherwise, a superb issue.

Elijah (sung in English) Ⓟ
Renée Fleming, Libby Crabtree sops Patricia Bardon, Sara Fulgoni mezzos Matthew Munro treb John Mark Ainsley, John Bowen tens Neal Davies bar Bryn Terfel bass-bar Geoffrey Moses bass Edinburgh Festival Chorus; Orchestra of the Age of Enlightenment / Paul Daniel
Decca ② 455 688-2DH2 (131 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text included. Recorded 1996

Paul Daniel and Bryn Terfel ensure that this is one of the most dramatic performances of the oratorio on disc. The young conductor, with the advantage of a period instrument orchestra and an excellent one at that, has looked anew at the score and as a consequence reveals much of the rhythmic and dynamic detail not always present in other performances, at least those available on CD in English. His accomplishment in terms of pacing and of balance is also praiseworthy, and he earns further marks for using the trio, quartet and double quartet of soloists Mendelssohn asks for in specific pieces, so as to vary the texture of the music. Terfel simply gives the most exciting and vivid account of the prophet's part yet heard. His range, in terms of vocal register and dynamics, is huge; his expression, mighty and immediate, befits a man of Elijah's temperament. As the score demands, anguish, anger and sympathy are there in full measure, displayed in exceptional definition of words, and when this Elijah calls on the Lord for the saving rain, the Almighty could hardly resist such a commanding utterance. Yet there is always the inwardness part of the role demands. As far as the other soloists are concerned, for the concerted numbers Daniel has chosen voices that nicely match each other in timbre. The chorus is alert and unanimous in both attack and well thought-through phrasing, but its actual sound can be a little soft-centred, partly because all-important consonants are ignored. The orchestral playing is exemplary.

Elijah (sung in German)
Christine Schäfer sop Cornelia Kallisch contr
Michael Schade ten Wolfgang Schöne bass-bar
Stuttgart Gächinger Kantorei; Stuttgart Bach Collegium / Helmuth Rilling
Hänssler Classic ② 98 928 (128 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included. Recorded 1994

Rilling brings out arrestingly the drama of the piece, turning it into a well-varied, exciting quasi-opera, a far from traditional view of the oratorio. The vicissitudes of the prophet's eventful life, his reaction to events, the challenge to Baal, the encounter with Jezebel, have never sounded so electrifying. For that we have to thank Rilling's disciplined chorus biting in diction, precise and convincing in attack. Yet they can also provide the most sensitive, ethereal tone, as in Nos 28 and 29, trio and chorus, 'Siehe, der Hüter Israels'.

The orchestral playing is no less arresting. Furthermore as Elijah Schöne unerringly or authoritatively captures his many moods. Here is the courageous man of action as he confronts Baal's followers and ironically taunts them, the sense of fiery conviction in 'Ist's nichts des Herrn Wort', of doubt in 'Es ist genug', and finally the wonderful Bachian serenity in 'Ja, es sollen wohl Berge weichen', all evoked in the most positive and imaginative delivery of the text. The voice itself, a firm, expressive bass-baritone, is ideal for the role, one on which the singer has obviously lavished much time and consideration – to excellent effect. The same can be said for Schäfer, who brings a Silja-like conviction to all her work. Anyone hearing her declaim 'Weiche nicht' would never be afraid again. The voice itself is interesting, gleaming and yet not without a fair degree of warmth in the tone. Kallisch is almost as convincing in the mezzo solos and gives us a wonderfully malign portrayal of Jezebel. Schade is a fresh-voiced, communicative Obadiah, and he's another who is vivid with his words. The recording, however, is slightly too reverberant, but the added space around the voices doesn't preclude immediacy of impact.

Gian-Carlo Menotti American b1911

GROVE American composer of Italian origin. He studied at the Milan Conservatory and the Curtis Institute (with Scalero, 1928-33), where a co-student was Samuel Barber, his close friend for whom he later wrote librettos. He won success with his comic one-act opera Amelia al ballo (1937), which was taken up by the Met in 1938 and led to an NBC commission for a radio opera, The Old Maid and the Thief (1939). A grand opera, The Island God (1942, Met), was a failure; but it was followed after the war by the chamber opera The Medium (1946), a supernatural tragedy notable for its sinister atmosphere; it was paired with his short comedy The Telephone (1947) for a Broadway run of 211 performances, 1947-8. The full-scale political melodrama The Consul (1950), in a post-Puccini verismo style, and The Saint of Bleecker Street (1954), an effective drama in the same serious style, enjoyed much success, as had the television Christmas opera Amahl and the Night Visitors (1951). His later works include more operas and orchestral pieces, including several works for children written in a direct and appealing style. More ambitious works (such as Goya, 1986), have been criticized as musically thin and too derivative. In 1958 he founded the Spoleto Festival of Two Worlds, which he directed until 1967.

Violin Concerto

Violin Concerto[a]. The Death of Orpheus[b]. Muero porque no muero[c]. Oh llama de amor viva[d]
[c]Julia Melinek sop [b]Jamie MacDougall ten
[d]Stephen Roberts bar [a]Jennifer Koh vn
[bcd]Spoleto Festival Choir and Orchestra / Richard Hickox
Chandos CHAN9979 (61 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Gian-Carlo Menotti's lyrical Violin Concerto, one of his most popular instrumental works, is here neatly coupled with première recordings of three cantatas written in the last 20 years, products of his active old age in his seventies and eighties. Hickox, as music director of the Spoleto Festival, has already established himself as a fine interpreter of Menotti's music. He draws from the Festival Orchestra warmly persuasive readings of works which may be unashamedly eclectic, but are powerfully convincing in such committed performances. The young American violinist, Jennifer Koh, is the excellent soloist. The first movement with its sequence of flowing melodies could easily seem to meander, but Koh and Hickox give it a clear shape, with each new idea emerging seductively. The slow movement, played with hushed dedication, has a tender poignancy here; an intrusive brass motif leads to the central cadenza, technically demanding but not showy. The vigorous finale features a jaunty main theme and ends with virtuoso fireworks, rounding off a piece that deserves resurrecting not just on disc but in the concert-hall too.

The two Spanish language cantatas were written respectively in 1982 and 1991 for the Catholic University in Washington. Menotti confesses to having lost his religious faith, and perhaps understandably here writes sensuous music closer to Puccini's opera, Suor Angelica, than to any religious model. Julia Melinek is the vibrant soloist in the St Teresa setting, with her marked vibrato well-controlled. Stephen Roberts, the responsive soloist in the St John of the Cross setting, is caught less happily, his voice ill-focused.

The Death of Orpheus, to an English text by Menotti himself, is even more dramatic, based on the legend of Orpheus being killed by Thracian women in a bacchanalian frenzy. Orpheus's song emerges as a broad diatonic melody, with choral writing of Delian sensuousness and the tenor's part with Britten-like echoes. Jamie MacDougall is the expressive soloist, with the chorus fresh and incisive in all three cantatas.

Aarre Merikanto Finnish 1893-1958

GROVE Aarre Merikanto, son of the composer Oskar Merikanto (1868-1924), studied with Reger in Leipzig (1912-14) and Vasilenko in Moscow (1915-16), and taught at the Helsinki Academy (1936-58). His opera Juha (1922) invites comparison with Janácek; other works, in a highly coloured, chromatic style, include three symphonies (1916, 1918, 1953), three piano concertos (1913, 1937, 1955) and chamber music.

Piano Concertos

Piano Concertos Nos 2 and 3. Two Studies. Two Pieces
Matti Raekallio pf
Tampere Philharmonic Orchestra / Tuomas Ollila
Ondine ODE915-2 (55 minutes: DDD) Ⓟ
Recorded 1997

Merikanto's Second and Third Piano Concertos (from 1937-8 and 1955 respectively) are typical of his later output – contrapuntally inventive and impressionistic in scoring. Both have an engaging Prokofievan brio in the brisk outer movements and a Rachmaninovesque Romanticism in the lyrical central adagios. Yet Merikanto never entirely forsook his adventurous harmonic writing, and especially in the Second the result – allied to considerable formal lassitude – is suggestive of (of all people) Villa-Lobos. Granted it is with a Nordic not a Brazilian accent, but think here of works such as Momoprecoce and Bachiana No 3 as much as the piano concertos; those who know both will appreciate the similarity. Matti Raekallio is a pianist of real technical ability and musical sensibility. He has the measure of both concertos, and the Second in particular could well become popular as an alternative to Prokofiev's Third or the Paganini Rhapsody. The purely orchestral Two Studies and Two Pieces (1941), though much slighter affairs, are by no means insignificant trifles. Tuomas Ollila secures more than competent performances from the Tampere orchestra, matched by excellent sound. A real delight.

Pan, Op 28

Lemminkäinen, Op 10. Pan, Op 28. Four Compositions. Andante religioso. Scherzo
Tampere Philharmonic Orchestra / Tuomas Ollila
Ondine ODE905-2 (54 minutes: DDD) Ⓟ
Recorded 1997

Aarre Merikanto's career divided broadly into three phases, those of apprentice, radical and conservative, and there are works from each present on this valuable issue. Critical hindsight accords (quite rightly) that the brief radical phase, roughly corresponding to the 1920s, was the most valuable, though at the time Merikanto's modernistic approach – and that of his like-minded contemporaries, Ernest Pingoud and Väinö Raito – was derided. Only one piece here represents this period, the highly accomplished tone-poem, Pan (1924), a wonderful, evocative, yet robust score, possessed of a very Nordic brand of impressionism. Lemminkäinen (1916), by contrast, seems immature, and rather parochial. A Sibelian shadow lies heavily across its quarter-hour duration, yet without a trace of the older composer's own Lemminkäinen tone-poems. There is little of the latter's emotional and psychological depth – or musical range – but instead a prevailing rollicking good humour broken occasionally by more serious moments. The remaining works all date from the early stages of Merikanto's post-modern period, when he reverted to a simpler, more accessible idiom. The Four Compositions (1932) make a very effective and satisfying set, and whereas the Andante religioso (1933) seems like a piece out of context, the Scherzo (1937) is entirely convincing on its own. The performances are sympathetic and well recorded.

Olivier Messiaen French 1908-1992

GROVE Messiaen studied at the Paris Conservatoire (1919-30) with Dukas, Emmanuel and Dupré, and taught there (1941-78) while also serving as organist of La Trinité in Paris. Right from his first published work, the eight Preludes for piano (1929), he was using his own modal system, with its strong flavouring of tritones, diminished 7ths and augmented triads. During the 1930s he added a taste for rhythmic irregularity and for the rapid changing of intense colours, in both orchestral and organ works. Most of his compositions were explicitly religious and divided between characteristic styles of extremely slow meditation, bounding dance and the objective unfolding of arithmetical systems. They include the orchestral L'ascension (1933), the organ cycles La nativité du Seigneur (1935) and Les corps glorieux (1939), the song cycles Poèmes pour Mi (1936) and Chants de terre et de ciel (1938), and the culminating work of this period, the Quatuor pour la fin du temps for clarinet, violin, cello and piano (1941).

During the war he found himself surrounded by an eager group of students, including Boulez and Yvonne Loriod, who eventually became his second wife. For her pianistic brilliance he conceived the Visions de l'amen (1943, with a second piano part for himself) and the Vingt regards sur l'enfant Jésus (1944), followed by an exuberant triptych on the theme of erotic love: the song cycle Harawi (1945), the Turangalîla-symphonie with solo piano and ondes martenot (1948) and the Cinq rechants for small chorus (1949). Meanwhile the serial adventures of Boulez and others were also making a mark, and Messiaen produced his most abstract, atonal and irregular music in the Quatre études de rythme for piano (1949) and the Livre d'orgue (1951).

His next works were based largely on his own adaptations of birdsongs: they include Réveil des oiseaux for piano and orchestra (1953), Oiseaux exotiques for piano, wind and percussion (1956), the immense Catalogue d'oiseaux for solo piano (1958) and the orchestral Chronochromie (1960). In these, and in his Japanese postcards, Sept haïkaï for piano and small orchestra (1962), he continued to follow his junior contemporaries, but then returned to religious subjects in works that bring together all aspects of his music. These include another small-scale piano concerto, Couleurs de la cité céleste (1963), and monumental Et exspecto resurrectionem mortuorum for wind and percussion (1964). Thereafter he devoted himself to a sequence of works on the largest scale: the choral-orchestral La Transfiguration (1969), the organ volumes Méditations sur le mystère de la Sainte Trinité (1969), the 12-movement piano concerto Des canyons aux étoiles (1974) and the opera Saint François d'Assise (1983).

Et exspecto resurrectionem...

Et exspecto resurrectionem mortuorum.
Chronochromie. La ville d'en-haut
Cleveland Orchestra / Pierre Boulez
DG 445 827-2GH (58 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1993 ●

Boulez has spoken of his pleasure at performing Messiaen with an orchestra relatively unfamiliar with his music. It sounds as though the Cleveland Orchestra must have enjoyed it too. You would expect them to, perhaps, in such a passage as that in the fourth movement of Et exspecto, where the two superimposed plainchant melodies return together with the noble 'theme of the depths' – it has great splendour, as does the chorale melody of the finale, rising at the end to a satisfyingly palpable fffff. And in this performance of Chronochromie you can hear why Messiaen said that certain pages of it were 'a double homage to Berlioz and Pierre Schaeffer [the French pioneer of electronic music]'. Absolute rhythmic precision and the clarity of colour that comes from meticulous balance are among the other pleasures of these performances. They make a most satisfying coupling, too. The recordings are excellent: clean but not clinical and ample in range.

La Transfiguration

La Transfiguration de Notre Seigneur Jésus-Christ
Thomas Prévost fl Robert Fontaine cl Roger Muraro pf Françis Petit mari Renaud Muzzolini xylr Emmanuel Curt vib Eric Levionnois vc Radio France Chorus; Radio France Philharmonic Orchestra / Myung-Whun Chung
DG ② 471 569-2GH2 (100 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included. Recorded c2001 ●●

La Transfiguration is an important turning point in Messiaen's work, at once a sort of summation of what he had achieved so far and (in retrospect) a preparation for the richness of his late music, culminating in his opera Saint Francois d'Assise. There are, as ever, bird songs and glinting piano flourishes, Messiaen's characteristic, rich, 'coloured' harmonies and complex rhythms. But not for some while in his music had there been such resplendent tonal chorales and sonorous unisons.

Compared to most of his major works, however, this one has been seldom recorded. The reason no doubt is the enormous forces it demands: you could perhaps get by with fewer than the 68 strings that he stipulates, but you still need quadruple woodwind, six horns, six percussion players and seven instrumental soloists. And, most crucially, a large chorus (Messiaen suggested 100 singers) of whom vaultingly angular lines are sometimes required and who at one point are divided into 20 parts. Until now there have been only three recordings. Those by Antál Dorati and Reinbert de Leeuw are unavailable, but Karl Anton Rickenbacher's on Koch Schwann is admirable in most respects. Where Chung is superior is in his greater readiness to allow events time in which to register, and the solemn chorales which end each half of the work really do need to be as slow as he takes them; each chord needs to be savoured, and Rickenbacher doesn't quite do this. Chung also has an edge in sheer splendour of orchestral sound, aided by a recording which balances the large orchestra, the concertante group and the chorus very well indeed.

Turangalîla-symphonie

Turangalîla-symphonie. Quatuor pour la fin du temps
Saschko Gawriloff vn Siegfried Palm vc Hans Deinzer cl Aloys Kontarsky, Peter Donohoe pfs Tristan Murail ondes martenot
City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra / Sir Simon Rattle
EMI ② 747463-8 (130 minutes: DDD/ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1986 ●●

No longer a rarity in the concert hall, Messiaen's epic hymn to life and love has been lucky on record too. Messiaen's luxuriant scoring presents a challenge for the engineers as much as the players and the EMI team comes through with flying colours. Tristan Murail's ondes martenot is carefully balanced – evocative and velvety, neither reduced to inaudibility nor overmiked. Peter Donohoe's piano obbligato is similarly integrated into the orchestral tapestry yet provides just the right decorative intervention. Rattle is at his best in the work's more robust moments like the jazzy fifth movement and the rhythmic passages which recall Stravinsky's Le Sacre. But those unfamiliar with Messiaen's extraordinary score should perhaps start with the central slow movement, the beautiful Jardin du sommeil d'amour, exquisitely done by the Birmingham team. This Turangalîla leaves room, on a second CD, for a distinguished Quatuor pour la fin du temps. The music-making here lacks the youthful spontaneity of the main work, but is notable for an unusually slow and sustained performance of the solo-cello movement.

Turangalîla Symphony (1990 revised version)
Pierre-Laurent Aimard pf Dominique Kim onde
Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Kent Nagano
Teldec 8573 82043-2 (73 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded live in 2000 ◉

Turangalîla is a difficult score, and to record it live is risky. Even when the orchestra is the Berlin Philharmonic? Yes, since the work is very far from the centre of their repertoire. Whether despite or because of that risk this is a splendidly exciting performance; more surprisingly it is also for the most part a very accurate and detailed one. The textures and colours of the third movement are finely balanced, as they are even in the headlong exuberance of its successor. Although the precision of the seventh seems to understate its balefulness the complex textures and superimposed rhythms of the ninth are outstandingly clear and fascinating. Throughout one alternates between astonishment that the Berlin Philharmonic seem to have re-invented their sound and (often in passages of massive or exciting brass sonority) gratitude that they haven't.

The soloists are admirable; the extremes of the piano part, in particular, are just what Aimard is good at. Inevitably in a live recording there are one or two imprecisions of balance – the ondes martenot is slightly backward in the fourth movement, and some of the birds with whom Aimard converses in the sixth are rather far back in the shrubbery – but this is among the two or three best accounts of Turangalîla available. We would still give primacy to Simon Rattle's version on EMI, and recommend Previn's (also EMI) despite its rather bright sound, but Nagano is ahead of all the others.

Turangalîla Symphony[a]. L'ascension
[a]François Weigl pf [a]Thomas Bloch ondes martenot
Polish National Radio Symphony Orchestra / Antoni Wit
Naxos ② 8 554478/9 (107 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1998

No other 20th-century composition – nothing by Strauss or Scriabin or Hollywood's finest – outdoes the sublime earthiness of the Turangalîla Symphony. It is so unselfconsciously over-the-top as to be in a category of its own: even The Rite of Spring seems austere beside it. The trick in performance is for 100 or so musicians to sustain the illusion of transcendent spontaneity for 80 minutes, and with more than 70 CDs under their belt for Naxos alone, you might expect a touch of the perfunctory from the Polish National RSO.

Not a bit of it. With the indefatigable Antoni Wit in charge, the only places where this performance threatens to become routine are in the sixth movement, when more melting woodwind playing can be imagined. But one is willing to sacrifice the last degree of tonal and textural refinement for the strong contrasts and surging intensity offered here, and the sound is typically bold and forwardly balanced. Despite the generalised brightness which seems to be a Naxos trademark these days (so that the various strands of the texture are not ideally defined in very loud passages, and the solo piano grows clangorous here and there), the spirit of the music survives and prospers. The soloists are excellent, and if this particular ondes martenot is less sweetly vibrant than you have come to expect, so much the better: it still supplies the music with its special ecstatic radiance at crucial moments.

Wit's Turangalîla doesn't displace Previn's greatly admired version (see below) – its only rival in lower price categories. Nevertheless, Wit's coupling – an imposing account of Messiaen's early yet already characteristic L'ascension – is even more welcome than Previn's pair of Poulenc concertos, and devotees of Naxos's ongoing forays into 20th-century masterworks certainly shouldn't hesitate.

Additional recommendation
Turangalîla Symphony
Couplings: Poulenc Concert Champêtre. Organ Concerto
Beroff pf Loriod org
London Symphony Orchestra / Previn
EMI Double Forte ② 569752-2 Ⓑ
(129 minutes: ADD: 6/78^{R})
Also available (without couplings) on EMI DVD-Audio DVC4 92398-9

If you're happy with the couplings, Previn's is the top recommendation at less than full price.

Eclairs sur l'Au-Delà

Orchestra of the Opéra-Bastille, Paris / Myung-Whun Chung
DG 439 929-2GH (66 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1994

Eclairs sur L'Au-Delà ('Illuminations of the Beyond') was Messiaen's last major work. It is almost a summary, musical and spiritual, of the preoccupations of his preceding 60 years but shows him delightedly discovering not only new birds but also entrancingly new sounds: he has not made such startling use before of the contrabass clarinet (in the huge and complex eighth movement, which culminates in a Great Messiaen Tune of sonorous nobility), nor employed (to evoke the Lyrebird) such vertiginous leaps between sections of the orchestra. In one way, then, it is a series of nostalgic revisits. In the fourth movement, for example, there's a sort of two-minute summary of the extremely dense counterpoint of Chronochromie; the sixth recalls the 'Dance of fury for the seven trumpets' in the Quartet for the end of time. But there's also a touching sense of Messiaen in his eighties preparing to contemplate the beyond. In the ninth of the 11 movements he writes his last birdsong piece, 25 birds impersonated simultaneously by 18 woodwind instruments: the image is of Christ as the Tree of Life, the birds are the souls of the blessed, and of course they are all singing at once. He then considers 'The path to the invisible': it is a clamorous and insistent piece, one of his great angular toccatas, expressing the very difficulty of keeping to that path. Finally, most movingly, one of his almost motionless, beginningless and endless string chorales, 'Christ, Light of Paradise'. Chung has a fine orchestra, and the immaculate recording made in the Opéra-Bastille sounds spacious.

Quartet for the End of Time

Messiaen Quartet for the End of Time[a].
Le merle noir[b]
[b]Karlheinz Zöller fl Erich Gruenberg vn
Gervase de Peyer cl William Pleeth vc Michel Béroff, [b]Aloys Kontarsky pfs
EMI 763947-2 (51 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Notes, text and translation included
[a]Recorded 1968 ○○

This performance was the Quartet's first recording, and many still consider it to be its best. The four performers here do not constitute a regular ensemble but were brought together specifically to make this record. Young though he may have been at the time – just 20 – Michel Béroff proves himself a virtuoso of astonishing gifts and a mature musician. Indeed, it would be difficult to imagine the piano part better played. The other performers are just as excellent, each making the most of the 'solo' movements and playing well together. Special praise for Gruenberg's account of the final 'Louange à l'immortalité de Jésus': extremely slow and ecstatically tender, as directed, and very affecting on any level – one could be transported by the violin playing alone, let alone the work's religious significance. The complementary number for cello and piano, 'Louange à l'éternité de Jésus', isn't quite as fine: Pleeth plays it with splendid intensity but finds himself short of the last ounce of tone at the climax. De Peyer treats the unaccompanied clarinet movement, 'Abîme des oiseaux', with just the right amount of fantasy. The performance as a whole is particularly admirable for the way it penetrates the notes and enters Messiaen's sound world.

The ensemble's musical perception, its exact observation of every dynamic nuance, and the sheer tonal beauty of the players make this a most desirable disc, not to be missed.

Additional recommendation
Quartet for the End of Time
Vacellier cl J Pasquier vn E Pasquier vc Messiaen pf
Accord mono 461 744-2 (43 minutes: ADD: 8/60) Ⓕ

A long-awaited reissue of a legendary recording: these four players gave the first performance of the work in 1941. Messiaen's plain speaking allows the work's message to come through loud and clear.

Catalogue d'oiseaux

Roger Muraro pf Ⓕ
Accord ③ 465 768-2 (DDD) ●

Until recently the French Accord label was not available in the UK: hard luck for Roger Muraro, who seems to record primarily for that company; harder luck for us, since we have been kept in ignorance of a pianist of great gifts.

Muraro demonstrates both formidable pianism and an outstandingly imaginative response to Messiaen's imaginative world. The dynamic range is wide, the colouring often subtly beautiful, the virtuosity quite breathtaking at times. The virtuoso and the poet are in ideal balance here – magnificent rocky landscapes, vivid greens and blues! This is an outstanding reading throughout, and one can only echo the audience's applause after 'The Wood Lark' and their cheers at 'Cetti's Warbler'. Recommended.

Huit préludes

Huit préludes. Etudes de rythme – No 1, Ile de feu I; No 4, Ile de feu II. Vingt regards sur l'Enfant-Jésus – No 4, Regard de la Vierge; No 10, Regard de l'esprit de joie; No 15, Le baiser de l'Enfant-Jésus
Angela Hewitt pf
Hyperion CDA67054 (76 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1998

Hewitt has few equals in Messiaen. The very early Préludes (Messiaen was studying with Dukas when he wrote them) might not seem the ideal repertory in which to demonstrate this, but Hewitt plays them with such exquisitely controlled colour, such clarity and such eager love for the music that, if one had dared think of them as not wholly characteristic one immediately changes one's mind. Indeed they are full, certainly in this performance, of luminous, shot and shaded colours that are typical of the mature Messiaen, and in the final virtuoso number Hewitt seems even to have discovered an early draft for a theme in the Turangalîla Symphony. Her melodic lines are strong, her sonorities rich (but her loud playing is never noisy or forced) and she has that crucial quality needed of a Messiaen pianist: patience. Patience to let a chord register and fade, patience never to pre-empt a climax. In the two Ile de feu pieces she shows that she can produce hard-edged sonorities as well as subtle ones. And all her gifts as a Messiaen pianist are evident in 'Le baiser de l'Enfant-Jésus': the tempo is patient, the contemplation rapt, the embellishments delicately precise, with a magical change of colour as the sunlit hortus conclusus at the centre of the movement is reached. The recording is finely sensitive to the exceptional beauty of Hewitt's sound.

Vingt regards sur l'enfant Jésus

Pierre-Laurent Aimard pf
Teldec ② 3984-26868-2 (116 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1999 ●●

One ought to begin any review of the Vingt regards by discussing how well the pianist conveys the cycle's visionary awe and builds its disparate sections into a true cycle. But here the virtuosity is so remarkable that one could well imagine even listeners with a profound distaste for Messiaen – for whom the 15th Regard ('The kiss of the infant Jesus') is a by-word for sentimental religiosity – listening open-mouthed. Sheer virtuosity is an important part of the cycle's language: one of the functions of Regard No 6 ('By Him all was made') is to astonish, and the power and excitement of Aimard's playing are indeed astonishing. Virtuosity is also desirable if Messiaen's demands for a huge palette of colour and orchestral or super-orchestral sonorities are to be met. In No 14 ('The gaze of the angels') his notes evoke 'powerful blasts of immense trombones' and Aimard's prodigious range of timbre and dynamic provide just the sound that Messiaen must have imagined. In the penultimate Regard, Messiaen makes a more extreme demand: that in the hushed coda the player should recall a passage from the Fioretti of St Francis where 'the angel drew his bow across the string and produced a note so sweet that if he had continued I should have died of joy'. Here the effect is suggested not by virtuosity but intense concentration, stillness and purity of colour. Could it have been a little slower? Possibly; Aimard's timing is faster than most and a few of his silences could have been held longer but his dazzling technique and fabulous range of colour make this the most spectacular reading of the Vingt regards yet.

Vingt Regards sur l'enfant Jésus
Steven Osborne pf
Hyperion ② CDA67351/2 (127 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded c2001 ●●●

Steven Osborne faces a tough job in Messiaen's Vingt Regards: not only music of exceptional difficulty but a score of which there are seven rival recordings currently available, six of them very good indeed. Even the finest, though, provoke very slight reservations: an occasional suspicion of hurry in Pierre-Laurent Aimard's outstanding account, a few misjudgments in Roger Muraro's, and so on. There are no such reservations about Osborne's reading. Indeed, there are two reasons for saluting this new set: because it is an extremely fine performance of the Vingt Regards and because it reveals a pianist of exceptional gifts.

Messiaen's widow, Yvonne Loriod, invited Osborne to study the work with her after she heard him playing other music by her late husband. One can hear throughout not only her influence but, even more, the qualities in his playing that led her to make the offer. His command of sonority is prodigious: if you have never been able to take Messiaen's talk about the 'colour' of particular chords seriously Osborne's playing may change your mind. He also has a remarkable dynamic range, and these two qualities combine to provide both clarity and a tremendous climax in the virtuoso quasi-fugal textures of No 6 ('By Him was everything made') and, at the other end of the spectrum, to make perfect sense of Messiaen's description of the opening bars of No 17 ('The Gaze of Silence'): 'The music seems to emerge from silence as colours emerge from the night.'

Nor is he insensible to the fact that some of the Regards are frankly showy. No 10 ('Gaze of the Spirit of Joy') is dazzling; No 16 ('Gaze of the Prophets, the Shepherds and the Magi') is barbarously colourful. Perhaps most significant of all, he finds in No 15 ('The kiss of the child Jesus') not only the sweet quietness of its opening but the spectacular Lisztian display of its later pages. Osborne is a very complete pianist indeed, and the recording is ideally responsive to the sheer range of sound that he draws from the instrument.

Additional recommendation
Complete Keyboard Works
Hill pf
Regis ⑦ RRC7001 (8 hours 5 minutes: DDD) Ⓑ
Recorded mid 1980s (also available separately)

Peter Hill delivers immaculate readings of some of the most technically and philosophically challenging works in the repertoire. Landmark recordings at the time, they remain an impressive achievement. The series enjoyed the close support of Messiaen, and you can hear why. The only gripe is the sound in the early volumes, which occasionally suffers from too close a recording.

Complete Organ Works

Jennifer Bate org
Regis ⑥ RRC6001 (454 minutes: DDD) Ⓑ
Played on the organs of L'Eglise de la Sainte-Trinité, Paris and St Pierre de Beauvais Cathedral, France. Recorded 1981, 1983 and 1987 ●

Olivier Messiaen was of towering importance to the world of 20th-century music. Yet the seven-and a-half hours of his compositions for organ are a salutary reminder of how little time he had for that century's secular and humanistic aspirations. The unwavering aura of the Catholic faith radiated by this music can, for less committed listeners, veer dangerously close to obsessive fanaticism, so it is therefore only right and proper that recordings of the organ works should be made in church, not concert hall or studio. Jennifer Bate made the first recording of Messiaen's last and longest cycle, Livre du Saint Sacrement, switching from Beauvais to the composer's own Parisian church, Sainte-Trinité. Though hailed as 'a monumental achievement' when new, later judgements have been more critical. But Bate's set stands up well, especially in the Livre du Saint Sacrement, where she relishes the extraordinary diversity of material and mood even more intensely than the cooler though never-less-than commanding Olivier Latry (DG). The other large-scale later cycle, Méditations sur le mystère de la Sainte Trinité, reinforces this basic distinction between the two interpreters, and although Latry has the more refined instrument and the more sophisticated recording, his slow tempos (Messiaen never gives metronome marks) can seem too slow, as in the eighth Méditation, 'Dieu est simple – les Trois sont Un'. All in all, Bate's set makes an excellent bargain-price recommendation.

La nativité du Seigneur

La Nativité du Seigneur. Apparition de l'église éternelle. Le banquet céleste.
Gillian Weir org
Priory PRCD921 (75 minutes: DDD)
Played on the 1928 Frobenius organ of
Århus Cathedral, Denmark. Recorded 1994 ●●

These performances remain outstanding. Remastered, the recordings made in Århus Cathedral are a model of how to combine atmosphere and clarity in this music, and no other player seems quite to equal Weir's remarkable identification with the reflective and dramatically explosive extremes of Messiaen's idiom. At the risk of being accused of heresy, this reviewer must admit to doubting whether La Nativité du Seigneur really works as a compositional whole, given the surely undeniable imbalance between mediative and more dynamic music. But Gillian Weir evidently has no doubts, sustaining the long, quiet episodes with particular sensitivity and irresistible conviction: if you are to perform the work complete, this is how it has to be.

So, despite the achievements of both Latry (on DG) and Bate (reviewed below) across the full range of Messiaen's organ works, Gillian Weir's performances again claim the definitive status which they were accorded when they were first released.

La nativité du Seigneur. Le banquet céleste
Jennifer Bate org
Unicorn-Kanchana DKPCD9005 (62 minutes: DDD).
Recorded on the organ of Beauvais Cathedral Ⓕ
in 1980 ●

La nativité du Seigneur comprises nine meditations on themes associated with the birth of the Lord. Messiaen's unique use of registration gives these pieces an extraordinarily wide range of colour and emotional potency and in Jennifer Bate's hands (and feet) it finds one of its most persuasive advocates. Bate was much admired by the composer and is so far the only organist to have recorded his complete works for the instrument. Le banquet céleste was Messiaen's first published work for the organ and is a magical, very slow-moving meditation on a verse from St John's Gospel (VI, 56). The faithful recording captures both the organ and the large acoustic of Beauvais Cathedral to marvellous effect.

Poèmes pour Mi

Poèmes pour Mi. Réveil des oiseaux. Sept Haïkaï
Françoise Pollet sop Pierre-Laurent Aimard, Joela Jones pfs Cleveland Orchestra / Pierre Boulez
DG 453 478-2GH (72 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included
Recorded 1990s ●

All the performances here are excellent, virtuoso indeed, and the recordings are first-class. Poèmes pour Mi represent Messiaen at his most lyrically passionate and sensuous, the Réveil des oiseaux his 'bird style' at its most intransigent, while the Sept Haïkaï stand both for Messiaen's love-affair with Asia and his attempts to convey vivid colour in music.

In Françoise Pollet the Poèmes get as close as any reading has to Messiaen's specification of a grand soprano dramatique as the ideal solo voice. She can sustain a long arch of melody splendidly and, assisted by Boulez's firm control, generates great rhythmic excitement in the fourth and ninth songs of the set. This latter quality gives exhilaration to Réveil des oiseaux, as the tangle of exuberant melodies grows ever more complex; Aimard is glitteringly precise here. But it is the Sept Haïkaï that are most crucial to Messiaen's later development, with their pairs of movements reflecting each other, their searing saturated colours, their use of juxtaposed 'refrains' and their central homage to the sound of a Japanese orchestra.

Boulez has expressed reservations about some of his great teacher's theories, but evidently has few if any about the fantastic sound world imagined by his astonishingly precise ear.

Saint François d'Assise

Dawn Upshaw sop L'Ange; José Van Dam bass-bar Saint François; Chris Merritt ten Le Lépreux; Urban Malmberg bar Frère Léon; John Aler ten Frère Massée; Guy Renard ten Frère Elie; Tom Krause bar Frère Bernard; Akos Banlaky ten Frère Sylvestre; Dirk d'Ase bass Frère Rufin
Jeanne Loriod, Valerie Hartmann-Claverie, Dominique Kim ondes martenots;

Arnold Schoenberg Choir;
Hallé Orchestra / Kent Nagano
DG 20/21 ④ 445 176-2GH4 (236 minutes: DDD).
Notes, text and translation included. Ⓕ
Recorded live 1998 ●●

The breakthrough for Messiaen's only opera came with the Salzburg Festival production unveiled in August 1992, Esa-Pekka Salonen conducting. Van Dam and his monks still wore habits, but Peter Sellars's production concept broke with the composer's 'realistic' Umbrian spectacle to put Dawn Upshaw's Angel in a grey business suit, while his trademark video monitors relayed associated imagery. He even invented a second Angel, one who doesn't exist in the score, an Angel who dances and mimes.

Nagano took up the reins for the 1998 Salzburg revival as captured here in DG's live recording, and there is no mistaking the remarkable authority and technical self-confidence of the results. Van Dam's definitive Saint François is a remarkable achievement for an artist on the cusp of his sixth decade and his identification with the role is profound. Upshaw too is well cast, with just enough tonal weight to underpin her fresh, ardent, mobile singing. It's mostly plain sailing in the subsidiary roles, although Malmberg's French is still as dodgy as the choir's. The musicians of the Hallé have been drilled to the peak of perfection, closely scrutinised by vivid, upfront sound that does not always give their glittering sonorities a natural perspective in which to expand.

All Messiaen's trademarks are here: the birdsong, the modal rigour (especially for the word setting which is crystal clear), the basic triads given new harmonic context and heft, the post-Stravinskian dances. There are also distant echoes of Boris Godunov and Pelléas et Mélisande.

Uninitiated listeners should perhaps try Act 1 scene 3 (the curing of the leper) where the mosaic construction permits a breathtaking conjunction of ideas from timeless chant through 1960s modernism, to childlike eruptions of joy and premonitions of holy minimalism.

Saint François d'Assise can make Parsifal seem like an intermezzo, but it exerts a uniquely hypnotic spell. Strongly recommended.

Giacomo Meyerbeer

German 1791-1864

GROVE Meyerbeer was born into a wealthy Jewish merchant family in Berlin and studied composition with Zelter (1805), B. A. Weber (1808) and Abbé Vogler in Darmstadt (1810-11), winning success more as a pianist than a composer. After a study tour in Italy (1816-25), where he met artists, librettists and impresarios and wrote six notable operas (especially the impressive Il crociato in Egitto, 1824), he gained a reputation equal to Rossini's. From 1825 he worked chiefly in Paris but was always on the move, taking cures, producing his operas in major European cities and auditioning new singers; in 1842, indisputably the world's leading active opera composer, he became Prussian Generalmusikdirektor – he was dismissed in 1848 but directed the Berlin royal court music until his death. Having first conquered the Paris Opéra with the five-act Robert le diable (1831), he and his most important collaborator Eugène Scribe created the famous Les Huguenots (1836), then began work on Le prophète and L'africaine, both of which suffered long delays from casting difficulties; Le prophète was eventually received enthusiastically with Pauline Viardot as Fidès (1849), while the première of L'africaine (1865) became a brilliant posthumous tribute to its composer.

Cultivating a consistently realistic style, 'expressive monumentalism', Meyerbeer conceived of grand opera as a whole, blending social content, historical material and local colour; exploitation of the horrific was an essential ingredient, along with massive crowd scenes building up a grandiose volume of sound and long passages of demanding solo singing. But these were allied to innovations, notably in the orchestra and in the deliberate creation of 'unbeautiful' sound. He was widely admired for his care over historical details, his melodic invention in ballet scenes and his grasp of the capabilities of individual singers.

Opera arias

Il crociato in Egitto – Queste destre l'acciaro di morte[a]; Ah! Non ti son piú cara[b]; Cara mano dell'amore[c]; Sogni, e ridenti[d]. Emma di Resburgo – Di gioja, di pace[e]. L'esule di Granata – Sí, mel credi[f]. Margherita d'Anjou[g] – Pensa e guarda; Amico, all erta! Romilda e Costanza – Che barbaro tormento[h]. Semiramide riconosciuta – Il piacer, la gioja scenda[i]
[eh]Bronwen Mills, [d]Linda Kitchen, [e]Maria Bovino, [bdi]Yvonne Kenny sops [h]Anne Mason, [bde]Diana Montague, [f]Patricia Spence, [cd]Della Jones mezs [ad]Bruce Ford, [h]Chris Merritt, [e]Harry Nicoll, [e]Paul Nilon, [d]Ugo Benelli tens [eg]Geoffrey Dolton, [d]Ian Platt, [g]Russell Smythe bars [fg]Alastair Miles bass Geoffrey Mitchell Choir; [a-d]Royal Philharmonic Orchestra; [e-i]Philharmonia Orchestra / David Parry
Opera Rara ORR222 (69 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes included. Recorded 1990-95

Meyerbeer, born 1791, was in Italy from 1816 to 1824. On this showing, one is tempted to think he should have stayed there. He is remembered, of course, for the big Paris operas, principally Les Huguenots, Le prophète and L'Africaine, hugely successful in their time but latterly somewhat buried in their own grandeur. The Italian period was nearer to the 18th century and Mozart. There was also the presence of Rossini (almost exactly Meyerbeer's age); and the music is that of a young man, gifted, energetic, confident and wealthy. The operas were admired and, remarkably, he himself was accepted by the public, despite being a German and having an unfashionable interest in orchestration.

These excellent selections include something of all six operas from the eight years in Italy, with Il crociato in Egitto returning regularly like the theme in a rondo. All the recordings are drawn from previous issues in the Opera Rara catalogue. One of the most attractive numbers is the semi-comic trio from Margherita d'Anjou in which Margaret's protectors pit their wits against those of Richard, Duke of Gloucester. In fact, it seems fairly typical of Meyerbeer at this stage: his genius seems to lie in the light touch, the graceful phrase, the felicitous orchestral scoring; if there is a weakness, it is revealed in the grandly dramatic moments, for which his music remains incorrigibly jolly.

The other great delight of the disc is the singing. Meyerbeer's vocal line, like Rossini's, is written for virtuosi, and that, almost without exception, is a description to which the soloists can lay claim. Each has to negotiate passage-work of a kind that half a century ago would have made everybody shake their head and say it couldn't be done by 'today's' singers. Bruce Ford, particularly, performs wonders in the revised (Trieste) version of Crociato; Alistair Miles is on top form in L'esule di Granata; but all do well, carrying off their respective prizes with easy competence and no fuss.

Nikolay Miaskovsky Russian 1881-1950

GROVE Miaskovsky studied for a military career but entered the St Petersburg Conservatory (1906-11), where his teachers included Lyadov and Rimsky-Korsakov. He served in the war, and from 1921 taught at the Moscow Conservatory. He was not an innovator but was an influential, individual figure working within the Russian tradition. His large output is dominated by the cycle of 27 symphonies (1908-50), highly regarded in and outside Russia in his lifetime. He also wrote 13 string quartets (1913-49), choral and chamber music.

Cello Concerto, Op 66

Miaskovsky Cello Concerto in C minor, Op 66
Prokofiev Symphony-Concerto for Cello and Orchestra in E minor, Op 125. (also includes alternative finale)
Truls Mørk vc City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra / Paavo Järvi
Virgin Classics 545282-2 (72 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997

Whichever way you view it – as attractive repertoire, as dynamic sound, or as distinctive interpretation – this CD is a sure-fire winner. Neither work yields its strongest virtues without encouragement: the Prokofiev responds best to focused solo phrasing and firm handling from the rostrum, while Miaskovsky's concerto can too easily sound discursive. Here, however, musical impact takes effect right from Prokofiev's introductory bars: Paavo Järvi and his players cut a commanding profile and the recording conveys a startlingly realistic sound stage, especially from the lower strings. Truls Mørk might be tagged a 'communicative introvert': his tone is firm and even, his phrasing refined and his poetic musicianship especially suits the Miaskovsky concerto, with its subtle asides and winding musical lines. Again, Järvi comes up trumps with a sympathetic accompaniment and the recording is spectacularly good.

Sinfonietta No 1

Sinfonietta No 1 in B minor, Op 32 No 2. Theme and Variations. Two Pieces, Op 46 No 1. Napeve
St Petersburg Chamber Ensemble / Roland Melia
ASV CDDCA928 (56 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1994

Miaskovsky's Variations are consistently attractive, as are the shorter works, despite disconcerting reminiscences of the Skye Boat Song in the first of the Op 46 Pieces. That's not to say that the music 'holds' you in the way that Stravinsky, Martinů, Honegger or Tippett do. And, as so often with Miaskovsky, there are slack moments where ideas seem to be coming back for no better reason than to fill out a pre-allocated space. The fact remains that if you have got the Miaskovsky bug, or if you want the fullest possible picture of middle-of-the-road Soviet music, you will find confident, full-bodied performances here which are the equal of any.

Darius Milhaud French 1892-1974

GROVE Milhaud studied with Widor, Gédalge and Dukas at the Paris Conservatoire and became associated with Claudel, who took him to Rio de Janeiro as his secretary (1916-18): he wrote incidental music for Claudel's translation of the Oresteia (1922), making innovatory use of chanting chorus and percussion; he also drew on Brazilian music in his ballet L'homme et son désir (1918). But Claudel's influence was briefly succeeded by Cocteau's, and he became a member of Les Six; works of this period include the ballet Le boeuf sur le toit (1919). In 1922 he sought out jazz in Harlem and used the experience in another ballet, Le création du monde (1923). Thereafter he travelled widely, taught on both sides of the Atlantic and produced a colossal output in all genres, normally in a style of fluent bitonality. His operas include Les malheurs d'Orphée (composed1925), Le pauvre matelot (1926), Christophe Colomb (1928), Maximilien (1930), Bolivar (1943), David (1952) and Saint Louis (1970). There are also 12 symphonies and much other orchestral music, sacred and secular choral music, 18 quartets and songs.

Le boef sur le toit / La création du monde

La création du monde. Harp Concerto, Op 323.
Le boeuf sur le toit, Op 58.

Frédérique Cambreling hp
Lyon Opéra Orchestra / Kent Nagano
Erato MusiFrance 2292-45820-2 (59 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1992

Here is music to delight, with performances to match. Milhaud's ballet Le boeuf sur le toit was written for Jean Cocteau in 1919 and is set in an American bar during the Prohibition period (forbidding the manufacture and sale of alcohol) that was then just beginning. Kent Nagano shows more Gallic taste and sophistication, and the playing is above all musicianly, while the more uproarious moments come over all the more effectively for this very reason. The playing by the accomplished Lyon orchestra is excellent, not least the wind players who have plenty to do. Written four years later, La création du monde was one of the first works by a European composer to take its inspiration from African folklore and the raw black jazz that Milhaud heard in New Orleans. This ballet on the creation myth ends with a mating dance and the whole work is powerfully and darkly sensual. Nagano and his French orchestra bring out all the character of this music and take the jazz fugue in Scene 1 more urgently than usual, to excellent effect. The Harp Concerto dates from 1953, three decades further on into Milhaud's career, and inevitably it has a brighter character, though here, too, there is some jazz influence, if of a gentler kind. Cambreling is a fine player – an ideal interpreter of this uneven but nearly always fascinating composer.

Milhaud Le boeuf sur le toit, Op 58. La création du monde
Ibert Divertissement Poulenc Les biches – Suite
Ulster Orchestra / Yan Pascal Tortelier
Chandos CHAN9023 (68 minutes: DDD). Ⓕ
Recorded 1991

Here is 1920s French music directed by a conductor who is completely in the spirit of it, and plenty of spirit there is, too. Except for Ibert's Divertissement, this is ballet music. Poulenc's suite from Les biches, written for Diaghilev's ballet company and first heard in Monte Carlo, is fresh and bouncy and stylishly played here, although Chandos's warm recording, good though it is, takes some edge off the trumpet tone; the genial nature of it all makes us forget that it is a unique mix of 18th-century galanterie, Tchaikovskian lilt and Poulenc's own inimitable street-Parisian sophistication and charm. As for Ibert's piece, this is uproariously funny in an unbuttoned way, and the gorgeously vulgar trombone in the Waltz and frantic police whistle in the finale are calculated to make you laugh out loud. Milhaud's Le boeuf sur le toit also has Parisian chic and was originally a kind of music-hall piece, composed to a scenario by Cocteau. It was while attending a performance of it in London in 1920 that the composer first heard the American jazz orchestra that, together with a later experience of New Orleans jazzmen playing 'from the darkest corners of the Negro soul' (as he later expressed it), prompted him to compose his masterly ballet La création du monde. Tortelier and his orchestra understand this strangely powerful music no less than the other pieces. This is a most desirable disc.

Violin Sonatas

Saudades do Brasil, Op 67 – Leme; Ipanema (arr Lévy). Suite for Violin, Viola and Piano, Op 157*b*. Quatre Visages, Op 238. Sonatine for Violin and Viola, Op 226. Sonatas for Viola and Piano – No 1, Op 240; No 2, Op 244. Sonatine for Viola and Cello, Op 378
Paul Cortese va Michel Wagemans pf with Joaquín Palomares vn Frank Schaffer vc
ASV CDDCA1039 (78 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997

Paul Cortese here brings his rich, warm tone and flawless technique to Milhaud's viola music. Of the seven works presented here, four were written in the 1940s while Milhaud was teaching at Mills College in the USA. Exceptions are the two arrangements from the early Saudades do Brasil; the Suite (which includes a jaunty Provençal-flavoured overture, and an engagingly cheery finale); and the much later Sonatine for violin and cello (played here with great finesse), which contains an unexpectedly emotional slow movement. Of the four other works, the Sonatine is easy-flowing small-talk, un-memorable save for the energetic final fugue; Quatre Visages, however, reveals Milhaud's sly wit in its characterisations of four women – a sunnily contented Californian, a chatterbox from Wisconsin, an earnest creature from Brussels and a vivacious Parisienne. The First Viola Sonata is one of his most endearing works. It has Milhaud indulging to the full his penchant for canonic writing. The Second Sonata is less overtly bracing, and its central Modéré is charged with expressive drama, while the finale is a rough-and-tumble which tempts Michel Wagemans, alert as he is, into being too loud for his partner – as he sometimes is elsewhere, notably in the early Suite. But, all in all, this disc does Milhaud proud.

Scaramouche (arr two pianos)

Le boeuf sur le toit, Op 58*a* (arr cpsr). Scaramouche, Op 165*b*. La libertadora, Op 236*a*. Les songes, Op 237. Le bal martiniquais, Op 249. Carnaval à la nouvelle-orléans, Op 275. Kentuckiana, Op 287
Stephen Coombs, Artur Pizarro pfs
Hyperion CDA67014 (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997

Milhaud was an inveterate traveller, and he absorbed influences from many national styles. The music here exudes infectious dance impulses, languid geniality, knockabout humour and sheer joie de vivre. It may inhabit a limited expressive sphere, but providing you don't expect introspection or searching profundity you won't be disappointed. There is enjoyment at every turn, whether in the foot-tapping 'Brazileira', the Satie-esque simplicity of the 'Valse' from Les songes, or the breezy music-hall atmosphere of Le boeuf sur le toit, with its wonderfully imaginative piano writing. The performances are exemplary. Stephen Coombs and Artur Pizarro both enjoy the byways of the piano repertory, and, even if Pizarro is the more starry soloist, they are well matched as a duo. Coombs's top part is suitably bright and sharply lit, and is offset by Pizarro's more subtle colouring. They revel in the protracted playfulness of Le boeuf sur le toit (the only work here for piano duet, incidentally, although there is if anything a greater wealth of inner detail than in the two-piano works), where their feeling for Hispanic exoticism is matched by their virtuosity. The recorded sound is excellent.

Ernest Moeran British 1894-1950

GROVE Moeran studied at the Royal College of Music (1913-14) then, after war service, with Ireland (until 1923) who, with Delius, was a dominant influence on his early music. In the early 1930s he retired to the Cotswolds, where he wrote his Symphony in G minor (1937), a work of Nature lyricism drawing on Sibelian thematic methods. His other works, all marked by meticulous craftsmanship, include the Sinfonietta (1944) and orchestral Serenade (1948), concertos for violin (1942) and cello (1945), chamber music and songs.

String Quartets

String Quartets – No 1 in A minor; No 2 in E flat. String Trio in G
Maggini Quartet (Laurence Jackson, David Angel vns Martin Outram va Michal Kaznowski vc)
Naxos 8 554079 (59 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1995 ●

The A minor Quartet dates from 1921 when Moeran was a pupil of John Ireland at the Royal College of Music. It is an enormously fluent, folk-song-inspired creation, full of Ravelian poise; indeed the last movement of the three (an exhilarating rondo) owes much to the finale of the French master's F major Quartet. The Maggini Quartets accords the piece wonderfully assured, flexible advocacy. Discovered among Moeran's papers by his widow after his death in 1950, the E flat Quartet appears to be another comparatively early effort. It is cast in just two movements, the second of which is an ambitious linked slow movement and finale, full of ambition and tender fantasy, and containing some truly magical inspiration along the way. Perhaps this movement's intrepid thematic and emotional diversity engendered sufficient niggling doubts in Moeran's mind for him to suppress the whole work. Certainly, in a performance as convinced and convincing as this, its melodic fecundity and unpretentious, 'out of doors' charm will endear it to many. That leaves the masterly String Trio of 1931, which, in its impeccable craft, rhythmic pungency (the opening Allegretto giovale boasts a time-signature of 7/8), gentle sense of purpose and unerring concentration (above all in the deeply felt slow movement), represents one of Moeran's finest achievements. The Magginis reveal a relish for Moeran's exquisitely judged part-writing and give an admirably polished, affectionate rendering. Sound and balance are excellent throughout this enterprising, hugely enjoyable collection.

Further listening
Bax String Quartet No 1
Couplings: Piano Quartet. Harp Quintet
McCabe pf Kanga hp English String Quartet
Chandos CHAN8391 (53 minutes: DDD: 4/87) Ⓕ
Dating from 1918, the first movement of Bax's First Quartet conveys an uncomplicated happiness, while the finale is a wild Irish dance.

Federico Mompou Spanish 1893-1987

GROVE Mompou studied in Barcelona and with Motte-Lacroix and Samuel-Rousseau in Paris, where he remained until 1941 except for a return to Barcelona in 1914-21; he then settled in his native city. His output consists almost entirely of small-scale piano pieces and songs in a fresh, naive style indebted to Satie and Debussy; he aimed for maximum expressiveness through minimum means, often achieving a melancholy elegance.

Música callada

Herbert Henck pf
ECM New Series 445 699-2 (63 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1993

Listening to this disc is rather like entering a retreat. There is a rapt, contemplative atmosphere around these 28 miniatures written between 1959 and 1967 as an attempt to express St John of the Cross's mystic ideal of 'the music of silence'. Practically all slow-moving, using repetition as a structural device but avoiding keyboard virtuosity, and rarely rising even to a forte, they seem to acknowledge descent from Erik Satie via the impressionists, though harmonically much freer and sometimes harsher – even, occasionally, stepping inside the area of atonality. No 3 has a childlike innocence in its folkloric theme: Mompou's fascination with bell-sounds finds echoes in Nos 5, 17 and 22. Overall there is a sense of tranquil self-communion which, paradoxically, exerts a strange spell on the listener. Herbert Henck, a specialist in 20th-century music, plays this collection with tender sensitivity and an ideally suited luminosity of tone, and he is finely recorded. An exceptional and haunting issue.

Preludes

Awards 1998

Cançons i danses – Nos 1, 3, 5, 7, 8 and 9. Preludes – Nos 1, 5, 6, 7, 9 and 10. Cants mágics. Charmes. Variations. Dialogues. Paisajes
Stephen Hough pf
Hyperion CDA66963 (77 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996 OOO

The music of Federico Mompou may appear at first to consist of little more than charming, delicately scented but dilettantish salon near-improvisations with marked overtones of Erik Satie; but it is significant that his earliest works (in the 1920s) are imbued with a sense of mystery and wonder. Later he was to progress from an ingenuous lyricism (in the Songs and dances) to a profounder contemplation and mysticism, to greater harmonic and keyboard complexity (Dialogues) and finally, in the 1946-60 Paisajes ('Landscapes'), to a more experimental, less tonal idiom. In the hands of an imaginative pianist like Stephen Hough this other-worldly quality becomes revelatory. Hough's command of tonal nuance throughout is ultra-sensitive, he catches Mompou's wistful moods to perfection, and on the rare occasions when the music lashes out, as in Prelude No 7, he is scintillating. In the more familiar Songs and dances he is tender in the songs and crisp rhythmically in the dances. He treats the 'Testament d'Amelia' in No 8 with a good deal of flexibility, and because Mompou declared (and demonstrated in his own recordings) that 'it's all so free', he takes the fullest advantage of the marking senza rigore in No 5, which reflects Mompou's lifelong fascination with bell-sounds.

12 Préludes. Suburbis. Dialogues. Cants magics. Chanson de berceau. Fêtes lointaines
Jordi Masó pf Ⓢ
Naxos 8 554448 (79 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1998

Vol 1 of Jordi Masó's Mompou cycle was given the warmest of welcomes and Vol 2 is no disappointment, either. Everything is presented with crystalline clarity, and if the manner is unusually robust it is never less than musicianly. Directions such as énergiquement and très clair (Prélude No 2), the forte climax of Prélude No 6 or the sudden blaze of anger that erupts in Prélude No 7 are arguably more sympathetically conveyed than Mompou's gentler, more characteristic instructions (con lirica espressione in Prélude No 8 or un peu plus calme in the second 'Gitanes' from Suburbis). It is almost as if Masó, a vibrant and articulate pianist, wished to draw attention away from sentimental or salon associations, and direct us towards Mompou's underlying fervour and what Wilfrid Mellors calls (in his invaluable book Le jardin retrouvé) the 'pre-melodic' nature of Mompou's vocal lines (in Cants magics) or the evocation of a remote, prehistoric world (see Stephen Hough's notes to his Gramophone Award-winning Hyperion disc). Masó's boldness is potent and arresting and his comprehensive undertaking makes comparison with Hough and Martin Jones a marginal issue. So although he is less tonally subtle than Jones, his playing is vital and idiomatic, qualities highlighted by the bright, immediate sound.

Jean-Joseph de Mondonville

French 1711-1772

GROVE In the 1730s violinist and composer Mondonville was in Lille; then he settled in Paris, where he won fame as soloist and composer. He became sous-maître to the royal chapel in 1740 and intendant in 1744. His music is notable for its imaginative textures. Best known were his sonatas for harpsichord and violin (1734), among the earliest accompanied keyboard music, and those for harpsichord, violin and voice (1748); his 17 grands motets (among the finest since Lalande's and like his, much performed at the Concert Spirituel) and 10 stage works (1742-71) were also popular.

Six Sonates en symphonies, Op 3

Les Musiciens du Louvre / Marc Minkowski 🅿
Archiv Produktion 457 600-2AH (58 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

These pieces show Mondonville in a position to offer something unique. He was a violinist first and foremost, and his most important legacy is his Op 3 set of six sonatas for violin and obbligato keyboard of 1734 – among the first of their kind – of which these Sonates en symphonies are orchestrations, made by the composer and performed with great success in Paris 15 years later. Put simply, they are pure enjoyment throughout, breathing that spirit of almost pure hedonism which characterizes the most beguiling of mid-18th-century French art. All the symphonies are in three movements, the outer ones being brisk and animated with much busy passagework surviving the transition from solo violin music very effectively, and the middle ones tuneful miniatures evoking the hushed atmosphere of a balmy night scene from a French Baroque opera. Minkowski's dramatic skills help him create a magical atmosphere in these, while his galvanizing energy lends boisterous life to the quick movements. The orchestra plays superbly. These are utterly delightful recordings..

Grands motets

Grands motets – Dominus regnavit; In exitu Israel; De profundis 🅿

Sophie Daneman, Maryseult Wieczorek sops
Paul Agnew, François Piolino tens
Maarten Koningsberger bar François Bazola bass
Les Arts Florissants / William Christie
Erato 0630-17791-2 (72 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included
Recorded 1996 ●

Mondonville's grands motets were enormously popular for many years at the Concert Spirituel in Paris (of which he was a director for a time). They follow the pattern laid down by Lalande and continued by Rameau, but with more independent instrumental parts and incorporating Italian influences (e.g. da capo arias) and operatic elements. These three on psalm texts are deeply impressive. Dominus regnavit (1734) was perhaps the earliest of Mondonville's grands motets and, besides its polyphonic opening chorus, is notable for two verses entirely for high-register voices and instruments, an operatic tempête, and a stunning complex 'Gloria patri'. De profundis (1748), written for the funeral of a Chapel Royal colleague, is by its nature sombre, and ends not with the usual 'Gloria patri' but with 'Requiem aeternam' and a fugue. The initial chorus was praised to the sky by contemporaries as 'sublime': other highlights are a baritone aria over a free chaconne bass, and a chorus illustrating 'morning' and 'night' by high and low voices respectively. There is even more illustrative music in the 1755 In exitu Israel: what amounts to a dramatic scena, with agitated strings and rushing voices for the 'fleeing sea', dotted figures for the mountains 'skipping like rams', and tremolos and vocal melismas for the 'trembling earth'. The performances are vivid, with very good soloists, an alertly responsive chorus and a neat orchestra.

Philippe de Monte Flemish 1521-1603

GROVE Flemish composer. He was a choirboy at Mechlin and then served the Pinelli family in Naples (1542-51). In 1554 he was in Antwerp and then England (where he met Byrd), serving in the private chapel of Philip II of Spain (Mary Tudor's husband). He was next in Rome, probably with Cardinal Orsini, and from 1568 until his death he was Kapellmeister at the Habsburg court in Vienna (later Prague). Prolific, successful and progressive in outlook, he composed over 1100 madrigals in 34 books (1554-1600, often reprinted), spiritual madrigals (5 bks, 1581-93) and chansons (1585), as well as some 40 masses (mostly MS) and over 250 motets (10 bks, 1572-1600).

Missa Aspice Domine

Missa Aspice Domine. Factum est silentium.
Miserere mei, Domine. Pie Jesu, virtus mea.
Clamavi de tribulatione mea. O suavitas et dulcedo
J de Mantua Aspice Domine

Christ Church Cathedral Choir, Oxford / Stephen Darlington
Metronome METCD1037 (58 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

What a feast for lovers of Renaissance polyphony, and the only available recording of Philippe de Monte's parody mass, Missa Aspice Domine. In general, Stephen Darlington adopts a faster tempo for the Missa (based on a motet by an earlier composer, Jachet de Mantua, also included here) than for the slowly-moving Jachet motet, but the mood is still quietly pleading. One of the loveliest forward-looking movements is the Angus Dei: the trebles lead with the finely-structured melody, the lower voices being more of an accompaniment than a clearly defined part of the polyphonic texture. Two of de Monte's original motets that follow are again settings of texts of earnest supplication. The most moving is the Miserere, with its opening phrases marked by an imaginative chord progression. Of the other three, we hear the composer's surprisingly loud-sounding 'silence in heaven' as Michael does the dragon in (Factum est silentium).

Claudio Monteverdi Italian 1567-1643

GROVE Monteverdi studied with Ingegneri, maestro di cappella at Cremona Cathedral, and published several books of motets and madrigals before going to Mantua in about 1591 to serve as a string player at the court of Duke Vincenzo Gonzaga. There he came under the influence of Giaches de Wert, whom he failed to succeed as maestro di cappella in 1596. In 1599 he married Claudia de Cattaneis, a court singer, who bore him three children, and two years later he was appointed maestro di cappella on Pallavicino's death. Largely as the result of a prolonged controversy with the theorist GM Artusi, Monteverdi became known as a leading exponent of the modern approach to harmony and text expression. In1607 his first opera, Orfeo, was produced in Mantua, followed in1608 by Arianna. The dedication to Pope Paul V of a grand collection of church music known as the Vespers (1610) indicated an outward looking ambition, and in 1613 Monteverdi was appointed maestro di cappella at St Mark's, Venice.

There Monteverdi was active in reorganising and improving the cappella as well as writing music for it, but he was also able to accept commissions from elsewhere, including some from Mantua, for example the ballet Tirsi e Clori (1616) and an opera, La finta pazza Licori (1627, not performed, now lost). He seems to have been less active after c1629, but he was again in demand as an opera composer on the opening of public opera houses in Venice from 1637. In 1640 Arianna was revived, and in the following two years Il ritorno d'Ulisse in patria, Le nozze d'Enea con Lavinia (lost) and L'incoronazione di Poppea were given first performances. In 1643 he visited Cremona and died shortly after his return to Venice.

Monteverdi can be justly considered one of the most powerful figures in the history of music. Much of his development as a composer may be observed in the eight books of secular madrigals published between 1587 and 1638. The early books show his indebtedness to Marenzio in particular; the final one, Madrigali guerrieri et amorosi, includes some pieces 'in genere rappresentativo' – Il ballo delle ingrate, the Combattimento di Tancredi e Clorinda and the Lamento della ninfa – which draw on Monteverdi's experience as an opera composer. A ninth book was issued posthumously in 1651.

Orfeo was the first opera to reveal the potential of this then novel genre; Arianna (of which only the famous lament survives) may well have been responsible for its survival. Monteverdi's last opera L'incoronazione di Poppea, though transmitted in not wholly reliable sources and including music by other men, is his greatest masterpiece and arguably the finest opera of the century. In the 1610 collection of sacred music Monteverdi displayed the multiplicity of styles that characterise this part of his output. The mass is a monument of the prima prattica or old style. At the other extreme the motets, written for virtuoso singers, are the most thorough-going exhibition of the modern style and the seconda prattica.

Il combattimento di Tancredi e ...

Il combattimento di Tancredi e Clorinda. 🅿
Il ballo delle ingrate
Concerto Italiano / Rinaldo Alessandrini hpd
Opus 111 OPS30-196 (58 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1998 ●

The graphic realism and dramatic subtlety of both these expanded madrigals are given the most incandescent and powerful readings imaginable here. Concerto Italiano has won many plaudits for its delectable linguistic colouring of the earlier Mantuan madrigal books. Combattimento, this sui generis dramatic masterpiece from 1624, demonstrates Alessandrini's impeccable instincts for theatrical timing and the stile concitato, where extrovert representation of two fighting crusaders has the listener enraptured, not only by the celebrated violence of the figuration, but the poignant foreboding of the Christian knight's discovery that the Saracen warrior whom he has killed is the maiden he loves, in disguise.

Stylistically provocative, it is the evocative restraint of Concerto Italiano's expressive world which shuns the self-conscious over-enactment that temporarily stalls even the most established readings. That said, the pace is hot throughout with words spat out by the Testo, or narrator, Roberto Abbondanza. His tenor is dark and often a touch hard-grained but he is remarkable in his dynamic range, contemplative dolour and grounded physicality. He is surrounded by a deeply affecting commentary of well-judged vibrating strings, bright fifths and rhythmic vitality. There are other notable recordings of this great scena but the pathos and purity of sentiment of Alessandrini's version have no rival, and the post-baptism, reconciliation scene at the end is given an ethereal fragility by Clorinda, the beguiling Elisa Franzetti.

The other work here, Il ballo delle ingrate, was written in 1608 for Monteverdi's patron Duke but the composer revised the original commission and published it as part of the Madrigali guerrieri e amorosi 30 years later. Again, the characterisation is penetrating, the recitative style unforced and the string players revel in the potent undercurrents of women's fate should they resist love. Irresistible.

Preludes

Selva morale e spirituale 🅿
Cantus Cölln; Concerto Palatino / Konrad Junghänel
Harmonia Mundi ③ HMC901718/20 Ⓕ
(230 minutes: DDD)
Awards 2002
Texts and translations included
Recorded 2000 ●●●

Monteverdi's last publication has always been something of a stepchild in his output, perhaps partly because of its sheer size and variety: there is lots of music in it that is hard to pigeon-hole. It is a massive assembly of some 40 pieces, some apparently very early, many of them from those mysterious years after the 1610 Vespers, and a few perhaps very late. In style they range from the purest academic polyphony of the stile antico to the most elaborate concerted music with intricate and showy instrumental parts, from the simplest melodic writing to virtuoso floridity with extreme vocal ranges. In this complete recording, Konrad Junghänel has effectively made the first and third CDs into approximate vespers collections, with the second CD containing most of the music that cannot be fitted into the others. This works extremely well, not least because those who are not ready to sit through it all at one sitting can get a satisfying musical unit from any one of the discs.

The 12 singers of Cantus Cölln have among them enough variety of colour to keep the sound lively and interesting. They are always clear, disciplined and balanced; and Junghänel directs the often episodic works with a firm control of their shape. The peerless Johanna Koslowsky leads much of the time in the larger pieces and contributes marvellous solo numbers. For the large-range bass solos Stephan MacLeod makes the impossible lines sound almost effortless. The instrumentalists of Concerto Palatino never for a moment sound tired, repeatedly adding energy to the performances. This set is a remarkable achievement. Anybody at all interested in Monteverdi's music will want to own it.

1610 Vespers

Vespro della Beata Virgine (ed Parrott/Keyte) 🅿
Taverner Consort; Taverner Choir; Taverner Players / Andrew Parrott

Virgin Classics Veritas Double ② 5 1662-2 Ⓑ
(106 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1984 ●

The technical and interpretative problems of the Monteverdi Vespers of 1610 are legion. Should the entire volume be performed as an entity, or just the psalms, or perhaps a mixture of psalms and motets? Since the vocal lines in the original are heavily ornamented, does this preclude the addition of further embellishment after the manner of contemporary instruction books? Which portions should be sung chorally (and how large should such a 'choir' be?), and which by the soloists? How should the continuo be realised?

The central controversy raised by the Vespers concerns five non-liturgical compositions inserted among the Marian psalms, hymn and 'Magnificat'. These, the sacred concerti described on the title-page as 'suitable for the chapels or private chambers of princes', do not conform textually to any known Marian office but occur in Monteverdi's collection in positions normally occupied by psalm antiphons. Here the concerti are performed as substitutes for the antiphons missing from Monteverdi's collections. One effect is to make this version feel more unified and monumental.

Both physically and emotionally the concerti are presented here as the focal points of the Vespers. Certainly they are the occasion for some of the most spectacular singing on this recording. The essential ingredient here is the performance of Nigel Rogers, surely the most accomplished and convincing singer of the early 17th-century Italian virtuoso repertory. He gives persuasive and seemingly effortless performances in three of the concerti in his mellifluous, dramatic yet perfectly controlled manner. In two cases, 'Audi coelum' and 'Duo Seraphim', he is well matched with Andrew King and Joseph Cornwell. By comparison 'Pulchra es', sung by Tessa Bonner and Emma Kirkby, seems rather understated.

One important feature of Andrew Parrott's interpretation is its fundamental conception, historically accurate, of the Vespers as chamber work rather than a 'choral' one. Thus only one instrument is used per part, the harpsichord is employed very sparingly, and the basic continuo group is restricted to organ and chitarrone. Following the same principle, one voice per part is taken as the norm. The result is a clarity of texture, evident from the opening bars, which allows correct tempos to be used without stifling often intricate rhythmic features. Finally, mention should be made of another fundamental choice which represents something of a novelty. Both 'Lauda Jerusalem' and the 'Magnificat' are transposed down a fourth here, as they should be according to the convention relating to the clef combinations in which they were originally notated. This brings all the vocal parts into the tessitura of the rest of the work, and also restores the instruments to their normal ranges. Whether or not the result is less 'exciting' than the version we are used to hearing has only partly to do with questions of musicality. For the rest, one of the lasting virtues of this well-balanced, unobtrusive recording is that it allows us to hear the Vespers sounding something along the lines that Monteverdi intended.

Vespro della Beata Vergine
Sophie Marin-Degor, Maryseult Wieczorek sops
Artur Stefanowicz, Fabián Schofrin countertens
Paul Agnew, Joseph Cornwell, François Piolino tens Thierry Félix, Clive Bayley basses
Les Sacqueboutiers de Toulouse; Les Arts Florissants / William Christie hpd/org
Cima Concerti ecclesiastici – Sonata per il violino, cornetto e violone; Sonata per il violino e violone
Members of Les Arts Florissants
Erato ② 3984-23139-2 (100 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included. Recorded 1997 ●

This is in some ways an oddly old-fashioned approach to the 1610 Vespers. With a substantial choir and sometimes highly varying orchestration, William Christie creates a warm and glowing sound. Part of his emphasis is on texture and flow, so Monteverdi's often sharp dissonances tend to have a soft edge; and there are some occasionally irrelevant pitches buried in the polyphonic web. He faces the challenge of putting the 'Lauda Jerusalem' and the 'Magnificat' at a pitch-standard a fourth lower than the rest (which he has at a modern concert pitch). And that is where the rich orchestration pays its dividends; the resulting almost impossibly low bass-lines, particularly in the 'Et misericordia' section of the 'Magnificat', sound clear and lucid with their instrumental doubling. He also benefits from the splendid low range of the tenors he uses: they manage to make the 'Gloria Patri' section a true climax to the work, and in particular they give the 'Duo Seraphim' perhaps the most convincing performance available anywhere because they are so beautifully matched. Christie prefaces each of the psalms with a chant introit; and he follows the order of the print except in putting 'Duo Seraphim' before the 'Sonata sopra Sancta Maria'. To fill the gap where Monteverdi put 'Duo Seraphim' he introduces a sonata by Cima, superbly played by a team led by the violinist, François Fernandez; and another excellently performed sonata by Cima separates the 'Lauda Jerusalem' from 'Duo Seraphim'. There is a warmth and generosity here that are undeniably attractive; the movements mentioned go better than anything else available; and everything is done at the level of skill and musicality that we have come to expect from Christie and his group.

Vespro della Beata Vergine – Domine ad adiuvandum; Dixit Dominus; Laudate pueri; Laetatus sum; Nisi Dominus; Lauda Jerusalem (with plainchant antiphons). Magnificat II. Motets – O quam pulchra es. Domine, ne in furore. Ego flos campi. Adoramus te, Christe. Laudate Dominum omnes gentes. Ego dormio, et cor meum vigilat. 🅿

Christe, adoramus te. Cantate Domino
Concerto Italiano / Rinaldo Alessandrini
Opus 111 OP20005 (75 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1996 ●●

Rinaldo Alessandrini and the Concerto Italiano have acquired a formidable reputation, above all for their records of Monteverdi madrigals. The kind of knowledge and detailed understanding of the subtleties of both meaning and pronunciation of the Italian language which only a native speaker can possess, and an impressive command of 17th-century vocal styles and techniques are two of the important elements that characterise their distinctive approach. This makes their foray into Monteverdi's church music all the more intriguing. The first half of the disc is made up of a complete vespers setting assembled from individual pieces published throughout the composer's career. Sung by one voice to a part and richly underpinned by a varied continuo group including theorbos, double harp and contrabass, there is a clarity and intimacy about the result. Details that often disappear in performances with larger forces here speak clearly. The recording is completed by a series of motets including three for solo voice; here it is almost invidious to express preferences, but it is difficult to resist praise for Rossana Bertini's breathtakingly audacious performance of Laudate Dominum, invigorated by a good deal of ornamentation executed with great élan. This disc brims with revelations and surprises – no serious Monteverdian can afford to be without it.

Madrigals

Madrigals – Book 2, Il secondo libro de madrigali 🅿
Concerto Italiano / Rinaldo Alessandrini
Opus 111 OPS30-111 (58 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1994

Captivation begins with the very opening of the first piece on the disc, Non si levav'anchor l'alba novella, whose gently growing sense of the awakening dawn is itself a delicately drawn metaphor for transition from the urgent desire of the lovers' final embrace after a night of lovemaking to the gentle pain of their parting. The exquisite bittersweet pathos of the scene, whose every nuance and ambiguity is superbly caught in Alessandrini's vision of Monteverdi's music, sets both the standard and the tone for much of what follows in a number of important ways. First, with the exception of S'andasse amor a caccia and Non giacinto o narcisi, there are no examples here of the lighter canzonetta, such a prominent feature of the musical picture in Italy during the 1580s and a strong presence in the composer's own Primo libro of 1587. Secondly, and crucially, almost half the contents of the Secondo libro of three years later are settings of poetry by Torquato Tasso, whose Gerusalemme liberata was the most significant and influential epic to have been written in Italy since Ariosto's Orlando furioso, first published in the early decades of the century. Packed with strong images and bright colours, Tasso's verse was much drawn upon by many composers, including Monteverdi who continued to set it throughout his career. In Alessandrini and the Concerto Italiano, the intimate fusion of words and music which the composer embarks upon in this Second Book, and which was to remain a lifelong preoccupation, is delineated with charm, skill and profound understanding.

Madrigals – Book 3, Il terzo libro de madrigali
La Venexiana (Rossana Bertini,
Valentina Coladonato, Nadia Ragni sops
Paola Reggiani mez Giuseppe Maletto,
Sandro Naglia tens Daniele Carnovich bass) /
Claudio Cavina counterten
Glossa Ⓕ GCD920910 (63 minutes: DDD)
Text and translation included
Recorded c2002 ●●●

The masterly anthology of styles that is Monteverdi's Third Book presents very specific challenges in performance precisely because of its variety. La Venexiana have an excellent understanding of the essentially polyphonic nature of such works as La giovinetta pianta and are therefore quite superb in the more difficult mixed style of O dolce anima mia, Stracciami pur il core or Se per estremo ardore, whose complicated rhetorical devices are brought off with perfection. Such brief transcendent moments as 'non può morir d'amor alma fedele' in Stracciami pur il core, or 'ingiustamente brami' in O dolce anima mia, far from seeming isolated jewels, arise here naturally from their context, which is no mean achievement for the uncharted waters that Monteverdi was navigating in these experimental but masterly works.

The singers also have the full measure of the Tasso cycles of the Third Book, entering fully into the polychrome, storm-lit intensity of the emotional and musical landscape. La Venexiana's dark hues and dramatic but not histrionic approach sound unbeatable to these ears. A very fine disc indeed.

Awards 1994

Madrigals – Book 4, Il quarto libro de madrigali 🅿
Concerto Italiano / Rinaldo Alessandrini
Opus 111 OPS30-81 (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included
Recorded 1993 ●●●

Monteverdi's Fourth Book of Madrigals, first published in 1603, is a wide-ranging collection of pieces written during the previous 10 years. Originally written for performance before a select audience by an ensemble of professional virtuoso singers, these madrigals, many of which are set to the sensuous, emotional and epigrammatic verses of Guarini and Tasso, show Monteverdi's seemingly inexhaustible ability to unite words and music in expressively effective ways. A complete and profound understanding of textual nuance is, then, central to any successful performance and here the Concerto Italiano begins with a considerable advantage over any group of non-Italians. Some of the finest madrigals in the Fourth Book are those involving direct speech, which allowed Monteverdi to make full use of the court virtuosi, famed for their abilities to combine clear declamation with dramatic gestures and subtle shadings of dynamics and speed. These are performances infused with a flexible approach to tempo and strong projection of text geared to a determination to allow each detail of the words to speak with due force. The singing style is muscular without losing its ability to move into a gentler mood, the vocal balance good, the sound bright and clear. At its best this record is simply without equal.

Madrigals – Book 5, Il quinto libro de madrigali 🅿
Concerto Italiano / Rinaldo Alessandrini
Opus 111 OPS30-166 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1996

There is a modernity about Monteverdi's poetic choices in the Fifth Book which is reflected in an adventurous harmonic and gestural language which pushes the madrigalian vocabulary of Giaches de Wert and Luca Marenzio to new boundaries. As always with Monteverdi, his main preoccupation is with an intimate bonding of words and music in a way which goes beyond the illustrative manoeuvres of traditional madrigalian styles. This aesthetic priority is one which Rinaldo Alessandrini and the Concerto Italiano have done so much to reveal. Enthusiasts for the Concerto's highly dramatic, yet sensitive and subtle approach, will not be disappointed by this disc. The opening diptych, 'Cruda Amarilli/O Mirtillo', sets the tone and style for much of what follows; the pace is stately, the passion being generated by extraordinary dissonances, delineated here with a lingering attention that is truly spine-chilling while still retaining its erotic undertow. Here and elsewhere on this recording, the exactness of the voicing, the gentle underscoring of rhythm and meaning, the authentic sound of the Italian language and the sheer musicality of the final result are united in performances of great expressive power and integrity.

Awards 1998

Madrigals – Book 8, Il ottavo libro de madrigali ('Madrigali guerrieri et amorosi') – Sinfonia; Altri canti d'amor; Non havea Febo ancora, 'Lamento della ninfa'; Vago augelletto; Perchè t'en fuggi, O Fillide?; Altri canti di Marte; Ogni amante è guerrier; Hor ch'el ciel e la terra; Gira il nemico insidioso Amore; Dolcissimo uscignolo; Ardo, ardo, avvampo, mi struggo 🅿
Concerto Italiano / Rinaldo Alessandrini
Opus 111 OPS30-187 (75 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1997 ●●●

Monteverdi's Eighth Book of Madrigals, issued with the eye-catching title of Madrigali guerrieri et amorosi ('Madrigals of Love and War'), was published in 1638. Taking their cue from the prominent position allocated to his cherished genere concitato in both the preface and contents of the collection, Rinaldo Alessandrini has made an unusual selection of pieces in which this kind of writing, which in practice involves much rapid chordal repetition, triadic formulas and scale passages to imitate the sounds of war, is prominent. It is a brave choice. The rhetorical gestures of the genere concitato are few, simple, obvious and rapidly pall when over-used. Nor are they confined to the madrigali guerrieri alone, since the agitation caused by the pains of love can also call them up. The real interpretative difficulty is to invest these moments with sufficient drama and character that they emerge from their somewhat textbook status and come to life.

The Concerto Italiano's dramatic readings of the texts involve the familiar devices of contrast, changes of pace, subtle underscorings at cadences and the highlighting of dissonant moments. The star performance is 'Hor ch'el ciel e la terra' which begins with a magically poetic evocation of the stillness of the night before settling into a depiction of the lover's pain, achieved through sharp stabbing motions of almost mannerist exaggeration. The Concerto's account of the second part ('Cosi soil d'una chiara fonte viva') is remarkable, not least for its inspired isolation of vocal lines of great lyrical power passed between the voices; it is a revelation.

Madrigals – Book 8, Il ottavo libro di madrigali; 'Madrigali guerrieri et amorosi'
Maria Cristina Kiehr, Salomé Haller sops Marisa Martins mez Bernarda Fink contr Christophe Laporte counterten John Bowen, Jeremy Ovenden, Mario Zeffiri, Kobie van Rensburg tens Victor Torres bar Antonio Abete, Renaud Delaigue basses Concerto Vocale / René Jacobs
Harmonia Mundi ② HMC90 1736/7 Ⓕ
(156 minutes: DDD). Texts and translations included
Recorded c2002 ●●

This appears to be the first ever complete recording (and at any rate, the only one currently available) of Book 8. The blurb on the jacket says, 'Indispensable', and this is hardly an exaggeration. A complete Book 8 would be enough to whet any Monteverdian's appetite; but fortunately, completeness is not the only reason to hail the new arrival.

Jacobs's team of singers is well rounded and most effective, perhaps, in the large ensembles, which have a festive opulence about them while allowing the necessary shadings to come into play: such things as the opening of Hor che'l ciel and Ardo, avvampo are admirably done, the one suitably mysterious and opaque, the other happily (but convincingly) chaotic. And with one or two exceptions the soloists acquit themselves handsomely, too: Bernarda Fink's title role in the Lamento della ninfa is very affecting – one of the high points of the set.

Jacobs's deployment of instruments, even on the continuo, is measured – even sparing, by his standards – but rich enough to evoke the splendid courtly entertainments for which these pieces were conceived. The instrumentalists are perhaps too easily overlooked in this repertoire: they do not draw attention to themselves here, but sound very solid and grounded.

Jacobs's feeling for the music's dramatic qualities is very keen, and – unsurprisingly – encompasses the largest pieces, the 'one-act' operas Il ballo delle ingrate and Combattimento di Tancredi e Clorinda. For these, some may prefer Concerto Italiano's recording which includes both pieces on a single disc, but Jacobs's less wilful readings are still most involving. Any gripes? There are almost bound to be in a project this size; but they are small, and are concentrated in a few of the slighter madrigali amorosi. By any objective criteria, Jacobs has pulled it off. So if you're looking for a single recording, this is a natural first choice.

Chamber Duets

Chamber Duets – Chiome d'oro, bel tesoro; Io son pur vezzosetta pastorella; Non è di gentil core; Non è mai le stelle; O come sei gentile, caro augellino; Ohimè, dovè il mio ben?; O viva fiamma; S'el vostro cor, madonna; Soave libertate; Tornate, o cari baci; Vorrei baciarti, O Filli; Book 8: Mentre vaga Angioletta ogn'anima; O sia tranquill'il mare; Book 9: Bel pastor dal cui bel guardo. Scherzi musicali – Zefiro torna. Non vedrò mai le stelle Ⓟ

Complesso Barocco / Alan Curtis hpd/org

Virgin Classics Veritas 545293-2 (68 minutes: DDD)

Texts and translations included. Recorded 1996 Ⓕ

Monteverdi's Chamber Duets are of a consistently high quality and include some of his most popular pieces (such as Zefiro torna, or the ravishing Chiome d'oro). The opening track wonderfully sets the tone, and showcases another of the recording's distinctive features, a particularly full continuo group. As one expects of Complesso Barocco, the standard of interpretation throughout is very high, although some of the more extended pieces seem to lose the thread of the argument, and the male soloists seem almost breathless at the tail-end of certain passaggi. The native singers' ease with the language is an essential asset: Bel pastor, one of the few duets for unequal voices, is particularly telling in this regard. Moving beyond interpretation, this project brings to the fore Monteverdi's astonishing resourcefulness and diversity of expression: what generous, essential music this is!

L'incoronazione di Poppea

Helen Donath sop Poppea; Elisabeth Söderström sop Nerone; Cathy Berberian mez Ottavia; Paul Esswood counterten Ottone; Giancarlo Luccardi bass Seneca; Rotraud Hansmann sop Virtue, Drusilla; Jane Gartner sop Fortune, Pallas, Darmigella; Maria Minetto contr Nurse; Carlo Gaifa ten Arnalta; Philip Langridge ten Lucano; Enrico Fissore bass-bar Lictor, Mercury; anonymous treb Love; Margaret Baker sop Valletto Vienna Concentus Musicus / Nikolaus Harnoncourt Ⓟ

Teldec ④ 2292-42547-2 (215 minutes: ADD)

Notes, text and translation included Ⓜ

Recorded 1973-74 ●

L'incoronazione di Poppea has always had its staunch admirers, many claiming it to be Monteverdi's greatest masterpiece, even the finest opera of the 17th century. However, what's left of the opera amounts to little more than a vocal score, and even then with some scenes missing, others evidently added by hands other than Monteverdi's own. To turn the sketchy, inadequate sources into something that Monteverdi might have recognised as his work requires more than a little self-confidence. Harnoncourt's production is still the best recording of it ever made. With its strong, sensitive cast and excellent pacing, this is a performance that shows the work's true potential, even if the realisation is calculated to raise a few eyebrows – and more so today than when it was first released. There are reservations about the use of loud wind instruments, above all in vocal contexts, and about the heavy ornamentation that their players use. Even the scoring of the string orchestra is heavy-handed on occasion. These effects are, of course, entirely of Harnoncourt's own making, since there's nothing in the sources to indicate even the size and nature of the orchestra. Also, his decision to associate certain timbres with specific situations could be seen as regrettable. Trumpets for the gods is acceptable enough, but there's nothing subtle about the pair of oboes that accompanies the comic characters. What saves this performance, however, is the fine cast of singers. There's not a single weak link. It was an imaginative move to cast Elisabeth Söderström as Nerone, and one can forgive her palpable femininity on the grounds that she finds so much to convey in her playing of the part. Equally sure of her role as Ottavia is Cathy Berberian. Even the lesser characters are played superbly well – Jane Gartner as Fortune/Darmigella/Pallas, for example, or Philip Langridge as Lucano. It's as if every member of the cast recognises the latent power of this marvellous music; and that's what makes this recording such an enduring one.

L'incoronazione di Poppea Ⓟ

Sylvia McNair sop Poppea; Dana Hanchard sop Nerone; Anne Sofie von Otter mez Ottavia, Fortune, Venus; Michael Chance counterten Ottone; Francesco Ellero d'Artegna bass Seneca; Catherine Bott sop Drusilla, Virtue, Pallas, Athene; Roberto Balcone counterten Nurse; Bernarda Fink contr Arnalta; Mark Tucker ten Lucano, First Soldier; Julian Clarkson bass Lictor, Mercury; Marinella Pennicchi sop Love; Constanze Backes sop Valleto;

Nigel Robson ten Liberto, Second Soldier
English Baroque Soloists / Sir John Eliot Gardiner
Archiv Produktion ③ 447 088-2AH3
(191 minutes: DDD). Notes, text and translation Ⓕ
included. Recorded live in 1993

The central question was always about how much needs to be added to the surviving notes in order to make Poppea viable on stage. Gardiner and his advisers believe that nothing needs adding and that the 'orchestra' indeed played only when explicitly notated in the score but that it was a very small group. To some ears this will have a fairly ascetic effect but it is firmly in line with current scholarly thinking. To compensate, Gardiner has a rich group of continuo players and they play with wonderful flexibility. And Gardiner's spacious reading of the score bursts with the variety of pace one might expect from a seasoned conductor of early opera. Sylvia McNair is a gloriously sensuous Poppea: from her sleepy first words to the final duet she is always a thoroughly devious character, with her breathy, come-hither tones. Complementing this is Dana Hanchard's angry-brat Nerone, less even in voice than one might hope, but dramatically powerful nevertheless. Whether they quite challenge Helen Donath and Elisabeth Söderström for Harnoncourt must remain a matter of opinion, but they certainly offer a viable alternative.

The strongest performances here, though, come from Michael Chance and Anne Sofie von Otter as Ottone and Ottavia, both of them offering superbly rounded portrayals. Again they face severe challenges from Harnoncourt's unforgettable Paul Esswood and Cathy Berberian, but here the challenge is more equal. Francesco Ellero d'Artegna is perhaps the most vocally skilled Seneca to date.

The fact that this was recorded at a public concert is noticeable only occasionally.

L'Orfeo

Laurence Dale ten Orfeo; Efrat Ben-Nun sop P
Euridice, Music; Jennifer Larmore mez Messenger;
Andreas Scholl counterten Hope; Paul Gérimon
bass Charon; Bernarda Fink contr Proserpina; Harry
Peeters bass Pluto; Nicolas Rivenq bar Apollo
Concerto Vocale / René Jacobs
Harmonia Mundi ② HMC90 1553/4
(120 minutes: DDD). Notes, text and translation Ⓕ
included. Recorded 1995 ●●

It is clear right from the start, with the almost aggressive snarling brass and thudding drums of the opening Toccata, that René Jacobs's reading of L'Orfeo is a full-blooded one. The tone is set almost immediately by Efrat Ben-Nun, whose approach to the two roles that she sings is refreshingly direct and dramatic. Among the other soloists Bernarda Fink delivers a convincingly urgent account of Proserpina's appeal at the opening of the Fourth Act, while Harry Peeters's Pluto presents his measured responses with an attractively lyrical authority. Charon's strangely angular lines, with their air of menace appropriate to one who spends time in contact with the Underworld, are expertly managed by Paul Gérimon, who shows himself to be a true Monteverdi bass. René Jacobs's approach to the thorny question of orchestration is robust.

The score is notoriously difficult to interpret in this respect, and in the end any solution can only be judged against some notion of what Monteverdi's sound world might have been. Jacobs's version was originally given at the Salzburg Festival in 1993, and his instrumental resources, based around three continuo instruments spatially separated, are more a reflection of the acoustical properties of a modern pit rather than those of the sort of room in the Ducal Palace in which L'Orfeo was first performed. There is nothing necessarily wrong with that, and it has to be said that the result is successful and rarely over-elaborate.

In Laurence Dale in the title-role, Jacobs has found a powerful protagonist, a singer capable of negotiating the sudden changes of emotional state that characterise the part. This is a version of L'Orfeo to be reckoned with.

Il Ritorno d'Ulisse in Patria

Christoph Prégardien ten Ulisse; Bernarda Fink P
contr Penelope; Christina Högmann sop Telemaco,
Siren; Martyn Hill ten Eumete; Jocelyne Taillon mez
Ericlea; Dominique Visse counterten Pisandro,
Human Fragility; Mark Tucker ten Anfinomo; David
Thomas bass Antinoo; Guy de Mey ten Iro; Faridah
Subrata mez Melanto; Jörg Dürmüller ten
Eurimaco; Lorraine Hunt sop Minerva, Fortune;
Michael Schopper bass Nettuno, Time; Olivier
Lallouette bass Giove; Claron McFadden sop
Giunone; Martina Bovet sop Siren, Love
Concerto Vocale / René Jacobs
Harmonia Mundi ③ HMX290 1427/9
(179 minutes: DDD). Notes, text and translation Ⓜ
included. Recorded 1992 ●

The only surviving manuscript score of this major musical drama, preserved in Vienna, presents an incomplete version of three acts. For this recording, René Jacobs has, within the spirit of 17th-century music-making, added more music by Monteverdi and others to expand the work to a satisfying five-act structure suggested by some surviving librettos. He has also considerably expanded the scoring, very much enlivening the instrumental palette that Monteverdi would have had available to him for his original production in Vienna in 1641, and the result is powerful and effective.

The extensive cast, led by Christoph Prégardien in the title-role, is excellently chosen, not only for vocal quality but also for a convincing awareness of Monteverdi's idiom. Without that, the performance could have seemed tame, and that is nowhere better exemplified than in Act 1, Scene 7 where Ulysses awakes, wondering where he is and what is to happen to him. Prégardien here manages to convey as much depth of feeling as a Pagliaccio yet stays clearly within the bounds of Monteverdi's expressive style. The result is a tour de force, one of the many within this production. The adept instrumental contribution certainly helps to maintain variety throughout the work, and an accompaniment suited to the sentiments expressed by the vocalists is always possible with these resources. Ultimately, this production is very much one for our time. It is a practical solution to the problems of performing music of another age, and one that turns out to be inspired, moving and totally compelling.

Cristóbal de Morales

Spanish c1500-1553

GROVE Morale is recognised as the most important figure in early 16th-century Spanish sacred music. He received his early musical education in Seville and in 1526 was appointed maestro de capilla of Avila Cathedral. In 1531 he resigned and by September 1535 was a singer in the papal chapel in Rome. He left in 1545 and was appointed maestro de capilla at Toledo Cathedral. He then fell ill and in 1547 renounced the position. On returning to Andalusia he became maestro de capilla to the Duke of Arcos at Marchena (1548-51). In 1551 he became maestro de capilla at Málaga Cathedral.

His works, almost all liturgical, include over 20 masses, 16 Magnificats, two Lamentations and over 100 motets. The Magnificats, perhaps the best known of his works, are permeated by Gregorian cantus firmi ; his Lamentations are characterised by a sober homophonic style. In his motets he often used chant associated with the text, as a melodic point of departure (eg Puer natus est) or as an ostinato figure (eg the five-voice Tu es Petrus), but he seldom borrowed entire melodies. Their texture is characterised by free imitation with exceptional use of homophonic sections to stress important words or portions of text. The two masses for the dead and the Officium defunctorum are the most extreme examples of Morales's sober style. He had thorough command of early 16th-century continental techniques and his style is better compared to Josquin, Gombert and Clemens than to his Spanish contemporaries. He favoured cross-rhythms, conflicting rhythms, melodic (but not harmonic) sequence and repetition, harmonic cross-relations, systematic use of consecutives and occasional daring use of harmony.

Masses

Missa 'Si bona suscepimus' Crecquillon Andreas 🄿
Christi famulus Verdelot Si bona suscepimus
The Tallis Scholars / Peter Phillips
Gimell CDGIM033 (56 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included
Recorded 1999 OO

The Tallis Scholars move into what is for them new territory here: Cristóbal de Morales. He is perhaps the most admired Spanish composer of all time, to judge from the distribution and longevity of his works. But not nearly enough of his music has been recorded.

And the six-voice Mass Si bona suscepimus appears not to have been recorded before. It was printed in his first book of Masses (1544) and undoubtedly comes from his years in the papal chapel. At first listening, there may be something almost too serene about its flawless counterpoint that flows with effortless invention. But there is an abundance of arresting detail in here, and he uses the six voices with an astonishing variety of textures.

The Tallis Scholars are up to their usual standards of magnificent sound colour, nicely judged balance and extremely pure intonation. There is nothing overtly Spanish in the performance: they simply sing what is there in the music, without imposing too much externally. They hardly ever rush or slow down severely, preferring to allow the music to unfold at its own flexible pace. That could seem bland until you compare the sound with the introductory five-voice motet of Verdelot on which the Mass is based, or indeed the marvellous Crecquillon motet that ends the disc; these immediately sound quite different (and indeed make you wonder why the Crecquillon motet passed for so long as a work of Morales).

Morales Mass for the feast of St Isidore of Seville. 🄿
Missa 'Mille regretz'. Emendemus in melius
Guerrero O Doctor optime
Instrumental and organ works by Cabézon, Rogier, Guerrero, Gombert and Santa María
Gabrieli Consort and Players / Paul McCreesh
Archiv Produktion Blue 474 228-2ABL Ⓜ
(76 minutes: DDD). Texts and translations included
Recorded 1995

The instrumental canciones by Guerrero and Rogier which open the disc are played with delightful sensitivity: one can understand why instrumentalists were so prized in Spanish cathedrals at this time if they played like this. Morales's Mass itself, performed by an all-male consort, is sung splendidly. There is a real feeling for the work's direction (not easily discerned in music so seamlessly polyphonic as Morales) which, in combination with the seductively rich sonority of the choir, make it a performance of genuine stature. The only reservations concern the stodgy singing of the 'Hosanna' which would surely benefit from a lighter, more rhythmic approach. The plainchant is for the feast of St Isidore of Seville, taken from unspecified 16th- and 17th-century sources by Robert Snow. It is sung accompanied by a dulcian, as indeed is the polyphony, common Spanish practice of the time. Instruments and choir come together only in Guerrero's motet, O Doctor optime, sung at the Offertory, which is an object lesson in how to achieve blend and balance. Another canción by Rogier acts as a recessional, and the disc closes with a short piece by Tomás de Santa María followed by a magnificent performance of Morales's motet Emendemus in melius.

Assumption Mass – Toledo Cathedral, c1580 P
Morales Ave regina caelorum. Exaltata est sancta Dei genitrix. Missa Benedicta est regina caelorum Cabezón Beata viscera Mariae Virginis. Tiento sobre el hymno, 'Ave Maris stella' Ceballos O pretiosum et admirabile sacrementum F Guerrero Ave Maria. Dulcissima Maria Ribera Beata mater Torrentes Asperges Mej Plainchants – Introitus; Oratio; Graduale and Alleluia; Offertorium; Prefacio; Pater noster; Communio; Postcommunio
Orchestra of the Renaissance / Richard Cheetham and Michael Noone
Glossa GCD921404 (76 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included

This is a reconstruction of a Mass for the Assumption as it might have been heard in Toledo Cathedral in about 1580. It follows very much the pattern established by the group's previous discs, with a mixture of musical items that can be pegged, however loosely, to a particular occasion or type of occasion. Here the research into the rich musical repertory and the musico-liturgical practice of Toledo Cathedral by guest conductor Michael Noone makes for a particularly compelling example of the reconstruction genre. The ways in which instruments and voices are used is well thought out, and the music, including those pieces by the less well-known Toledan maestros Ribera and Torrentes, is of the highest quality. Similar care has been taken over the sources for the plainchant which, as on earlier recordings by the Orchestra of the Renaissance, is performed with just the right inflections and sense of pace by the bass Josep Cabré.

It is clear that Morales' music continued to be performed in Spanish cathedrals throughout the 16th century and beyond, and the superb Mass Benedicta est regina caelorum makes it easy to see why. It is performed well by singers and instrumentalists alike, the harp and dulcian adding a distinctive shimmer and depth to the overall soundpool of voices, shawms and sackbuts. Overall, the performances are restrained with a good sense of natural flow, if perhaps occasionally lacking in intensity. An impressive and very attractive CD that grows with repeated listening into one of the most convincing 'occasional' recordings in the catalogue.

Ignaz Moscheles

German 1794-1870

GROVE A pupil of B. D. Weber in Prague and of Albrechtsberger and Salieri in Vienna, Moscheles became a piano recitalist, travelling throughout Europe (1815-25). Settling in London (1825-46), he taught at the RAM established a series of 'historical soirées' (in which he performed Bach and Scarlatti on the harpsichord), wrote fashionable salon music and conducted th Philharmonic Society; he was a friend o Mendelssohn, conducted the London première o Beethoven's Missa solemnis (1832) and translate Schindler's biography as The Life of Beethove (1841). From 1846 he was professor at the Leipzi Conservatory. His best compositions are his pian sonatas (some for duet), in which a classical balanc is tempered with an early Romantic dynamism, an his studies (still used).

Piano Concertos

Piano Concertos – No 2 in E flat, Op 56;
No 3 in G minor, Op 58. Anticipations of Scotland:
A Grand Fantasia, Op 75
Tasmanian Symphony Orchestra /
Howard Shelley pf
Hyperion CDA67276 (76 minutes: DDD)

Both the Second and Third Concertos bristl with enough savage jumps and hurdles to thro a less than first class performer; woe betide th pianist without flawless scales and arpeggio (often twisting into awkward and unpredictabl patterns). Moscheles' contemporaries, hungr for heart-stopping acrobatics, surely left th concert hall thrilled and gratified. But there ar also many fascinating purely musical surprises.

Most engagingly, Moscheles was highl responsive to local colour, paying tribute to his adopted city of London in hi Fourth Concerto by quoting the 'March of th Grenadiers' and, in his Anticipations of Scotland A Grand Fantasia, to folk songs and dances nort of the border. Who can resist the assurance o 'Auld Robin Grey' (though even he breaks ou into a flash of virtuosity) or a strathspey sufficiently perky to set all true Scotsmen's bloo tingling.

The recordings, made in Tasmania, are excellent, and the Tasmanian Symphony Orchestr enter into the spirit of things with verve an affection. In short, a disc of aristocratic brilliance and distinction.

Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart

Austrian 1756-179

GROVE Mozart, son of Leopold Mozart, showe musical gifts at a very early age, composin when he was five and when he was six playing befor the Bavarian elector and the Austrian empress Leopold felt that it was proper, and might also b profitable, to exhibit his children's God-given geniu (Mozart's sister was a gifted keyboard player), s from mid-1763-66 the family set out on a Europea tour. Mozart astonished his audiences with hi precocious skills; he played to the French and Englis royal families, had his first music published an wrote his earliest symphonies. In 1767 they were of again, to Vienna, where hopes of having an opera b Mozart performed were frustrated by intrigues 1770-73 saw three visits to Italy, where Mozar wrote two operas (Mitridate, Lucio Silla) and a serenata for performance in Milan, and acquainted himself with Italian styles. Summer 1773 saw a further visit to Vienna where he wrote a set of string quartets and, on his return, a group of symphonies including Nos 25 in G minor and 29 in A. Apart from a journey to Munich for the première of his opera La finta giardiniera early in 1775, the period from 1774 to mid-1777 was spent in Salzburg, where Mozart worked as Konzertmeister at the Prince Archbishop's court; his works of these years include masses, symphonies, all his violin concertos, six piano sonatas, several serenades and divertimentos and his first great piano concerto, K271.

In 1777 he was sent, with his mother, to Munich and to Mannheim, but was offered no position (though he stayed over four months at Mannheim, falling in love with Aloysia Weber). His father then dispatched him to Paris: there he had minor successes, notably with his Paris Symphony, no.31, deftly designed for the local taste. But prospects there were poor and Leopold ordered him home, where a superior post had been arranged at the court. He returned slowly and alone; his mother had died in Paris. The years 1779-80 were spent in Salzburg, playing in the cathedral and at court, composing sacred works, symphonies, concertos, serenades and dramatic music. But opera remained at the centre of his ambitions, and an opportunity came with a commission for a serious opera for Munich. He went there to compose it late in 1780; his correspondence with Leopold is richly informative about his approach to musical drama. The work, Idomeneo, was a success. In it Mozart depicted serious, heroic emotion with a richness unparalleled elsewhere in his works, with vivid orchestral writing and an abundance of profoundly expressive orchestral recitative.

Mozart was then summoned to Vienna, where the Salzburg court was in residence on the accession of a new emperor. Fresh from his success, he found himself placed between the valets and the cooks; his resentment towards his employer, exacerbated by the Prince-Archbishop's refusal to let him perform at events the emperor was attending, soon led to conflict, and in May 1781 he resigned, or was kicked out of, his job. He made his living over the ensuing years by teaching, by publishing his music, by playing at patrons' houses or in public, by composing to commission; in 1787 he obtained a minor court post as Kammermusicus, which gave him a reasonable salary and required nothing beyond the writing of dance music for court balls. He earned, by musicians standards, a good income, but lavish spending and poor management caused him financial difficulties. In 1782 he married Constanze Weber, Aloysia's sister.

In his early years in Vienna, Mozart built up his reputation by publishing, playing the piano and, in 1782, having an opera performed: Die Entführung aus dem Serail, a German Singspiel which went far beyond the usual limits of the tradition with its long, elaborately written songs. The work was successful and was taken into the repertories of many provincial companies (for which Mozart was not however paid). In these years, too, he wrote six string quartets which he dedicated to the master of the form, Haydn: they are marked not only by their variety of expression but by their complex textures, conceived as four-part discourse, with the musical ideas linked to this freshly integrated treatment of the medium.

In 1782 Mozart embarked on the composition of piano concertos, so that he could appear both as composer and soloist. He wrote 15 before the end of 1786, with early 1784 as the peak of activity. They represent one of his greatest achievements, with their formal mastery, their subtle relationships between piano and orchestra (the wind instruments especially) and their combination of brilliance, lyricism and symphonic growth. In 1786 he wrote the first of his three comic operas with Lorenzo da Ponte as librettist, Le nozze di Figaro: here and in Don Giovanni (given in Prague, 1787) Mozart treats the interplay of social and sexual tensions with keen insight into human character that - as again in the more artificial sexual comedy of Così fan tutte (1790) - transcends the comic framework, just as Die Zauberflöte (1790) transcends, with its elements of ritual and allegory about human harmony and enlightenment, the world of the Viennese popular theatre from which it springs.

Mozart lived in Vienna for the rest of his life, though he undertook a number of journeys to Salzburg, Prague, Berlin and Frankfurt. The last Prague journey was for the première of La clemenza di Tito (1791), a traditional serious opera written for coronation celebrations, but composed with a finesse and economy characteristic of Mozart's late music. Instrumental works of these years include some piano sonatas, three string quartets written for the King of Prussia, some string quintets, which include one of his most deeply felt works (K516 in G minor) and one of his most nobly spacious (Kn C), and his last four symphonies – one (No 38 in D) composed for Prague in 1786, the others written in 1788 and forming, with the lyricism of No 39 in E flat, the tragic suggestiveness of No 40 in G minor and the grandeur of No 41 in C, a climax to his orchestral music. His final works include the Clarinet Concerto and some pieces for masonic lodges (he had been a freemason since 1784). At his death from a feverish illness whose precise nature has given rise to much speculation (he was not poisoned), he left unfinished the Requiem, his first large-scale work for the church since the C minor Mass of 1783, also unfinished. Mozart was buried in a Vienna suburb, with little ceremony and in an unmarked grave, in accordance with prevailing custom.

Clarinet Concerto in A, K622

Clarinet Concerto. Clarinet Quintet in A, K581
Thea King basset cl [b]Gabrieli String Quartet
(Kenneth Sillito, Brendan O'Reilly vns Ian Jewel va Keith Harvey vc); [a]English Chamber Orchestra / Jeffrey Tate
Hyperion CDA66199 (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1985 ●

The two works on this disc are representative of Mozart's clarinet writing at its most inspired; however, the instrument for which they were written differed in several respects from the modern clarinet, the most important being its extended bass range. Modern editions of both the Clarinet Concerto and the Quintet have adjusted the solo part to suit today's clarinets, but Thea King reverts as far as possible to the original texts, and her playing is both sensitive and intelligent. Jeffrey Tate and the ECO accompany with subtlety and discretion in the concerto, and the Gabrieli Quartet achieves a fine rapport with King in the Quintet. Both recordings are clear and naturally balanced, with just enough distance between soloist and listener.

Clarinet Concerto. Oboe Concerto in C, K314
Jack Brymer cl Neil Black ob
Academy of St Martin in the Fields / Sir Neville Marriner
Philips 416 483-2PH (50 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1973 ●●

For all the classic status of Jack Brymer's recordings with Beecham (available on EMI with various couplings), we would not now choose them in preference to this Marriner version. His recording here is of the highest distinction, coupled with Neil Black's delightful performance of the Oboe Concerto. They are fine performances, even great ones; with Marriner, Brymer seems to have rethought his approach to a work he must have known almost too well. He has shed none of his elegance, but there is a greater touch of wistfulness, a hint of tragedy, which lends the music fuller substance. Even in the finale, there is the suggestion that the liveliness is the more precious for an awareness of a darker element. It is the finest of all the recordings displaying Brymer's art at its greatest in one of the greatest works ever written for the instrument.

Mozart Clarinet Concerto[a]
Spohr Clarinet Concerto No 1 in C minor, Op 26
Weber Clarinet Concerto No 2 in E flat, J118
Ernst Ottensamer cl/[a]basset cl
Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Sir Colin Davis
Philips 438 868-2PH (72 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1992

Ernst Ottensamer is a virtuoso with a real sense of style, that is to say a musician with an instinct for the difference between the contained Romanticism of Mozart's concerto and the overt but differing Romanticism of Spohr and Weber. His tone is rich and warm, with a beautiful depth in the lower registers of the basset clarinet in the Mozart, but also a brilliance that has a bit of a wicked glint to it in Weber's finale compared to the dancing ease of Mozart's. Mozart's Adagio is beautifully judged in tempo, a song with a seamless line, while Weber's Romanza is taken quite differently, like a wordless operatic aria. Spohr's short Adagio, a touchingly simple, direct piece, is charmingly delivered, and elsewhere Ottensamer listens with a careful ear to the woodwind and other lines which in this work intermingle so subtly: he is an old Philharmoniker who shows a proper attention to his colleagues. He is given close, sympathetic support by orchestra and conductor. One of Davis's particular qualities is his ear for the telling simplicities in Mozart, so that here a plain arpeggio springs to life with the clarinet's melody; or a set of repeated notes has a sense of direction towards a cadence. The VPO responds with complete understanding, and the recording engineers have missed nothing.

Additional recommendation
Mozart Clarinet Concerto, K622
Coupled with: Beethoven Violin Concerto (arr Pletnev for cl)
Collins cl Russian National Orchestra / Pletnev
DG 457 652-2GH (70 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Wonderfully agile playing from Michael Collins on the basset clarinet. His is an elegant but powerful reading, with a deeply poetic slow movement. Pletnev's Russian National Orchestra give refined support

Flute Concertos

No 1 in G, K313/K285c; No 2 in C, K314/K285d. Andante in C major, K315/K285e. Flute and Harp Concerto in D, K299/K297c

---

Flute Concerto No 1. Andante. Flute and Harp Concerto
Susan Palma fl Nancy Allen hp
Orpheus Chamber Orchestra
DG 427 677-2GH (58 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1988
Also available (coupled with Horn Concertos Nos 1-4; Clarinet Concerto in A, K622; Sinfonia concertante in E flat; Bassoon Concerto in B flat, K191; Oboe Concerto in C, K314) on DG ③ 469 362-2GX3 Ⓑ

Mozart's G major Flute Concerto is a charming work, not without depth. This is an admirable performance by Susan Palma, a remarkably gifted player who is also a member of the Orpheus Chamber Orchestra, a conductorless ensemble of 24 musicians, who play with skill and unanimity so that all is alert, lithe and yet sensitive. Palma's tone is liquid and bright, with fine tonal nuances. The Concerto for flute and harp was written for the flute-playing Count de Guines to play with his harpist daughter, and combines these two beautiful instruments to fine effect. Again the soloists are highly skilled and, beyond that, their playing is nicely matched, tonally and stylistically. Indeed Palma is as delightful as in the other work and the spacious Andante in C major that separates the two concertos, while Nancy Allen makes an exquisite sound and also articulates more clearly than many other harpists. The attractive cadenzas are by Palma and Bernard Rose. The balance between the soloists and the orchestra is natural and the recording from New York's State University has a very pleasing sound.

Flute Concertos Nos 1 and 2. Andante. Flute and Harp Concerto 🅿
Konrad Hünteler fl Helga Storck hp

Orchestra of the Eighteenth Century / Frans Brüggen
Philips 442 148-2PH (78 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1990s

Konrad Hünteler and Frans Brüggen shape the elegant lines of the G major Concerto with finesse, enhanced by an exceptionally attractive blend between Hünteler's *c*1720 Denner flute and the orchestra's pleasingly fine-grained sound. Hünteler's soft flute sound (atmospherically evoking the human voice) and the orchestra's distinctive period instruments bring added dramatic intensity to this music. Likewise, Hünteler and the orchestra capture the direct charm of the C major Andante. The C major concerto is Mozart's arrangement for flute of his Oboe Concerto. For this recording, the 18th-century flute parts have been compared with those for oboe for a more 'authentic' text, and the resulting exquisitely balanced account makes a wholly convincing masterpiece for the flute. Hünteler and Storck, aided by the orchestra's subtle playing, highlight vividly the flute and harp concerto's perfect match of technical and instrumental resources.

Flute and Harp Concerto[a]; Concerto for Bassoon and Orchestra in B flat, K191[b]; Sinfonia concertante in E flat, K297[bc]
[a]Kate Hill fl [c]Nicholas Daniel ob [c]Joy Farrall cl [bc]Julie Andrews bn [b]Lucy Wakeford hp [c]Stephen Bell hn Britten Sinfonia / Nicholas Cleobury
Classic fM The Full Works 75605 57038-2 Ⓜ
(74 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1998

A delightful recording in every way. These three works are brimful of Mozartian melody of the most beguiling kind. Julie Andrews, the bassoonist, has a spring in her step from the very opening of her solo concerto – after Nicholas Cleobury has set the pace in his spirited and stylishly turned opening ritornello. Her articulation is most winning: there is geniality here without clowning. The melody of the Andante then brings a touchingly doleful mood, while the Minuet finale is so deftly decorated that you cannot help being captivated. The Flute and Harp Concerto (which opens the programme) also swings off elegantly; and what fragility of texture the soloists, Kate Hill and Lucy Wakeford, create between them! The flute playing is quite exquisite in the slow movement, and the harp's delicate filigree brings a sense of caressing to the background embroidery. The finale dances off with great charm. The support provided by the Britten Sinfonia throughout has just the right degree of robustness to set off the airy tracery of the two soloists. The Sinfonia concertante is of course a team work and the solo response is first class. In the slow movement the bassoonist winningly takes the lead: the finale brings a delectably light-hearted gait; and how these players enjoy their divisions, with each taking the spotlight in turn, and then chortling in concert most infectiously. The recording is vividly real, the kind that leaps out of the speakers. Highly recommended.

Additional recommendation
Flute Concerto No 1 in G
Coupling: Flute and Harp Concerto. Oboe Concerto
Snowden fl Thomas harp Hunt ob
London Philharmonic Orchestra / Mackerras
Classics for Pleasure 575 1442 (76 minutes: DDD) Ⓑ

Jonathan Snowden performs the Flute Concerto quite gloriously. The equally stylish Gordon Hunt plays the Oboe Concerto, and Mackerras directs with his customary flair.

Horn Concertos

No 1 in D, K412; No 2 in E flat, K417; No 3 in E flat, K447; No 4 in E flat, K495

Horn Concertos Nos 1-4. Piano Quintet in E flat, K452 🄷
Dennis Brain hn
Philharmonia Orchestra / Herbert von Karajan
EMI mono 566898-2 (55 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1953 ●●●

Dennis Brain was the finest Mozartian soloist of his generation. Again and again Karajan matches the graceful line of his solo phrasing (the Romance of No 3 is just one ravishing example), while in the Allegros the crisply articulated, often witty comments from the Philharmonia violins are a joy. The glorious tone and the richly lyrical phrasing of every note from Brain himself is life-enhancing in its radiant warmth. The Rondos are not just spirited, buoyant, infectious and smiling, although they are all of these things, but they have the kind of natural flow that Beecham gave to Mozart. There is also much dynamic subtlety – Brain doesn't just repeat the main theme the same as the first time, but alters its level and colour. His legacy to future generations of horn players has been to show them that the horn – a notoriously difficult instrument – can be tamed absolutely and that it can yield a lyrical line and a range of colour to match any other solo instrument. He was tragically killed, in his prime, in a car accident while travelling home overnight from the Edinburgh Festival. He left us this supreme Mozartian testament which may be approached by others but rarely, if ever, equalled, for his was uniquely inspirational music-making, with an innocent-like quality to make it the more endearing. It is a pity to be unable to be equally enthusiastic about the recorded sound. The mono master is, rightly, not given spurious stereo treatment, but the remastering – although the horn timbre, with full Kingsway Hall resonance, is unimpaired – has dried out the strings. But this remains a classic recording.

Horn Concertos Nos 1-4. Rondos – D, K514; E flat, K371, 'Concert Rondo' 🄿
Anthony Halstead hn Academy of Ancient Music / Christopher Hogwood

L'Oiseau-Lyre 443 216-2OH (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1993 ◉

A particular charm of Halstead's recording lies in cool, understated performances and the variety in his approach to the different concertos: the broader phrasing and longer lines he brings to the more consciously expansive and symphonic K495, for example, the chamber musical playing in K447 (easily the finest of the concertos), and the gentle lyricism in K417. Everywhere, however, he excels with his shapely moulding of the music and his natural, musical way of rounding off phrases. Playing a period horn, he 'makes' the notes that are not natural harmonics by deft movements of his hand in the bell. This technique can lead to the chromatic notes differing sharply in quality from the open ones, but Halstead seems to have more control over tone quality than most natural horn players: the stopped notes sometimes slip in unobtrusively, but where he wants to use colour to stress them, he does so very effectively, with the occasional touch of brassiness or muffling. With the Academy of Ancient Music under Hogwood on form, with well pointed ritornellos and attentive accompaniments, this is a thoroughly musicianly account of these endearing works.

Horn Concertos Nos 1-4. Horn Quintet in E flat, K407/K386c
David Pyatt hn Kenneth Sillito vn Robert Smissen, Stephen Tees vas Stephen Orton vc
Academy of St Martin in the Fields / Sir Neville Marriner
Warner Elatus 0927-46723-2 (70 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1996

David Pyatt, Gramophone's Young Artist of the Year in 1996, provides performances in which calm authority and high imagination fuse; and this disc is ideally placed in the catalogue to comlement the nobility and urbanity of Dennis Brain. Although there can be no direct comparison with Anthony Halstead, Pyatt's is very much in that mode of supple, understated and often witty playing, accompanied by truly discriminating orchestral forces. Soloist and orchestra create a constantly shifting and lively pattern of dynamic relationships. Pyatt makes the music's song and meditation very much his own. Compared with the dark, dream-like cantabile of Brain, he offers in the Second Concerto an Andante of cultivated conversation and, in the Third, a Romanza of barely moving breath and light. His finales trip the light fantastic. The Second Concerto's springing rhythms reveal wonderfully clear high notes; the Third is nimble and debonair without being quite as patrician as Brain's; and the Fourth creates real mischief in its effervescent articulation. The cadenzas by Terry Wooding (to the first movements of the Third and Fourth Concertos) epitomise Pyatt's performances as a whole: longer and more daringly imaginative than those of Brain, while remaining sensitively scaled and fancifully idiomatic. The concertos are imaginatively and unusually coupled with a fine performance of the Horn Quintet in E flat.

Horn Concertos Nos 1-4; E, KAnh98*a*/K494*a*. Rondos for Horn and Orchestra – D, K514 (cptd Süssmayr); E flat, K371. Fragment for Horn and Orchestra in E flat, K370*b* (both reconstr Humphries)
Bournemouth Sinfonietta / Michael Thompson hn
Naxos 8 553592 (76 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1995

This is not just an excellent bargain version of the horn concertos, superbly played and recorded, but a most valuable example of Mozartian scholarship on disc. Michael Thompson, himself directing the Bournemouth Sinfonietta with point and flair, plays the four regular concertos in revised texts prepared by John Humphries, as well as offering reconstructions by Humphries of two movements, designed as the outer movements, an Allegro, K370*b* and a Rondo, K371, for an earlier horn concerto written soon after Mozart arrived in Vienna. The Rondo played here as the second-movement finale of K412 is Humphries' reconstruction from sources recently discovered, and is much more imaginative than the Süssmayr version. It is a revelation too in the most popular of the concertos, No 4, to have extra passages, again adding Mozartian inventiveness. For example, the tutti in the first movement before the development section is here extended in a charming few extra bars.

Thompson, for 10 years the Philharmonia's first horn, is not only technically brilliant, but plays with delectable lightness and point, bringing out the wit in finales, as well as the tenderness in slow movements. As conductor and director, he also draws sparkling and refined playing from the Sinfonietta, very well recorded in clear, atmospheric sound. An outstanding issue for both specialist and newcomer alike.

Oboe Concerto in C, K314/K271k

Oboe Concerto. Flute Concerto No 1. Clarinet Concerto
Nicholas Daniel ob Kate Hill fl Joy Farrall basset cl
Britten Sinfonia / Nicholas Cleobury
Classic fM 75605 57001-2 (73 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1997

This collection of Mozart's finest solo woodwind concertos is a winner. All the soloists are distinguished British orchestral players, each having a distinct personality in his or her own right. Joy Farrall's clarinet style combines an easy freedom with warm classical directness. Her performance of the Clarinet Concerto is totally seductive, with Nicholas Cleobury's gracefully phrased opening ritornello setting the scene for the lightly pointed solo entry. Her fluid line is heard at its most ravishing in the Adagio, which is richly echoed by the strings of the Britten Sinfonia; and the delicacy of the reprise is particularly magical. It is followed by a delicious, bubbling finale with lilting secondary material. Nicholas Daniel is hardly less appealing in the more petite Oboe Concerto and his reedy sweetness of timbre never cloys. He, too, is at his finest in the slow movement, while in the infectious closing Rondo finale he provides a neatly succinct cadenza. The Flute Concerto is equally delectable, especially the tender Adagio which Cleobury moves forward at exactly the right measured pace and which Kate Hill carols so touchingly. The neatly pointed Minuet finale is captivating. The recorded sound is excellent.

Mozart Oboe Concerto
R Strauss Oboe Concerto in D
Douglas Boyd ob
Chamber Orchestra of Europe / Paavo Berglund
ASV CDCOE808 (44 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

This coupling links two of the most delightful oboe concertos ever written. Mozart's sprightly and buoyant work invests the instrument with a chirpy, bird-like fleetness encouraging the interplay of lively rhythm and elegant poise. Boyd's reading captures this work's freshness and spontaneity beautifully. If the Mozart portrays the sprightly side of the instrument's make-up the Strauss illustrates its languorous ease and tonal voluptuousness. Again Boyd allows himself the freedom and breadth he needs for his glowing interpretation; he handles the arching melodies of the opening movement and the witty staccato of the last with equal skill. Nicely recorded.

Complete Piano Concertos

No 1 in F, K37; No 2 in B flat, K39; No 3 in D, K40; No 4 in G, K41; No 5 in D, K175; No 6 in B flat, K238; No 8 in C, K246; No 9 in E flat, K271, 'Jeunehomme'; No 11 in F, K413/K387*a*; No 12 in A, K414/K385*p*; No 13 in C, K415/K387*b*; No 14 in E flat, K449; No 15 in B flat, K450; No 16 in D, K451; No 17 in G, K453; No 18 in B flat, K456; No 19 in F, K459; No 20 in D minor, K466; No 21 in C, K467; No 22 in E flat, K482; No 23 in A, K488; No 24 in C minor, K491; No 25 in C, K503; No 26 in D, K537, 'Coronation'; No 27 in B flat, K595

Piano Concertos Nos 1-27
English Chamber Orchestra / Murray Perahia pf
Sony Classical ⑫ SX12K46441 Ⓜ
(608 minutes: ADD/DDD). Recorded 1975-84 ◉◉

Mozart concertos from the keyboard remain unbeatable. There is a rightness, an effortlessness, about doing the concertos this way which makes for heightened enjoyment. Not that it is the only way; and yet so many of them seem to gain in vividness when the interplay of pianist and orchestra is realized by musicians listening to each other in the manner of chamber music. Provided the musicians are of the finest quality, of course. We now just take for granted that the members of the English Chamber Orchestra will match the sensibility of the soloist. They are on top form here, as is Perahia, and the finesse of detail is breathtaking. Just occasionally Perahia communicates an 'applied' quality – a refinement which makes some of his statements sound a little too good to be true. But this is to be pernickety. The line of his playing, appropriately vocal in style, is exquisitely moulded; and the only reservations one can have are that a hushed, 'withdrawn' tone of voice, which he is little too ready to use, can bring an air of self-consciousness to phrases where ordinary, radiant daylight would have been even more illuminating; and that here and there a robuster treatment of brilliant passages would have been in place. However, the set is entirely successful on its own terms – whether or not you want to make comparisons with other favourite recordings. Indeed, we now know that records of Mozart piano concertos don't come any better played than here.

Piano Concertos Nos 1-27. Rondo in D, K382
English Chamber Orchestra / Daniel Barenboim pf
EMI ⑩ 572930-2 (661 minutes: ADD). Ⓜ
Recorded 1967-74 ◉

Mozart's piano concertos explore a number of expressive worlds ranging from buoyant youthful elegance – though there are surprises and formal innovations even in the Salzburg works, like the Minuet section that invades the finale of K271 – to the Sturm und Drang of the first movements in K466 and K491, the introspection of the slow movements of K467 and K488 and the ineffable poise of K595, the last concerto of all. In their performance it is necessary for a soloist and conductor to be at one interpretatively, or better still to be one and the same person, which is what happens here, just as it would have done in Mozart's own time.

Daniel Barenboim uses cadenzas of his own along with Mozart's, and others by Beethoven arranged by Edwin Fischer (No 20 in D minor) and Wanda Landowska (in the Coronation Concerto, No 26). (Barenboim's own may take Mozart rather far in the direction of romanticism.) He gives a legitimate sense of breadth to Mozart's thought that will appeal especially to collectors who have come to these concertos through Beethoven's. At times he can be self-indulgent and seeming to be unconsciously telling us how exquisitely he can turn a phrase, rather than allowing Mozart to speak for himself; but we hasten to say that we feel this only here and there and that not all listeners will agree. The best way to find out whether you do is to listen to this soloist's shaping of a melody in a slow movement, such as the poignant Adagio of No 23 in A major; beautiful as this playing is with its ultra-delicate dynamic shading, it could be thought anachronistically romantic in spirit and even narcissistic. Alternatively, but for similar reasons, hear Barenboim in the Larghetto of No 27, with its mannered half-tones and hesitations.

Again, the performances of the dramatic D minor and C minor Concertos, which incidentally are the only ones of the series to have a minor key, will tell you if Barenboim's approach to these works that were admired by Beethoven is too overtly Beethovenian, with the Romance in the D minor a rather heavyweight affair, not least where the orchestra is concerned. But it is still Murray Perahia, like Barenboim, directing the excellent ECO, who seems to be closest of all to that radiantly self-revealing and self-giving, and yet still elusive, genius which Mozart demonstrated in this wonderful series of concertos.

Piano Concertos Nos 1-14

Piano Concertos Nos 1-4 P
Robert Levin hpd Academy of Ancient Music / Christopher Hogwood
Decca L'Oiseau-Lyre 466 131-2OH Ⓕ
(60 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1998

'These performances follow the original practice in Salzburg and use an orchestra without cellos', says a note in the booklet. But Neal Zaslaw, in his weighty tome on the Mozart symphonies – The Compleat Mozart – reckons that between 1767 (the year these works were adapted from the music of other composers) and 1775, that city's orchestra had either one or two cellos. Controversy apart, you are unlikely to miss this instrument here because the bass's line alone is quite rich in sonority. Moreover, Levin plays continuo (as Mozart did) and that helps to fill gaps though he is occasionally a trifle over-enthusiastic.

Best not to be critical about that aspect, however, because these juvenile pieces get what they need: enthusiastic advocacy. The sound of the period ensemble is also very good (no seedy violins) although the harpsichord isn't stable. Sometimes it moves forward and, in K37, wanders to the right. Levin improvises his own cadenzas, as he has consistently done throughout this series. It is his prerogative, and he has managed to stay in style without being imitative.

Hogwood's contribution has its own brand of distinction. For instance, his artistic contouring of phrases (some of them forming only a background) in the Andante of K40 offers delicately graded tonal contrasts to the different sort of lyricism that Levin extracts from his percussive instrument. Asperities of timbre are absent, and the succeeding Presto has a bubbling verve because all the accents are perfectly judged. Soloist and conductor always interpret the music – and that is real authenticity.

Piano Concertos Nos 9 and 21
English Chamber Orchestra / Murray Perahia pf Ⓕ
Sony Classical SK34562 (59 minutes: DDD) ●
No 21 (coupled with No 23) also available on
Sony Classical Theta Ⓜ SK89876

Perahia's fine Mozart playing is a feature of the musical scene that has been with us for decades. There is a delightful freshness and crispness as well as the kind of authority that convinces us that this is the only way to perform the music – that is, until another masterly account comes along. Perahia's choice of tempos is a case in point, yet he seems natural rather than merely predictable and one recalls how even fine musicians can often go astray on this matter which Wagner and Stravinsky alike regarded as crucial. Are there any reservations? Well, perhaps the CD sound is just that little bit close and bright, but with music-making of this quality that does not seem to matter.

The grave Andantino of No 9 is given weight without exaggeration. In No 21, Perahia does not give the first movement the maestoso element which is suggested in some editions: instead there is a delightful flexibility and Leporello-like charm. However, one may possibly feel that the G minor passage before the second subject and the E minor one in the development are too soft and yielding, charming though they are in themselves. Perahia's own cadenza is effective and in keeping with his chosen approach. In the famous Andante also, Perahia plays with great feeling and poise.

Piano Concertos Nos 11, 12 and 14
English Chamber Orchestra / Murray Perahia pf Ⓕ
Sony Classical SK42243 (70 minutes: ADD/DDD) ●

Piano Concertos Nos 20 and 27
English Chamber Orchestra / Murray Perahia pf Ⓕ
Sony Classical SK42241 (63 minutes: ADD/DDD) ●

These discs happily epitomise some of the best qualities of the complete Perahia/ECO set. Always intelligent, always sensitive to both the overt and less obvious nuances of this music, Perahia is firstly a true pianist, never forcing the instrument beyond its limits in order to express the ideas, always maintaining a well-projected singing touch. The superb ECO reflects his integrity and empathy without having to follow slavishly every detail of his articulation or phrasing. K414 and K413 are charming and typically novel for their time, but do not break new ground in quite the way that K449 does. Here, Mozart's success in the theatre may have suggested a more dramatic presentation and working of ideas for this instrumental genre. K595 is a work pervaded by a serenity of acceptance that underlies its wistfulness. Mozart had less than a year to live, and the mounting depression of his life had already worn him down, yet there is still a sort of quiet joy in this music. The vast range of styles, emotions, and forms that these few works encompass are evocatively celebrated in these performances, and admirably captured in civilised recordings.

Piano Concertos Nos 11-13 (arr cpsr)
Patrick Dechorgnat pf Henschel Quartet
(Christoph Henschel, Markus Henschel vns

Monika Henschel va Mathias D Beyer vc)
EMI Debut 572525-2 (79 minutes: DDD) Ⓑ
Recorded 1995

Writing of these three concertos in 1782, Mozart made an impressive claim: 'They strike a happy medium, neither unnecessarily complex nor overly simple; colourful, pleasant to the ear – but not without substance. At certain moments only the cognoscenti will derive any enjoyment from them, but there is something to please the less discriminating too, even if they don't know why.' Heard here in Mozart's own arrangement for piano and string quartet they make a crystalline, tirelessly inventive trio played with much spirit, articulacy and affection. A faint suspicion that in the opening Allegro of K414 (among Mozart's most economical but endearing works) provided you are clear and tasteful the rest will follow is erased in a most affecting sense of interplay in the Larghetto from K413, a grave sense of serenity in the Andante from K414 and embellishments that are elegant and discreet throughout. Dechorgnat also achieves a special sense of Romantic delicacy in the second subject from the opening movement of K415 and time and again relishes the opportunity for improvisatory freedom in the cadenzas. He is superbly partnered by the Henschel Quartet, and balance and sound are exemplary.

Piano Concertos Nos 12 and 19
London Mozart Players / Howard Shelley pf
Chandos CHAN9256 (52 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1993

These are clear and stylish readings. The playing of Shelley and the London Mozart Players is assured, relaxed and enjoyable, allowing the music to unfold naturally. Shelley demonstrates his fine judgement of tempo, and textures are well served; the recording gives quite a bold sound to his modern piano, but its overall immediacy and warmth are not excessive and the balance is just right. Phrasing also deserves praise: Shelley and his expert team shape the music gracefully without falling into the slightly mannered delivery which can affect other artists in this repertory. Finally, cadenzas have the right balance of freedom and formality. Perhaps the two 'slow' movements here – the quotes are because that of K414 is an Andante and K459's is an Allegretto – are richer in style than will suit some tastes: they do not sound authentic in period-performance terms, but then this is another kind of performance and perfectly convincing. The recordings are of high quality.

Piano Concertos Nos 15-27

Piano Concertos Nos 15[a], 23[b] and 24[b] 🄷
Solomon pf Philharmonia Orchestra /
[a]Otto Ackermann, [b]Herbert Menges
Testament mono SBT1222 (80 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1953-55

It was Abram Chasins, the American pianist and critic, who noted in Solomon a 'proportionate grandeur that instead of seeming to lack power appeared not to desire it.' Others have spoken of his 'matchless austerity', and listening once more to his Mozart is to be reminded of the essential truth of such comments. Mozart may have felt that K450 (No 15) is a concerto 'to make the pianist sweat', but it is difficult to imagine even a single bead of perspiration on Solomon's brow as he tosses off cascades of notes with superlative ease and elegance. In his hands the Andante's set of variations comes as close to Elysium as you could wish, while the finale has a delectable lightness that makes it a true dance of the Gods.

In K488 (No 23), Solomon's lucidity, in the canonic interplay, for example, is of a sort granted to very few pianists, and his refinement in the closing pages of the ineffable F sharp minor Adagio suggests all of his inimitable but lightly worn authority. In K491 (No 24) he shares with Clara Haskil, another supremely prized Mozartian, a characteristic way of taking one of Mozart's two minor-key concertos by stealth rather than by storm, though he compensates for what some may see as undue restraint by giving us Saint-Saëns' storming cadenza. The 1953-55 recordings have been superbly remastered and his musical partners Otto Ackermann and Herbert Menges are as inspired as their soloist.

Awards
1984

Piano Concertos Nos 15 and 16
English Chamber Orchestra /
Murray Perahia pf
Sony Classical SK37824 Ⓕ
(50 minutes: DDD) ●●●

This is an interpretation of the highest calibre: Perahia's delicious shaping of even the longest and most elaborate phrases, his unfailingly clear and arresting articulation, and his delicacy and refinement of tone are without parallel. Perahia's attention is, moreover, by no means restricted to the solo parts: even the tiniest details of the orchestral writing are subtly characterized, and the piano and orchestra take on the character of a dialogue – sometimes poignant, often witty or sparklingly humorous. The two works are admirably contrasted: the 15th is largely light and high-spirited, while the first movement of the 16th is almost Beethovenian in its grandeur and purposefulness, and both concertos have typically beautiful slow movements. Recordings are superb.

Piano Concertos Nos 15 and 26 🄿
Robert Levin fp Academy of Ancient Music /
Christopher Hogwood
L'Oiseau-Lyre 455 814-2OH (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997

This disc is particularly interesting for several reasons. Firstly, the fortepiano employed belonged to Mozart himself. Secondly, an earlier version of K450's Andante – whose existence is not even mentioned by Köchel, Einstein, Hutchings or Grove – with significant differences in the shape of the theme, is included besides the usual one. Thirdly, Robert Levin – by playing along in tuttis, improvising cadenzas, lead-ins and liberal embellishments, providing new left-hand parts for K537 and adopting some of Mozart's original, more difficult readings in K450 – has boldly opted for performances with an element of spontaneity and non-familiarity such as Mozart's own audiences would have experienced. The results are delightfully fresh and vital. The wind are excellent, the finale of K450 is splendidly light-footed; but in K537 Hogwood might have heeded Richard Strauss's advice not to look encouragingly at the trumpets, who in the first movement are somewhat overenthusiastic. The biggest surprise comes in the slow movement of K537, where Levin often offers a free, but stylish paraphrase of the solo part. There is an A just below middle C on this fortepiano that gives off a curious tinkle whenever it is struck, and in the initial Allegro of K537 this can be a bit obtrusive; but it cannot put you off a thoroughly illuminating performance.

Piano Concertos Nos 9 and 17 🅿
Concerto Köln / Andreas Staier fp
Teldec Das Alte Werk 4509-98412-2 Ⓕ
(61 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1995

Andreas Staier, speaking of the use of period instruments in this outstanding recording of Mozart's G major Concerto, K453, declares the piece has 'more of the farmyard about it' that way – and he's right. From the braying and bellowing of the mid-phrase crescendos, the snuffling and snorting of the bassoons and the hee-hawing of the alternating loud and soft chords, Staier appears throughout it all the delighted child with a favourite picturebook. Conductorless, the string playing in the outer movements of both this and the E flat Concerto is buoyant with daring. The impetus and excitement of both dialogue and modulations in the slow movement of K453 is thrilling – and so is the dialogue within the orchestral writing itself in the finale.

In K271 the music-making has a bracing immediacy as the almost percussive string playing cuts into the fortepiano's rhetoric, so imaginatively developed in Staier's fingers.

Piano Concertos Nos 9 and No 25
Alfred Brendel pf Scottish Chamber Orchestra / Sir Charles Mackerras
Philips 470 287-2PH (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 2001 ⦿

Brendel's latest recording, of No 9, K271, and No 25, K503, is alive with provocation, subtlety and distinction. In both widely contrasted concertos he somehow manages to combine a sense of first love and discovery with the sort of unalloyed musicianship that only comes with years of experience. He is also ideally complemented by Sir Charles Mackerras and the SCO who are as alert to musical impetus and every passing felicity as their superb soloist.

Throughout, the sense of a chamber music-like interplay between Brendel and Mackerras is maintained with an ease and naturalness the reverse of a more obvious or immature approach. How withdrawn yet characterful is Brendel's entry at 4'52" in the ever-astonishing C minor Andante, and how subtly he differentiates between Andantino and Andante in the cadenza, finding all of its prophecy of later autumnal sadness.

Mackerras opens K503 with a magnificent sense of its maestoso and the same musical qualities noted in K271 are present in every bar. Brendel's own cadenza for the first movement is impishly engaging yet unfailingly true to Mozart's spirit. The Andante's lines are discreetly and stylishly embellished and in K271 Brendel chooses the second set of Mozart's cadenzas. Philips's sound and balance are exemplary.

Piano Concertos Nos 17[a] and 21 Ⓕ
Maria João Pires pf Chamber Orchestra of Europe / Claudio Abbado
DG 439 941-2GH (58 minutes: DDD). Item marked [a]
recorded live in 1993 ⦿

It is clear from the opening of the G major Concerto that Claudio Abbado and the Chamber Orchestra of Europe were on good form at this concert in Italy. It springs along, yet unhastily, and the orchestral sound, while full-bodied, has none of the heaviness that detracts from good Mozartian style. Playing what sounds like a modern piano of unusual tonal crispness, Maria João Pires also satisfies, with shapely phrasing and lovely sonorities, and this whole first movement proceeds with both a keen sense of purpose and unmannered grace. The cadenza here is Mozart's own and, of course, a model of what cadenzas in his concertos should be but often are not, in other words suiting the music and not overlong. After these unalloyed pleasures, the touching Andante is no less satisfying, elegantly sculptured and with marvellous woodwind playing. The playful, variation-form finale is again perfectly judged, and indeed the performance of the whole concerto offers truly outstanding Mozart playing, among the best on disc and unquestionably in the Perahia class. The recording is worthy of it: beautifully balanced and clear while also refreshingly free of audience noise and applause. The C major Concerto is also excellent, the first movement strong yet not pompous. The famous 'Elvira Madigan' slow movement is not at all romanticized but admirably poised, and the finale springs along.

Piano Concertos Nos 17 and 20 🅿
Robert Levin fp Academy of Ancient Music / Christopher Hogwood
L'Oiseau-Lyre 455 607-2OH (61 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996

The performance of the D minor Concerto is a major achievement, one of those recordings that has a sense of occasion, a feeling that the artists are creating the music afresh. Well, so they are, to a rather greater extent than usual: Robert Levin improvises the cadenzas and quite a lot else besides. The first-movement cadenza here is a particular triumph. Hogwood and Levin take quite a measured tempo for this movement, and it works very well, giving Levin just the space he needs to shape the music pointedly and with meaning. Here and there he does vary the text more than one might expect. Of course, that is well within his rights, historically speaking, and he never transgresses the boundaries of good taste but at times one might feel there is a little too much ornamentation. In the lighter G major Concerto Levin is truly on sparkling form, playing the outer movements gracefully and wittily – the finale is especially fine, with the basic speed maintained, to brilliant effect. These are fine performances, with sensitive and delicate playing from Levin, and admirable support from Hogwood and the AAM; the balance between piano and orchestra seems particularly happily managed, the glittering fortepiano sound coming clearly through the textures but so translucent as to allow woodwind details to be heard sharply.

Piano Concertos Nos 18 and 19 🅿
Robert Levin fp Academy of Ancient Music / Christopher Hogwood
L'Oiseau-Lyre 452 051-2OH (59 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995

These are thoughtful, strongly characterised performances which make much of the individuality of the works. K456 is taken at rather steady tempos, with soft and sustained textures and gentle colours, and Levin plays it with rare tenderness and delicacy – there are many sensitive touches of timing in the first movement and less of self-conscious brilliance or assertiveness than the music might permit. This rather inward view is very compelling, and it harmonises happily with the view he and Hogwood take of the slow movement, a G minor set of variations, which on modern instruments is apt to sound decoratively pathetic but not deeply felt, which it certainly does here. There is a good deal of intensity, and of darker colouring: partly the result of the superior blend of sound resulting from the use of the fortepiano. And some of the solo woodwind playing is of a very high order. Then the finale is taken at quite a measured tempo, not at all as a jolly hunting piece, allowing Levin to shape and shade individual phrases effectively. Levin improvises the cadenzas, although sets by Mozart survive for both concertos: his argument that a cadenza should have an element of the unexpected is a strong one. The F major, K459, is a lighter work, in a sense; its airy orchestral textures are quite unlike those of the other concertos, especially K456. This is a lively, almost jaunty performance, but in no way superficial; there are countless delectable touches in Levin's playing as well as lightness and elegance, and the effect is very appealing. Similarly, the slow movement, here an Allegretto, is quite relaxed, and there is some lovely woodwind playing, counterpointing gracefully with the piano, all exquisitely audible in this aurally translucent recording; at the end you are left under no illusions about the seriousness and stature of the music.

Piano Concertos Nos 18 and 20
Richard Goode pf Orpheus Chamber Orchestra
Nonesuch 7559-79439-2 (58 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996 ●●

With a first-rate balance and quality of sound, here is a Mozart concerto record to transcend considerations of style and stance. The excellence of Richard Goode's playing is not surprising, but the quality of his collaboration with the Orpheus Chamber Orchestra is special: and the beautiful thing about Mozart performance of this calibre is that the two seem inseparable. Of course the freshness and placing of the detail are to be savoured, but it is the long view which holds and persuades. In the D minor Concerto's first movement the brilliant piano writing is so thrilling here because it's projected as being essential to the expression, not just a decoration of it. Goode is particularly impressive in the way he handles the three successive solo statements at the start of the development without slackening pace. They are subtly different in feeling, one from the other, and although he's not the first player to have noticed this, it's characteristic of his distinction to have kept the detail and the overview in balance. He plays his own cadenza in the finale, in place of Beethoven's. He has some good ideas about dynamics in this last movement, and the lightening of mood at the turn to the major key towards the end has rarely sounded such an inspiration – on Mozart's part, of course. The B flat Concerto, K456, is equally enjoyable. The outer movements are brisk and light on their feet, even balletic, but all the colours – and the shadows which pass over the face of the music – are there, just as one wants. At the end, you feel you have had glorious entertainment, and a discourse that has touched on the deepest things. You may well be puzzled as to how Goode achieves so much while appearing to do so little. In this the orchestra matches him, as it also matches his spontaneity.

Piano Concertos Nos 19 and 27
Orpheus Chamber Orchestra / Richard Goode pf
Nonesuch 7559-79608-2 (55 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996 ●

The opening tutti of K595 (No 27, which comes first on the disc) makes a striking impact, not only thanks to the crisp, alert playing but to the full, bright, immediate recording. The piano enters with similarly full and immediate sound – very different from the more transparent piano sound on a rival Decca release with András Schiff – but then the orchestra seems to move further off. It is an inconsistency of balance that is disconcerting for no more than a moment or two, but might well make a hypercritical artist or producer have reservations.

What matters is the liveness of the experience that Goode and his partners provide. His approach is more purposeful, more direct than that of Schiff, who favours speeds consistently a shade broader than Goode's. The natural weight and gravity of Goode's playing, reflecting his equivalent mastery as a Beethovenian, emerges clearly in such moments as the hushed B minor opening or the development in the first movement of K595, an extraordinary modulation for a movement in B flat major, or in the opening solo of the Larghetto which follows. Not that Goode's Mozart has anything remotely heavy about it in the wrong way. His lightness and wit in the finales of both concertos is a delight.

In the finale of K459, Goode, like Schiff, opts for a very fast Allegro assai, drawing on his phenomenal agility. Some may prefer a slightly more relaxed tempo, such as Murray Perahia, for example, adopts, with more swagger and fun in it, but Goode's playing is thrilling from first to last.

Piano Concerto No 20. Symphony No 38 in D, K504, 'Prague'. Serenade No 13 in G, K525, 'Eine kleine Nachtmusik'. Three German Dances, K605 H
Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Bruno Walter pf
Pearl mono GEMMCD9940 (72 minutes: AAD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1936-37

Bruno Walter was an accomplished pianist, and his solo work in Mozart's D minor Concerto is full of personality. The first movement cadenza by Reinecke is boring, but otherwise there's much to enjoy in this romantic and subjective interpretation. The VPO plays beautifully both here and in the other Mozart works. The Prague Symphony has lots of muscle as well as grace and elegance. If you seek a romantic approach to Eine kleine Nachtmusik, then Walter's affectionate interpretations will surely give great pleasure, and the little German Dances are charmingly played. Pearl has used commercial pressings for the issue, and a certain amount of surface noise is present. Colin Attwell has reproduced the original sound quality very faithfully and straightforwardly, and his transfers are much kinder to the ears than most others from this period.

Piano Concertos Nos 20 and 24
Alfred Brendel pf Scottish Chamber Orchestra / Sir Charles Mackerras
Philips 462 622-2PH (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ ●

Brendel's conception of Mozart's two minor-key concertos has altered in countless nuances and emphases but little in fundamentals since his 1973 Philips recordings with Marriner. His sensibility, pianistic refinement and sheer questing intelligence remain as compelling as ever. Neither performance will entirely please those who favour a barnstorming approach.

More than in 1973, Brendel is at times more concerned to draw out the music's elegiac resignation than to highlight its more obvious passion and turbulence. But more than most pianists he constantly illuminates the smaller and larger shapes of the music with his range of colour and dynamics. In both opening movements, for instance, he brings a speaking eloquence to the piano's initial solo theme and then in the development finds a subtly altered tone of voice, in response to the gradually darkening musical landscape, for each of its reappearances.

Another Brendel hallmark is his variety of tone and articulation in rapid passagework, which is purposefully directed in accordance with its place in the overall scheme. As before, he provides apt and spontaneous-sounding embellishments and 'in-filling' at fermatas, this time allowing himself greater freedom in decorating the spare lines of the slow movements; again, he uses his own cadenzas in both concertos, more adventurous in their thematic development than any of Mozart's own surviving examples.

In the opening tutti of K491 one can hear the extra character Mackerras brings to the music compared to Marriner – the impact of raw, louring brass (tamed by Marriner) at strategic moments, for instance, or his attentive shaping of inner strands to enhance the tension. The recording has an attractive spaciousness and ambient warmth, though in K491 the keyboard occasionally obscures important thematic ideas on oboes, clarinets and bassoons.

Piano Concertos Nos 20[a], 23[b], 24[b], 26[c] and 27[a]
Sir Clifford Curzon pf [a]ECO / Benjamin Britten; [bc]LSO / István Kertész
Decca Legends ② 468 491-2DL2 Ⓜ
(154 minutes: ADD) ●

With the addition of Curzon's recently disinterred account of No 26, the present collection is a genuine best buy. There are odd pockets where the piano part feels sparse and unadorned without infilling, where the 'inauthentic' accompaniments feel a little thick and opaque, but to describe such music-making as merely dated would be grossly unfair. Britten's ECO contributes more sparkle and individuality than Kertész's LSO, only partly a matter of acoustics though the present transfer does tend to 'dry out' the Kingsway Hall. Curzon's playing is outwardly cool and controlled, at times almost self-effacing, and yet teeming with inner life. What makes it so special is not easily put into words: Curzon seems able to respond to every nuance in a way that makes most performers seem superficial even as he eschews their effortful striving after profundity.

Piano Concertos Nos 23 and 24
Orpheus Chamber Orchestra / Richard Goode pf
Nonesuch 7559-79489-2 (56 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ ●

This is the third Mozart CD Richard Goode and the Orpheus Chamber Orchestra have made, and collaborations of this kind must necessarily be rare. The demands this sort of music-making imposes on the players are considerable. But so are the potential rewards. They are evident here in the exceptional focus and concentration of the playing. Polished you might expect it to be, but the allure and spontaneity are a joy. First impressions are likely to be of details of scoring in the orchestral expositions of the first movements, details that may not go unnoticed in other performances but which rarely receive such voicing and definition. The pianist does not disappoint either. Judge him by his first entry in this concerto, in the solo theme: there is none more difficult to get right. Goode has the range, the control and the rhetoric. He passes another difficult test in this first movement by supplying an impressive cadenza. It is an outstanding account of this movement, to be returned to again and again. There is no falling off in the other two either.

The A major, K488, equally well illuminated, has light and air from a different world. There is indeed an airborne quality to the finale, done here with the utmost vivacity, and a hint of that too in the open textures and the easy, glorious buoyancy of the first movement. The recorded sound is exemplary.

Piano Concertos Nos 23 and 24
Mitsuko Uchida pf
English Chamber Orchestra / Jeffrey Tate
Philips Solo 442 648-2PM (58 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1987-88 ●

These performances from the late 1980s have impressive authority. The balance of sound is a distinctive feature of the recording. How beautifully Mitsuko Uchida plays, and with what freshness and sensibility. Throughout the intimate No 23, the ease with which she releases and projects the expression is a delight. One wants to hear magic communicated in this music and it is there. After the slow movements, the daylight and brio she brings to the finale is lovely, as if to test the reality of the sublime visions which have gone before. This is some of the best playing of Mozart in recent years. It is an all-round achievement that will not quickly be surpassed and no doubt it will occupy a place in the catalogue as one of the best Mozart concerto recordings of our day.

Hers is a thoughtful approach to the great C minor Concerto (No 24). She eschews the overtly Sturm und Drang style that is fashionable for the first movement. Perhaps her interpretation is helped too by the balancing of the 'percussive' piano rather far back in a way that reveals good orchestral detail while obscuring nothing from the keyboard. Uchida contributes her own cadenza, which convinces at first but goes on too long, wandering stylistically into Beethovenian territory with dreamy recitative. A poised account of the Larghetto and a powerful but well-nuanced finale complete this attractive performance. When you listen to the colour and distinction Jeffrey Tate brings to these works you feel surer still of that. It is the pianist who must make the running, of course, but it is not many in Mozart who get a collaborator of such calibre.

Piano Concertos Nos 23 and 24 (plus Nos 20, 26 and 27)
Sir Clifford Curzon pf
London Symphony Orchestra / István Kertész
Decca Legends ② 468 491-2DM2 Ⓜ
(ADD). Recorded 1967 ●●

In a list of all-time best recordings of Mozart piano concertos these should have a place. The balances of piano with orchestra are just right, and the sound has come up freshly on CD, with air as well as clarity and a nicely truthful character. In the No 24 the wind is not as forward as recordings favour these days, but from the LSO as distinguished soloists and as a wind chorus their contributions tell. Kertész gives Curzon nicely judged support: it sets him off, in a frame, even if it does appear a mite neutral at times and strangely limp in the presentation of the variation theme at the start of the finale of the C minor Concerto. These days, some people might consider the interpretations dated, or unreconstructed. Curzon doesn't decorate the bare, leaping intervals at the close of the slow movement of K488, and he's restrained too in the C minor. But the performances seem to be beyond fashion. The slow movements are especially fine. In the Larghetto of No 24, unfolding at an ideal tempo, Curzon gives the impression of walking while he speaks to us. The gravity of the F sharp minor Adagio of No 23 is a different thing; but there, again, he is unaffected and completely unsentimental, direct in manner even while projecting the deepest feeling. He reminds us that the best interpreters do not impose but find a way of letting the music speak through them.

Piano Concertos Nos 9 and 25
Orpheus Chamber Orchestra / Richard Goode pf
Nonesuch 7559-79454-2 (63 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997 ●●

The opening of No 25 sounds tremendous, with a leathery thwack to the kettledrums and the orchestra suitably weighty. Although the acoustic is a bit dry, there is a satisfying depth to the sonority, and the balance and placing of the instruments is absolutely perfect. All the colours are vivid. In contrast to many players of the modern instrument, Goode does not pull his punches and makes this first movement a most glorious procession, imposing but never ponderous. His tempo has a propulsive energy and an underlying fitness that makes possible some relaxation of it in the broader paragraphs of the solo part. Wonderful slow movement too, flowing admirably, and it's a tricky one to get right.

This concerto has rarely been recorded so successfully, but the Ninth has been done better. Many of the virtues enjoyed by No 25 apply here also. It needs a different rhetoric, of course, and Goode supplies it, but he waxes and wanes and there's something a shade impersonal about him. The reservations concern the first movement principally, where it's as if he were saying: 'I do not need to attract your attention, this beautiful thing Mozart has made we are going to lay out before you'. However, this is still a Mozart concerto disc to give exceptional pleasure. And what teamwork! The musical focus sustained here is not something often encountered outside chamber music.

Piano Concerto No 26. Rondos – D, K382; A, K386
English Chamber Orchestra / Murray Perahia pf
Sony Classical SK39224 (DDD) Ⓕ ●

This is one of the most distinguished of Perahia's Mozart concerto recordings. The D major Concerto, No 26, is not, perhaps, a work of such individuality as the 12 concertos which preceded it, or the only one which succeeded it (No 27), yet it used to be one of the most popular, probably because it has a convenient nickname (Coronation), stemming from the fact that Mozart performed it on October 15, 1790, at the festivities accompanying the coronation of the Emperor Leopold II in Frankfurt am Main. Now, curiously enough, it is not played all that often and of the available recordings, Perahia leads the field: dignified yet never aloof in the first movement, eloquent in the central Larghetto, and marvellously agile and dexterous in the florid concluding Rondo. He plays his own characteristically stylish cadenza in the first movement (Mozart's own has not survived). As a coupling Perahia gives us the two concert Rondos: K382 in D, a Viennese alternative finale for the Salzburg D major Concerto, K175; and K386 in A, presumably the original, rejected finale of K414. The A major Rondo has had an eventful history, having been cut into pieces in the 19th century for use as greeting cards (!), and patched together subsequently by numerous editors, including Alfred Einstein, Paul Badura-Skoda, Sir Charles Mackerras, and Erik Smith. The version performed here has a different ending which was discovered by Peter Tyson. It was completed by Paul Badura-Skoda and this is its first recording. The performances are sheer delight and, as in the concerto, the ECO plays, quite literally, con amore – a spirit evidently shared by the Sony recording team.

Piano Concerto No 27. Concerto for Two Pianos and Orchestra in E flat, K365/K316a
Schubert Fantasia, D940
Emil Gilels, Elena Gilels pfs Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Karl Böhm
DG The Originals 463 652-2GOR Ⓜ
(59 minutes: ADD) ●●

This is the most beautiful of Mozart playing, his last piano concerto given here by Emil Gilels with total clarity. This is a classic performance, memorably accompanied by the VPO and Böhm. Suffice it to say that Gilels sees everything and exaggerates nothing, that the performance has an Olympian authority and serenity, and that the Larghetto is one of the glories of the gramophone. He is joined by his daughter Elena in the Double Piano Concerto in E flat, and their physical relationship is mirrored in the quality, and the mutual understanding of the playing: both works receive marvellous interpretations. We think Emil plays first, Elena second, but could be quite wrong. The VPO under Karl Böhm is at its best; and so is the quality of recording, with a good stereo separation of the two solo parts, highly desirable in this work.

Additional recommendation
Piano Concertos Nos 9, 14, 15, 17, 18
Coupling: Rondo in D, K382
Uchida pf; English Chamber Orchestra / Tate
Philips Duo ② 473 313-2PM2 (107 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ

Wonderfully imaginative interpretations that show soloist, orchestra and conductor in perfect rapport.

Violin Concertos

No 1 in B flat, K207; No 2 in D, K211; No 3 in G, K216; No 4 in D, K218; No 5 in A, K219; D, K271*a*

Violin Concertos Nos 1-5[a]. Adagio in E, K261[c]. Rondo in C, K373[a]. Sinfonia concertante in E flat, K364/K320*d*[b]
[a]Arthur Grumiaux vn [b]Arrigo Pelliccia va
[ab]London Symphony Orchestra / Sir Colin Davis;
[c]New Philharmonia Orchestra / Raymond Leppard
Philips Duo ② 438 323-2PM2 (153 minutes: ADD). Ⓜ
Recorded 1961-64
The concertos are also available on Philips 50 Great Recordings, coupled with violin sonatas nos 32 and 35 464 722-2PM2 Ⓜ

These performances of the five standard violin concertos, the Sinfonia concertante and a couple of other pieces were much admired when they came out on LP, and they continue to earn praise for their crispness, lightness and eloquence. Grumiaux was also fortunate in his partner in the Sinfonia concertante, for Pelliccia is also an expert Mozartian and they give a performance of this beautiful piece that is expressive but still avoids self-indulgent romanticism. In the solo concertos, too, Grumiaux plays cadenzas that suit the music in length and style. Both Sir Colin Davis and Raymond Leppard are sympathetic partners in this repertory, and since the playing of the two London orchestras is no less satisfying, this issue scores all round artistically. The 1960s recordings do not sound their age, and are pleasing save for a little tape hiss and an excess of bass that hardly suits the style of this translucent music. However, that is a small price to pay when so much else is admirable, and Grumiaux's fine tonal palette is well caught.

Violin Concertos Nos 1-5. Serenade No 7 in D,
'Haffner', K250/K248*b* – Andante; Menuetto; Rondo
Pamela Frank vn Zurich Tonhalle Orchestra / David Zinman
Arte Nova Classics ② 74321 72104-2 Ⓢ
(139 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1997-1999

What a good idea to include the violin concerto movements from the Haffner Serenade as a filler, rather than the more usual group of extra movements for violin and orchestra. The Serenade shows the 20-year-old Mozart with his imagination at full stretch; Frank, Zinman and the Zurich orchestra revel in the wit, the sensuous expressiveness and the melodic fecundity of this still neglected music. Pamela Frank gives us, here and throughout the two discs, violin playing of great technical purity. The music speaks to us without any affectation, yet respecting Mozart's indications and such 18th-century conventions as tailing off the weak beats of the bar. She's given a splendidly positive, well-considered accompaniment. The bouncy rhythms and perfect orchestral balance of, say, the opening tutti to K216 establish a sense of joie de vivre that carries over into the violin playing.

Zinman's care for detail ensures that nothing of importance is overlooked: on the many occasions where the bass is carried by the second violin or viola these lines are given a bit of extra emphasis to highlight the harmonic movement. The horns deserve special mention; their purity of tone and rhythmic poise give a real sparkle to the outer movements of K207 and to the middle section of the Haffner Minuet, spectacularly scored for violin and wind. Zinman has also written the cadenzas (except in K219, where Frank plays the famous Joachim ones) – they're imaginative and stylish, but don't always sound improvisatory enough and occasionally seem too long. Frank has an ability to bring the music to life, and she's supported by an unusually characterful orchestra and very crisp, clear recording. A fantastic bargain.

Violin Concertos Nos 1-5[b]. Rondos[b] – B flat,
K269/K261*a*; C, K373. Concertone in C,
K190/K186*e*[abce]. Adagio in E, K261[b]. Sinfonia
concertante in E flat, K364/K320*d*[dh]. Double Concerto in D, KAnh56/K315*f*[gh]. Sinfonia
concertante in A, KAnh104/K320*e*[dfh]
[a]Richard Morgan ob [b]Henryk Szeryng, [c]Gérard Poulet vns [d]Nobuko Imai va [e]Norman Jones, [f]Stephen Orton vcs [g]Howard Shelley pf [b]New Philharmonia / Sir Alexander Gibson; [h]Academy of St Martin in the Fields / Iona Brown vn
Philips Mozart Edition ④ 422 508-2PME4 Ⓜ
(265 minutes: ADD/DDD)
Recorded 1966-70

Mozart's violin concertos reflect their creator's love and understanding of an instrument which he played more than capably. They have much in common with Mozart's cassations, divertimentos and serenades, which also highlight the solo violin and have other concerto-like elements in them. But their lightweight means of expression in no way diminishes their long-term appeal, for Mozart filled them to the brim with wonderful ideas. Henryk Szeryng has a relaxed way with these works and the New Philharmonia under Sir Alexander Gibson is alert yet sensitive. Szeryng's tone is unfailingly beautiful with a sweetness that is greatly appealing. His evident affection for these works makes for pleasing listening and the vivid and witty 'Turkish' episode in the finale of No 5 has great spirit. This disc also includes the 'doubtful' but agreeable solo Concerto in D major, K271*a*, together with a rather laid-back account of the Sinfonia concertante with Iona Brown and Nobuko Imai as the soloists (beautifully matched and blended). In addition we have the reconstructions of the incomplete projected Concerto for piano and violin and the single-movement Sinfonia concertante in A major for string trio and orchestra. The recordings are satisfying.

Mozart Violin Concerto No 3
Brahms Violin Concerto in D, Op 77[a]
Frank Peter Zimmermann vn
Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Wolfgang Sawallisch
EMI 555426-2 (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Item marked [a] recorded live in 1995

With the string complement of the Berlin Philharmonic reduced, and Sawallisch at his most sparkling, the Mozart is a delight throughout, with a quicksilver lightness in the outer movements very different from the big bow-wow approach that virtuoso violinists used to adopt. More than in the Brahms Zimmermann finds a vein of fantasy, and in the central Adagio he plays with a repose and concentration markedly greater than in his live account of the Brahms slow movement. Curiously, it is not until the finale of the Brahms, where Zimmermann seems to acquire an extra degree of daring, that the advantages of live recording come home at all clearly. Till then, his performance seems just a little too well mannered, with his silvery tone pointing a lack of bravura, however brilliant the playing is technically. Yet in the finale not only does the performance take wing, but Zimmermann becomes more individual, as in the little commas of expression he inserts each time in the main Hungarian dance theme.

Violin Concertos Nos 3-5
Camerata Academica Salzburg / Augustin Dumay vn
DG 457 645-2GH (75 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996 ●

Taking a break from chamber music-making, Augustin Dumay makes his début as soloist and conductor in these vivid and immediate recordings from the Salzburg Mozarteum. The dual role is very much what sets these performances apart. High-fibre, robustly articulated orchestral playing acts as frame and foil for the imaginative richesse of Dumay's own free and airy spirit; and the excitement of the players' close mutual engagement gives a real sense of Mozart's youthful energy bursting out of its Salzburg prison walls.

Dumay's choice of tempos makes each slow movement appear to breathe the air of another planet: in the G major work, the pizzicato pulse becomes the plucking of a distant lyre, as the bow scarcely seems to shift on the string in a finely suspended song.

In the D major, the soloist is primus inter pares in a fine weave of wind and strings. And in the A major, whose piercingly true, birdlike first-movement song deliciously anticipates Joachim's larkrise of a cadenza, there is a fluency and sense of wonderment which makes other interpretations seem earthbound by contrast. Dumay can be earthy enough when the occasion demands: in the finales of the D major and A major Concertos, his little moments of rubato make a shapely leg point and stretch forward in a series of high-stepping open-air dances.

Overtures

Overtures – Le nozze di Figaro; Il re pastore; Die Entführung aus dem Serail; Die Zauberflöte; Idomeneo; Der Schauspieldirektor; Bastien und Bastienne; La clemenza di Tito; Lucio Silla; Così fan tutte; La finta giardiniera; Mitridate, Re di Ponto; Don Giovanni
Sinfonia Varsovia / Yehudi Menuhin
Classic fM The Full Works 75605 57032-2 Ⓜ
(63 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1998

This is a highly recommendable issue, offering fresh and alert performances, vividly recorded. Not only that, the choice of overtures is markedly more generous than on any rival disc, including as it does the early pieces, Il re pastore, Bastien und Bastienne and Mitridate. The Overture to Bastien und Bastienne may be little more than a flourish, lasting just over a minute and a half, but its opening strikingly anticipates the first theme of the Eroica. Like the Overture to Lucio Silla, the most inspired of Mozart's teenage operas, the one for Mitridate is like a symphony in three movements, just as delightful only even more compact, lasting in all only five and a half minutes.

Menuhin's fresh, alert manner at relatively brisk speeds, is most refreshing. And what above all makes this disc compelling is the overall sense of live communication, of players responding in fresh enjoyment.

The excellent sound is full and clear with ample bloom.

Serenades

No 3 in D, K185/167*a*; No 4 in D, K203/K189*b*; No 5 in D, K204/K231*a*; No 6 in D, K239, 'Serenata notturna'; No 7 in D, K250/K248*b*, 'Haffner'; No 9 in D, K320, 'Posthorn'; No 10 in B flat for 13 wind instruments, K361/K370*a*, 'Gran Partita'; No 11 in E flat, K375; No 12 in C minor, K388/K384*a*; No 13 in G, K525, 'Eine kleine Nachtmusik'

Serenades – Nos 3 and 4 (with Iona Brown vn); No 5 (Kenneth Sillito vn); Nos 6 and 7 (Iona Brown vn); Nos 9 and 13. Marches – D, K62; D, K189/167*b*; D, K215/K213*b*; D, K237/K189*c*; D, K249; D, K335/K320*a* No 1; D, K335/K320*a* No 2. Cassations – G, K63 (Kenneth Sillito vn); B flat, K99/K63*a*; D, K100/K62*a*. Divertimento in D, K131. Notturno in D, K286/K269*a*. Galimathias musicum, K32 (John Constable hpd Ambrosian Singers) Academy of St Martin in the Fields / Sir Neville Marriner
Philips Mozart Edition ⑦ 422 503-2PME7 Ⓜ
(404 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1981-89

The prospective collector must face the fact that although at medium price this set represents a substantial outlay, it is a pretty good investment for a lifetime's listening pleasure. With Sir Neville Marriner and the Academy of St Martin in the Fields we are in sure and sensitive Mozartian hands, and these performances, by and large, penetrate easily to the heart of the music in all its moods and colours. The recordings are good, too, with crisp sound that nevertheless has a bloom of resonance on it, and there is a natural balance between the orchestral forces, which include a harpsichord. In fact this issue offers Philips engineering at its best. Alongside masterpieces such as the big Posthorn and Haffner Serenades and the incomparably graceful Eine kleine Nachtmusik there is something of a ragbag of music here, and seven CDs make for a lot of listening. But there are few disappointments. The Galimathias musicum is an extraordinary mixture of themes, with 17 sections in all making up a cheerful 'quodlibet' medley of popular tunes, including a bagpipe-like one in the Lydian mode (in this case G major with C sharps), which the composer seems to have penned in 1766, aged 10; here also the Ambrosian Singers and a solo harpsichordist make a useful and idiomatic contribution.

Good nature goes together with inventiveness and compositional brilliance in the best of Mozart's entertainment music, and we can only sit back and admire the wealth of ideas that are laid out before us, including instrumental ones – for example, the Divertimento, K131 has four horns, as its last Adagio reminds us. Nevertheless, for anyone planning consecutive listening there are seemingly unending stretches of D major – every work on the fourth, sixth and seventh discs is in this key, and most of the fifth as well. The Eine kleine Nachtmusik on the fifth is the exception, being in G major, and is nicely played, though the orchestra seems on the big side and in its second-movement Romance the bass-line is over-weighty. In the Haffner Serenade, Iona Brown is a stylish violin soloist, while the small contribution of the posthorn player Michael Laird in the work named after his instrument (listen for him in the second Minuet) is attractive too, as is that of the other wind players.

Serenade No 3[a]. March, K189/K167*b*. Five Contredanses, K609. Notturno in D, K286/K269*a*
[a]Arvid Engegard vn Salzburg Mozarteum Camerata Academica / Sándor Végh
Capriccio 10 302 (66 minutes: DDD). Ⓕ
Recorded 1988-89

The main work here is the big Serenade, K185, commissioned by the Antretter family of Salzburg and first performed in August 1773 to celebrate the end of the university year. Like other works of its kind it incorporates a miniature two-movement violin concerto within a loose symphonic framework: an Andante designed to display the instrument's powers of cantilena, and a brisk contredanse with plenty of opportunities for ear-catching virtuosity. There is also a violin solo in the glum D minor trio of the second minuet. But perhaps the finest movements are the sensuous A major Andante grazioso, with its concertante writing for flutes and horns, and the rollicking 6/8 finale, preceded by an unexpectedly searching Adagio introduction.

The performance by Végh and his hand-picked Salzburg players is affectionate, rhythmically alive and beautifully detailed, with an imaginative, subtly coloured solo violin contribution from Arvid Engegard. The tempo and specific character of each movement is shrewdly judged: the two minuets, for example, are vividly differentiated, the first properly swaggering, with a nice lilt in the trio, the second spruce and quick-witted. Only in the finale is Végh arguably too leisurely, though here too the style and rhythmic lift of the playing are infectious. Végh follows the serenade with deft, colourful readings of five contredanses from Mozart's last year and a beguiling performance of the Notturno for four orchestras, exquisitely imagined open-air music, with its multiple echoes fading into the summer night. All in all a delectable disc, offering a varied concert of Mozart's lighter music performed with exceptional flair and finesse. The recording, too, is outstandingly vivid, with the spatial effects in the Notturno beautifully managed.

Serenades Nos 6, 12 and 13
Orpheus Chamber Orchestra
DG Galleria 439 524-2GGA (54 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1985

The Serenata notturna (No 6) can easily seem bland but here is attractively vivacious and alert. The use of light and shade is a constant source of pleasure, the playing itself is extremely fine, and it is altogether a splendid account. Serenade No 12 is a big piece, being in four movements, and it is played so stylishly and with so much refinement and variety that one never becomes satiated with wind tone, as can happen with more ordinary performances. Of course one wonders at the composer's choice of a minor key for the C minor Serenade (No 12), a work described in Anthony Burton's booklet note as 'dramatic and sombre' – hardly conventional serenade material.

But whatever the mystery of its nature, this is a splendid piece, with a tense first movement and a mirror canon for oboes and bassoons in its Minuet that has been described as suggesting 'the image of two swans reflected in still water'. The finale is a terse set of variations, and indeed it is only the Andante (in E flat major) of this Serenade that offers real warmth. Since the recording in a New York location is as successful as the playing, this is the most recommendable version available of this work.

There are many worthy recorded performances of Mozart's most famous Serenade, the one that is now universally called Eine kleine Nachtmusik (No 13), but this one by the string section of the Orpheus Chamber Orchestra has qualities of refinement and alertness that make it rather special. These players clearly enjoy the music, but bring to it a delightful precision as well as the necessary joie de vivre and spontaneity, and each of the four movements is beautifully shaped and characterized, so that this familiar music comes up as fresh as anyone could wish for.

Serenades Nos 6 and 13. Divertimento in D, K136. Adagio and Fugue in C minor, K546
Ferenc Liszt Chamber Orchestra / János Rolla
Hungaroton HCD12471 (50 minutes: ADD/DDD) Ⓕ

The Eine kleine Nachtmusik Serenade is a favourite which will never be in any danger of oblivion. The Hungarian Ferenc Liszt Chamber Orchestra plays splendidly with an exceptionally alert style, but with a slightly heavier sound, a slightly solider style, than the Orpheus Chamber Orchestra. Nevertheless, this is to point to minor differences in the two perfectly sensible approaches, not to suggest that either of the performances is in any way materially superior to the other. Another common factor of the two discs is their inclusion, along with the Nachtmusik, of Serenade No 6. The Divertimento here offers a degree of instrumental contrast, adding a few wind players to the basic orchestra of strings. Perhaps rather more of the built-in different sounds of these two groups could have been made in the present recording; but the Serenade remains an enchanting one. The Divertimento, also in D, lacks corresponding colour, but is nevertheless, quite a strong work; and the C minor Adagio and Fugue (an arrangement by Mozart himself from a piano duo) offers a very noticeably strong Adagio, and a fugue in which Mozart makes one of his few explorations – a successful one – of an earlier contrapuntal idiom.

Serenades Nos 10[a] and 11[b]. Adagio in F, K410/K484*d*
[a]Academy of St Martin in the Fields / Sir Neville Marriner; [b]Holliger Wind Ensemble
Philips Complete Mozart Edition 446 227-2PM Ⓜ
(76 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1984

'A great wind piece of a very special kind': that is how Mozart's Serenade No 10 for 13 instruments was described on its première in March 1784, and with no exaggeration. It has had many excellent recordings in the past, and this one is certainly among the very finest. It is a matter of taste rather than any kind of chauvinism that leads us to prefer English wind players to any others in the world: the compromise they invariably find between a smooth, well-blended sound and individuality of tone and expression seems to be extremely satisfying. The present disc happily exemplifies it. The ensemble sound, which digital recording doubtless captures the more vividly, has a remarkable warmth and richness yet remains clearly defined, with the result that much inner detail comes through. Sir Neville Marriner's interpretation is characteristically both spirited and graceful.

Heinz Holliger leads his group of wind players in an exceptionally crisp and light-textured reading of the supreme 11th Serenade, marked as you would expect by some quite winningly imaginative oboe solos. Characterising the lightness of texture is the unusually reedy, thin-sounding clarinet tone, which will not please everyone. Except for the modern pitch it might almost be from period instruments. The Holliger group can sound too metrical, however crisp in pinpoint precision the ensemble is but in the slow movement the melodic lines soar persuasively. The Adagio in F major, K410 is a much shorter, light work, but equally appealing in its Mozartian charm and here receives yet another persuasive performance.

Serenade No 11. Harmoniemusik on 'Die Zauberflöte' (arr Stumpf) 🅿
Nachtmusique (Alf Hörberg cl/basset hn Danny Bond, Donna Agrell bns Claude Maury, Teunis Van der Zwart hns) / Eric Hoeprich cl/basset hn
Glossa GCD2K0601 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1996

This recording of K375 uses the relatively rare original version, without oboes. In some ways it makes better sense – the later one with oboes never quite justifies their presence. This performance is thoughtful, euphonious (the chording purer than is usual with period instruments) and very musicianly. The opening movement is taken rather deliberately, the central Adagio rather more quickly than usual and flowing very gracefully. Eric Hoeprich, who directs from the first clarinet, has a beautifully full and round tone and provides many happy details of expressive timing. There is some very neat and spirited playing in the finale; the clarinets in particular are tested and show themselves to be duly agile. If some of the emphatic chords in the opening movement are a little too loudly played, which leads to some coarsening of tone, this is nevertheless one of the best available recorded versions of the work, certainly in its sextet form.

The Zauberflöte wind arrangements are less familiar than those of the Da Ponte operas and they are particularly enjoyable; more than once the transcription virtually reproduces the original scoring. They follow the same formulae as the others, offering shortened versions of the overture and 13 favourite numbers. The arrangements are for the most part the work of J C Stumpf, although two pieces are indeed performed in other versions, for smaller ensemble, in order to create variety.

Mozart Serenade No 13. Adagio and Fugue in C minor, K546 Anonymous (arr L Mozart) Cassation in G, 'Toy Symphony' Pachelbel Canon and Gigue
Academy of St Martin in the Fields / Sir Neville Marriner
Philips 416 386-2PH (52 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1984-85

Sir Neville Marriner here collects a miscellaneous group of popular classical and Baroque pieces in characteristically polished and elegant performances. The only roughness – and that deliberate – is in the extra toy percussion of Leopold Mozart's Cassation with its long-misattributed Toy Symphony. The anonymous extra soloists enjoy themselves as amateurs might, not least on a wind machine, but what is very hard to take is the grotesquely mismatched cuckoo-whistle, an instrument which should readily be tunable for pitch. Eine kleine Nachtmusik brings a performance plainly designed to caress the ear of traditional listeners wearied with period performance.

The second movement Romanze is even more honeyed than usual on muted strings. The oddity of the Pachelbel item is that the celebrated Canon – taken unsentimentally if sweetly at a flowing speed – is given a reprise after the fugue. Warm, well-balanced recording.

Divertimentos

Divertimentos – B flat, K287/K271*h*; D, K205/K167*a*
Salzburg Mozarteum Camerata Academica / Sándor Végh
Capriccio 10 271 (59 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1988 ●

Mozart's Divertimento, K287 is a six-movement work cast on quite a large scale, and is scored for two violins, viola, two horns and bass, a combination which presents some difficulties of balance. One solution is to use a full orchestral string section, but this can bring its own problems, for Mozart demands playing of virtuoso standard in this score, and anything less is ruthlessly exposed. Sandor Végh's smallish string band is of high quality, and has a pleasantly rounded tone quality. The engineers have managed to contrive a satisfactory balance which sounds not at all unnatural, and the sound quality itself is very good. Végh directs an attractive, neatly pointed performance of the work, one which steers a middle course between objective classicism and expressive warmth. The Divertimento, K205, has five movements, but none lasts longer than five minutes, and the work is much shorter and more modest than K287. Scoring in this case is for violin, viola, two horns, bassoon and double bass, to provide another difficult but well resolved problem for the engineers. Végh directs another characterful, delightful performance, to round off a very desirable disc.

Mozart Divertimento No 17 in D, K334^{a} 🅷 Schubert Quintet for Piano and Strings
in A, 'The Trout', D667^{b}
Members of the Vienna Octet
(Willi Boskovsky, ^{a}Philipp Matheis vns
Günther Breitenbach va Nikolaus Hubner vc
Johann Krump db ^{a}Joseph Velba, ^{a}Otto Nitsch hns
^{b}Walter Panhoffer pf)
Pearl mono GEM0129 (72 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1950

Mozart's Divertimento for two horns and strings, K334, is one of his ripest and most engaging pièces d'occasion and this is a marvellous performance of it. Indeed, some skimping of repeats and a couple of cuts in the finale notwithstanding, this classic, out of the catalogues now for more than 30 years, is still the version to have.

Like the still too little regarded Vienna Konzerthaus Quartet, the Vienna Octet was one of the glories of post-war Viennese musical life. Willi Boskovsky, one of its founders, was a particular inspiration. Boskovsky may not have been every recording producer's dream. A wonderfully inspirational player, he would not necessarily play a take the same way twice. The results, though, are a joy; his playing, and the playing of the ensemble as a whole, is always burnished, idiomatic, intensely alive. The same could be said of this famous 1950 recording of Schubert's Trout Quintet, though the Vienna Octet's remake, recorded with Sir Clifford Curzon in 1957 when Boskovsky was still leading, is one of those gramophone classics difficult to knock off its perch. The original Decca LPs of the present performances (Pearl hasn't had access to the original tapes) were often said to be wiry in sound and difficult to reproduce, though this isn't true of the Mozart. Here, it sounds a million dollars. Tracking the latter movements of the Trout LP, though, has clearly not been easy. A barely audible amount of surface noise and a tiny amount of incipient distortion persists. That said, the new disc is indispensable.

Ein musikalischer Spass, K522

Ein musikalischer Spass. Contredanses – C, K587, 'Der Sieg vom Helden Koburg'; D, K534, 'Das Donnerwetter'; C, K535, 'La Bataille'; G, K610, 'Les filles malicieuses'; E flat, K607/K605*a*, 'Il trionfo delle donne'. Gallimathias musicum, K32. German Dances – K567; K605; C, K611, 'Die Leyerer'. March in D, K335 No 1
Orpheus Chamber Orchestra
DG 429 783-2GH (69 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1989

The celebrated Musikalischer Spass ('Musical Joke') which begins the disc is never so crudely funny that it wears thin, but make no mistake, the jokes are there in just about every passage, whether they are parodying third-rate music or wobbly playing, and oddly enough sound still more amusing when the performance is as stylishly flexible as this one by the conductorless Orpheus Chamber Orchestra. One of the tunes here (that of the finale on track four) is that of the BBC's Horse of the Year programme – and what a good tune it is, even at the umpteenth repetition as the hapless composer finds himself unable to stop The rest of this programme is no less delightful and includes miniature pieces supposedly describing a thunderstorm, a battle, a hurdy-gurdy man and a sleigh-ride (with piccolo and sleigh-bells). There is also a Gallimathias musicum, a ballet suite of dainty little dances averaging less than a minute in length, which Mozart is supposed to have written at the age of 10. Whatever the case this CD, subtitled 'A Little Light Music', provides proof of his genius, though differently from his acknowledged masterpieces. The recording is as refined as anyone could wish yet has plenty of impact.

Symphonies

No 1 in E flat, K16; No 2 in B flat, K17 (attrib L Mozart); No 4 in D, K19; No 5 in B flat, K22; No 6 in F, K43; No 7 in D, K45; No 7*a in G, K45a/KAnh221, 'Alte Lambach'; No 8 in D, K48; No 9 in C, K73; No 10 in G, K74; No 11 in D, K84/K73*q*; No 12 in G, K110/K75*b*; No 13 in F, K112; No 14 in A, K114; No 15 in G, K124; No 16 in C, K128; No 17 in G, K129; No 18 in F, K130; No 19 in E flat, K132; No 20 in D, K133; No 21 in A, K134; No 22 in C, K162; No 23 in D, K181/K162*b*; No 24 in B flat, K182/K173*dA*; No 25 in G minor, K183/K173*dB*; No 26 in E flat, K184/K161*a*; No 27 in G, K199/K161*b*; No 28 in C, K200/K189*k*; No 29 in A, K201/K186a; No 30 in D, K202/K186*b*; No 31 in D, K297/K300*a*, 'Paris'; No 32 in G, K318; No 33 in B flat, K319; No 34 in C, K338; No 35 in D, K385, 'Haffner'; No 36 in C, K425, 'Linz'; No 38 in D, K504, 'Prague'; No 39 in E flat, K543; No 40 in G minor, K550; No 41 in C, K551, 'Jupiter'; (No 42) in F, K75; (No 43) in F, K76/K42a; (No 44) in D, K81/K73*l*; (No 45) in D, K95/K73*n*; (No 46) in C, K96/K111*b*; (No 47) in D, K97/K73*m*; (No 55) in B flat, KApp214/K45*b*; F, KAnh223/K19a; B flat, K74g/KAnh216/C11.03

Symphonies Nos 1-36; Nos 38-47; (No 7*a*) in G, 'Alte 🅷
Lambach', K45*a*/KAnh221; G, 'Neue Lambach'
Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Karl Böhm
DG ⑩ 453 231-2GX10 (749 minutes: ADD). Ⓑ
Recorded 1959-68

Böhm's vintage Mozart recordings with the Berlin Philharmonic were in fact just as much a pioneering project as Antál Dorati's Haydn symphonic cycle, completed five years later. This was the first attempt on commercial disc to record the whole Mozart symphony cycle, at a time when virtually none of the works before the little known G minor, No 25, were at all familiar even to specialists. What the performances tell us, warm and genial, with bold contrasts of dynamic and well-sprung rhythms, is that for the players as well as the conductor this was a voyage of discovery, and their enthusiasm never wanes. On matters of scholarship these performances may have been supplanted by a whole series of recordings since, but as a welcoming way to investigate Mozart early and late they hold their place, with no hint of routine in the playing. As with Dorati in Haydn, minuets are slow and often heavy by today's standards, but some of the minuets in the early symphonies are taken more briskly, almost as fast ländlers. In finales Böhm rarely adopts an extreme speed, but always the springing of rhythm, and the clarity of articulation has the ear magnetized, even with a speed slower than we have grown used to.

When this set was first issued on CD, it involved 12 discs, and it is welcome to have these transfers squeezed on to 10 discs instead, particularly when the sound is fuller and more forward, with good body and presence. There is some inconsistency in the recording quality, but not enough to worry about, and even the earliest reading – of the Haffner, made in 1959 – is satisfyingly full-bodied, when one or two of the later ones are rather thinner. All the earlier symphonies were recorded in intensive sessions in 1968, and the present bargain box, unlike the previous, has such information included.

Böhm is inconsistent over such matters as exposition repeats. In the Prague, for example, though there is no repeat in the first movement, the exposition repeat is observed in the Presto finale, a question, one imagines, of Böhm wanting to balance two exceptionally long earlier movements. Then in No 40 he does observe the first movement repeat, but not in No 39 or the Jupiter, and it is probable that with the Jupiter the reason is that DG wanted the symphony to fit comfortably on an LP side. Whatever the reason, it means that the last three symphonies have been squeezed on to a single disc of 79 minutes, and only one of the other discs has a timing of less than 70 minutes, and most are over 75. An excellent bargain.

Complete Symphonies 🅿
The English Concert / Trevor Pinnock
Archiv Produktion 471 666-2AB11 Ⓑ
(11 discs: 13 hours, 36 minutes: DDD)
Recorded 1993-94 ●

This set is pure joy. These are period performances, but there's nothing hair-shirt about them. Pinnock caresses the slow movements with great affection and throughout there's a sense of fun and enjoyment. What is exciting about this set is the sweetness of the period-instrument sound and the suppleness and flexibility The English Concert brings to the music. They play, much of the time, as if it were chamber music, particularly in second subjects – the lyrical passages, that is, where they shape the phrases with a warmth and refinement you hardly expect in orchestral music. Timing is quietly witty, yet not at all contrived or artificial: it is the sort of expressive refinement that depends on listening to one another, not on the presence of a conductor. There is large-scale playing, too.

Pinnock is especially good in the middle symphonies. The opening of the brilliant D major work, K133 (No 20) has a splendid swing, with its prominent trumpets, and a real sense of a big, symphonic piece. K184 (No 26) is duly fiery and its accents are neatly judged. K201 and K202 (Nos 29 and 30) are both very impressively done: an eloquent rather than a fiery account (though something of that too) of the opening movement of K201, with a particularly euphonious and shapely Andante, and the finales of both are done with exceptional vitality and the rhythmic resilience that is characteristic of these performances.

His Jupiter (No 41) is truly outstanding. The first movement is duly weighty, but energetically paced and its critical junctures timed with a keen sense of their role in the shape of the whole. In the Andante Pinnock draws an extraordinarily beautiful, almost sensuous sound from The English Concert and the lines are moulded with tenderness. This, above all, is the quality that distinguishes Pinnock's recordings from all others, this natural and musical sound, deriving from the way the players are intently listening to one another; and it is fitting that it reaches its high point in the Jupiter. As for the finale: well, it is decidedly quick, and one has the impression of a performance in which the orchestra is pressed to an extent that its ensemble playing is under stress, though it does of course hold together. It is a very bold, outspoken reading, which leaves one gasping afresh at the music's originality.

In short, quite outstanding performances, unfailingly musical, wholly natural and unaffected, often warmly expressive in the slow music and always falling very happily on the ear, with no trace of the harshness that some think is inevitable with period instruments. They are excellently recorded, with the properly prominent wind balance helping to characterize the sound world of each work.

Symphonies Nos 1, 2, 4 and 5
Abel (formerly attrib Mozart) Symphony, Op 7 No 3
Northern Chamber Orchestra / Nicholas Ward Ⓢ
Naxos 8 550871 (59 minutes: DDD)
Recorded 1994

Symphonies Nos 6-10
Northern Chamber Orchestra / Nicholas Ward Ⓢ
Naxos 8 550872 (56 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1993

These two discs of Mozart's first 10 symphonies offer a unique view of the composer's earliest years of apprenticeship as a symphonist. Ward and his orchestra show a sensitive response to the wealth of stylistic influences apparent in these works. Purists may question the inclusion of two of the symphonies, Nos 2 and 3, since neither work is actually by Mozart. The former is attributed to the composer's father, Leopold, while the latter is Mozart's orchestration of C F Abel's E flat Symphony, Op 7 No 3. However, when they are played with such engaging style and elegance as here, these two works add a further important dimension to Mozart's early symphonic output. Where J C Bach's influence is most powerful (Symphonies Nos 1, 4, 5 and 6), the NCO presents the music's contrasting thematic characters with fine clarity, balancing the music's beautifully transparent textures with appropriate lightness of touch. The inclusion of trumpets and drums in the next three symphonies (Nos 7, 8 and 9) announces the young composer's growing brilliance and stature. In these pieces, the NCO moves into a higher gear, revealing Mozart's potent originality, with powerfully dramatic tuttis and expressively sung andantes. Mozart made his first trip to Italy in 1770, and the symphony he wrote in Milan that year (No 10) shows his enthusiastic incorporation of Italian stylistic models. Here the NCO's deliciously spacious orchestral playing shows Mozart's ravishing originality, with dramatic opposition of gesture and instrumentation in the exuberant allegros and a beguilingly graceful slow movement that winningly displays a keen awareness of the composer's innovative touches. These are indeed splendid performances, admirably complemented by vivid recordings (made in the spacious acoustic of the Concert Hall, New Broadcasting House, Manchester).

Symphonies Nos 15-18
Northern Chamber Orchestra / Nicholas Ward Ⓢ
Naxos 8 550874 (58 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1994

After Mozart returned from his first extended tour of Italy in 1771, he embarked on a number of symphonic projects that show his astonishing assimilation and transformation of the Italian overture, with crisp, transparent orchestration and suppleness of expression. The influence of Sammartini and J C Bach – whose music could be heard at concerts in Salzburg during 1772 when these pieces were written – is especially apparent in the bold thematic gestures and civilized discourse between wind and strings. Nicholas Ward and the NCO bring their customary style and eloquence to this music in performances that evocatively portray its blend of formal unity, radiant vitality and occasionally – as in the rhythmically imaginative finale of the C major Symphony – rustic charm. Opening allegros are suitably vivacious, andantes are graceful and poignant and the vigorous finales bristle with energy. The first movement of the C major Symphony offers a more potent dramatic formula, with subtly poetic triplets and tense tremolos; however, the highlight of the programme is the F major Symphony (No 18), which Saint-Foix described as 'the first of [Mozart's] great symphonies'. Here, Ward's and the NCO's dramatically compelling account, beautifully presented in a natural, spacious recording, brilliantly highlights the music's operatic qualities.

Symphonies Nos 21-24 and 26
Northern Chamber Orchestra / Nicholas Ward Ⓢ
Naxos 8 550876 (53 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1993

This is a chance to enjoy Mozart's inexhaustibly imaginative assimilation and transformation of Italian operatic models. Ward's balanced orchestral textures reveal Mozart's fragrant orchestration with great clarity in the A major Symphony. Sample the second movement's deftly handled interplay of strings, woodwind and horns, and buoyantly stately Menuetto that culminates effectively in the finale's restless drive. The complete musical satisfaction provided by the four Italian-overture symphonies that comprise the remainder of the programme is due to the fullness and vigour of the orchestration itself, and to the Northern Chamber Orchestra's lively performances. The opening allegros and cheerfully effervescent finales bubble with infectious vitality, while the slow movements give the opportunity for more intimate instrumental ensembles. Most impressive, however, is the E flat major work, which originated as the overture to the play Lanassa. Here, Ward and the NCO compellingly portray the dramatic violence of the opening Presto, the despair of its minor-key Andante and the exuberant rhythms of its finale. The recording is atmospheric.

Symphonies Nos 25, 28 and 29
Prague Chamber Orchestra / Sir Charles Mackerras
Telarc CD80165 (78 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1987 Ⓜ

Here are three symphonies from Mozart's late teens, written in Salzburg, in crisply articulated performances. The first of them is a Sturm und Drang piece in G minor, a key that the composer reserved for moods of agitation. Mackerras takes the orchestra through the big opening Allegro con brio of No 25 with drive and passion, although it is unlikely that Mozart would have expected a Salzburg orchestra in the 1770s to play as fast as this skilful body of Czech players. The gentle Andante comes therefore as a relief, though here too Mackerras keeps a firm rhythmic grasp on the music, and indeed a taut metrical aspect is a feature of all three symphonies as played here, so that minuets dance briskly and purposefully and finales bustle. However, the sunlit warmth of the beautiful A major Symphony, No 29, comes through and the bracing view of the other two symphonies is a legitimate one, though giving little or nothing in the direction of expressive lingering, much less towards sentimental indulgence. The Prague Chamber Orchestra is an expert ensemble, not overlarge for this style of music, and the recording is without doubt admirably clear although a little reverberant.

Symphonies Nos 29, 31-36 and 38-41 🅿
English Baroque Soloists / Sir John Eliot Gardiner
Philips ⑤ 442 604-2PH5 (309 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1984-89 ●●

Gardiner took his pilgrimage through the late Mozart symphonies more or less in chronological order over a span of six years. The first disc contains appealing performances of Nos 29 and 33, the former particularly lyrical and shapely, with an eloquent account of the Andante, the latter distinguished for its refinement of line and the properly spirited opening movement. Then comes the Paris, No 31, a piece designed to show off a virtuoso orchestra, which it duly does in this alert and shapely reading, coupled with No 34, another large-scale piece, in which Gardiner again provides a specially graceful slow movement. In the Haffner, Linz and Prague Symphonies Gardiner is possibly more concerned with classical grandeur than with strong characterization of the ideas. The G minor is the outstanding achievement of the set: the first movement performed with great drive and spaciousness, the second shapely and intense in expression, the finale done with immense vitality, the strings' arpeggios leaping vividly through the texture. The Jupiter is almost equally splendid, if slightly flawed by some piano effects in the first movement tuttis (this happens too in No 39) where they do not belong, but the crowning glory, the finale, contains many thrilling things. This is probably the version to choose, under any conductor, of these symphonies on period instruments – and perhaps on any instruments.

Symphony No 33. Serenade No 9
Academy of St Martin in the Fields / Iona Brown
Hänssler Classic CD98 129 (59 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997

Symphony No 35. Serenade No 7
Academy of St Martin in the Fields / Iona Brown vn
Hänssler Classic CD98 173 (72 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997

Each disc brings together a middle-period symphony and a contemporaneous Serenade. The sound recording has a sharpness of focus and sense of presence more often associated with the finest analogue recordings of the 1960s and 1970s. It is surprising to find that the venue was Henry Wood Hall, for this sounds rather more intimate than most recordings made there, with plenty of bloom but no excessive reverberation. This is Mozart sound, using modern instruments but with some concern for the crisper manners encouraged by period performance, that in its freshness and beauty makes one want to go on listening. The finale of the Symphony No 33, for example, brings a hectic speed which does not sound at all breathless, with featherlight triplets, and similarly in the finale of the Posthorn Serenade with which it is coupled. Exceptionally, in that Serenade, Iona Brown opts for a more relaxed speed and more moulded style in the lovely minor-key Andantino of the fifth movement. The posthorn in the Trio of the second Minuet is this time much more brazen and more forwardly balanced than before.

The coupling of the Haffner Symphony and Haffner Serenade is specially apt. Iona Brown herself is the virtuoso soloist in the Serenade, lighter than ever in the moto perpetuo scurryings of the fourth-movement Rondo. For those who continue to resist period performances in this repertory these are very refreshing discs.

Symphonies Nos 35, 36 and 38-41 🄷
Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Karl Böhm
DG The Originals ② 447 416-2GOR2 Ⓜ
(146 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1959-66

These performances come from the first ever complete set of Mozart symphonies (reviewed above), and they still represent 'big orchestra' Mozart at its most congenial. The contrast between Böhm's sparkling Mozart, both elegant and vigorous, and the much smoother view taken by Karajan on his countless recordings with the same orchestra, works almost entirely in Böhm's favour here. Interpretatively, these are performances very much of their time, with exposition repeats the exception (as in the first movement of No 40) and with minuets taken at what now seem like lumbering speeds. However, the slow movements certainly flow easily enough, and finales bounce along infectiously.

Consistently they convey the happy ease of Böhm in Mozart, even if the recording is beefy by today's standards, not as transparent as one now expects in this repertory, whether on modern or period instruments.

There is some inconsistency between the different recordings, all made in the Jesus-Christus Kirche in Berlin. The best sound comes from the sessions in 1966 for the Linz and No 39 – satisfyingly full without any perceptible edginess on violins – and the least good from 1959 for the Prague, where high violins sound rather fizzy. Yet the very precision of the CD transfers encourages one to highlight such points. In practice most collectors will find the sound more than acceptable enough in all six symphonies to convey the warmth of Böhm in Mozart without distraction.

Symphonies Nos 36 and 38
Prague Chamber Orchestra / Sir Charles Mackerras
Telarc CD80148 (66 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1987

Mozart wrote his Linz Symphony in great haste (five days to be precise), but needless to say there is little evidence of haste in the music itself, except perhaps that the first movement has all the exuberance of a composer writing on the wing of inspiration. The slow movement with its siciliano rhythm certainly has no lack of serenity, although it has drama too. The Prague Symphony was written only three years later, yet Mozart's symphonic style had matured and the work is more ambitious and substantial.

A glorious spaciousness surrounds Sir Charles's performances. The fullness of the sound helps to add weight to climaxes without going beyond the bounds of volume that Mozart might have expected. Sir Charles captures the joy and high spirits that these symphonies embody without in any way undermining their greatness. This vivacity is emphasised by the East European sound of the Prague Chamber Orchestra. Mackerras adopts some aspects of the modern approach to Mozart performance: he includes harpsichord continuo, his minuets are taken trippingly, one-to-a-bar, and he prefers bowing that is crisper, more detached, and pointed. The very rightness of the result is recommendation enough.

Symphony No 38. Piano Concerto No 25 in C, K503^{a}. Ch'io mi scordi di te ... Non temer, amato bene, K505^{b} ^{b}Bernarda Fink sop Lausanne Chamber Orchestra / Christian Zacharias ^{ab}pf
Dabringhaus und Grimm MDG340 0967-2 Ⓕ
(73 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1999 ●

Here Christian Zacharias successfully experiments with a nicely balanced Mozart group of symphony, aria and concerto. He himself takes multiple roles, conducting a fresh and lively account of the Prague Symphony, and acting as piano soloist not only in the Concerto, directing the weighty K503 from the keyboard, but also providing a crisply pointed obbligato in the most taxing of Mozart's concert arias, Ch'io mi scordi di te. The sense of freedom and spontaneous enjoyment is enhanced by the clarity of the recording, made in the Metropole, Lausanne. Though tuttis are big and weighty, Zacharias finds rare transparency in lighter passages, and a vivid sense of presence throughout. One of Zacharias's great merits as a Mozart pianist is the crispness of his arti-culation; he defines each note with jewelled clarity.

The Symphony, too, is given a refreshing performance, with due weight in the first movement and light, crisp articulation in the finale. Some may feel that Zacharias underplays the gravity of the central Andante, but nowadays few will object to a flowing tempo such as one expects in a period performance.

Most striking of all, though, is the concert aria. Bernarda Fink, officially a mezzo, is not just untroubled by the soprano tessitura but gives a characterful interpretation, pointing words and phrases with delightful individuality. Using her lovely creamy tone-colours, Fink offers one of the most impressive of all readings since Schwarzkopf's. Her contribution crowns a consistently enjoyable programme.

Clarinet Quintet in A, K581

Mozart Clarinet Quintet
Brahms Clarinet Quintet in B minor, Op 115
Karl Leister cl Berlin Soloists (Bernd Gellermann, Bernhard Hartog vns Wolfram Christ va Jörg Baumann vc)
Warner Apex 0927-43502-2 (71 minutes: DDD) Ⓑ
Recorded c1989

This is a familiar and successful coupling, of course, of two of the most beautiful works written for clarinet and strings. Karl Leister gives most beautifully easy, charming, relaxed performances of both works, and the recordings are pleasantly fresh and immediate. There is no lack of sparkle in Mozart's final variations, and the Hungarian tinges are beautifully touched upon in the Brahms; the slow music in both works is reflective and tender without any loss of poise. Here are two beautiful performances that can be warmly recommended.

Clarinet Quintet. String Quartet No 18 in A, K464
Janet Hilton cl The Lindsays (Peter Cropper, Ronald Birks vns Robin Ireland va Bernard Gregor-Smith vc)
ASV CDDCA1042 (74 minutes: DDD). Ⓕ
Recorded 1998 ●

The Clarinet Quintet is given with the finesse and care for phrasing and articulation that characterises all Lindsay Mozart issues. It's good for Mozart to sound suave, and Janet Hilton presents the melody of the Larghetto (track 2) with lovely soft articulation, yet the music is more rhetorical and passionate than she allows, and the hint of vibrato only serves further to soften the expression. There are, however, fine features in this performance – the exciting, perfectly controlled first-movement development, a lively, beautifully shaped Minuet, a really melancholic viola in the finale and a splendidly robust concluding Allegro.

The Lindsays' interpretation of K464 is entirely persuasive, barring a few minor quibbles – the first movement, though flexible and elegant, is perhaps slightly lacking in urgency and dynamic contrast, the finale, on the other hand, has all the drama and onward thrust one could wish for. If you prefer to have modern instruments in this quartet, go for this recording. The recording is clear, intimate, but not dry.

String Quintets

String Quintets – No 1 in B flat, K174; No 2 in C minor, K406/K516*b*; No 3 in C, K515; No 4 in G minor, K516; No 5 in D, K593; No 6 in E flat, K614
Arthur Grumiaux, Arpad Gérecz vns Georges Janzer, Max Lesueur vas Eva Czako vc
Awards 1991
Philips Trio ③ 470 950-2PTR3 Ⓜ
(170 minutes: ADD).
Recorded 1973 ●●●

Of the six works which comprise Mozart's complete oeuvre for string quintet, that in B flat major, K174, is an early composition, written at the age of 17. It is a well-made, enjoyable work, but not a great deal more than that. The C minor work, K406, is an arrangement by Mozart of his Serenade for six wind instruments, K398. It is difficult not to feel that the original is more effective, since the music seems to sit a little uncomfortably on string instruments. But the remaining four works, written in the last four years of Mozart's life, are a different matter. The last string quintets from Mozart's pen were extraordinary works, and the addition of the second viola seems to have pulled him to still greater heights. It has been suggested that Mozart wrote K515 and K516 to show King Friedrich Wilhelm II of Prussia that he was a better composer of string quintets than Boccherini, whom the King had retained as chamber music composer to his court. There was no response, so he offered these two quintets for sale with the K406 arrangement to make up the usual set of three. K593 and K614 were written in the last year of his life. Refinement is perhaps the word that first comes to mind in discussing these performances, which are affectionate yet controlled by a cool, intelligent sensitivity. The recordings have been well transferred, and Grumiaux's tone, in particular, is a delight to the ear.

String Quintet No 3.
String Quartet No 16 in E flat, K428
Louise Williams va The Lindsays (Peter Cropper, Ronald Birks vn Robin Ireland va Bernard Gregor-Smith vc)
ASV CDDCA992 (67 minutes: DDD)
Recorded 1995 Ⓕ

Here's a fine performance of the great C major Quintet. The Lindsays take the first movement at a true Allegro, so that it bowls along in top gear, the details vivid and sharply etched. Much of this grandest and most spacious movement in Mozart's chamber output is marked to be played softly: in the Lindsays' hands the wonderful counterpoint in the development section can be heard with exceptional clarity as the tension builds up, but not the dynamic. The Andante sounds the more touching for never being overplayed, and it's a special pleasure to hear how the most florid passages for first violin and first viola fit effortlessly into the rhythmic scheme. In the finale, Peter Cropper introduces some beautifully played portamentos in the main theme, and the whole movement sounds delightfully witty and happy. The E flat Quartet, K428, is cool and stylish, which suits this enigmatic work rather well. The Lindsays' way of using Mozart's marks of expression and articulation to make the music speak feels absolutely right, especially in their delicate, refined Andante, and it's good to hear the quartet played with all its repeats. The recording has a nice intimate quality.

Flute Quartets

Flute Quartet No 1 in D, K285. Oboe Quartet in F, K370/K368*b*. Clarinet Quintet
Jaime Martin fl Jonathan Kelly ob Nicholas Carpenter cl Brindisi Quartet (Jaqueline Shave, Patrick Kiernan vns Katie Wilkinson Krososhunin va Anthony Pleeth vc)
EMI Debut 569702-2 (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996

Do you like your Mozart refined and graceful? Or robust and spontaneously expressive? A combination of both would be perfect, you may think, but in practice it's not always easy to achieve. The Brindisi Quartet and their three colleagues play with exceptional finesse, and excellent balance and blend, well captured by the recording. These are predominantly light-toned performances, with the phrases shaped convincingly and with unfailing elegance. Their approach seems just about ideal in the Flute Quartet, where the joyful, vivacious atmosphere of the outer movements is enhanced by thoughtful attention to detail. Jaime Martin's sensitive, sensuous flute-playing in the Adagio provides a delightful contrast.

There are many good things in the other two pieces, too. Jonathan Kelly's virtuosity in the Oboe Quartet's finale is really exciting, as is the brilliant, superbly balanced development section in the Clarinet Quintet's first movement. But there are places where you might long for something less cool and detached. The recording of the Oboe Quartet by Nicholas Daniel and members of the The Lindsays (reviewed below with the String Quartet No 17 and the Horn Quintet) manages to combine stylishness with rather stronger expression, but nevertheless this is a nice little set, worth buying for the Flute Quartet alone.

Flute Quartets – D, K285; G, K285*a*; C, KAnh171/K285*b*; A, K298
Emmanuel Pahud fl Christoph Poppen vn Hariolf Schlichtig va Jean-Guihen Queyras vc
EMI 556829-2 (59 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

There may be only one movement of any emotional weight, the B minor Adagio of the First Quartet, K285, but in that brief cantilena Pahud finds a mystery and subtlety of dynamic shading that outshine almost any rival. For the rest he consistently conveys the fun in the writing here. The A major work may run the dangerous course of parodying the banalities of the contemporaries whom Mozart despised, but Pahud still finds charm in the invention, helped by the warm, imaginative playing of his string partners. Pahud's lighter, more sparkling playing, with his fresh, clear tone is preferable to Galway's more Romantic approach at generally broader speeds, and with phrasing more heavily underlined in characteristically full flute tone. Pahud also observes second-half repeats as well as first in the sonata-form first movements of the first three quartets. Recommended.

Piano Quartets

No 1 in G minor, K478; No 2 in E flat, K493

Piano Quartets – E flat, K452; Nos 1 and 2 🅿
Sonnerie (Monica Huggett vn Emilia Benjamin va Alison McGillivray vc Gary Cooper fp)
ASV Gaudeamus CDGAU212 (76 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 2000

Sonnerie go one – rather a large one – better than their recorded rivals in the Mozart piano quartets by including an extra work: the piano quartet arrangement (not generally thought to be Mozart's own) of the Quintet for piano and wind. The work, so artfully composed around the sound and capacities of the oboe, clarinet, bassoon and horn, loses the motivation for its particular thematic structure in transcription but is nevertheless a worthwhile bonus.

Not that these performances need any bonus. They have exceptional musical vitality, as though the music is being freshly thought through as it unfolds and the players are newly fired by its ideas. The G minor Quartet in particular is given a large-scale, outspoken performance, vigorous, dark-toned in the first movement, with an almost alarmingly vivid and strongly shaped account of the development section. There is drama in the Andante, too, which is expansively done, and the finale of the E flat work, too, is done with great spirit – here the pianist is very much in the driving seat – and there are many happy details of timing and dynamic gradation.

Mozart's wit is beautifully captured in K493, yet this is a deeply serious performance, strongly argued, with the mystery and logic of his unusual modulations fully grasped. The first movement here, taken at a rather steady tempo, is particularly successful, with Cooper taking his time over the expression of its ideas and Monica Huggett and her colleagues playing the lyrical secondary material with much warmth.

Piano Quartets Nos 1 and 2
Isaac Stern vn Jaime Laredo va Yo-Yo Ma vc Emanuel Ax pf
Sony Classical Theta SMK89794 Ⓜ
(56 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1994

There is no shortage of good recordings of this favourite coupling of two Mozart masterpieces, and this grouping of star names offers performances of comparable imagination and insight. In the E flat Quartet, K493, it is not just Isaac Stern and Yo-Yo Ma whose solo entries have one sitting up, but also Jaime Laredo in the rare moments when Mozart gives a solo to his own instrument, the viola. Speeds are beautifully chosen, and in both works the performances convey a happy spontaneity. Emanuel Ax shows what a natural, individual Mozartian he is. The G minor work is in many ways parallel to the great piano concertos of the period, with the piano regularly set against the strings in ensemble, and Ax readily establishes the sort of primacy plainly required, even in such company as this. He is a shade robust at the start of the central Andante but in fast music as in slow his gift of pointing rhythms and moulding phrases is consistently persuasive and imaginative. The recording, made in the Manhattan Center, New York, is a degree drier than in many of the current rival versions, but there is ample bloom on the sound, fitting very well in a domestic listening room.

Additional recommendation
Piano Quartets
FP Zimmermann vn T Zimmermann va Wick vc Zacharias pf
EMI Encore 575874-2 (61 minutes: DDD) Ⓑ
Recorded 1988

The players make their instruments sing, and they're alert to all the drama in the music. Just one quibble: the viola sound is slightly too recessed.

String Quartets

No 1 in G, K80/K73*f*; No 2 in D, K155/K134*a*; No 3 in G, K156/K134*b*; No 4 in C, K157; No 5 in F, K158; No 6 in B flat, K159; No 7 in E flat, K160/K159*a*; No 8 in F, K168; No 9 in A, K169; No 10 in C, K170; No 11 in E flat, K171; No 12 in B flat, K172; No 13 in D minor, K173; No 14 in G, K387; No 15 in D minor, K421/ K417*b*; No 16 in E flat, K428/K421*b*; No 17 in B flat, K458, 'Hunt'; No 18 in A, K464; No 19 in C, K465, 'Dissonance'; No 20 in D, K499, 'Hoffmeister'; No 21 in D, K575; No 22 in B flat, K589; No 23 in F, K590

Awards 1991

String Quartets Nos 1-23
Quartetto Italiano (Paolo Borciani, Elisa Pegreffi vns Piero Farulli va Franco Rossi vc)
Philips ⑧ 462 262-2PB8 Ⓜ
(474 minutes: ADD)
Recorded 1966-73 ○○○

These classic performances have won praise since they began to appear in 1967. Admittedly, a little allowance has to be made for the sound. For example, it is a touch heavy and close in the 1966 recording of the D minor Quartet that is one of the wonderful set of six that Mozart dedicated to Haydn. In a way, this accords with the playing of the Quartetto Italiano, which is at times rather earnest – and in the first movement of this work, rather deliberate in its pace. But these are the only criticisms of a splendid issue, and the innate seriousness of these fine Italian artists is almost always a plus feature: indeed, they bring an overall intelligence, refinement and, above all, range of interpretative values to this often superb and always attractive music. As for quality of ensemble, they are impeccable. This is still the best general survey of Mozart's string quartets available, and at mid-price the eight discs represent a safe investment that should yield many years of pleasure.

The 'Haydn' Quartets – Nos 14 -19
Hagen Quartet

(Rainer Schmidt, Lukas Hagen vns
Veronika Hagen va Clemens Hagen vc)
DG ③ 471 024-2GH3 (173 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996 and 2001 ●●

Mozart's dedication of six quartet masterpieces to Haydn extends, in the hands of the Hagen Quartet, to Bartók, Janáček and Shostakovich. This is Mozart viewed from the sensitised standpoint of the 20th century: the transforming power of 'Hagenisms' – tiny brush strokes from an amazingly varied tonal palette – makes every Mozartian nerve end glow. Hardly a bar passes without some heightened dynamic, rhythmic or colouristic effect. This might have been infuriating but there's good hard thinking here behind the notes, the sort of informed radicalism that Glenn Gould brought to Bach.

Everything here makes musical sense. Put on K387 and listen to the improvisational violin cadenzas at the start of the development. Think about it for a moment and, yes, that's precisely what the writing suggests. They also score in the imaginative way they handle the witty 'false ending', making the final climax sound conclusive – which, in the event, it isn't.

Broadly speaking, the Hagen's Mozart is a hive of interpretative activity with constantly shifting hues and just an occasional hint of self-consciousness. The keenest bargain competition comes from Philips and the aristocratic Quartetto Italiano and is probably still a first choice overall, but the Hagens offer so much food for musical thought that only the most closed-minded listener is likely to disapprove. Strongly recommended.

String Quartet No 17. Oboe Quartet in F,
K370/K368*b*. Horn Quintet in E flat, K407/K386*c*
Nicholas Daniel ob Stephen Bell hn The Lindsays
(Peter Cropper vn Ronald Birks vn/va Robin Ireland va Bernard Gregor-Smith vc)
ASV CDDCA968 (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995

The Lindsays really make the Hunt Quartet sparkle. One could describe their approach as middle-of-the-road; they're as meticulous as many period-instrument groups about details of phrasing, and avoid excessive accents and vibrato, yet their sound is modern, and the care over detail doesn't preclude a very spontaneous approach in which the music's feeling is compellingly communicated. In the Oboe Quartet Nicholas Daniel matches the string players' care over articulation and detailed expression, and plays with exceptional technical polish and brilliance. His gleaming tone is capable of great expressive range. The Horn Quintet is perhaps not quite such an individual or remarkable work as the two quartets. And you may find yourself longing for the extra character and beauty that a fine performance with the natural horn would have had. Yet this is a highly recommendable reading, too. The recording is very lifelike, with clear spacing of the instruments.

String Quartets Nos 20 and 22 🅿
Quatuor Mosaïques Ⓕ
Astrée Naïve E8834 (63 minutes: DDD) ●●

This release completes the Mosaïques' recording of the 10 mature Mozart Quartets: an outstanding achievement. Apart from the clear, rich sound of the period instruments and the precise, beautiful tuning, what impresses about this Mozart playing is the care for detail, the way each phrase is shaped so as to fit perfectly into context while having its own expressive nuances brought out clearly. This often leads the quartet to use more rubato, to make more noticeable breathing spaces between sentences than many other groups do.

In the first movements of both these quartets, for instance, the Mosaïques adopt a very similar tempo and tone to the Quartetto Italiano, but the Italians aren't so rhythmically flexible. The Mosaïques make us listen to and appreciate the significance of each detail as it unfolds. With this approach there might be a danger of sounding contrived, but even when adopting a mannered style, as in the Minuet of K499, the Mosaïques retain a strong physical connection with the music's natural pulse – by comparison the Quartetto Italiano here seem a trifle heavy and humourless.

The slow movements of both quartets are taken at a flowing pace, making possible an unusual degree of expressive flexibility. All repeats are made, including those on the Minuet's da capo in K499. The longer the better when the playing is as exceptional as this.

String Quartets Nos 21 and 23 🅿
Quatuor Mosaïques (Erich Höbarth, Andrea Bischof vns Anita Mitterer va Christophe Coin vc)
Auvidis Astrée E8659 (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1998 ●

The Mosaïques here turn to Mozart's last quartets; the sheer refinement of its playing – its silk-sewn ensemble and its uncanny ability to sense out the living pulse and pace of a work – comes into its own in the sotto voce movements of No 21. A single ascending or descending scale can take on a rare beauty. And when these characteristic scales return to seal the first movement in tiny coda, they are enlivened by the little touches of rubato which breathe air into this performance. That same touch of rubato awakens the spirit of dance in the Menuetto, lifting the heel and pointing the toe. It is details like these which reanimate this music and give the edge of character to the Mosaïques' playing, over and above their rivals in this repertoire. In No 21, the mercurial playing of the Mosaïques, with the light, close harmony and subtly shaded inner voices, which is such a hallmark of this group, combines with a perfectly judged pace for the 6/8 Allegretto. Again the Mosaïques takes little moments to catch its breath, so that the hurtling round-dance of a finale leaves us a little less dizzy than it does in the hands of most other groups.

Piano Trios

Awards 1991

Piano Quintet in E flat, K452. Clarinet Trio in E flat, K498, 'Kegelstatt'. Adagio and Rondo in C minor, K617. Adagio in C, K356/K617*a*. Piano Quartets – No 1 in G minor, K478; No 2 in E flat, K493. Piano Trios – B flat, K254; D minor, K442 (cptd Stadler and Marguerre); No 1 in G, K496; No 3 in B flat, K502; No 4 in E, K542; No 5 in C, K548; No 6 in G, K564

Patrick Ireland, Karl Schouten, Bruno Giuranna vas Jean Decroos vc Aurèle Nicolet fl Heinz Holliger ob Eduard Brunner, Jack Brymer cls Hermann Baumann hn Klaus Thunemann bn Bruno Hoffmann glass harmonica Beaux Arts Trio (Isidore Cohen vn Bernard Greenhouse vc Menahem Pressler pf); Alfred Brendel, Stephen Kovacevich pfs

Philips Mozart Edition ⑤ 422 514-2PME5 Ⓜ

(274 minutes: ADD/DDD). Recorded 1969-87 ○○○

These recordings come from different locations and dates. Four of the five discs offer the two piano quartets and seven piano trios, played by the Beaux Arts Trio who are joined in the quartets by the viola player Bruno Giuranna; these are clearly the centrepiece of the issue and the playing of this fine ensemble is strongly characterful yet thoughtful. These are alert, direct and yet refined performances and earn only praise, although the recording in Philips's favoured Swiss location of La-Chaux-de-Fonds could have placed a little more distance between the players and the listener. But otherwise this clear sound suits the music, and Menahem Pressler's piano tone is well captured.

The D minor Trio which ends the series is not wholly authentic, being mainly Maximilian Stadler's compilation from material found by Mozart's widow Constanze after his death. Before we come to the piano quartets and piano trios, the first disc also has important works in fine performances in which Alfred Brendel and Heinz Holliger are just two of the artists involved (the Quintet for piano and wind was among the composer's favourite works). The first disc also offers two pieces featuring the ravishing sound of the glass harmonica (musical glasses), which is played by its leading exponent, Bruno Hoffmann, and the solo Adagio in C major is quite ethereally beautiful, if rather closely recorded. This unique instrument is usefully described and illustrated in the booklet.

Piano Trios – No 1 in G, K496; No 3 in B flat, K502. Divertimento in B flat, K254

Augustin Dumay vn Jian Wang vc

Maria João Pires pf

DG 449 208-2GH (73 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Includes bonus CD featuring short works by Brahms, Franck, Grieg, Mozart and Ravel. Recorded 1995

This disc of early Mozart trios is radiant with the discriminating, fanciful and exuberant music-making which characterizes this rare trio of friends. A crescendo of joy shooting up through the opening scalic and arpeggio figures of K496 is answered by finely tapered violin playing and a cello which draws the ear to its contributions long before the true dialogue of the Andante. This ensemble finds a truly lilting 6/8 (rather than the illusion of a sturdier 3/4) for the second movement, and the finale is full of a sense of wonder, in its platinum-tipped violin and the drawing back into finely nuanced tones of grey for the sombre fifth variation. For K502, Pires picks up on the forward impetus inherent in the rhythm of the opening theme and in the slow movment her phrasing makes its melody more shapely above the unsurpassed beauty of sustained tone in violin and cello. A delicious performance of the little Divertimento, K254 reveals the ancestry of these two trios; and there is another bonus in a 48-minute disc of extracts from the six recordings of Mozart, Brahms, Franck, Ravel and Grieg made over six years by the incomparable duo of Pires and Dumay.

Piano Sonatas

No 1 in C, K279/K189*d*; No 2 in F, K280/K189*e*; No 3 in B flat, K281/K189*f*; No 4 in E flat, K282/K189*g*; No 5 in G, K283/K189*h*; No 6 in D, K284/K205*b*; No 7 in C, K309/K284*b*; No 8 in A minor, K310/K300*d*; No 9 in D, K311/K284*c*; No 10 in C, K330/K300*h*; No 11 in A, K331/K300*i*; No 12 in F, K332/K300*k*; No 13 in B flat, K333/K315*c*; No 14 in C minor, K457; No 15 in F, K533/K494; No 16 in C, K545; No 17 in B flat, K570; No 18 in D, K576

Awards 1991

Piano Sonatas Nos 1-18. Fantasia, K475

Mitsuko Uchida pf

Philips Complete Mozart Edition 🏵

⑤ 468 356-2PB5 Ⓑ

(325 minutes: DDD) ○○○

By common consent, Mitsuko Uchida is among the leading Mozart pianists of today, and her recorded series of the piano sonatas won critical acclaim as it appeared and finally Gramophone Awards in 1989 and 1991. Here are all the sonatas, plus the Fantasia in C minor, K475, which is in some ways a companion piece to the sonata in the same key, K457. This is unfailingly clean, crisp and elegant playing, that avoids anything like a romanticised view of the early sonatas such as the delightfully fresh G major, K283. On the other hand, Uchida responds with the necessary passion to the forceful, not to say Angst-ridden, A minor Sonata, K310. Indeed, her complete series is a remarkably fine achievement, comparable with her account of the piano concertos. The recordings were produced in the Henry Wood Hall in London and offer excellent piano sound; thus an unqualified recommendation is in order for one of the most valuable volumes in Philips's Complete Mozart Edition. Do not be put off by critics who suggest that these sonatas are less interesting than some other Mozart compositions, for they are fine pieces written for an instrument that he himself played and loved.

Piano Sonatas Nos 5, 6 and 10
Maria João Pires pf
DG 437 791-2GH (73 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1990

Maria João Pires presents these sonatas with clear yet lightly pedalled textures and an overall directness that still allows room for tonal and rhythmic flexibility – which, generally speaking, is not overdone. Largely, her playing seems to let the music speak for itself, although of course just offering the notes is not enough and what we here appreciate is the art that actually conceals art. However, one might question the occasional detail: for example, less than a minute into the G major Sonata, Pires's longish trill on the D preceding the second subject is questionable, which gives us a bar with four beats in it instead of three. The Andante of the same work begins with repeated Cs that seem too emphatically staccato, and its central section is a little overdramatized. The dance movement called Rondeau en Polonaise in K284 is on the slow side, though it still holds together, and the variation-form finale varies considerably in pace. Pires consistently observes repeats, including the second halves of movements (thus we get virtually every note of K283 twice), as is indicated. These are clear, commendable performances, and the kind of grace that Pires brings to this music, in which other pianists can sound a touch severe, is most appealing. The recording is pleasing and faithful.

Piano Sonatas Nos 12, 13 and 14. Adagio in B minor, K540
Alfred Brendel pf
Philips 468 048-2PH (75 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 2001 ●

Alfred Brendel is not the first distinguished Mozartian to have embarked on a thoroughgoing exploration of the solo sonatas comparatively late in his career and to have found there a greater range than he had discovered hitherto. The F major Sonata, No 12 K332, he has never played before; it was misdated by Köchel (five years too early) and perhaps as a result has been underestimated by many pianists. It is mature Mozart, and when presented with Brendel's freshness of perception you wonder how its stature could ever have been overlooked. He uses a big range of dynamics and colour throughout K457, No14, and the rhythmic control which supports his quite free handling of line and rubato and dramatic pauses is a wonder to behold. There is spontaneity of feeling too, without which a Mozart player cannot attain the heights, and in the finales of the two earlier pieces a sparkle in the fingers that makes evident his delight in them.

The acoustic at The Maltings, Snape seems glorious for the sweep and Beethovenian force of gesture of No 14, contributing to the impression of music unconfined by the instrument and alive in the air around it. The other recordings were done at Glyndebourne and are very good too, but drier. The intimacy there is just right for the Adagio in B minor, K540. Sample him in this, if you will, for an immediate revelation of his achievement here as a Mozart interpreter of the highest class. Then forget about him and go straight to the heart of the matter.

Piano Duets

Piano Sonatas Nos 15 and 16. Fantasia, K475 (all arr Grieg)
Sviatoslav Richter, Elisabeth Leonskaja pfs
Teldec 4509-90825-2 (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1993

When Grieg added an accompaniment for a second piano to Mozart's keyboard sonatas, he did it primarily with teaching in mind. But the resulting compositions soon found their way into the concert hall where, according to Grieg, 'the whole thing sounded surprisingly good'. And so it does today. In trying to 'impart to several of Mozart's sonatas a tonal effect appealing to our modern ears' Grieg left a telling little document or two on just what those late 19th-century Norwegian ears expected. If the C major 'Sonata facile' seems to sit even more sedately in the drawing-room, then it soon becomes clear that the light glinting through its windows is not a million miles away from that bouncing off the fjord waters which lap around Troldhaugen.

The C minor Fantasia becomes a dark salon melodrama which moves from conversation with not a little chromatic prevarication to the hanging of whimsical icicles of figuration around the major-key section. These are Mozart-Kugeln with a bonne bouche or two of the finest Gravadlax on the side. And if these fond tributes are good enough for Elisabeth Leonskaja and Sviatoslav Richter, who could resist tasting them?

Piano Variations

Awards 1991

Piano Variations[a] – G, K24; D, K25; C, K179/K189*a*; G, K180/K173*c*; C, K264/K315*d*; C, K265/K300*e*; F, K352/K374 (with Koopman); E flat, K353K/300*f*; E flat, K354/K299*a*; F, K398/K416*e*; G, K455; A, K460/K454*a* (Koopman); B flat, K500; D, K573; F, K613. Minuets[c] – F, K1*d*; G/C, K1/K1*e*/K1*f*; F, K2; F, K4; F, K5; D, K94/K73*h*; D, K355/K576*b* (Uchida). Fantasia in D minor, K397/K385*g*[b]. Rondos[b] – D, K485; A minor, K511. Adagio in B minor, K540[b]. Gigue in G, K574b. Klavierstück in F, K33*B*c. Capriccio in C, K395/K300*g*[c]. March No 1 in C, K408/K383*e*[c]. Prelude and Fugue in C, K394/K383*a*[c]. Allegros[c] – C, K1*b*; F, K1*c*; B flat, K3; C, K5*a*; G minor, K312/K590*d*; B flat, K400/K372*a* (cpted Stadler). Suite in C, K399/K385*i*[c]. Kleine Trauermarsch in C minor, K453a[c]. Andante in C, K1a[c]. Fugue in G minor, K401/K375*e*[c] (with Tini Mathot hpd) [a]Ingrid Haebler, [b]Mitsuko Uchida pfs 🅿

^{c}Ton Koopman hpd
Philips Mozart Edition ⓢ 422 518-2PME5 Ⓜ
(274 minutes: ADD/DDD) ●●●

These five mid-price discs offer music of fine and often superb quality in a convenient format. Of the three artists here, two are generally fine and satisfying, though the third is more controversial. Ingrid Haebler was recorded back in 1975, but the piano sound is good and little tape background remains, and her performances of the variation sets, which take up the first three discs, are delicate without cuteness, effortlessly encompassing the music's wide range of moods. Mitsuko Uchida, on the fourth disc, performs individual pieces including the two rondos and the beautiful Adagio in B minor in a highly refined manner, a touch over-sophisticated perhaps but still beautiful and expressive and taking full, unashamed advantage of the sound of a modern grand. By contrast, Ton Koopman's disc of minuets and other miscellaneous things is played on a harpsichord at a semitone below modern concert pitch and offers a recording of such immediacy that some will regard it as too bright. Koopman puts gusto into everything he does, but not always to good effect. However, even if grace is in short supply in his performances, they offer ample personality, and any reservations about his playing should not affect the desirability of the set as a whole.

Fantasias

Adagio in B minor, K540. Fantasias – C minor, K396/385f; D minor, K397/K385g; C minor, K475. Gigue in G, K574. Kleiner Trauermarsch in C minor, K453a. Minuet in D, K355/576b. Rondos – D, K485; F, K494; A minor, K511
Christian Zacharias pf
Dabringhaus und Grimm MDG340 0961-2 Ⓕ
(67 minutes: DDD)

Most of Mozart's single piano pieces are the product of some special stimulus: they are not the daily bread of music-making, like the sonatas, but something rather more piquant. Christian Zacharias groups the pieces interestingly, starting with a D major-based section: the D minor Fantasia, the D major Rondo, the B minor Adagio and the D major Minuet, as if making a kind of free sonata of them. He omits the Allegretto portion of the Fantasia (on the grounds, it seems, that Mozart left it unfinished), and leads directly from the Fantasia into the Rondo. The B minor Adagio is one of Mozart's darkest, most inward pieces: written at a difficult moment in his life, it invites autobiographical interpretation with its sense of defeat and protest. Zacharias's sombre, subdued performance underlines such thoughts, and in the very chromatic K355 Minuet, too, his playing is dark and impassioned.

The C minor Fantasia, K396, is a rarity: a completion by Maximilian Stadler of a fragment that Mozart wrote for keyboard and violin. One can't imagine a performance much more persuasive than this; and in the authentic C minor Fantasia Zacharias plays beautifully, again with fire in the turbulent sections and with exquisite gentleness in the coolly reflective music such as the B flat episode. The K494 Rondo – more familiar in its revised version as finale of the K533 Sonata – is played in a more relaxed manner; in the A minor Rondo, K511, Zacharias beautifully captures the 'sentimental' tone and provides a performance of great delicacy and refinement, again drawing the full depth of expression from Mozart's harmonic subtleties.

Concert Arias

Concert Arias – Ah! se in ciel, benigne stelle, K538; Vorrei spiegarvi, oh Dio!, K418; No, no che non sei capace, K419; Se tutti i mali miei, K83/K73p; Popoli di Tessaglia!... Io non chiedo, eterni Dei, K316/K300b; Mia speranza adorata...Ah, non sai qual pena sia, K416; Alcandro, lo confesso...Non so d'onde viene, K294; Ma che vi fece, o stelle...Sperai vicino il lido, K368
Natalie Dessay sop Orchestra of the Opéra de Lyon / Theodor Guschlbauer
EMI 555386-2 (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1994 ●

Natalie Dessay's range extends upward far into the leger lines yet without incurring breathiness of a pallid coloration in the lower notes. She has a sylph's grace and lightness, and yet the timbre or character of her voice is thoroughly human. The profusion of scales and more intricate passagework common in some degree to all these pieces find in her an unostentatious virtuoso, mind and breath giving well-regulated support, and a sensitive feeling for phrase and line making good musical sense throughout.

Where vehemence and a dramatic quality of voice are in demand, as in the opening of Popoli di Tessaglia, we can find some reassurance in their absence because at least the young singer does not try to force an effect. In less strenuous attack, as in No, no che non sei capace, she conveys the energy of a determined spirit yet still has some way to develop as an expressive artist. The more sorrowful and tender phrases of Se tutti i mali miei, for example, evoke only a mild response in her. Occasionally, too, Dessay's purity forfeits normal resonance and for what seems to be an involuntary note or two the voice flutes with a kind of disembodied hollowness. An instance occurs just before the second part of Vorrei spiegarvi, yet this is such a lovely performance, so graceful in its leisurely interplay of voice and instruments, that grumbling really is out of order.

Additional recommendation
Lieder and Concert Arias
Schwarzkopf sop Brendel, Gieseking pfs
LSO / Szell
EMI Références 574803-2 (ADD)

Recorded 1955 and 1968) Ⓜ ●●

This disc is an absolute classic – the fruitful collaboration of great artists. Schwarzkopf was 39 when she recorded the Lieder, mature in resources but still amazingly capable of the clarity of youth.

Litaniae...

Litaniae de venerabili altaris sacramento, K243 🅿
Mass in C, K257, 'Credo'
Angela Maria Blasi sop Elisabeth von Magnus contr Deon van der Walt ten Alistair Miles bass
Arnold Schoenberg Choir; Vienna Concentus Musicus / Nikolaus Harnoncourt
Teldec Das Alte Werk 9031-72304-2 (61 minutes: DDD)
Notes, texts and translations included Ⓕ
Recorded 1991

The Litaniae de venerabili altaris sacramento of 1775 has powerful claims to be reckoned the finest of Mozart's church works before the C minor Mass and Requiem; but it has never quite had the recognition it deserves. Or the performance: until now, that is. It is clearly a deeply felt work, from the grave, warm opening of the 'Kyrie', through the imposing 'Verbum caro factum' and the graceful 'Hostia' that succeeds it, the 'Tremendum' with its almost Verdian menace and the appealing 'Dulcissum convivium' (a soprano aria with soft textures supplied by flutes and bassoons), the highly original 'Viaticum' and the resourcefully and lengthily developed 'Pignus' to the 'Agnus', a beautiful soprano aria with solo writing for flute, oboe and cello. The performance here under Nikolaus Harnoncourt rightly sees no need to apologize for the stylistic diversity of the work. The issue is made still more attractive by the inclusion of a Mass setting of the same year, one of Mozart's most inventive and original in its textures and its treatment of words. Altogether a very attractive record.

Masses

No 1 in G, K49/K47*d*, 'Missa brevis'; No 2 in D minor, K65/K61*a*; 'Missa brevis'; No 16 in C, K317, 'Coronation'; No 18 in C minor, K427/K417a, 'Great'; No 19 in D minor, K626, Requiem

Missae breves – G, K49/K47*d*^{a}; D minor, K65/K61*a*^{b}; 🅿 D, K194/K186*ha*; C, K220/K196*bb*, 'Spatzenmesse'
^{a}Christine Schäfer, ^{b}Angela Maria Blasi sops
^{a}Ingeborg Danz, ^{b}Elisabeth von Magnus mezzos
^{a}Kurt Azesberger, ^{b}Uwe Heilmann tens ^{a}Oliver Widmer bar ^{b}Franz-Josef Selig bass
Arnold Schoenberg Choir; Vienna Concentus Musicus / Nikolaus Harnoncourt
Teldec Das Alte Werk 3984-21818-2 (69 minutes: DDD)
Texts and translations included Ⓕ
Recorded 1994

These youthful Masses, composed between 1768 and 1775, are among Mozart's most concise – K65, in particular, is a Missa brevis with a vengeance. Brevity was de rigueur in the Salzburg liturgy and we can hardly blame Mozart for rattling unceremoniously through the long texts of the Gloria and Credo. With minimal scope for musical development, much of the writing in the two earlier works, especially, is perfunctory – the 12-year-old composer dutifully going through the motions. As so often in late 18th-century Masses, the central mystery of the 'Et incarnatus est – Crucifixus' prompts a more individual musical response; and the Benedictus of K65 is a touching little duet for soprano and alto soloists based, surprisingly, on a descending chromatic motif, a traditional trope of lamentation. For all the conventional bustle of their faster movements, the two later Masses are more varied in their textures and more memorable in their ideas. Both the settings of the Benedictus have the grace and airiness of 18th-century Austrian churches. But the high point in each work is the Agnus Dei, especially that of K194, with its harmonic poignancy and dramatic alternations of solo and chorus. Occasionally Nikolaus Harnoncourt's direction can sound over-insistent – in, say, the Kyrie of K49, with its almost aggressive marcato articulation. But for the most part he chooses apt, mobile tempos, keeps the rhythms buoyant and characterizes vividly without betraying the music's blitheness and innocence.

Both individually and in consort the soloists make the most of their limited opportunities, with delectable tone and phrasing from the two sopranos, Christine Schäfer and Angela Maria Blasi. The recorded balance is excellent, catching Harnoncourt's sharply etched orchestral detail while giving ample presence to the polished and responsive choir.

Coronation Mass. Vesperae solennes de 🅿 confessore in C, K339. Epistle Sonata in C, K278/K271e
Emma Kirkby sop Catherine Robbin mez John Mark Ainsley ten Michael George bass Winchester Cathedral Choir; Winchester Quiristers Academy of Ancient Music / Christopher Hogwood with Alastair Ross org
L'Oiseau-Lyre 436 585-2OH (54 minutes: DDD)
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1990 Ⓕ

It is difficult to think of many recordings of Mozart's church music that so happily captures its character – the particular mixture of confidence, jubilation and contemplation – as Hogwood's. His unfussy direction, broad phrasing, lively but generally unhurried tempos and happy details of timing serve splendidly in the Coronation Mass, the finest of Mozart's completed mass settings; the solemnity of the Kyrie, the fine swing of the Gloria and the energy of the Credo, with due pause for its rapt moment at the 'Et incarnatus', all these come over with due effect. Arguably the 'Osanna' is rather quick, but its jubilation is splendid. And the sweetness of the Benedictus is ravishing.

Not more so, however, than the Agnus, for there, at a decidedly slow tempo, Hogwood allows Emma Kirkby to make the most of this very sensuous music, which she duly most beautifully does. The soloists are altogether an excellent team, with two refined voices in the middle and Michael George a firm and sturdy bass. The inclusion of the K278 Epistle Sonata is a happy notion. The Vesperae solennes de confessore is a setting of the five vesper psalms and the Magnificat, made in 1780, a year after the Mass, for some church feast in Salzburg. With admirable singing from the choir and a spacious recording with exceptionally good stereo separation that properly conveys the ecclesiastical ambience, this is a disc to treasure.

C minor Mass (ed Maunder) 🅿
Arleen Auger, Lynne Dawson sops John Mark Ainsley ten David Thomas bass Winchester Cathedral Choir; Winchester Quiristers; Academy of Ancient Music / Christopher Hogwood
L'Oiseau-Lyre Florilegium 425 528-2OH
(51 minutes: DDD). Text and translation included Ⓜ
Recorded 1988

Mozart left unfinished the work that ought to have been the choral masterpiece of his early Viennese years but there is enough of it to make up nearly an hour's music – music that is sometimes sombre, sometimes florid, sometimes jubilant. Hogwood avoids any charge of emotional detachment in his steady and powerful opening Kyrie, monumental in feeling, dark in tone; and he brings ample energy to the big, bustling choruses of the Gloria – and its long closing fugue is finely sustained. The clarity and ring of the boys' voices serve him well in these numbers. There is a strong solo team, headed by the late Arleen Auger in radiant, glowing voice and, as usual, singing with refined taste; Lynne Dawson joins her in the duets, John Mark Ainsley too in the trio. But this is essentially a 'soprano mass' – Mozart wrote it, after all, with the voice of his new wife (and perhaps thoughts of the much superior one of her sister Aloysia) in his mind – and Auger, her voice happily stealing in for the first time in the lovely 'Christe', excels in the florid and expressive music of the 'Et incarnatus' (where Richard Maunder has supplied fuller string parts than usual, perhaps fuller than Mozart would have done had he finished the work). Hogwood directs with his usual spirit and clarity.

C minor Mass (ed Eder)
Arleen Auger, Barbara Bonney sops Hans Peter Blochwitz ten Robert Holl bass Berlin Radio Chorus; Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Claudio Abbado
Sony Classical Theta SBK89777 (53 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Text and translation included. Recorded 1990 ●

'Comfortable' is not a fashionable word to use by way of praise; 'disturbing' is. However, Abbado's is comfortable. No doubt part of the warmth is due to another unfashionable feature, the use of a large orchestra not playing on period instruments. That it plays magnificently and that the choir is a particularly fine one will have something to do with it too. Perhaps the balance of the recording overweights the orchestral bass, and a little less reverberance might not come amiss in the hall acoustic, but these are matters of degree, not disqualifying objections. Rather similarly, when it comes to the style of the performance, one might prefer a more jolly, a-hunting-we-will-go bounce for the rhythms of the Credo, but again this is a matter of degree for Abbado is not lacking in vitality or colour. In tempo, too, he judges well. Abbado's singers are well forward and very distinct. Abbado brings a vigorous touch to the Kyrie without impairing the profundity.

The other great strength is the excellence of the two sopranos. Auger has warmth, Bonney brightness, and she sings the 'Et incarnatus est' with blissfully assured control.

There have been many lovely accounts of this work on disc, and few better than here.

C minor Mass (ed Schmitt/Gardiner)
Sylvia McNair sop Diana Montague mez Anthony Rolfe Johnson ten Cornelius Hauptmann bass Monteverdi Choir; English Baroque Soloists / John Eliot Gardiner
Philips 420 210-2PH (54 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included ●

Writers on Mozart sometimes take him to task for the alleged mixture of style in the C minor Mass, in particular the use of florid, 'operatic' solo writing amidst all the severe ecclesiastical counterpoint. To object is to misunderstand the nature of Mozart's religion, but it takes a performance as stylistically accomplished as this one to make the point in practice. The usual stumbling-block is the 'Et incarnatus', with its richly embellished solo line and its wind obbligatos. Sung as it is here, by Sylvia McNair, beautifully refined in detail, it is indeed passionate, but passionately devout. McNair is deeply affecting in the 'Christe', taken quite spaciously and set in a measured Kyrie of great cumulative power which also has some fine, clean singing from the Monteverdi Choir.

As with Gardiner's version of the Requiem one might wish for the sound of a boys' choir (why go to the trouble of having authentic instruments if you then use unauthentic voices?) but the bright, forward tone of his sopranos is very persuasive. The music is all strongly characterised: the 'Gloria' jubilant, the 'Qui tollis' grandly elegiac with its solemn, inexorable march rhythm and its dying phrases echoed between the choirs, the 'Credo' full of vitality. Some of the 'Cum sancto spiritu' fugue is too heavily accented, though. Nevertheless, a confident recommendation.

Requiem (cptd Süssmayr)
Sylvia McNair sop Carolyn Watkinson contr Francisco Araiza ten Robert Lloyd bass Chorus and Academy of St Martin in the Fields / Sir Neville Marriner

Philips 432 087-2PH (50 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included. Recorded 1990 ●

Mozart's Requiem may not be wholly Mozart's, as we all know: but performers certainly show no reservations in the power or the conviction they bring to its music, whoever it may be by. Marriner's is among the noblest and most powerful of them all; an unusually thoughtful and careful reading. The first thing that strikes you is the passionate nature of the choral singing, right from the start: the Academy chorus sings the beginning almost as if it were a personal protest against death, and the chromaticisms and dissonances of the 'Requiem aeternam' make their due effect. And the Kyrie, taken at a vigorous pace, has great energy. The dynamics in the 'Dies irae' are strongly made, almost exaggerated; there is a solemn 'Rex tremendae majestatis', with sharply dotted rhythms, a slow 'Lacrimosa' with detailed shaping, a lively 'Domine Jesu' and an Agnus Dei so grandly sombre that it emerges as the expressive climax of the whole work.

There is superlative solo singing, too – Robert Lloyd in dark and noble voice in the 'Tuba mirum', Sylvia McNair as moving as always with her beautiful sound and refinement of nuance. Marriner's Requiem is a powerful and distinctive interpretation of the work: a consistent, considered view of it which has been faithfully and carefully carried through.

Requiem. Ave verum corpus in D, K618 P
Anna Maria Panzarella sop Nathalie Stutzmann contr Christoph Prégardien ten Nathan Berg bass
Les Arts Florissants / William Christie
Erato 0630-10697-2 (54 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1994 ●

Les Arts Florissants provides a substantial, dramatic reading: the tempo for the 'Requiem aeternam' is slow, but malleable, and Christie is ready to make the most of the changes in orchestral colour or choral texture and indeed to dramatize the music to the utmost. Clearly he has little truck with any notion that this is an austere piece: he sees it as operatic, almost romantic – and the result is very compelling. There are surprising things: 'Quantus tremor', in a very weighty account of the 'Dies irae', for example, is hushed rather than terrifying; the 'Recordare' is slow to the point of stickiness; there are rather mannered crescendos in the Sanctus; and often cadences are drawn out, for example in the 'Hostias'. The powerful choruses of the Sequence are imposingly done, and the grave 'Lacrimosa' wonderfully catches the special significance not only of the music itself but also of the fact that this is the moment where Mozart's last autograph trails off. The choral singing is sharply etched and generally distinguished: the choir gives a vigorous yet finely dovetailed Kyrie fugue and the 'Quam olim Abrahae' is splendidly sturdy. Although the solo singing is not uniformly outstanding the soprano's melting tone is sometimes very appealing, and Prégardien is an excellent stylist; the Benedictus is particularly impressive, very shapely and refined. In short, this is a reading full of character and imaginative ideas, very much a conscious modern interpretation of the work and very finely executed. The disc is completed by perhaps the only piece which can reasonably follow the Requiem, the Ave verum corpus, in a slow, hushed, rather romantic reading that is undeniably moving.

Requiem. Symphony No 25 H
Lisa della Casa sop Ira Malaniuk contr Anton Dermota ten Cesare Siepi bass
Vienna State Opera Concert Choir; Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Bruno Walter
Orfeo D'Or mono C430961B (76 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded live in 1956

Listening to this is a moving experience. This was Walter's farewell to a festival with which he had been closely associated over 30 years: he conducted there from 1925 to 1937 after which he withdrew because of Austria's Anschluss with Nazi Germany. He returned again in 1946 and off and on, until this final meeting with his beloved Mozart. Yet there is nothing sentimental here from a conductor nearing his 80th birthday. As a contemporary critic put it, the little G minor Symphony is given as an 'eerie vision of night and suffering' with consolation coming only in the Andante. Of the other work Schumann commented: 'Walter understands the Requiem logically as Catholic church music, as a musical interpretation of the liturgy' and so banishes thoughts about a 'swansong elegy'.

The performance is taut and closely worked. Listen to the counterpoint of 'Quam olim Abrahae' and you will hear the sharp rhythms that characterise the whole. Even so, Walter's beloved VPO displays its warm, ethereal string tone as circumstances allow. Four of the leading soloists of the day contribute positively. Siepi inhabits the bass-line as to the manner born, and della Casa provides tones fit for the contemplation of heavenly matters. The one drawback of the performance is the unsteady tone of the Vienna Opera chorus's sopranos. But as a whole, the choral singing is as dedicated as the rest. The recording is in well-focused mono. This was the best of Walter's Requiems and so worth an hour or so of anyone's time.

Opera arias

Cecilia Bartoli
Le nozze di Figaro – Non so più; Voi che sapete; Giunse alfin il momento ... Deh vieni. Così fan tutte – E'amore un ladroncello. Don Giovanni – Vedrai, cariNo La clemenza di Tito – Parto, parto; Deh, per questo; Ecco il punto, o Vitellia ... Non piu di fiori. Concert Arias – Chi sa, chi sa, qual sia, K582; Alma grande e nobil core, K578; Ch'io mi scordi di te?, K505
Cecilia Bartoli mez András Schiff pf
Peter Schmidtl basset cl/basset hn

Vienna Chamber Orchestra / György Fischer
Decca 430 513-2DH (58 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
exts and translations included. Recorded 1989-90 ●

Mozart wrote some of his most appealing music or the mezzo-soprano voice with the roles of Cherubino and Susanna in Le nozze di Figaro, Dorabella in Così fan tutte and Zerlina in Don Giovanni each boasting at least one memorable ria. Alongside these this disc includes a andful of concert arias including Ch'io mi scordi i te? which was written for the farewell performance of the great mezzo Nancy Storace with Mozart playing the concertante piano role. Here with as innate an interpreter of Mozart's piano writing as András Schiff and a voice so emarkably self-assured as Cecilia Bartoli's the lectricity of that first, historic performance eems almost to be recreated. And, here as lsewhere, György Fischer directs the splendid Vienna Chamber Orchestra with disarming ensitivity while the recording is wonderfully warm and vibrant.

Cecilia Bartoli boasts a voice of extraordinary harm and unassuming virtuosity: her vocal haracterizations would be the envy of the inest actresses and her intuitive singing is in tself a sheer delight. But she also brings to hese arias a conviction and understanding of he subtleties of the language which only a ative Italian could. Listen to the subtle uances of 'Voi che sapete', the depth of nderstanding behind Dorabella's seemingly rivolous 'E'amore un ladroncello'; these are ot mere performances, but interpretations which cut to the very soul of the music. No Mozart lover should be without this CD.

Cecilia Bartoli
Così fan tutte – In uomini, in soldati; Temerari! … Come scoglio; Ei parte … Per pietà, ben mio. Le ozze di Figaro – E Susanna non vien! … Dove sono; Giunse alfin il momento … Al desio (K577*a*). Don Giovanni – Batti, batti, o bel Masetto; In quali eccessi . Mi tradì quell' alma ingrata. Davidde penitente, K469 – Lunghi le cure ingrate. Exsultate, jubilate, K165/K158*a*
Cecilia Bartoli mez Vienna Chamber Orchestra / György Fischer
Decca 443 452-2DH (61 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
exts and translations included. Recorded 1993 ●

There are few Italian mezzos, or sopranos for hat matter, who sing a lot of Mozart and Bartoli's very Italian characteristics are mmediately identifiable: brilliance of execution, itality of words, sharpness of mind. She tears nto the recitative before Donna Elvira's 'Mi radì' with a blistering fury that leaves most nterpreters of the role standing and has no problems with the fioriture of the aria itself. Her Fiordiligi has the bite for 'Come scoglio', but omparisons with a variety of lyric sopranos how up a want of depth to the tone, both here nd in 'Per pietà'. Her Countess delivers her ines with appropriate aristocratic weight, hough one senses her natural temperament being suppressed with difficulty. However much she tries to disguise herself, the real Bartoli is likely to pop her head out.

There are unlikely to be any complaints about her effervescent Despina or Zerlina, both portrayals for which she has stage experience. In the concert hall she is also a spirited interpreter of Exsultate, jubilate. From the opening line Bartoli makes other singers seem bland by comparison, getting the Latin words to tingle with a sense of elation that only an Italian-speaker would dare. The orchestral sound might be more firmly focused (the sound picture in 'Batti, batti' has the solo cello close, while the wind struggle to be heard from some deep recess) but Fischer accompanies his soloist with energy and tact.

Natalie Dessay P
Ascanio in Alba, K111 – Dal tuo gentil sembiante. Die Entführung aus dem Serail, K384 – Welcher Wechsel; Traurigkeit ward mir zum Lose; Martern aller Arten. Idomeneo, rè di Creta, K366 – Solitudini amiche; Zeffiretti lusinghieri. Lucio Silla, K135 – Vanne, t'affreta; Ah se il crudel periglio. Zaide, K344 – Ruhe sanft, mein holdes Leben; Tiger! Wetze nur die Klauen. Die Zauberflöte, K620 – O zittre nicht, mein lieber Sohn!; Zum Leiden; Der Hölle Rache; Ach, ich fühl's
Natalie Dessay sop Orchestra of the Age of Enlightenment / Louis Langrée
Virgin Classics 545447-2 (67 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 2000 ●●●

Nathalie Dessay has cornered the market in the world's poshest operatic addresses – except Covent Garden and Glyndebourne, of course – as the Queen of Night, whose two arias frame this recital programme. She can be heard in the role complete in William Christie's 1996 recording of Die Zauberflöte for Erato. Aided by Louis Langrée's marginally faster tempos, Dessay's 'star-blazing' accounts of these famous show-stoppers sound even more vehement than before – the angry staccatos of 'Der Hölle Rache' spat out with blinding accuracy and the in altissimo Fs effortlessly, cleanly attained.

Dessay's light, girlish timbre might not immediately suggest regal imperiousness, but she brings real depth of feeling to 'Zum Leiden bin ich auserkoren' and its magnificent recitative 'O zittre nicht' on the concluding track. Between these mainstay arias of what the Germans call her Parade-Rolle, she selects an enterprising mix of the familiar – a delicate, fragile, touching 'Ach, ich fühl's' suggesting she may soon hanker after the role of the Queen's daughter, Pamina – and the virtually unknown – the fawn's charming but virtuosic aria, 'Dal tuo gentil sembiante' from Ascanio in Alba (the festa teatrale written for the wedding of the Archduke Ferdinand to Maria Beatrice of Modena, in Milan, 1771). The instrumental quality of her florid technique is put to marvellous use here, as it is in Giunia's moment of truth in Act 2 of Lucio Silla, 'Ah se il crudel periglio'. Perhaps in the theatre one would crave a richer voice, but Dessay colours her tone so effectively that the aria touches all the right emotional spots. Langrée has recently garnered glowing credentials as a Mozartian at Glyndebourne, and his beautifully conceived and theatrical accompaniments here demonstrate why. In addition, the period instruments of the Orchestra of the Age of Enlightenment complement the astringency of the soprano's tone.

Véronique Gens

Le nozze di Figaro – Non so più cosa son; Porgi, amor. Don Giovanni – Batti, batti; In quali eccessi … Mi tradì. Così fan tutte – Temerari … Come scoglio; Ei parte … Per pietà, ben mio. La clemenza di Tito – Deh per questo istante; Ecco il punto … Non più di fiori vaghe catene. Oh, temerario Arbace! … Per quel paterno amplesso, K79/K79*d*. Ch'io mi scordi di te … Non temer, amato bene, K505*a*

Véronique Gens sop Orchestra of the Age of Enlightenment / Ivor Bolton with Melvyn Tan fp

Virgin Classics Veritas 545319-2

(59 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Texts and translations included. Recorded 1998 ●

Véronique Gens is one of the most engaging and stylish Mozart sopranos around, as this sampler of her art confirms. Under the exacting baton of Ivor Bolton, the OAE show sharp and eager teeth to match her own highly-strung recitative in 'In quali eccessi'. And this Donna Anna demonstrates more than one-dimensional Angst as the orchestra's wind soloists breathe in sympathy with every moment of palpitando in Gens's own supple phrasing. There's a similar focus on the emotional potential of breath in a 'Non so più' whose fierce frustration flies out of eloquent consonants. Steady control of breath and tone bring a moving poise to 'Non più di fiori', where Vitellia's horrified introspection finds empathy in the basset-horn obbligato. And as Sesto, Gens moulds the moist clay of some of Mozart's most beautiful melodic contours in 'Deh, per questo istante'. There's her Countess and Zerlina to enjoy as well and the two exquisitely sculpted and sparingly but powerfully ornamented arias from Così fan tutte.

Gundula Janowitz

Ah, lo previdi … Ah, t'invola, K272. A questo seno … Or che il cielo, K374. Alma grande e nobil core, K578. Grabmusik, K42*a*/K35*a* – Betracht dies Herz und frage mich. Vado, ma dove? oh Dei!, K583. Bella mia fiamma … Resta, o cara, K528. Misera! dove son … Ah! non son io, K369

Gundula Janowitz sop Vienna Symphony Orchestra / Wilfried Boettcher

DG The Originals 449 723-2GOR (61 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ

Texts and translations included. Recorded 1966 ●

An 'original' is exactly what this disc is, as it reproduces Janowitz's first solo recital record, issued in 1967. Listening back, we can marvel not just at the purity of tone and silken vocal line, but also a refinement of style that marks out a fully formed artist. Highlights include a delicate Vado, ma dove? and a performance of Bella mia fiamma which lights up the music with the subtlest of colours from within. Some recitatives might have been more dramatic, but Boettcher and the Vienna Symphony Orchestra provide alert accompaniment. There is also a bonus: the original LP did not have room for the ravishing G minor lament 'Betracht dies Herz' from the Grabmusik, K42, and that is issued for the first time here, a minor treasure in its own right.

Exsultate, jubilate, K165/K158a

Mozart Exsultate, jubilate. Zaïde – Ruhe sanft, meine holdes Leben. Nehmt meinen Dank, ihr holden Gönner, K383. Mia speranza adorata ... Ah non sai qual pena sia, K416. Vorrei spiegarvi, oh Dio, K418. Ch'io mi scordi di te … Non temer, amato bene, K505[a] R Strauss Morgen, Op 27 No 4. Liebeshymnus, Op 32 No 3. Der Rosenband, Op 36 No 1. Wiegenlied, Op 41 No 1. Das Bächlein, AV118

Christine Schäfer sop [a]Maria João Pires pf Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Claudio Abbado

DG 457 582-2GH (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Texts and translations included. Recorded 1997

Schäfer must now be rated in the royal line of Schwarzkopf, Seefried, Ameling, Popp and most recently Bonney as an interpreter of Mozart and Strauss. Yet, she is, like those renowned singers, very much her own person with her own distinctive voice and style. Her almost vibrato-less, at times slightly acerbic tone won't be to all tastes but her unadorned, clear and imaginative singing of all the Mozart arias holds attention. In Nehmt meinen Dank, the single word 'Geduld' carries a wealth of meaning; the whole of K416 has an intense feeling of farewell as Schäfer delivers it and again a single word, 'addio' at the end of the recitative, is drenched in sadness. In Non temer, amato bene, with Pires providing an ideal counterpoint to the singer, Schäfer etches into the mind the full import of the emotions being expressed, without a hint of sentimentality. Ruhe sanft disarms criticism, so touchingly, simply, is it sung, with the little cadenza before the reprise deftly touched in. The more extrovert pieces, Exsultate, jubilate and Vorrei, spiegarvi are sung more objectively. Abbado and the BPO support Schäfer in the most refined fashion possible, all the instrumental detail finely honed. They are just as ingratiating in Strauss. Most recent interpreters have had richer, warmer voices than Schäfer's. She is a throwback to, say, Elisabeth Schumann, who sang Wiegenlied with the same kind of artless, silvery beauty, combined with a pure, keen line – a real winner. But so is each of these beautifully composed and sung pieces, the texts fully understood so the words are ideally melded with their settings: note especially the extra intensity at the climax of Liebeshymnus and the ideal delineation of the elegiac Morgen's reflective mood. Indeed it's in this last song, that one hears, as well as anywhere, the soprano's special gift of plaintive eloquence. The recording could not be better balanced.

La clemenza di Tito

Uwe Heilmann ten Tito; Della Jones mez Vitellia; 🅿
Cecilia Bartoli mez Sesto; Diana Montague mez Annio; Barbara Bonney sop Servillia; Gilles Cachemaille bar Publio
Academy of Ancient Music Chorus; Academy of Ancient Music / Christopher Hogwood
L'Oiseau-Lyre ② 444 131-2OHO2 (137 minutes: DDD). Notes, text and translation included Ⓕ
Recorded 1993

Hogwood has assembled a quite remarkable cast, with certainly two, perhaps three, outstanding interpretations. First among them must be Cecilia Bartoli, who rightly establishes Sextus as the central character, the one whose actions and whose feelings are the focal point of the drama. The opening number is the duet 'Come ti piace, imponi', where the firm and pure sound of Bartoli's voice, in contrast with the contained hysteria of Vitellia's, at once defines the opera's basis. It is clear from her singing that she reads Sextus, for all his weakness in giving way to Vitellia, as a man of integrity, one of the noblest Romans of them all.

Then there is Della Jones's remarkable Vitellia. There are lots of interesting and emotionally suggestive touches in her singing; her rich bottom register is magnificent and the top Bs have no fears for her. Uwe Heilmann's Titus is marked by much subtle and finely shaped singing and a keen awareness of how phrasing conveys sense. Occasionally the tone is inclined to be nasal, but that does not interfere with a very sympathetic and often moving reading. Hogwood's keen awareness of what, expressively speaking, is going on in the music, and his refusal to be tied to a rigid rhythmic pulse in order to make it manifest, is one of the strengths of this recording. The recitatives are sung with a great deal of life and awareness of meaning, not simply gabbled through at maximum speed. These, of course, are not Mozart's own work and are usually heavily cut. While some may feel that the inclusion of every note, as in the present version, is an advantage to the opera, others may not unreasonably take the opposite view. At any rate, the discs' tracking is arranged so that a new track begins for each aria, which enables listeners to make their own cuts without difficulty.

La clemenza di Tito
Gösta Winbergh ten Tito; Carol Vaness sop Vitellia; Delores Ziegler mez Sesto; Martha Senn mez Anno; Christine Barbaux sop Servilia; László Polgár bass Publio Vienna State Opera Chorus; Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Riccardo Muti
EMI ② 555489-2 (136 minutes: ADD).
Notes, texts and translation included Ⓕ
Recorded live in 1988

Riccardo Muti, oblivious to or at least putting aside attempts at period practice, interprets the work unashamedly as a grand, incisive near-tragedy. Nor is he averse to the players of the Vienna Philharmonic drawing the most sensuous sounds from the score, yet he never indulges Mozart, favouring swiftish, though flexible tempos and sharp rhythms. Muti is also notable for catching the tinta, the individual colour, of this work. Listen to the trio of contrasted feeling, 'Quello di Tito', in Act 2 and you'll divine the calibre of this reading, or a little earlier to the way Muti persuades the chorus into the most mellifluous sounds in 'Ah, grazie si rendamo'. Muti's approach is admirably seconded by the generous voices taking the three central roles: Vaness is in her element as Vitellia, alternately amorous, vindictive, scheming and forgiving. Her account is boldly and confidently sung throughout a longish evening. As Sextus, Ziegler is fully the equal of her/his loved one, encompassing both her arias with richly contoured tone and courageously delivered coloratura, all tending to convey Sesto's torture of the mind. The only drawback is a certain similarity in the two singers' refulgent tone.

At the centre of the emotional chasm stands Winbergh's commanding Tito, perhaps the most heroically sung on any version yet. It is good to hear the true sound of a theatre acoustic on this live recording. In all, then, this is a formidable addition to the work's discography, totally engrossing on its own terms and recommendable as a contender to any newcomer to the piece on disc.

Così fan tutte

Elisabeth Schwarzkopf sop Fiordiligi; Christa Ludwig mez Dorabella; Hanny Steffek sop Despina; Alfredo Kraus ten Ferrando; Giuseppe Taddei bar Guglielmo; Walter Berry bass Don Alfonso
Philharmonia Chorus and Orchestra / Karl Böhm
EMI Great Recordings of the Century ③ 567379-2 Ⓜ
(165 minutes: ADD). Notes, text and translation included. Recorded 1962 ●●●

Così fan tutte is the most balanced and probing of all Mozart's operas, formally faultless, musically inspired from start to finish, emotionally a matter of endless fascination and, in the second act, profoundly moving. It has been very lucky on disc, and besides this delightful set there have been several other memorable recordings. However, Karl Böhm's cast could hardly be bettered, even in one's dreams. The two sisters are gloriously sung – Schwarzkopf and Ludwig bring their immeasurable talents as Lieder singers to this sparkling score and overlay them with a rare comic touch. Add to that the stylish singing of Alfredo Kraus and Giuseppe Taddei and the central quartet is unimpeachable. Walter Berry's Don Alfonso is characterful and Hanny Steffek is quite superb as Despina. The pacing of this endlessly intriguing work is measured with immaculate judgement. The emotional control of the characterization is masterly and Böhm's totally idiomatic response to the music is arguably without peer. However, two modern recordings, using period instruments, do offer stimulating alternative views.

Così fan tutte P

Amanda Roocroft sop Fiordiligi; Rosa Mannion sop Dorabella; Eirian James mez Despina; Rainer Trost ten Ferrando; Rodney Gilfry bar Guglielmo; Carlos Feller bass Don Alfonso

Monteverdi Choir; English Baroque Soloists / Sir John Eliot Gardiner

Archiv Produktion ③ 437 829-2AH3 Ⓕ

(134 minutes: DDD). Recorded live in 1992

Gardiner's is a Così with a heart, and a heart in the right place. It comes from a stage performance given in the Teatro Comunale at Ferrara – the city from which the sisters in the story hail – in 1992. The vitality and the communicativeness of the recitative is one result of recording a live performance; it is flexible, conversational and lively, as it ought to be, and the Italian pronunciation is remarkably good considering there isn't a single Italian in the cast. Amanda Roocroft makes a capable Fiordiligi, with a big, spacious 'Come scoglio', and shows real depth of feeling in a very beautiful account of 'Per pietà'; her tone is bright and forward. Rosa Mannion, as Dorabella, acts effectively with her voice in 'Smanie implacabili' and is full of life in her Act 2 aria. The Guglielmo, Rodney Gilfry, is outstanding for his light, warm and flexible baritone, gently seductive in Act 1, showing real brilliance and precision of articulation in 'Donne mie'. Eirian James's Despina is another delight, spirited, sexy and rich-toned, and full of charm without any of the silliness some Despinas show. Period instruments notwithstanding, this is a fairly traditional performance. Gardiner often uses quite generous rubato to highlight the shape of a phrase, and he is alert, as always, to how the orchestral writing can underline the sense.

Così fan tutte P

Soile Isokoski sop Fiordiligi; Monica Groop mez Dorabella; Nancy Argenta sop Despina; Markus Schäfer ten Ferrando; Per Vollestad bar Guglielmo; Huub Claessens bass Don Alfonso

La Petite Bande and Chorus / Sigiswald Kuijken

Accent ③ ACC9296/98 (181 minutes: DDD)

Notes, text and translation included Ⓕ

Recorded live in 1992

Kuijken's live recording is lighter in mood than Gardiner's. Nearly all the tempos are quicker and there is more sense of spontaneity. Mozart very rarely wrote dynamic or accentuation marks into his singers' parts; the singers were expected to learn their music from a repetiteur (or Mozart himself) and take their cues from what they heard in performance. Gardiner has his singers follow, meticulously, the orchestral dynamics; Kuijken leaves them, more or less, to sing with what they hear. This is a symptomatic difference: one performance is highly wrought, the other freer and more natural. The sisters in the Kuijken version are excellently done by Soile Isokoski, even in voice and with an attractive ring, and Monica Groop, again a pleasing and even voice intelligently and musically used. Their duets are very appealing, with a happy sense in 'Prenderò quel brunettino' that they might be getting up to a little mischief. The Alfonso here, Huub Claessens, more baritone than bass, is particularly successful in the recitative, which here again is done with much care for its meaning. A pleasing, lively Così, it would be a good recording with which to get to know the opera, whereas the Gardiner is a connoisseur's performance, subtle and sophisticated, and communicating important things about the opera.

Additional recommendation

Così fan tutte

Caballé Fiordiligi Baker Dorabella Cotrubas Despina Gedda Ferrando Ganzarolli Guglielmo

Royal Opera House Chorus and Orch / C Davis

Philips ③ 422 542-2PME3

(182 minutes: ADD: 2/75^{R}) Ⓜ

The surprise casting of Caballé and Baker pays rich rewards, indeed the entire cast has a real ensemble feel to it, helped no doubt by Davis's clear direction. A fine mid-price alternative in good sound.

Don Giovanni

Eberhard Waechter bar Don Giovanni; H Joan Sutherland sop Donna Anna; Elisabeth Schwarzkopf sop Donna Elvira; Graziella Sciutti sop Zerlina; Luigi Alva ten Don Ottavio; Giuseppe Taddei bar Leporello; Piero Cappuccilli bar Masetto; Gottlob Frick bass Commendatore

Philharmonia Chorus and Orchestra / Carlo Maria Giulini

EMI Great Recordings of the Century ③ 567869-2 Ⓜ

(162 minutes: ADD). Notes, text and translation included. Recorded 1959 ●●

Although this set is over 40 years old, none of its successors is as skilled in capturing the piece's drama so unerringly. It has always been most recommendable and Giulini captures all the work's most dramatic characteristics, faithfully supported by the superb Philharmonia forces of that time. At this stage of Giulini's career, he was a direct, lithe conductor, alert to every turn in the story and he projects the nervous tension of the piece ideally while never forcing the pace, as can so easily happen. Then he had one of the most apt casts ever assembled for the piece. Waechter's Giovanni combines the demonic with the seductive in just the right proportions, Taddei is a high-profile Leporello, who relishes the text and sings with lots of 'face'. Elvira was always one of Schwarzkopf's most successful roles: here she delivers the role with tremendous intensity. Sutherland's Anna isn't quite so full of character but is magnificently sung. Alva is a graceful Ottavio. Sciutti's charming Zerlina, Cappuccilli's strong and Italianate Masetto and Frick's granite Commendatore are all very much in the picture. The sound is so good, the set might have been recorded yesterday.

Don Giovanni 🅿
Rodney Gilfry bar Don Giovanni; Luba Orgonasova sop Donna Anna; Charlotte Margiono sop Donna Elvira; Eirian James mez Zerlina; Christoph Prégardien ten Don Ottavio; Ildebrando d'Arcangelo bass Leporello; Julian Clarkson bass Masetto; Andrea Silvestrelli bass Commendatore
Monteverdi Choir; English Baroque Soloists / Sir John Eliot Gardiner
Archiv Produktion ③ 445 870-2AH3 (176 minutes: DDD). Notes, text and translation included Ⓕ
Recorded 1994

John Eliot Gardiner's set has a great deal to commend it. The recitative is sung with exemplary care over pacing so that it sounds as it should, like heightened and vivid conversation, often to electrifying effect. Ensembles, the Act 1 quartet particularly, are also treated conversationally, as if one were overhearing four people giving their opinions on a situation in the street. The orchestra, perfectly balanced with the singers in a very immediate acoustic, supports them, as it were 'sings' with them. That contrasts with, and complements, Gardiner's expected ability to empathise with the demonic aspects of the score, as in Giovanni's drinking song and the final moments of Act 1, which fairly bristle with rhythmic energy without ever becoming rushed. The arrival of the statue at Giovanni's dinner-table is tremendous, the period trombones and timpani achieving an appropriately brusque, fearsome attack. Throughout this scene, Gardiner's penchant for sharp accents is wholly appropriate; elsewhere he is sometimes rather too insistent. As a whole, tempos not only seem right on their own account but also, all-importantly, carry conviction in relation to each other. Where so many conductors today are given to rushing 'Mi tradì', Gardiner prefers a more meditative approach, which allows his soft-grained Elvira to make the most of the aria's expressive possibilities.

Rodney Gilfry's Giovanni is lithe, ebullient, keen to exert his sexual prowess; an obvious charmer, at times surprisingly tender yet with the iron will only just below the surface. Suave and appealing, delivered in a real baritone timbre, his Giovanni is as accomplished as any on disc. Ildebrando d'Arcangelo was the discovery of these performances: this young bass is a lively foil to his master and on his own a real showman, as 'Madamina' indicates, a number all the better for a brisk speed. Orgonasova once more reveals herself a paragon as regards steady tone and deft technique – there is no need here to slow down for the coloratura at the end of 'Non mi dir' – and she brings to her recounting of the attempted seduction a real feeling of immediacy. As Anna, Margiono sometimes sounds a shade stretched technically, but consoles us with the luminous, inward quality of her voice and her reading of the role, something innate that cannot be learnt.

Nobody in their right senses is ever going to suggest that there is one, ideal version of Don Giovanni; the work has far too many facets for that, but for sheer theatrical élan complemented by the live recording, Gardiner is among the best, particularly given a recording that is wonderfully truthful and lifelike.

Don Giovanni
Bo Skovhus bar Don Giovanni; Christine Brewer sop Donna Anna; Dame Felicity Lott sop Donna Elvira; Nuccia Focile sop Zerlina; Jerry Hadley ten Don Ottavio; Alessandro Corbelli bar Leporello; Umberto Chiummo bass Masetto, Commendatore
Scottish Chamber Chorus and Orchestra / Sir Charles Mackerras
Telarc ③ CD80420 (183 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, text and translation included. Recorded 1995

This set has no astonishing or brilliant individual interpretations, but the whole is full of life and energy and freshness. The Scottish Chamber Orchestra is not a period-instrument group, but Mackerras uses valveless horns and trumpets and something close to period timpani – hence the alarming sound of the opening chords. He also calls for sharper attack and quicker decay from the string players and a very forward wind balance. Tempos are often but by no means always on the fast side. But he also allows his singers plenty of time to phrase their music expressively, for example in the Giovanni-Zerlina scene in the first finale, in the trio at the beginning of Act 2 (some wonderfully sensual orchestral colours here), in Giovanni's serenade, in the great sextet (very powerfully done) and in the cemetery scene, which has a proper sense of the hieratic and yet a knife-edge tension too. In sum, this release is a highly theatrical interpretation that has you right on the edge of your seat.

Umberto Chiummo makes a good, incisive Masetto and a truly formidable Commendatore in the final scenes. Nuccia Focile provides a beguiling Zerlina, with a sweet upper range and more than a touch of sensuousness and charm. Alessandro Corbelli, the Leporello, is a lively, lowish baritone who uses the sound of the words to advantage and can phrase with just the right hint of elegance. His voice is very close, arguably too close, in sound to that of the Giovanni, Bo Skovhus, yet the master-servant relationship is conveyed convincingly. Skovhus's sharp vitality, his virile Champagne Aria and his deeply sensual portamentos in the Serenade stress those aspects of Giovanni's character that underlie the plot. Jerry Hadley offers an Ottavio of some intensity, not the smoothest or most graceful, but stronger in expression than most, and Dame Felicity is in full, creamy voice in a role she has often sung with distinction. On the question of versions, Mackerras gives the Prague original first (with 'Dalla sua pace' inserted in Act 1), so if you play the second disc through to the end, you should then skip the first 10 tracks of the third disc to continue; or, if you want the Vienna version, you should skip the last six of the second and pick up at the beginning of the third, where you will hear the rare (and rather silly, though musically agreeable) Zerlina-Leporello duet and Elvira's scene (but not 'Il mio tesoro'). This is an excellent solution for listeners who can be bothered to press a couple of buttons. All round, an immensely enjoyable Don Giovanni.

Additional recommendation

Allen Don Giovanni Vaness Donna Anna Ewing Donna Elvira Gale Zerlina Lewis Don Ottavio Van Allen Leporello
London Philharmonic Orchestra / Haitink
EMI ③ 747037-8 (172 minutes: DDD: 12/84) Ⓕ

Haitink's Don Giovanni is more than just a memento of a fine Glyndebourne production. Allen is a dangerous Giovanni, predatory yet magnetic. Vaness is wonderful as Anna and Ewing is a fine Elvira. Van Allen matches his master in charisma.

Die Entführung aus dem Serail

Die Entführung aus dem Serail[a] 🄷
Exsultate, jubilate, K165/K158a[b]
Maria Stader sop Constanze (Beate Guttmann); Rita Streich sop Blonde; Ernst Haefliger ten Belmonte (Sebastian Fischer); Martin Vantin ten Pedrillo (Wolfgang Spier); Josef Greindl bass Osmin; Walter Franck spkr Bassa Selim
[a]Berlin RIAS Chamber Choir and Orchestra, [b]Berlin Radio Symphony Orchestra / Ferenc Fricsay
DG The Originals [a]mono/[b]stereo ②
457 730-2GOR2 (125 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Notes, texts and translations included
Recorded 1954 ●

Fricsay was an advocate of crisp, zestful, pared-down Mozart avant la lettre. This was the first in his distinguished series of Mozart opera recordings, throughout which he used Berlin Radio forces and singers familiar with his work. They prove formidable advocates. The orchestra, recorded in resonant, honest mono, plays superbly. Stader was a particular favourite with Fricsay. If not the most refulgent of sopranos, she had both the consistency of voice and thoroughness of technique to cope with almost all the demands of Constanze's music. Although one ideally wants a more dramatic singer in the part, her feeling for the shape of a Mozart phrase is always admirable. She is suitably partnered by the fluent, lyrical Haefliger, who also sang Belmonte at Glyndebourne in the 1950s. Rita Streich is the ideal Blonde, singing with pure tone and spirited attack: she has the individuality of voice, the hint of vibrato most attractive. Vantin is a more than adequate Pedrillo, who sings his Serenade in an appropriate mezza voce. Greindl brings a fully fledged bass to bear on Osmin's music and fills it with a nice combination of vicious sadism leavened by comedy. Although his singing is occasionally marred by intrusive aspirates, he is among the most enjoyable Osmins on disc. Happily he and Streich are allowed to speak their own dialogue so that their Act 2 encounter goes particularly well.

As was a dubious custom with DG at the time, the other singers are doubled by speaking voices that hardly match their own. Those who have come to appreciate Fricsay's many attributes as a conductor will not be disappointed by this reissue, and will gain as a generous bonus Stader's delightful account of Exsultate, jubilate. In absolute terms those without Die Entführung in their collection should hear this one.

Die Entführung aus dem Serail
Ingrid Habermann sop Constanze; Donna Ellen sop Blonde; Piotr Bezcala ten Belmonte; Oliver Ringelhahn ten Pedrillo; Franz Kalchmair bass Osmin; Harald Pfeiffer spkr Bassa Selim Linz Landestheater Choir; Linz Bruckner Orchestra / Martin Sieghart
Arte Nova Classics ② 74321 49701-2
(115 minutes: DDD). Notes, text and translation included. Recorded live in 1996-97 Ⓢ

This is a real bargain, just about as enjoyable as any performance given by more prominent artists on better-known labels. Recorded live, it is not surprising to find such a natural sense of ensemble among the principals or such a well-integrated account of the score from Sieghart, who is also aware of the latest research on this score in terms of orchestration and small embellishments. His reading is a shade strict and unsmiling, but it has the virtue of keeping the drama on the move in a work that can outstay its welcome in more self-indulgent performances, and the playing of the small band is exemplary. Dialogue is included but kept to the minimum essential to clarify the action. Ingrid Habermann has the dramatic coloratura, the technique and all the notes to encompass the fearful demands of Constanze's role and shows the dramatic resolution it requires. The Polish tenor Piotr Bezcala has also been judiciously cast for his part: his voice is firm and sappy, and he discloses an ability to make his four taxing arias sound relatively simple. One or two unwanted lachrymose moments apart, he is a model of Mozartian style. The Canadian soprano, Donna Ellen, is a mettlesome Blonde, happy in the dizzy heights reached in her first aria. Her Pedrillo is a lively singer but one prone to questionable pitch, particularly in his Serenade. Best of all is the native Austrian, Franz Kalchmair as an Osmin with a rotund, pleasing bass, as happy at the bottom as at the top of his range, and he is obviously a formidable actor. The recording is reasonably good.

Idomeneo, re di Creta

Awards 1991

Anthony Rolfe Johnson ten Idomeneo; Anne Sofie von Otter mez Idamante; Sylvia McNair sop Ilia; Hillevi Martinpelto sop Elettra; Nigel Robson ten Arbace; Glenn Winslade ten High Priest; Cornelius Hauptmann bass Oracle Monteverdi Choir; English Baroque Soloists / Sir John Eliot Gardiner Ⓟ
Archiv Produktion ③ 431 674-2AH3
(211 minutes: DDD). Notes, text and translation included. Recorded 1990 ●●●

This is unquestionably the most vital and authentic account of Idomeneo to date on disc (though see the more recent review of the Mackerras set below). We have here what was given at the work's first performance in Munich plus, in appendices, what Mozart wanted, or was forced, to cut before that première and the alternative versions of certain passages, so that various combinations of the piece can be programmed by the listener. Gardiner's direct, dramatic conducting catches ideally the agony of Idomeneo's terrible predicament – forced to sacrifice his son because of an unwise row. This torment of the soul is also entirely conveyed by Anthony Rolfe Johnson in the title role to which Anne Sofie von Otter's moving Idamante is an apt foil. Sylvia McNair is a diaphanous, pure-voiced Ilia, Hillevi Martinpelto a properly fiery, sharp-edged Elettra. With dedicated support from his own choir and orchestra, who obviously benefited from a long period of preparation, Gardiner matches the stature of this noble opera seria. The recording catches the excitement which all who heard the live performances will recall.

Idomeneo
Ian Bostridge ten Idomeneo; Lorraine Hunt Lieberson mez Idamante; Lisa Milne sop Ilia; Barbara Frittoli sop Elettra; Anthony Rolfe Johnson ten Arbace; Paul Charles Clarke ten High Priest; John Relyea bass Oracle; Dunedin Consort; Edinburgh Festival Chorus; Scottish Chamber Orchestra / Sir Charles Mackerras
EMI ③ 557260-2 (203 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, text and translation included
Recorded 2001 ●●

There were golden opinions for the Idomeneo given at 2001's Edinburgh Festival by these performers, and here it is. The work is given complete, at the marvellously extravagant length at which Mozart initially planned it, bar some small (and authentic) cuts in the secco recitative. And it works. It works triumphantly, in fact. That is partly due to Mackerras's truly inspired reading of the score, and his insights into the meaning of its musical gestures. This is a score full of gestures, heavy with emotional significance, not only in the arias and the ensembles but perhaps above all in the orchestral recitative that abounds in this score as in no other of Mozart's. It is partly the expressiveness of Mackerras's handling of what is, in effect, Mozart's emotional commentary on the unfolding of the plot that makes this performance so powerful. He has a clear vision of the expressive messages that Mozart transmits through texture or harmony or dynamic or rhythmic refinement.

The performance is also full of dramatic energy. During the Overture you experience that tingle in your spine that comes of the expectation of a curtain about to rise. Never mind that this is not a 'period instrument' performance: the textures are as lucid as one could wish, the articulation as light and precise, the balance as just. Tempi are unhurried.

Ian Bostridge makes a strong Idomeneo. His opening aria, 'Vedrommi intorno', is exquisitely done, smoothly and lovingly phrased. Mozart wrote it in a traditional style to flatter the voice of his original singer, Anton Raaff. Just here and there, and especially in the closing aria, one might perhaps have liked more variety of tone and in particular more soft and lyrical colouring. Idamante, originally a castrato part, is sung by a mezzo, and one can't imagine one much better than Lorraine Hunt Lieberson: it is a lovely, focused sound, with the firm centre that a male part needs, and there are many happy details of phrasing. Lisa Milne provides a sympathetic yet not frail Ilia, with a clear and warm ring to the voice. The singing of Barbara Frittoli as Elettra has properly a bit more edge to it and there is plenty of tension and power to her first aria and especially her stormy final one, 'D'Oreste, d'Ajace'. With Anthony Rolfe Johnson to sing Arbace, both of that character's arias (as well as his important accompanied recitatives) are given, understandably, although the second in particular is not on the level of most of the score – Mozart probably excluded both of them in his own performances. It is a joy to hear them so beautifully sung; the legato line and the smooth large leaps in the first are a delight.

The chorus is first-rate, and there is excellent orchestral playing. This set, enshrining Mackerras's profound and mature understanding of the music, is the most moving performance of the opera, perhaps of any opera, that this reviewer has heard on record; readers are urged to buy it.

Mitridate, re di Ponto

Giuseppe Sabbatini ten Mitridate; Natalie Dessay sop Aspasia; Cecilia Bartoli mez Sifare; Brian Asawa counterten Farnace; Sandrine Piau sop Ismene; Juan Diego Flórez ten Marzio; Hélène Le Corre sop Arbate Les Talens Lyriques / Christophe Rousset Ⓟ
Decca ③ 460 772-2DHO3 (179 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, text and translation included Recorded 1998

Mozart was not quite 15 when he composed Mitridate, as the first carnival opera for the

Milan opera house, which was shortly to become La Scala. Operas of that period were composed specifically for the cast that created them: Mozart more than once referred to fitting an aria to the voice as a tailor fitted a suit to the figure. And some of the original cast of Mitridate thought their arias ill-fitting: Mozart was required to rewrite several of them. Many of the arias are expansive pieces, with a semi-da capo, and make heavy demands on the singers' agility and compass.

This set has a starry cast. The primo uomo role, Sifare, written for an unusually high-lying castrato voice, is sung, with great character, by Cecilia Bartoli. Perhaps the finest of her four arias is the slow one in Act 2 with horn obbligato, 'Lungi da te, mio bene', which is sung here with real depth of feeling, shapeliness of line and richness of tone. The only reservation is that the part does lie very high for her: the top B flats sound strained, and indeed the quality from G upwards is slightly impaired. Still, it is a marvellous performance and she brings to the music a real sense of drama and care for the words in the recitative and arias.

There is nothing but praise, too, for Natalie Dessay in the prima donna role of Aspasia, beloved of Sifare. Full, creamy tone, brilliantly thrown-off rapid music, a firmly sustained line, a keen sense of drama, high notes struck loud and clear and bang in the middle: one could ask for nothing more. Her duet with Bartoli, the single concerted number, at the end of Act 2, is a joy: they seem to have all the time in the world for sensitive phrasing and refined detail.

Brian Asawa, in the castrato role of Farnace, offers some very fine countertenor singing, with a full, almost throaty tone, not at all in the usual countertenor manner, and extraordinarily even across a wide range. Giuseppe Sabbatini copes well in the role of Mitridate but does not always manage so happily either in the lyrical music or the expressions of anger. He is inclined to sing too loudly or too softly: there is no comfortable mean. His first aria, 'Se di lauri', the most beautiful piece in the score, is forceful and grandiose where softness and warmth are wanted, and the pianissimo recapitulation is not persuasive. Still, this is accurate, technically accomplished and perfectly tuned singing. Rousset directs his period instrument band with vigour and conviction.

Le nozze di Figaro

Sesto Bruscantini bar Figaro; Graziella Sciutti sop Susanna; Franco Calabrese bass Count Almaviva; Sena Jurinac sop Countess Almaviva; Risë Stevens mez Cherubino; Monica Sinclair contr Marcellina; Ian Wallace bass Bartolo; Hugues Cuénod ten Don Basilio; Daniel McCoshan ten Don Curzio; Gwyn Griffiths bar Antonio; Jeanette Sinclair sop Barbarina H
Glyndebourne Festival Chorus and Orchestra / Vittorio Gui
Classics for Pleasure ② CD-CFPD4724 Ⓑ
(158 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1955 ○○○

This comes from what might be termed the second generation of Glyndebourne performances, those dominated by Vittorio Gui, whose approach to Mozart was more volatile, more Italianate, possibly a little less warm than that of his equally individual predecessor, Fritz Busch. This is immediately evident in the Overture, which tells us very definitely that we are to hear a tale of intrigue and emotional turmoil, da Ponte as prominent as Mozart. To achieve his purpose, Gui imported a cast that included three Italians. Bruscantini is a mercurial, light-voiced, mobile Figaro, Calabrese a dark-browed Almaviva, very much a dominant personality in his household (he is also, for the most part, strong and vibrant in tone and excellent in Mozartian diction). Graziella Sciutti, who was to be Glyndebourne's Susanna only in 1958, was brought in for the recording, and a lively, if a little thin-voiced Susanna she proves. Wonderful to hear all three pronouncing their own tongue so pointedly.

For all that, the most compelling reason for obtaining this set is the Countess of the irreplaceable Sena Jurinac, a noble, aristocratic assumption sung in the warmest, most palpitating tones – a lovable singer at the height of her powers. A drawback is Risë Stevens's tired-sounding and unidiomatic Cherubino, but even she fits well enough into the ensemble.

This was one of EMI's earliest stereo efforts, and the placings are well managed, with the sense of intimacy you get in the theatre at Glyndebourne but it has to be said that the orchestral sound now seems a little confined and lacking in bloom. But then – regardless of the countless excellent modern recordings available – listen again to Jurinac's touching 'Dove sono' and Gui's very theatrical way with the score and you will know that you will always need to have this set. Gui's matching of tempos is laudable and he draws playing from the RPO that is at once disciplined and full of character. And this set is an exceptional bargain.

Le nozze di Figaro P
Bryn Terfel bass-bar Figaro; Alison Hagley sop Susanna; Rodney Gilfry bar Count Almaviva; Hillevi Martinpelto sop Countess Almaviva; Pamela Helen Stephen mez Cherubino; Susan McCulloch sop Marcellina; Carlos Feller bass Bartolo; Francis Egerton ten Don Basilio, Don Curzio; Julian Clarkson bass Antonio; Constanze Backes sop Barbarina
Monteverdi Choir; English Baroque Soloists / Sir John Eliot Gardiner
Archiv Produktion ③ 439 871-2AH3
(179 minutes: DDD). Notes, text and translation included. Recorded live in 1993 Ⓕ ○

The catalogue of Figaro recordings is a long one, and the cast lists are full of famous names. In this version only one principal had more than a half-dozen recordings behind him, and some had none at all. It is a commentary on the astuteness of the casting and on the capacity of a strong conductor to make the whole so much more than the sum of its parts that this version can stand comparison with any, not only for its grasp of the drama but also for the quality of its singing. It is, of course, a period-instrument recording, more evidently so than many under Gardiner. The string tone is pared down and makes quite modest use of vibrato, the woodwind is soft-toned (but happily prominent). The voices are generally lighter and fresher-sounding than those on most recordings and the balance permits more than usual to be heard of Mozart's instrumental commentary on the action and the characters. The recitative is done with quite exceptional life and feeling for its meaning and dramatic import, with a real sense, during much of it, of lively and urgent conversation.

Bryn Terfel and Alison Hagley make an outstanding Figaro and Susanna. Terfel has enough darkness in his voice to sound menacing in 'Se vuol ballare' as well as bitter in 'Aprite un po' quegli occhi'; it is an alert, mettlesome performance – and he also brings off a superlative 'Non più andrai'. Hagley offers a reading of spirit and allure. The interplay between her and the woodwind in 'Venite inginocchiatevi' is a delight, and her cool but heartfelt 'Deh vieni' is very beautiful. Once or twice her intonation seems marginally under stress but that is the price one pays for singing with so little vibrato, and it's worth it. Hillevi Martinpelto's unaffected, youthful-sounding Countess is enjoyable; both arias are quite lightly done, with a very lovely, warm, natural sound in 'Dove sono' especially. Some may prefer a more polished, sophisticated reading, of the traditional kind, but this is closer to what Mozart would have wanted and expected.

Rodney Gilfry provides a Count with plenty of fire and authority, firmly focused in tone; the outburst at the Allegro assai in 'Vedrò mentr'io sospiro' is formidable. Pamela Helen Stephen's Cherubino sounds charmingly youthful and impetuous. There is no want of dramatic life in Gardiner's direction. His tempos are marginally quicker than most, and the orchestra often speaks eloquently of the drama. Gardiner adopts the Moberly/Raeburn order of events in Act 3. This involves placing 'Dove sono' before, instead of after, the sextet and in the last Act he places Susanna's aria before, instead of after, Figaro's.

Le nozze di Figaro Ⓗ

Cesare Siepi bass Figaro; Hilde Gueden sop Susanna; Alfred Poell bar Count Almaviva; Lisa della Casa sop Countess Almaviva; Suzanne Danco sop Cherubino; Hilde Rössl-Majdan contr Marcellina; Fernando Corena bass Bartolo; Murray Dickie ten Don Basilio; Hugo Meyer-Welfing ten Don Curzio; Harald Pröglhöf bass Antonio; Anny Felbermayer sop Barbarina

Vienna State Opera Chorus; Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Erich Kleiber

Decca Legends ③ 466 369-2DM03 Ⓜ

(172 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1955 OO

Erich Kleiber's Figaro is a classic of the classics of the gramophone: beautifully played by the Vienna Phil, conducted with poise and vitality and a real sense of the drama unfolding through the music. It's very much a Viennese performance, not perhaps as graceful or as effervescent as some but warm, sensuous and alive to the interplay of character. At the centre is Hilde Gueden, whose Susanna has echoes of Viennese operetta singing although she remains a true Mozartian stylist – her 'Deh vieni' is impeccably graceful and perfectly timed. Lisa della Casa's Countess may not be one of the most dramatic but the voice is full yet focused, and 'Dove sono' is a delight in particular. Suzanne Danco's Cherubino is not exactly impassioned, and is really as much girlish as boyish, but it is still neat and musical singing. The balance among the men is affected by the casting of Figaro with a weightier singer than the Count. But Alfred Poell's Count makes up in natural authority and aristocratic manner what he lacks in sheer power, and he shows himself capable, too, of truly sensual singing in the Act 3 duet with Susanna.

There are excellent performances, too, from Corena's verbally athletic Bartolo and Dickie's alert, ironic Basilio. However, the true star is Erich Kleiber. The beginning of the opera sets your spine a-tingling with theatrical expectation. Act 1 goes at pretty smart tempos, but all through he insists on full musical value. There is no rushing in the confrontations at the end of Act 2 – all is measured and properly argued through. And everything is truly sung: the singers never skimp on the music to convey the drama; they rather use the music to convey it. With Kleiber and the VPO behind them, they do so utterly convincingly. The sound is satisfactory, for a set of this vintage – and no lover of this opera should be without it.

Additional recommendations

Le nozze di Figaro

Prey Figaro Mathis Susanna Fischer-Dieskau Count Janowitz Countess Troyanos Cherubino

Deutsche Oper Orchestra / Böhm

DG The Originals 449 728-2GOR3 Ⓜ

(173 minutes: ADD: 3/97)

A strongly cast opera from 1968 with Böhm a near perfect Mozartian in charge. Fischer-Dieskau and Janowitz are ideally partnered as the aristocrats and Prey and Mathis are a lively pair of young lovers. Troyanos's Cherubino is finely drawn. A mid-price version well worth considering.

Pinza Figaro; Réthy Susanna; Stabile Count Almaviva; Rautawaara Countess Almaviva; Novotna Cherubino; Vienna State Opera Chorus; Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Walter Ⓗ

Andante mono ③ 3981 (157 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ

Notes, libretto and translation included

Recorded live at the Salzburg Festival in 1937

This is an invaluable document: an edge-of-your-seat reading, devoid of Romanticism, aware of authentic practice even in the sense of brisk tempi and use of harpsichord in the recitatives. The singers are quite superb, and the cast melds into a convincing whole. The transfers have been lovingly achieved and the results are perfectly good enough for you to enjoy this performance without hindrance. Thoroughly recommended.

Zaïde

Lynne Dawson sop Zaïde; Hans-Peter Blochwitz 🅿 ten Gomatz; Olaf Bär bar Allazim; Herbert Lippert ten Sultan Soliman; Christopher Purves bass Osmin
Academy of Ancient Music / Paul Goodwin
Harmonia Mundi HMU90 7205 (75 minutes: DDD).
Notes, text and translation included Ⓕ
Recorded 1997

Mozart began composing the work known as Zaïde in 1779-80, but left it unfinished, ostensibly because no performance was in prospect, but perhaps also because, very soon after he broke off, he came to see that this rather static kind of musical drama was not the sort of piece he wanted to write. Moreover, the character relationships are difficult to deal with: the libretto and the music (as far as it goes) imply a powerful attraction at the beginning of the opera between Zaïde and Gomatz, but ultimately, in the final scene, which Mozart never reached, they turn out to be brother and sister: very touching, and well attuned to the sensibilities of the time, but cramping to the composer. Nevertheless, the music of Zaïde is full of fine things, often foreshadowing not only the similar Entführung but also Idomeneo. This recording captures its beauties and its depth of feeling beautifully. This is partly because of the sympathetic conducting of Paul Goodwin, who paces it with excellent judgement, bringing to it just the right degree of flexibility, and achieves orchestral textures that are clear and warm – much more so than usual from period-instrument groups. The melodramas, tellingly shaped, perfectly catch the tone of passion. The AAM plays at its best for him (notably, understandably, the principal oboist).

It is hard to imagine a better cast. Lynne Dawson sings the title-role with a frail beauty that is very appealing. Hans-Peter Blochwitz's shapely lines and full, eloquent tone make Gomatz's arias a delight, too; and Herbert Lippert, the second tenor, as the Sultan (in love, or lust, with Zaïde), is almost his match in evenness and lyrical quality. It is also a luxury to have Olaf Bär as Allazim: the music is sung with a refinement of tone and ease of articulation that you don't imagine it has often had before. Christopher Purves sings Osmin cleanly without perhaps quite fully realizing the comedy. In sum, this far excels any previous recording.

Die Zauberflöte

Ruth Ziesak sop Pamina; Sumi Jo sop Queen of Night; Uwe Heilmann ten Tamino; Michael Kraus bar Papageno; Kurt Moll bass Sarastro; Andreas Schmidt bar Speaker; Heinz Zednik ten Monostatos; Lotte Leitner sop Papagena; Adrianne Pieczonka sop Annette Kuettenbaum, Jard van Nes mezzos First, Second and Third Ladies; Max Emanuel Cencic, Michael Rausch, Markus Leitner trebs First, Second and Third Boys; Wolfgang Schmidt ten Hans Franzen bass Two Armed Men; Clemens Bieber ten Hans Joachim Porcher bar Two Priests
Vienna Boys' Choir; Vienna State Opera Concert Choir; Vienna Philharmonic Orch / Sir Georg Solti
Decca ② 433 210-2DH2 (152 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, text and translation included
Recorded 1990 ●●

Solti's relationship with Die Zauberflöte is long and illustrious. When, in 1937, he was musical assistant to Toscanini in Salzburg, it was Solti's fingers which conjured the sound from Papageno's glockenspiel. In Salzburg in 1990, Solti turned from rostrum to celesta and duetted with Papageno once again. This recording is a fitting celebration of Solti's own long Mozartian journey. Solti's 1969 recording, also for Decca and available as a three-disc reissue, was praised for its feeling for excitement, where a very slight excess of solemnity or relaxation can be deadly. It is exactly that quality which epitomises this recording: if anything, tempos are even more finely judged, more intuitively moulded to the shape of the score's harmonic dramas and emotional breathing.

Solti's tempos and pacing are in fact the inspiration of this Flute. Marginally faster than in 1969, the Overture now springs rather than stings on its way. Solti gives time and space enough, though, for melodically or harmonically self-isolating lines such as Tamino's response to the Speaker, 'Der Lieb' und Tugend Eigentum'; for the vibrancy of the inner string parts for Isis and Osiris and the Armed Men; to Pamina's cry of 'Die Wahrheit!' – one of the most moving on disc.

Ruth Ziesak's fresh, intelligent performance here restores to Pamina that fusion of innocence and strength, vulnerability and courage which the character and her music demand. With Solti's tempo, and sprung orchestral chords pulsing like a heartbeat, her first pure phrase of 'Bei Männern' catches the breath with delight; her genuflecting cry of pain to Sarastro quite pierces the heart. The casting of Tamino epitomises a major difference between the two Solti versions. Uwe Heilmann, raw, penetrating and a little Schreier-like of timbre, is a livelier dramatic presence than Stuart Burrows (1969), if not as aristocratic and well-groomed a voice. The 1969 version is singerly: this newer recording primarily dramatic.

By the same token, Hermann Prey's Papageno (1969) is easier to listen to than that of Michael Kraus, who tends to bounce clean off the end of a phrase. This Queen of Night is not merely an Olympia with a crown. Sumi Jo is truly in her ascendant here. Her lunar beauty seems to take its strength, as it surely must, from Sarastro himself. Kurt Moll, appropriately, sings on an entirely other vocal plane: the depth of his voice is fully equal to the breadth of his music. In his musical temple there are indeed many mansions. To sum up, Solti's earlier recording bears up well musically, but it is eclipsed dramatically by the live presence and meticulous recording balance of this newer version.

Die Zauberflöte P
Rosa Mannion sop Pamina; Natalie Dessay sop Queen of Night; Hans-Peter Blochwitz ten Tamino; Anton Scharinger bass Papageno; Reinhard Hagen bass Sarastro; Willard White bass Speaker; Steven Cole ten Monostatos; Linda Kitchen sop Papagena; Anna Maria Panzarella sop Doris Lamprecht mez Delphine Haidan contr First, Second and Third Ladies; Damien Colin, Patrick Olivier Croset, Stéphane Dutournier trebs First, Second and Third Boys; Christopher Josey ten First Armed Man, First Priest; Laurent Naouri bass Second Armed Man, Second Priest
Les Arts Florissants / William Christie
Erato ② 0630-12705-2 (150 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Notes, text and translation included. Recorded 1995

With a background primarily in the French Baroque, William Christie comes to Die Zauberflöte from an angle quite unlike anyone else's; yet this is as idiomatic and as deeply Mozartian a reading of the work as any. Interviewed in the booklet-note, Christie says wise things about the work and ways of performing it, and in particular remarks on the unforced singing that is one of his objectives, much more manageable with the gentler sound of period instruments. All of this is borne out by the performance itself, which falls more sweetly and lovingly on the ear than any other. Mozartians will relish it, and it will surely prompt fresh thought about the work.

Overall the performance is quick and light-textured – and often quite dramatic. Some may find Christie less responsive than many more traditional interpreters to the music's quicksilver changes in mood, yet this is a part of his essentially broad and gentle view of Die Zauberflöte. His cast has few famous names. There is of course Hans-Peter Blochwitz, probably the finest Tamino around these days. As Pamina, Rosa Mannion has much charm and a hint of girlish vivacity but blossoms into maturity and indeed passion in 'Ach, ich fühl's' – the final phrases, as the wind instruments fall away and leave her alone and desolate, are very moving. Natalie Dessay's Queen of Night is forthright, clean and well tuned, with ample weight and tonal glitter.

The orchestral playing from Les Arts Florissants is polished, and the translucent sound is a joy on the ear. In short, Christie offers a very satisfying, acutely musical view of the work.

Die Zauberflöte H
Tiana Lemnitz sop Pamina; Erna Berger sop Queen of Night; Helge Roswaenge ten Tamino; Gerhard Hüsch bar Papageno; Wilhelm Strienz bass Sarasto; Walter Grossmann bass Speaker, Second Armed Man; Heinrich Tessmer ten Monostatos, First Armed Man; Irma Beilke sop Papagena, First Boy; Hilde Scheppan sop First Lady; Elfriede Marherr-Wagner sop Second Lady; Rut Berglund contr Third Lady, Third Boy; Carla Spletter sop Second Boy; Ernest Fabbry ten Priest
Favres Solisten Vereinigung; Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Sir Thomas Beecham
EMI Références mono ② 761034-2 (130 minutes: ADD). Notes, texts and translation included.
Also available on Pearl mono GEMMCDS9371. Ⓜ
Recorded 1937-38 ○○

Sir Thomas Beecham's feeling for both the grandeur and the delicacy, and the evident command he has of his forces, ensure attentiveness and delight at every turn. Every appearance of Gerhard Hüsch is a joy: we have had good Papagenos since this, the first of all complete recordings of Die Zauberflöte, but he surely remains the best. Tiana Lemnitz sings with such surpassing beauty for so much of the time that the occasional scoop is forgiven. Erna Berger's Queen of Night is firm and technically accomplished, and there are some splendid performances by the Three Ladies. The Tamino is not well cast: Roswaenge lacks finesse though he is a positive enough character. Wilhelm Strienz is literally out of his depth, producing nasty, unresonant low notes and generally sounding more like a Hans Sachs than a Sarastro. Walter Grossmann is a woolly Speaker, and Heinrich Tessmer, perfect as Monostatos, is sadly no use as First Armed Man.

The absence of dialogue, as the anonymous writer of EMI's admirable sleeve-note says, 'turns music-dramainto a sort of song-cycle'. Altogether a set to pick one's way through, essential though it is to have it at hand. And this also applies to the Pearl, warily recommending it over its rival with the caution that there is surface-sound (however reduced) and, alas, no text and translation.

The Pearl transfer provides the greater enjoyment, although it is true that EMI has all but eliminated the surface-sound; true also that the EMI transfer has greater sharpness of sibilants and 't's with all that that may imply about frequency range.

Additional recommendation
Die Zauberflöte
Janowitz Pamina Popp Queen of Night; Gedda Tamino Berry Papageno
Philharmonia Chorus and Orchestra / Klemperer
EMI Great Recordings of the Century
② 567388-2 (134 minutes: ADD: 10/00) Ⓜ
Text and translation included

A classic set if not quite a 'Great Recording'. Gedda is a forthright Tamino, Popp a nonpareil of a Queen of Night and Berry an enchanting Papageno. However, Janowitz, beautifully as she sings, is a detached Pamina. Note, the dialogue is absent (Otto Klemperer's decision).

Modest Mussorgsky

Russian 1839-1881

Mussorgsky's mother gave him piano lessons, and at nine he played a Field concerto before an audience in his parents' house. In 1852 he entered the Guards' cadet school in St Petersburg. Although he had not studied harmony or composition, in 1856 he tried to write an opera the same year he entered the Guards. In 1857 he met Dargomïzhsky and Cui, and through them Balakirev and Stasov. He persuaded Balakirev to give him lessons and composed songs and piano sonatas.

In 1858 Mussorgsky passed through a nervous or spiritual crisis and resigned his army commission. A visit to Moscow in 1859 fired his patriotic imagination and his compositional energies, but although his music began to enjoy public performances his nervous irritability was not entirely calmed. The emancipation of the serfs in March 1861 obliged him to spend most of the next two years helping manage the family estate; a symphony came to nothing and Stasov and Balakirev agreed that 'Mussorgsky is almost an idiot'. But he continued to compose and in 1863-6 worked on the libretto and music of an opera, Salammbô, which he never completed. At this time he served at the Ministry of Communications and lived in a commune with five other young men who ardently cultivated and exchanged advanced ideas about art, religion, philosophy and politics. Mussorgsky's private and public lives eventually came into conflict. In 1865 he underwent his first serious bout of dipsomania (probably as a reaction to his mother's death that year) and in 1867 he was dismissed from his post.

He spent summer 1867 at his brother's country house at Minkino, where he wrote, among other things, his first important orchestral work, St John's Night on the Bare Mountain. On his return to St Petersburg in the autumn Musorgsky, like the other members of the Balakirev-Stasov circle (ironically dubbed the 'Mighty Handful'), became interested in Dargomïzhsky's experiments in operatic naturalism. Early in 1869 Musorgsky re-entered government service and, in more settled conditions, was able to complete the original version of the opera Boris Godunov. This was rejected by the Mariinsky Theatre and Mussorgsky set about revising it. In 1872 the opera was again rejected, but excerpts were performed elsewhere and a vocal score published. The opera committee finally accepted the work and a successful production was given in February 1874.

Meanwhile Mussorgsky had begun work on another historical opera, Khovanshchina, at the same time gaining promotion at the ministry. Progress on the new opera was interrupted partly because of unsettled domestic circumstances, but mainly because heavy drinking which left him incapable of sustained creative effort. But several other compositions belong to this period, including the song cycles Sunless and Songs and Dances of Death and the Pictures at an Exhibition, for piano, a brilliant and bold series inspired by a memorial exhibition of drawings by his friend Victor Hartmann. Ideas for a comic opera based on Gogol's Sorochintsy Fair also began to compete with work on Khovanshchina; both operas remained unfinished at Musorgsky's death. During the earlier part of 1878 he seems to have led a more respectable life and his director at the ministry even allowed him leave for a three-month concert tour with the contralto Darya Leonova. After he was obliged to leave the government service in January 1880, Leonova helped provide him with employment and a home. It was to her that he turned on February 23, 1881 in a state of nervous excitement, saying that there was nothing left for him but to beg in the streets; he was suffering from alcoholic epilepsy. He was removed to hospital, where he died a month later.

Many of Mussorgsky's works were unfinished, and their editing and posthumous publication were mainly carried out by Rimsky-Korsakov, who to a greater or lesser degree 'corrected' what Mussorgsky had composed. It was only many years later that, with a return to the composer's original drafts, the true nature of his rough art could be properly understood.

Pictures at an Exhibition (orch Ravel)

Pictures at an Exhibition (orch Ravel). A Night on the Bare Mountain (arr Rimsky-Korsakov)

Pictures at an Exhibition. St John's Night on the Bare Mountain. The destruction of Sennacherib[a]. Salammbô – Chorus of priestesses[a]. Oedipus in Athens – Chorus of people in the temple[a]. Joshua[b]
[b]Elena Zaremba mez [a]Prague Philharmonic Chorus; Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Claudio Abbado
DG 445 238-2GH (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included
Recorded live in 1993

St John's Night on the Bare Mountain is the original version of A Night on the Bare Mountain. Abbado relishes the odd grotesque spurts of colour from the woodwind and Mussorgskian ruggedness. The composer's structural clumsiness is not shirked and the lack of the smooth continuity found in the Rimsky-Korsakov arrangement does not impede the sense of forward momentum; indeed at the close the Russian dance element is emphasised, rather than the sinister pictorialism. The choral pieces are gloriously sung and again Abbado brings out their Russian colour, especially in the glowing yet sinuous 'Chorus of priestesses'. Joshua is made to seem a minor masterpiece with its lusty opening and its touching central solo ('The Amorite women weep'). This is most eloquently sung by Elena Zaremba and the theme is then movingly taken up first by the women of the chorus and then the men, before the exultant music returns. The performance of Pictures at an Exhibition, like the choral items, gains from the spacious ambience and sumptuous overall textures. It is very dramatic in its contrasts and very beautifully played.

The refinement and colour of the evocation, so characteristic of Abbado is most touching in 'The old castle', while 'Tuileries' is gently evoked with a flexibly fluid control of tempo. 'Bydlo' opens and closes mournfully, yet reaches a strong, positive immediacy as it finally comes close. The chicks dance with dainty lightness, then the hugely weighty lower orchestral tutti and bleating trumpet response of 'Samuel Goldenberg' demonstrate the extraordinary range of tone this great orchestra can command.

After the scintillating virtuosity of 'Market Place at Limoges' the sonorous Berlin brass makes a tremendous impact in 'Catacombe' and Abbado's tonal and dynamic graduations are astute; then after a ferociously rhythmic 'Baba-jaga' he steadily builds his three-dimensional 'Great Gate at Kiev', losing none of the grandeur of the gentle contrasts of the intoned chorale, with the tam-tam splashes at the end satisfyingly finalizing the effect. A most enjoyable concert: there is nothing routine about anything here.

Mussorgsky Pictures at an Exhibition
Stravinsky The Rite of Spring
Philadelphia Orchestra / Riccardo Muti
EMI Encore 574742-2 (64 minutes: ADD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1978 ●

Pictures at an Exhibition was the first commercial recording to do full justice to the sheer range and depth of sonority that the Philadelphia Orchestra could command. The recording venue was the Metropolitan Church of Philadelphia and the generous acoustic of the hall enabled this great orchestra to be heard to best advantage. The lower strings in 'Samuel Goldenberg and Schmuyle' have an extraordinary richness, body and presence, and 'Baba Yaga' has an unsurpassed virtuosity and attack. The glorious body of tone, the richly glowing colours, the sheer homogeneity of the strings and perfection of the ensemble is a consistent pleasure. Muti's reading is second to none and the orchestral playing is breathtaking. There are many other fine recordings of this work but they do not have quite that homogeneity of tone and the extraordinary sheen that is and has been the hallmark of the Philadelphians for many decades. The recording is amazingly lifelike and truthful.

Muti directs a performance of The Rite of Spring which is aggressively brutal but yet presents its violence not in coldly clinical terms but with red-blooded conviction. He favours a tempo a degree faster than usual, but no faster than the composer recommends. The great compulsion of the performance lies in his ability to draw playing from his orchestra which is not just precise and brilliant, but passionately committed. Wildness and barbarity are so clearly part of the mixture to a degree not matched by most other recordings, so it is not surprising that Muti's interpretation remains among the front-runners. The recording is gloriously full and dramatic with wide dynamic range and fine separation. The brass and percussion are caught with special vividness helped by one of the most impressive bass responses to be heard in this work.

Mussorgsky Pictures at an Exhibition. A Night on the Bare Mountain
Ravel Valses nobles et sentimentales
New York Philharmonic Orchestra / Giuseppe Sinopoli
DG 429 785-2GH (67 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1989

Sinopoli's recording of Pictures at an Exhibition has great panache and is full of subtle detail and sharply characterized performances. None of this would be possible without the marvellous virtuosity of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, whose brass section plays with a wonderful larger-than-life sonority and whose woodwind section produces playing of considerable delicacy and finesse, as for example in 'Tuileries' and the 'Ballet of the Unhatched Chicks'. Sinopoli revels in the drama of this work and this is nowhere more noticeable than in his sinister readings of 'Catacombs' and 'Baba-Yaga'. A Night on the Bare Mountain is no less impressive, where again the orchestra's flair and virtuosity have an almost overwhelming impact. Less successful are Ravel's Valses nobles et sentimentales which are perhaps too idiosyncratic for an individual recommendation despite some superb performances and moments of great beauty. The sound is very well balanced.

Pictures at an Exhibition[a] (orch Ravel). Night on the Bare Mountain (arr Rimsky-Korsakov). Khovanshchina – Prelude (orch Shostakovich). Sorochintsï Fair – Gopak (orch Liadov)
Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Valery Gergiev
Philips 468 526-2PH (52 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
[a]Recorded live at the Musikverein, Vienna in 2000

This is a larger-than-life reading of Pictures, which underplays the subtleties of colouring introduced by Ravel in favour of more earthily Russian flavours. The coupling is an all-Mussorgsky one, surprisingly rare in the many versions of this work.

This live account brings some superb playing, with fast, brilliant movements dazzlingly well played, and with the speed bringing an edge-of-seat feeling from perils just avoided, something not usually conveyed in a studio performance. The opening 'Promenade', taken squarely, establishes the monumental Russian quality, enhanced by the immediacy of the sound. Even the 'Hut on Fowl's Legs' seems larger than life, and the performance culminates in an account of the 'Great Gate of Kiev' shattering in its weight and thrust.

That and the all-Mussorgsky coupling establish a clear place for this new issue in an over-stocked market, even though the coupling is not generous. The regular Rimsky version of Night on the Bare Mountain, though not recorded live, brings a performance to compare in power with Pictures, with very weighty brass, while Shostakovich's orchestration of the Khovanshchina Prelude, though less evocative than it can be, is warm and refined, with the Gopak added as a lively encore.

Pictures at an Exhibition (orch Ravel). A Night on the Bare Mountain – 2 versions: orch Mussorgsky; orch Rimsky-Korsakov. The Fair at Sorochintsï – Gopak. Khovanshchina – The departure of Prince Golitsïn
Ukraine National Symphony Orchestra / Theodore Kuchar 💰
Naxos 8 555924 (63 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded c2002

Ravel's orchestration of Pictures at an Exhibition was commissioned by Koussevitzky as a showpiece for his superb Boston orchestra, and it proves just as impressive here to demonstrate the excellence of the National Symphony Orchestra of the Ukraine. The colour palette of the woodwind is a joy, as we discover in both 'Tuileries' and the deliciously cheeping 'Unhatched Chickens'; and how beautifully the solo saxophone sings his sad serenade outside 'The Old Castle'. In representing the bold profile of 'Samuel Goldenberg', the massed lower strings show their splendid body of tone, and the punch of the brass entry in 'Catacombae' has the richest underlying resonance in a performance full of eerie menace. The percussion come fully into their own in 'The Hut on Fowl's Legs', where the bass drummer adds dramatic weight and point. The 'Great Gate of Kiev' is given with the full, rich orchestral sonority now thrillingly expansive, and Kuchar broadening the final statement of the great chorale to give the listener a tingling frisson of satisfaction.

It was an original and fascinating idea to record both the original Mussorgsky score of Night on the Bare Mountain alongside the Rimsky arrangement, for in many ways they are entirely different works, something Theodore Kuchar underlines by his contrasting interpretations. It may be unfashionable to say so, but however inspired and original Mussorgsky's draft score is in conception, the all-but-recomposed Rimsky-Korsakov piece is the finer work overall. With a superbly rasping opening from the heavy brass, and thrusting forward momentum, Kuchar readily captures its intitial and recurring malignant force, deftly amalgamating the jollity of Rimsky's interpolated brass fanfares, then producing a magically peaceful close, with radiant playing from the Russian woodwind.

To sum up, this is a quite remarkable CD on all counts – outstandingly fine orchestral playing, vividly exciting and very Russian music-making, and a very tangible sound picture, consistently in the demonstration bracket.

Pictures at an Exhibition. A Night on the Bare Mountain. Khovanshchina – Prelude, Act 1, 'Dawn over the Moscow River'
Atlanta Symphony Orchestra / Yoel Levi Ⓕ
Telarc CD80296 (50 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1991

When this was released, Telarc established a position for it as sonically the most spectacular set of Pictures among the many in the current catalogue. And it is a very fine performance too. The programme opens with A Night on the Bare Mountain – the brass sound is special, with great richness and natural bite with no exaggeration. The performance overall is both well paced and exciting. Perhaps Levi's evil spirits are not as satanic as some, but they make an impact and the contrasting melancholy of the closing section is very touching, with the tolling bell nicely balanced and the clarinet solo poignantly taking over from the gently elegiac strings.

The characterisation of Pictures at an Exhibition is no less successful, although it is an essentially mellower view than, for example, Sinopoli's highly praised DG version with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra. Levi's is a performance where throughout the conductor makes the most of the colour, and brilliant orchestral effects of Ravel's inspired score, revealing much that often goes unheard – the grotesquerie of 'Gnomus' is not accentuated, but one greatly enjoys the attack of the lower strings which are very tangible indeed; a doleful bassoon introduces 'The Old Castle' and the saxophone solo has a satin-like finish on the timbre to produce an elegant melancholy; the woodwind in 'Tuileries' is gentle in its virtuosity. Levi holds back a little for the delicate string entry and the whole piece has a captivating lightness of touch. The final climax is unerringly built and at the very close the brass and strings produce an electrifying richness and weight of sound, to bring a frisson of excitement, with the tam-tam resounding clearly. Then there is silence, and out of it steals the exquisite opening of the Khovanschchina Prelude, with its poetic evocation of dawn over the Kremlin. Levi goes for atmosphere above all else and does not make too much of the climax, but the coda with its fragile woodwind halos is most delicately managed. This disc is a first choice if state-of-the-art recording is your prime consideration.

Pictures at an Exhibition (piano)

Mussorgsky Pictures at an Exhibition 🄷
Chopin 27 Etudes, Opp 10, 25 and posth – E, Op 10/3 Liszt 12 Etudes d'exécution transcendante, S139 – No 5, Feux follets; No 11, Harmonies du soir. 4 Valses oubliées, S215 – No 1; No 2
Prokofiev Sonata for Piano No 6, Op. 82 – Sonata for Piano No 7, Op 83. Sonata for Piano No 8, Op 84
Rachmaninov 24 Preludes – G sharp minor, Op 32/12 Schubert Impromptus – No 2 in E flat; No 4 in A flat. 6 Moments musicaux, D780 – No 1 in C
Sviatoslav Richter pf
Philips ② 456 946-2PM2 (149 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1958 live in Sofia

Forced to select the greatest of Richter's performances for a two-disc set, Philips, understandably, have looked to his famous 1958

Sofia recital. Even at the height of his powers Richter could be an erratic player, but on this occasion the force was with him from first note until last. Not only did the recital help to spread the Richter 'legend' in the months leading up to his much-hyped London and New York débuts in 1960, his Mussorgsky Pictures made a decisive contribution to the rehabilitation of that piece as a staple of the piano repertoire. Here is virtuosity entirely at the service of the music, defying anyone to say a word against Mussorgsky's pianistic imagination or to want to hear Ravel's orchestral make-over ever again.

The rest of the recital displays Richter's view of the Romantic repertoire at its first mature flowering, after a period of occasionally experimental overstatement. His Schubert, Chopin and Liszt share a common core of determined resistance to buffeting emotions. Yet on the surface his Schubert is as beautiful and refined as anyone's (no controversial tempos either); and as all collectors of recorded piano music already know, his Liszt 'Feux follets' remains a benchmark performance to this day.

As for his Prokofiev, has anyone taken the Scherzo of the Sixth Sonata more convincingly at this tempo (the fast end of allegretto), for instance, or found more wide-ranging yet integrated drama in all three movements of the Eighth. You could certainly wish for more refined recording quality on the first disc, though the Prokofiev sonatas are well enough recorded, especially the Eighth. Overall it's difficult to imagine a truer encapsulation of the Richter phenomenon.

Complete Songs

Boris Christoff bass Alexandre Labinsky, Gerald Moore pfs French Radio National Orchestra / Georges Tzipine 🄷
EMI Références mono ③ 763025-2 Ⓜ
(191 minutes: ADD). Notes, texts and translations included. Recorded 1951-56 ◉◉◉

This set is undoubtedly one of the all-time glories of the gramophone and should be in any worthwhile song collection. This is unquestionably Boris Christoff's most important legacy. Even on the first disc, in the earlier and slightly less remarkable songs, Mussorgsky offers a range of personalities and emotions as then unknown in Russian song. There are the war-like King Saul, the sad figure of Wilhelm Meister in the Song of the Old Man (what we know as 'An die Türen'), the desolate landscape of The Wind Howls, the folk-hero, Calistratus. Then we hear a wide variety of styles from the recitative-like Cast-off Woman to the gentle lyricism of Night. In this last song Christoff produces that magical mezza voce of his to suggest the intimacy of the loved one portrayed within. But, by then – the 11th song – he has already given us an amazing palette of sound colours, everything from the utterly ferocious to the gentlest whisper. With the second disc, we come to many of the better-known songs but few of them have ever been better interpreted than here.

The centrepiece of the second disc is, of course, the Nursery cycle, where Christoff manages to adapt his big tone for a convincing impersonation of a small boy. He finds yet other voices for the Nurse and for the Mother. This is a tour de force. Similarly rewarding are his performances of the Sunless and Songs and Dances of Death cycles. He catches all the bleak gloom of the first, the histrionic force of the second, where his variety of timbre is once more astonishing, but in the Songs and Dances he uses a corrupt orchestration. After these two cycles, Mussorgsky's inspiration seemed to falter, though On the Dnieper, a lyrical piece of surpassing beauty, and the ever-popular Song of the flea, which ends the set, are remarkable achievements in their way and are here excellently interpreted. Labinsky and Moore are vivid and imaginative partners.

Boris Godunov

Boris Godunov (first version)
Nikolai Putilin bar Boris Godunov; Viktor Lutsiuk ten Grigory; Nikolai Okhotnikov bass Pimen; Fyodor Kuznetsov bass Varlaam; Konstantin Pluzhnikov ten Shuisky; Nikolai Gassiev ten Missail; Zlata Bulycheva mez Fyodor; Olga Trifonova sop Xenia; Yevgenia Gorokhovskaya mez Nurse; Liubov Sokolova mez Hostess; Evgeny Akimov ten Simpleton; Vassily Gerello bar Shchelkalov; Grigory Karassev bass Nikitich; Evgeny Nikitin bass Mityukha; Yuri Schikalov ten Krushchov

Boris Godunov (second version)
Vladimir Vaneyev bass Boris Godunov; Vladimir Galusin ten Grigory; Olga Borodina mez Marina; Nikolai Okhotnikov bass Pimen; Fyodor Kuznetsov bass Varlaam; Konstantin Pluzhnikov ten Shuisky; Nikolai Gassiev ten Missail; Evgeny Nikitin bass Rangoni, Mityukha; Zlata Bulycheva mez Fyodor; Olga Trifonova sop Xenia; Yevgenia Gorokhovskaya mez Nurse; Liubov Sokolova mez Hostess; Evgeny Akimov ten Simpleton; Vassily Gerello bar Shchelkalov; Grigory Karassev bass Nikitich; Yuri Schikalov ten Krushchov; Andrei Karabanov bar Lavitsky; Yuri Laptev ten Chernikovsky
Chorus and Orchestra of the Kirov Opera / Valery Gergiev
Philips ⑤ 462 230-2PH5 (306 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Notes, texts and translations included
Recorded 1997 ◉◉

What we have here is, literally, two operas for the price of one. That is to say, the two discs containing Mussorgsky's first Boris Godunov and the three containing his second are available at five discs for the normal cost of three. And what we are dealing with is, in a real sense, two operas. First, a brief resumé of the facts. In 1868-69 Mussorgsky composed seven scenes: outside the Novedevichy Monastery, Coronation outside the Kremlin, Pimen's Cell, the Inn, the Tsar's rooms in the Kremlin, outside St Basil's Cathedral, Boris's Death in the Kremlin. When these were rejected by the Imperial Theatres in 1872, he made various revisions. To meet objections about the lack of female roles, Mussorgsky added the two scenes with the Polish princess Marina Mniszek; he also substituted the final Kromy Forest scene for the St Basil's scene. He made a large number of adjustments, some of a minor nature, some rather more significant (such as dropping Pimen's narration of the murder of the young Tsarevich), and one huge, the complete rewriting of the original fifth scene, in the Kremlin, sometimes known as the Terem scene. This was the work that he resubmitted, and which was first performed in St Petersburg in 1874. Rimsky-Korsakov's famous version (which does much more than reorchestrate) was first heard in 1896, and for many years superseded its predecessors.

However, it has increasingly been recognised that Boris II is not a revision of Boris I but a different work, both as regards the view of the central character and his place in the historical narrative, and also as regards the rethought musical technique and sometimes change of idiom which this has brought about. Therefore the present set makes a real contribution to our understanding and enjoyment of Russia's greatest opera. It follows that there have to be two singers of the central role. Putilin (Boris I) is in general more capacious in tone, more brooding and lofty, in the Terem scene more embittered and harsh, willing to act with the voice. Vaneyev is a decidedly more immediate and human Boris, tender with his son Fyodor (a touching, engaging performance from Zlata Bulycheva) both in the Terem and at the end, not always as dominating as this Tsar should be but sympathetic, allowing his voice to blanch as death approaches, and especially responsive to the melodic essence of Mussorgsky's speech-delivered lines. This enables him to be rather freer with the actual note values. It does not necessarily matter that much: Mussorgsky changed his mind over various details, and the important thing is to use his notes to create character rather than be too literal with what the different versions propose. Pimen, strongly sung with a hint of the youthful passions that he claims to have abjured, is sung by Nikolai Okhotnikov more or less identically in both performances.

The only character, apart from Boris, to be accorded two singers is Grigory, the False Dmitri. Viktor Lutsiuk (Boris I) is strenuous, obsessed, vital; Vladimir Galusin (Boris II) can sound more frenzied, and has the opportunity with the addition of the Polish acts to give a convincing portrayal of a weak man assuming strength but being undermined by the wiles of a determined woman. Here, she is none other than Olga Borodina, moodily toying with her polonaise rhythms and then in full sensuous call. Yevgenia Gorokhovskaya is a jolly old Nurse in the Boris II Terem scene. The rest of the cast do not really change their interpretations from one Boris to another, and indeed scarcely need to do so: it is not really upon that which the differences depend. Liubov Sokolova sings a fruity Hostess, welcoming in Fyodor Kuznetsov a Varlaam who can really sing his Kazan song rather than merely bawling it. Konstantin Pluzhnikov makes Shuisky move from the rather sinister force confronting Boris in the Terem to a more oily complacency in the Death scene: many Shuiskys make less of the part. Evgeny Nikitin is a creepy, fanatical Rangoni, Vassily Gerello a Shchelkalov of hypocritical elegance, Evgeny Akimov a sad-toned Simpleton. Gergiev directs strong, incisive performances, accompanying sympathetically and controlling the marvellous crowd scenes well.

However, it is a pity that he allows fierce whistles completely to drown the speeding violins opening the Kromy Forest scene (the music can be heard only when it returns), and he has not been given sufficient clarity of recording with the chorus. The words are often obscure, even with the boyars in the Death scene, and far too much is lost in the crowd exchanges. This is regrettable for a work that, in either incarnation, draws so much on realistic detail of articulation. Nevertheless, these five discs form a fascinating set, one which no admirer of this extraordinary creative achievement can afford to ignore.

Boris Godunov

Anatoly Kotcherga bass Boris; Sergei Larin ten Grigory; Marjana Lipovšek mez Marina; Samuel Ramey bass Pimen; Gleb Nikolsky bass Varlaam; Philip Langridge ten Shuisky; Helmut Wildhaber ten Missail; Sergei Leiferkus bar Rangoni; Liliana Nichiteanu mez Feodor; Valentina Valente sop Xenia; Yevgenia Gorokhovskaya mez Nurse; Eléna Zaremba mez Hostess; Alexander Fedin ten Simpleton; Albert Shagidullin bar Shchelkolov; Wojciech Drabowicz ten Mitukha, Krushchov

Slovak Philharmonic Chorus; Berlin Radio Chorus; Tölz Boys' Choir; Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Claudio Abbado

Sony Classical ③ S3K58977 (200 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Notes, text and translation included

Recorded 1993 ◉

Few conductors have been more diligent than Claudio Abbado in seeking the truth about this vast canvas. He chooses the definitive 1872-74 version, adding scenes, including the complete one in Pimen's cell and the St Basil's scene from 1869. His is a taut, tense reading – grand, virtuosic, at times hard-driven, favouring extremes of speed and dynamics. The orchestra is very much in the foreground, sounding more emphatic than would ever be the case in the opera house. Kotcherga has a superb voice, firmly produced throughout an extensive register. His is a Boris avoiding conventional melodrama and concerned to show the loving father. The ambitious lovers are well represented. Indeed, Larin is quite the best Grigory yet recorded on disc, sounding at once youthful, heroic and ardent, and quite free of any tenor mannerisms. Lipovšek characterizes Marina forcefully: we are well aware of the scheming Princess's powers of wheeler-dealing and of erotic persuasion. The recording is of demonstration standard: it is most potent in the way that it captures the incisive and pointed singing of the combined choruses in their various guises. Here all is vividly brought before us by conductor and producer in the wide panorama predicated by Mussorgsky's all-enveloping vision.

Boris Godunov (arr Rimsky-Korsakov) H
Boris Christoff bass Boris, Pimen, Varlaam; Nicolai Gedda ten Grigory; Eugenia Zareska mez Marina, Feodor; André Bielecki ten Shuisky, Missail, Krushchov; Kim Borg bass Rangoni, Shchelkalov; Ludmila Lebedeva sop Xenia; Lydia Romanova mez Nurse, Hostess; Wassili Pasternak ten Simpleton; Raymond Bonte ten Lavitsky; Eugène Bousquet bass Chernikovsky
Choeurs Russes de Paris; French Radio National Orchestra / Issay Dobrowen
EMI Références mono ③ 565192-2 Ⓜ
(178 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1952 ●

Dobrowen's lean, vivid, acutely shaped direction, benefiting from taut rhythms and fastish tempos, is as vital as that on any version since. Its other main attribute is, of course, Christoff's first complete reading on disc of the tortured Tsar, whose role he sings with an enviable combination of firm tone, vital diction and concentrated histrionics, never overstepping the mark. His assumption of two other parts has always been frowned on, but he so subtly varies his tone – softer, greyer for Pimen, rotundly rollicking for Varlaam – that the tripling only worries in the final scene when Pimen comes face to face with the dying ruler. The contrast of his finely shaded Pimen with Ramey's one-dimensional singing on the Abbado version is most marked. If that were not enough, there is the beauty and ardour of the young Gedda as Grigory to please the ear and Zareska's seductive, vocally appealing Marina. She also sings a likeable Feodor. Kim Borg doubles successfully as Shchelkalov and an oily Rangoni. The choral singing is good. We have heard much better on disc since, but few orchestras, in the West at least, have sounded so Russian as these French players but then few have had the benefit of being tutored by Dobrowen. The digital transfers bring out the excellence of the original engineering.

Khovanshchina

Aage Haugland bass Ivan Khovansky; Vladimir Atlantov ten Andrey Khovansky; Vladimir Popov ten Golitsin; Anatolij Kotscherga bar Shaklovity; Paata Burchuladze bass Dosifey; Marjana Lipovšek contr Marfa; Brigitte Poschner-Klebel sop Susanna; Heinz Zednik ten Scribe; Joanna Borowska sop Emma; Wilfried Gahmlich ten Kouzka
Vienna Boys' Choir; Slovak Philharmonic Choir; Vienna State Opera Chorus and Orchestra / Claudio Abbado
DG ③ 429 758-2GH3 (171 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, text and translation included
Recorded live in 1989 ●●

The booklet-essay suggests that Mussorgsky's music constantly poses a question to his Russian compatriots: 'What are the causes of our country's continuing calamities, and why does the state crush all that is good?'. Anyone who follows today's news from Russia and then experiences this opera will understand what is meant, and while we observe with sympathy we seem no nearer than the citizens of that great, tormented country to finding solutions for its endemic problems. However, Mussorgsky was not the least of those Russian musicians who found lasting beauty in her history and he expressed it in a powerfully dramatic idiom that drew on folk-music and had both epic qualities and deep humanity as well as an occasional gentleness. There is also an element here of Russian church music, since Khovanshchina has a political and religious theme and is set in the 1680s at the time of Peter the Great's accession. Since the work was unfinished when Mussorgsky died, performances always involve conjectural work, and the version here – which works convincingly – is mostly that of Shostakovich with the choral ending that Stravinsky devised using Mussorgsky's music. The cast in this live recording is not one of star opera singers, but they are fully immersed in the drama and the music, as is the chorus and the orchestra under Abbado, and the result is deeply atmospheric.

Nikolay Myaskovsky

Russian 1881-1950

GROVE Myaskovsky studied for a military career but entered the St Petersburg Conservatory (1906-11), where his teachers included Lyadov and Rimsky-Korsakov. He served in the war, and from 1921 taught at the Moscow Conservatory. He was not an innovator but was an influential, individual figure working within the Russian tradition. His large output is dominated by the cycle of 27 symphonies (1908-50), highly regarded in and outside Russia in his lifetime. He also wrote 13 string quartets (1913-49), choral and chamber music.

Violin Concerto

Myaskovsky Violin Concerto in D minor, Op 44
Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto in D, Op 35
Vadim Repin vn Kirov Orchestra / Valery Gergiev
Philips 473 343-2PH (72 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded c2002 ●●●

It's the Myaskovsky that really makes this disc a 'must-have'. Myaskovsky's Violin

Concerto was written in just a few months during 1938 and premièred by David Oistrakh in Leningrad early in 1939. As with Tchaikovsky's Concerto, the opening tutti plays for less than a minute and the slow movement is touchingly lyrical. The rather melancholy first movement is built on a grand scale and includes an expansive cadenza where Repin's mastery is virtually the equal of Oistrakh's (in one of his earliest recordings). It's forceful music, epic in scale and earnestly argued, the sort of piece that Gergiev thrives on. The up-front recording makes a powerful impact.

Listening to Repin's Tchaikovsky Concerto (his second recording of the work) confirms just how far he has journeyed in a mere few years. Tone projection is stronger (admittedly the new recording accentuates the fact), attack more aggressive and his solo demeanour seems better focused than before, far more confident and spontaneous.

Mixed in with these 'improvements' are one or two affectations, nothing too drastic but the sort that tend to work better in concert than on disc. Take the beginning of the finale, with its pregnant hesitations and splayed pizzicati. Fun? Yes. Durable? Possibly not. But it's a cracking performance, one of the best from the younger generation, and dynamically accompanied under Gergiev, although the recording sounds like a digital update of the sort of blowsy in-your-face sonics typical of the first stereo recordings of the late 1950s.

Nevertheless, a fabulous disc.

José de Nebra

Spanish 1702-1768

GROVE José de Nebra was principal organist of the Spanish royal chapel and the Descalzas Reales convent at Madrid from 1724; in 1751 he became deputy director of the chapel and head of the choir school. A highly successful theatre composer, he had 57 stage works performed in Madrid and Lisbon in 1723-30 and 1737-51 (none in 1731-6). Whether secular or sacred, they combine comic, folklike and tragic elements, and all include spoken dialogue. He also wrote (especially from the 1740s) music for the royal chapel.

Miserere

Miserere. Iphigenia en Tracia – Allegro cantabile; 'Yo soy, tyrana'; 'Ha, ingrato'
Marta Almajano sop Xenia Meijer mez
Al Ayre Español / Eduardo López Banzo hpd
Deutsche Harmonia Mundi 05472 77532-2 Ⓕ
(58 minutes: DDD). Texts and translations included
Recorded c2001 ●

There are no two ways about it: this CD is an absolute stunner. This is the eighth recording in a sequence of increasingly polished and insightful performances exploring the almost uncharted territory of the vocal and instrumental repertory of the Spanish court and theatre in the 17th and 18th centuries.

José de Nebra, the 300th anniversary of whose birth is being celebrated in Spain with recordings and performances, is clearly one of the most interesting figures of the period. He wrote much theatre music, mostly for the public theatres in Madrid, before dedicating himself, from about 1750, to the composition of sacred music for the royal chapel. Al Ayre Español give us a taste of both theatre and chapel with his setting of the Miserere and two extracts from the zarzuela (a Spanish version of semi-opera) Iphigenia en Tracia of 1747.

As one might expect from such an experienced composer for the stage, the Miserere is a dramatic work, which in this excellent performance continually arrests the attention. Eduardo López Banzo, his small ensemble of strings and continuo and his two superb singers, Marta Almajano and Xenia Meijer, really seem to have got the measure of this piece. Clearly influenced by the Italian, and perhaps primarily the Neapolitan idiom, there are also more galant features and at times a penchant for the unexpected harmonic twist or melodic turn that reminds me of CPE Bach – though it is not at all clear that Nebra would have known that composer's music.

The psalm is set in alternatim, that is with alternate verses set for solo voice or duet and strings, leaving the remaining verses to be sung to plainchant, as here, or perhaps – something the group might experiment with – organ elaborations of the chant. It may take you a while to become accustomed to the aural shock of hearing plainchant and 18th-century operatic arias juxtaposed; just one slight criticism of this CD is the difference in acoustic aura between the two (both were recorded in the same venue but at different times). Both singers perform with utter conviction and panache, and the duets are beautifully matched.

The instrumental and vocal extracts from Nebra's Iphigenia are equally compelling; If you have yet to experience the Spanish Baroque, there could be no better introduction; if you are already a fan of Al Ayre Español you'll probably agree that this is their best recording yet.

Carl Nielsen

Danish 1865-1931

GROVE Nielsen had a poor, rural upbringing, though his father was a musician and he learnt to play the violin, brass instruments and the piano. He studied at the Copenhagen Conservatory (1884-6), then continued having lessons with Orla Rosenhoff. In 1890-91 he travelled to Germany, France and Italy, and began his Brahmsian First Symphony (1892); from 1889 to 1905 he played the violin in the Danish court orchestra.

During the decade from the First Symphony to the Second ('The Four Temperaments', 1902) he developed an extended tonal style, but compacted and classical in its logic: the relatively few works of this period include the string quartets in G minor and E flat, the cantata Hymnus amoris and the opera Saul and David. Here he showed a gift for sharp musical characterisation, pursued in his second opera, the comedy Maskarade (1906) and other works, while his parallel command of large-scale, dynamic forms was affirmed by the Third Symphony (Sinfonia espansiva, 1911) and the Violin Concerto (1911).

From this period he was an international figure and went abroad often to conduct his own music, while working in Copenhagen as a conductor and teacher. At the same time his music became still more individual in its progressive tonality (movements or works ending in a key different from the initial one), 'group polyphony' (the orchestra being treated as an assembly of ensembles in counterpoint), vigorous rhythmic drive and dependence on a harmony not so much of chords as of focal pitches. His chief works were still symphonies (no. 4 'The Inextinguishable', 1916; No.5, 1922) and chamber pieces (F major quartet, 1919; Serenata in vano for quintet, 1914), but he also produced numerous songs and hymn tunes, in addition to incidental scores.

The range of his output remained broad during his last decade, but his textures became still more polyphonic and his ideas still more vividly characterized, bringing a conversational style, intimate or dramatic, to such works as the Sixth Symphony (Sinfonia semplice, 1925), the Wind Quintet (1922) and the concertos for flute (1926) and clarinet (1928). His last works, going still deeper into the great contrapuntal tradition, include the Three Motets (1929) and Commotio for organ (1931).

Clarinet Concerto

Nielsen Clarinet Concerto, FS129 Lutosławski Dance Preludes Prokofiev Flute Sonata in D, Op 94 (arr Kennan)
Richard Stoltzman cl Warsaw Philharmonic Orchestra / Lawrence Leighton Smith
RCA Red Seal 09026 63836-2 (66 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded c2002

Richard Stoltzman's Lutosławski, Nielsen and Prokofiev compilation is a fine achievement. He brings to the Nielsen Concerto both virtuosity and depth of characterisation. There may be other ways of presenting this complex musical character-study – Ib Eriksson's wrestling match with the score probably takes us closest to the original conception – but Stoltzman's fluency and broad expressive range are as impressive as any modern recorded account. The Warsaw Philharmonic under Lawrence Leighton Smith sound exceptionally well prepared. They lend a natural idiomatic pliancy to the Lutosławski Dance Preludes, where Stoltzman is perkiness personified, and make a fine foil for him in the Concerto.

Kent Kennan's orchestration of the Prokofiev Flute Sonata is also well worth hearing – indeed, well worth taking up by other clarinettists. This is a tactful and adroit arrangement for chamber orchestra, which Kennan treats as a natural extension of the Peter and the Wolf ensemble. Stoltzman lavishes care on the solo part, making a persuasive case for the Scherzo as an allegretto scherzando rather than Prokofiev's suggested presto. His romanticised approach to the slow movement is less convincing, but his earthy characterisation of the finale is admirable.

RCA's recording quality is outstanding.

Violin Concerto, FS61

Awards 1989

Nielsen Violin Concerto[a]
Sibelius Violin Concerto in D minor, Op 47[b]
Cho-Liang Lin vn
[a]Swedish Radio Symphony Orchestra, [b]Philharmonia Orchestra / Esa-Pekka Salonen
Sony Classical Theta SMK89748 Ⓜ
(69 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1987-88 ●●●

At the time this was the best recording of the Sibelius Concerto to have appeared for more than a decade and probably the best ever of the Nielsen. Cho-Liang Lin brings an apparently effortless virtuosity to both concertos. He produces a wonderfully clean and silvery sonority and there is no lack of aristocratic finesse. Only half-a-dozen years separate the two concertos, yet they breathe a totally different air. Lin's perfect intonation and tonal purity excite admiration and throughout them both there is a strong sense of line from beginning to end. Esa-Pekka Salonen gets excellent playing from the Philharmonia Orchestra in the Sibelius and almost equally good results from the Swedish Radio Symphony Orchestra.

This is one of the classic concerto recordings of the century.

Violin Concerto. Flute Concerto. Clarinet Concerto
Toke Lund Christiansen fl Niels Thomsen cl
Kim Sjøgren vn
Danish National Radio Symphony Orchestra / Michael Schønwandt
Chandos CHAN8894 (80 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1990

Kim Sjøgren may not command the purity of tone of Cho-Liang Lin but he has the inestimable advantage of totally idiomatic orchestral support: Michael Schønwandt has an instinctive feeling for this music – and it shows throughout. The perspective between soloist and orchestra is well judged (Sjøgren is never larger than life) and so is the internal balance. In the Flute Concerto, which veers from Gallic wit to moments of great poetic feeling, Toke Lund Christiansen is an excellent soloist. He has no want of brilliance or of authority and his performance is also endowed with plenty of character. Niels Thomsen's account of the Clarinet Concerto is one of the very finest now before the public. If there is any music from another planet, this is it! There is no attempt to beautify the score nor to overstate it: every dynamic nuance and expressive marking is observed by both the soloist and the conductor. Thomsen plays as though his very being is at stake and Michael Schønwandt secures playing of great imaginative intensity from the Danish Radio Orchestra.

Symphonies

No 1 in G minor, FS16; No 2 FS29, 'The Four Temperaments'; No 3, FS60, 'Sinfonia espansiva'; No 4, FS76, 'The inextinguishable'; No 5, FS97; No 6, FS116, 'Sinfonia semplice'

Awards 1991

Symphonies Nos 1, 2 and 3[a]. Maskarade – Overture. Aladdin – Suite, FS89
[a]Nancy Wait Fromm sop [a]Kevin McMillan bar
San Francisco Symphony Orchestra / Herbert Blomstedt
Double Decca 460 985-2DF2 Ⓜ
(134 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1989 ●●●
The complete symphonies with Blomstedt / San Francisco SO are also available in a box set:
Decca 443 117-2DH3 Ⓕ

Nielsen always nurtured a special affection for his First Symphony – and rightly so, for its language is natural and unaffected. It has great spontaneity of feeling and a Dvořákian warmth and freshness. Blomstedt's recording is vital, beautifully shaped and generally faithful to both the spirit and the letter of the score. The recording is very fine: the sound has plenty of room to expand, there is a very good relationship between the various sections of the orchestra and a realistic perspective. The Second and Third are two of Nielsen's most genial symphonies, both of which come from the earliest part of the century, in performances of the very first order. The Second (1902), inspired by the portrayal of The Four Temperaments (Choleric, Phlegmatic, Melancholic, Sanguine) that he had seen in a country inn, has splendid concentration and fire and, as always, from the right pace stems the right character. Moreover the orchestra sounds inspired, for there is a genuine excitement about its playing. Indeed Blomstedt's accounts are by far the most satisfying available. The Third, Espansiva, is even more personal in utterance than The Four Temperaments, for during the intervening years Nielsen had come much further along the road of self-discovery. His melodic lines are bolder, the musical paragraphs longer and his handling of form more assured. It is a glorious and richly inventive score whose pastoral slow movement includes a part for two wordless voices. Blomstedt gives us an affirmative, powerful reading and in the slow movement, the soprano produces the required ethereal effect. The sound is very detailed and full-bodied, and in the best traditions of the company. Blomstedt's Espansiva has greater depth than most accounts; the actual sound has that glowing radiance that characterizes Nielsen, and the tempo, the underlying current on which this music is borne, is expertly judged – and nowhere better than in the finale.

Symphonies Nos 1 and 2
Finnish Radio Symphony Orchestra / Jukka-Pekka Saraste
Finlandia 8573-85574-2 (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Saraste's characterisation of the Second Symphony is absolutely winning. The headlong momentum of the 'Choleric Temperament', the charm of the 'Phlegmatic' non-scherzo, the immensely sympathetic 'Melancholic' slow movement, and the tremendous sense of well-being in the 'Sanguine' finale: all these are spot-on. Alongside Blomstedt (reviewed above) I'm inclined to rate this the most successful modern recording of No 2, and for anyone interested in this particular coupling, Saraste's accounts are greatly preferable to Bryden Thomson's. Finlandia's recording quality is respectable, though Decca's larger sound-stage for Blomstedt makes for airier perspectives.

Saraste neither over-sells nor under-sells the First Symphony, and the balance he finds between feeling and flow in the slow movement is the sure sign of a conductor with a strong instinct for Nielsen. In the first movement he slightly overplays the music's Berliozian self-assertiveness; vital though that ingredient is, it needs to be set off by a more palpable sense of wonder in such places as the opening of the development section. Saraste launches the scherzo at an extraordinary lick. Not only are the rhythms uncomfortably bustled along as a result, but he has to rein in when the dotted figures appear. Most of the finale, though, is splendidly done.

All in all, this is a most likeable Nielsen cycle – not quite as classily played as Blomstedt's with his San Franciscans (reviewed above), and not always entirely persuasive in choice of tempo, but always well prepared and exuding both enthusiasm and intelligence.

Symphony No 1. Flute Concerto. Rhapsody Overture: An imaginary trip to the Faroe Islands, FS123
Patrick Gallois fl Gothenburg Symphony Orchestra / Myung-Whun Chung Ⓕ
BIS CD454 (63 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1989

This recording of the First Symphony is hardly less fine than that of Blomstedt. Tempos are generally well judged and there is a good feeling for the overall architecture of the piece. It gets off to a splendid start and Chung shapes the second group affectionately. He does not put a foot wrong in the slow movement, which has a splendid sense of line, and phrasing which is attentive but never overemphatic. The finale is exhilaratingly played. Throughout the work Chung knows how to build up to a climax and keep detail in the right perspective. As always, the Gothenburg Symphony plays with enthusiasm and spirit, as if it has always lived with this music and yet, paradoxically, is discovering it for the first time. The Rhapsody Overture, An imaginary trip to the Faroe Islands, begins most imaginatively but inspiration undoubtedly flags. The performance of the Flute Concerto is rather special. It is most strongly characterised by Patrick Gallois who plays with effortless virtuosity and an expressive eloquence that is never over- or under-stated. His purity of line in the first movement is quite striking and he has the measure of the poignant coda. His dynamic range is wide, the tone free from excessive vibrato and his approach fresh.

Symphonies Nos 2 and 3
National Symphony Orchestra of Ireland / Adrian Leaper
Naxos 8 550825 (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1994

The vital current on which every phrase must be borne in Nielsen needs to flow at higher voltage. This is music which needs to be played at white heat. Well, there is certainly no lack of electricity in Leaper's reading of the Second. He sets a cracking pace for the first movement, the choleric temperament, and hardly puts a foot wrong in its three companions. His tempos in the Sinfonia espansiva are well judged and sensible throughout all four of the movements. The finale, where many conductors get it wrong, seems to be just right. These are more than just serviceable performances: they are very good indeed and the Irish orchestra sounds well rehearsed and inside the idiom. You can pay more and do worse although some collectors will think the additional polish one gets from Blomstedt or Myung-Whun Chung is worth the extra outlay. These latter performances continue to grow in stature, and it is no mean compliment to the Naxos versions to say that they give them a very good run for their money. Naxos does not identify the singers in the slow movement of the Espansiva. No one investing in this issue and then going on to either of the Blomstedt accounts is going to feel that they have been let down. The recording team secures a very decent balance: well laid-back wind and brass, with good front-to-back perspective and transparency of texture.

Symphonies Nos 3 and 5
Catherine Bott sop Stephen Roberts bar
Royal Scottish Orchestra / Bryden Thomson
Chandos CHAN9067 (71 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1991

Bryden Thomson and the Royal Scottish Orchestra give fresh and direct readings of the Espansiva and the Fifth which are eminently satisfying. At no point are we aware of the conductor interposing himself between composer and listener, and one can sense an evident enthusiasm on the part of the players. This is Nielsen plain and unadorned without any frills. Thomson has a very good feeling for Nielsen's tempos and his account of the finale feels exactly right. All in all, a splendidly sane performance with good singing from the fine soloists in the slow movement.

The Fifth Symphony is another unaffected and straightforward performance that has a great deal going for it – not least the beautiful clarinet playing in the coda, and the thoroughly committed second movement. One is, perhaps, more aware of the beat in the first movement than in Blomstedt's Decca account and it rarely seems to float or sound disembodied as it does with him. However, Thomson achieves very spirited playing from the orchestra and the recordings are very good and present, even if the sound lacks the transparency Decca achieves for Blomstedt. Eminently enjoyable, ardent performances that can hold their head high.

Symphonies Nos 4-6. Little Suite in A minor, FS6[a]. Hymnus Amoris[b]
[b]Barbara Bonney sop [b]John Mark Ainsley, [b]Lars Pedersen tens bMichael W Hansen, [b]Bo Anker Hansen bars
San Francisco Symphony Orchestra / Herbert Blomstedt; [a]Danish National Radio Symphony Orchestra / [a]Ulf Schirmer
Double Decca 460 988-2DF2 Ⓜ
(142 minutes: DDD) ●
The complete symphonies with Blomstedt / San Francisco SO are also available in a box set: Decca 443 117-2DH3 Ⓕ

The Fourth and Fifth are two of Nielsen's most popular and deeply characteristic symphonies. Blomstedt's are splendid performances. The Fourth occupied Nielsen between 1914 and early 1916 and reveals a level of violence new to his art. The landscape is harsher; the melodic lines soar in a more anguished and intense fashion (in the case of the remarkable slow movement, 'like the eagle riding on the wind', to use Nielsen's own simile). Blomstedt's opening has splendid fire and he is not frightened of letting things rip. The finale with its exhilarating dialogue between the two timpanists comes off splendidly.

The Fifth Symphony of 1922 is impressive, too: it starts perfectly and has just the right glacial atmosphere. The climax and the desolate clarinet peroration into which it dissolves are well handled. The recording balance could not be improved upon: the woodwind are well recessed (though clarinet keys are audible at times), there is an almost ideal relationship between the various sections of the orchestra and a thoroughly realistic overall perspective.

Blomstedt has a good rapport with his players who sound in excellent shape and respond instinctively to these scores.

Blomstedt's account of the Sixth Symphony is a powerful one, with plenty of intensity and an appreciation of its extraordinary vision. It is by far the most challenging of the cycle and inhabits a very different world from early Nielsen. The intervening years had seen the cataclysmic events of the First World War and Nielsen was suffering increasingly from ill health. Blomstedt and the fine San Fransisco orchestra convey the powerful nervous tension of the first movement and the depth of the third, the Proposta seria.

Symphonies Nos 4 and 5
Finnish Radio Symphony Orchestra / Jukka-Pekka Saraste
Finlandia 3984-21439-2 (72 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997
Symphony No 5 also available (coupled with No 6) on Warner Elatus 0927-49424-2 Ⓜ

This is an impressive account of the Symphony No 4 which can hold its own among the very best. The Finnish RSO brings a feeling of urgent intensity to the slow movement and Saraste is attentive to matters of dynamics and phrasing. He builds up the musical argument powerfully to a convincing climax. Nor can No 5 be faulted: it is also powerfully conceived with a strong command of both detail and the overall architecture of the piece. The opening moves but is atmospheric, with careful attention to dynamic nuance and texture. The tranquillo section (two bars before fig 24: track 5) is most sensitively handled: it is both poetic and mysterious.

The engineers cope admirably with the dryish acoustic of the Helsinki Culture Hall: they produce exemplary clarity and it is only at the ends of movements or in the general pause that precedes the final Allegro of No 4 where one becomes aware of this. Among modern recordings, this issue deserves to be recommended alongside Blomstedt's San Francisco coupling. You may even prefer it.

Symphonies Nos 4 and 6
Royal Scottish National Orchestra / Bryden Thomson
Chandos CHAN9047 (70 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1991

Bryden Thomson's accounts of the Fourth and Sixth call to mind the ardent intensity of the pioneering Danish recordings (no longer available) by Launy Gróndahl and Thomas Jensen, such are their fire. The orchestra plays with total commitment and the underlying violence of No 4 makes a powerful impact, both at the opening and in the finale. But his Sixth is arguably the very finest version of the work on disc, notwithstanding the cultured and splendidly recorded account by Herbert Blomstedt.

Thomson strikes exactly the right tempo for the first movement and the problematic 'Humoreske' has never made better sense. He takes it at a steadier pace than most rival conductors, so that its questioning spirit registers. The third movement, the 'Proposta seria', is both eloquent and searching.

Even in a strongly competitive field this splendidly recorded Chandos account brings one closer to this extraordinary work than any other.

Aladdin – Suite, FS89

Aladdin – Suite. Maskarade – Overture; Prelude, Act 2; The Cockerels' Dance. Rhapsody Overture: An imaginary trip to the Faroe Islands, FS123. Helios Overture, FS32. Saga-Drøm, FS46. Pan and Syrinx, FS87
Gothenburg Symphony Orchestra / Neemi Järvi
DG 447 757-2GH (72 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995

Järvi gets totally committed playing from his fine orchestra; its members convey the feeling that they all believe in every note they utter. Aladdin is given with great spirit and spontaneity. The recording, made by the same team and in the same venue as the orchestra's earlier recording of the work, under Myung-Whun Chung, is excellent, though the 1983 BIS account has marginally greater depth and transparency. In only one instance does Järvi get it wrong and that is in the Helios Overture, which is too fast for its sunrise to cast its spell! Thoughts turn to Jupiter where the sun rises every 10 hours. Everything else here calls for applause.

Wind Quintet, FS100

Nielsen Wind Quintet, FS100
Fernström Wind Quintet, Op 59
Kvandal Wind Quintet, Op 34. Three Sacred Folktunes, Op 23b
Oslo Wind Quintet (Tom Ottar Andreasson fl Lars Peter Berg ob Arild Stav cl Hans Peter Aasen bn Jan Olav Marthinsen hn) Ⓢ
Naxos 8 553050 (70 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1993

This is a thoroughly entertaining CD, combining three very different and unfamiliar works with what is probably the finest wind quintet ever penned. The major item here, of course, is the Nielsen: a glorious work which achieves the rare combination of seriousness of expression as well as being utterly relaxed in tone. The Oslo ensemble is a little slower than usual, but its measured tempos are most convincing; indeed, in the finale they highlight musical connections with Nielsen's Fifth and Sixth Symphonies in ways rarely heard. The Swede John Axel Fernström was undeniably a minor composer. If his music does not possess many visionary qualities it is certainly well crafted and his 1943 Quintet is an engaging concert opener. Johan Kvandal from Norway is a weightier proposition and better-known outside of his native country than is Fernström. Kvandal's Quintet, Op 34 (1971), was written for the Oslo ensemble and is serious and high-minded in tone, contrasting effectively with both the Fernström and Kvandal's own Sacred Folktunes of 1963. In the Quintet's fast second movement Kvandal adopts a rather Shostakovichian manner, even alluding to the Soviet master's 12th Symphony, though to what purpose is unexplained. The idiomatic playing is reproduced in a slightly flat recording (made in the studios of Norwegian Radio), although the Naxos sound has great immediacy.

String Quartets

No 1 in G minor, FS4; No 2 in F minor, FS11;
No 3 in E flat, FS23; No 4 in F, FS36

String Quartets Nos 1 and 2
Oslo Quartet (Geir Inge Lotsberg, Per Kristian Skalstad vns Are Sandbakken va Oystein Sonstad vc)
Naxos 8 553908 (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1998 ●

Nielsen wrote five quartets in all between 1882 and 1919, although two of them exist in different versions, and the opus numbering is contradictory. This may explain why Naxos gets itself into such a pickle over the numbering of the G minor and F minor Quartets here, the second and third he composed (the early D minor of 1882-83 remains unnumbered). The G minor, Op 13 (FS4; 1887-88 but thoroughly rewritten in 1898) is No 1 and the F minor, Op 5 (FS11; 1890) is No 2. The front cover cites the works correctly as 'Quartets No 1, Op 13. No 2, Op 5', but the back cover has 'Quartet No 1 in F minor, Op 5 (Rev 1898)' and 'No 2 in G minor, Op 13 (1890)', managing thus to confuse both dates and numbering. Although in his notes Keith Anderson lays out the composition history quite simply, he refers only to the opus numbers, which should be consigned to oblivion and replaced by the more accurate Fog-Schousboe numbers.

The performances are as clear-sighted as the labelling is a mess. As with the first volume, the Oslo are sympathetic exponents, and do not overlay any extraneous expression on the music as the disappointing Zapolski for Chandos did. Like the almost exactly contemporaneous early Sibelius quartets, there is barely a hint of the familiar, mature Nielsen in either work, but both are well crafted and beautifully written for the instruments. The Oslo seem completely at home in the style, more so than either the Kontra for BIS (who, like the Zapolski, have the benefit of top-quality sound) or Danish (Kontrapunkt) Quartets, making them come alive as none of their rivals manage. The recording is, like Volume 1, a touch confined but not constricted; that aside, this disc can be unreservedly recommended.

String Quartets Nos 3 and 4
Oslo Quartet (Geir Inge Lotsberg, Per Kristian Skalstad vns Are Sandbakken va Øystein Sonstad vc)
Naxos 8 553907 (57 minutes: DDD). Ⓢ
Recorded 1997

Why is it that quartets of international standing have not taken up the Nielsen quartets (or the Berwald or Stenhammar for that matter). They are marvellous pieces and their neglect outside Scandinavia seems quite unaccountable. This release by the Oslo Quartet is refreshingly straightforward, full of vitality and spirit. Both scores are played with evident feeling but without any intrusive expressive exaggeration. The recordings are a little closely balanced, and as a result fortissimo passages can sound a touch fierce and wiry, for example in the closing page or so of the first movement of the F major (seven minutes into track 5). A pity the Oslo doesn't have as well-balanced a recording as Chandos and the Danish engineers provide for the Zapolski. The quartet is scrupulous in observing dynamic markings and gives totally dedicated, idiomatic performances. Artistically it is the finest at any price point.

String Quartets Nos 1-4.
Movements for String Quartet, FS3c
Danish Quartet (Tim Frederiksen, Arne Balk-Møller vns Claus Myrup va H Brendstrup vc)
Kontrapunkt ② 32150/1 (138 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1992

Nielsen composed two quartets and a string quintet during his student years. There was a gap of eight years between the F minor Quartet and the Third, in E flat, Op 14 (FS23) during which Nielsen had written his First Symphony, and another eight before the F major, Op 44 (FS36) saw the light of day. By this time he had written his opera, Saul and David and the best part of Maskarade as well as the Second Symphony. The Danish Quartet is very sensitive to dynamic nuance and phrases imaginatively. Of course, the F major Quartet goes deeper than the Third. There is a grace, an effortless fluency and a marvellous control of pace. Ideas come and go just when you feel they should; yet its learning and mastery is worn lightly. Though the earlier quartets are not such perfect works of art, they are nevertheless always endearing. The Danish Quartet is completely inside this music and is totally persuasive. In spite of the closely balanced recording this set gives real pleasure and can be recommended with enthusiasm.

Aladdin

Mette Ejsing contr Guido Paevatalu bar
Danish National Radio Chamber Choir; Danish National Radio Symphony Orchestra / Gennadi Rozhdestvensky
Chandos CHAN9135 (79 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included. Recorded 1992

Nielsen's music to Adam Oehlenschläger's Aladdin comes from 1917-18, and was commissioned for a particularly lavish production of the play at the Royal Theatre in Copenhagen. More than half the music consists of orchestral interludes to accompany processions and dances, most of which come in the Third Act. Many are delightful and endearing, and once heard difficult to get out of one's head. Robert Simpson summed the work up in his Nielsen monograph: 'The market-square in Isfahan where four orchestras play in four different tempos suggesting marvellously the clashing colours, movements and sounds of an eastern market-place is undoubtedly the most striking and original part of the music. Some of it is not very interesting (the rather commonplace Blackamoors' Dance, for instance) but most is intensely perceptive and colourful.' It is full of characteristic Nielsenesque touches, and although it is not the composer at his very best, it offers many irresistible delights. Performance and recording are both superb.

Maskarade

Aage Haugland bass Jeronimus; Susanne Resmark contr Magdelone; Gert Henning Jensen ten Leander; Bo Skovhus bar Henrik; Michael Kristensen ten Arv; Kurt Ravn bar Leonard; Henriette Bonde-Hansen sop Leonora; Marianne Rørholm contr Pernille; Johan Reuter bar Night Watchman, Master of the Masquerade; Christian Christiansen bass Tutor
Danish National Radio Choir and Symphony Orchestra / Ulf Schirmer
Decca ② 460 227-2DHO2 (145 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, text and translation included
Recorded 1996 ●●●

If you can keep a straight face through the master/servant antics of the club-addicts Leander and Henrik, if you can stay uncharmed by the ageing, repressed Magdelone when she shows she can still cut a caper, if you can stop your foot tapping in the Act 3 Maskarade itself, and if you can remain unmoved by the gentle pathos of the demasking scene, then you're made of very stern stuff. It is, not surprisingly, thoroughly idiomatic. Since the first production in 1906 Maskarade has been Denmark's national opera, and all the principals here have the music in their blood. Gert Henning Jensen may be a rather tremulous Leander, but he sounds appropriately youthful, and the love duets with his well-matched Leonora, Henriette Bonde-Hansen, are wonderfully touching. Bo Skovhus is in superb voice as the Figaro-esque Henrik, though an even sharper sense of fun in the characterisation would not have gone amiss; Michael Kristensen's blockhead Arv is also a paler impersonation than it should be. Aage Haugland is in magnificent voice and almost steals the show in Act 1 as the crusty old Jeronimus. And Ulf Schirmer conducts with excellently judged tempos and a deep affection for the idiom. Above all he has a grasp of the underlying momentum of each act.

This recording restores traditionally cut or displaced passages and corrects a host of textual and musical details. Having said that, Schirmer does miss a trick or two. The Overture could do with rather more lilt and swagger (the Danish strings could be more full-bodied here); synchronisation is initially dodgy in Act 3, as though the chorus can't quite believe the swift tempo; and the choral interpolations in the Tutor's strophic song sound a little contrived. So collectors wedded to the lovable Unicorn-Kanchana Frandsen set (somewhat dimmed in its CD transfer) will find reasons for returning to it. The balance sheet comes out strongly in favour of this Decca set, though, even before taking into account the excellent recording quality. This is a life-enhancing comic opera, comparable in many ways to Britten's A Midsummer Night's Dream, and it's wonderful to hear the piece done full justice.

Pehr Henrik Nordgren Finnish 1944

Nordgren studied musicology at the University of Helsinki, taking an MA in 1967, and composition as a private student of Joonas Kokkonen from 1965 to 1969. From 1970 to 1973, he studied composition and traditional Japanese music at the Tokio University of Art and Music. Nordgren is a composer who transcends divisions between schools and styles combining, in various ways, elements of twelve-tone technique, Ligetian field technique, the Western tonal tradition, a meditative minimalism related to the music of Arvo Pärt, and Finnish and Japanese folk music. He has acknowledged Shostakovich as a particularly strong influence, but the affinity is one of expressive aims rather than style. Significant works include Euphonie II (1967), The Turning Point (1972) and 10 piano ballades (1972-78) – both of which draw upon Nordgren's interest and study into Japanese traditional music – three symphonies (1974, 1989, 1993) and Beaivi, Ah…áñan (The Sun, My Father) for soloists, choir and orchestra (1987–89) – a setting of poems in the Sámi language. He has also composed a number of concertos, chamber works, a few vocal works and two operas.

Symphonies Nos 2 and 4

Symphonies – No 2, Op 74; No 4, Op 98
Finnish Radio Symphony Orchestra / Juha Kangas
Finlandia 3984-29720-2 (55 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1999 ●

Cello Concerto No 1, Op 50^{a}. Concerto for Strings, Op 54^{b}. Violin Concerto No 3, Op 53^{c}. Equivocations, Op 55^{d}. Nine Kwaidan Ballades^{e}
^{c}Kaija Saarikettu, ^{d}Reijo Tunkkari vns ^{d}Timo Kangas va ^{a}Erkki Rautio vc ^{d}Niiles Outakoski vc ^{d}Ritva Koistinen kantele ^{e}Izumi Tateno pf ^{abc}Ostrobothnian Chamber Orchestra / Juha Kangas
Finlandia Meet the Composer ② 3984 23408-2 (154 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1984,1990 and 1992-93 ●

The darkly eloquent, recent Fourth Symphony is an ideal introduction to the impressive sound world of Pehr Henrik Nordgren, though it's more richly scored and denser in texture than anything on the two-disc set (one of Finlandia's valuable Meet the Composer compilations). The Fourth begins turbulently, and often during its course rises to forbidding, dissonantly fraught climaxes. But, as often in his work, the complexity is built from simple constituents – a phrase from Boris Godunov, Finnish folk melodies – and at the centre and the end of the symphony the textures clear to reveal a solitary herdsman playing a pipe and a hushed, solemn string chorale. The effect is moving, but the presence of those simple motifs amidst the uproar that surrounds the islands of tense calm gives them a grandeur, even a nobility and the whole work a powerful sense of drama.

The Second Symphony (1989) is longer, its contrasts more violent, its unifying elements harder to perceive, but its coherence is striking. Even in a densely complex tutti or a texture thinned to nothing more than a string shimmer and a few isolated piano notes the sense of movement and destination is tangible.

On the two-disc set the ideal starting-point is the Concerto for Strings. Characteristic of Nordgren again is the way that the first movement is derived from two ideas, one unchanging (a simple, pulsing rhythm), the other a melodic figure which is both extended and simplified, becoming intensely expressive in the process. The central movement is an exciting, virtuoso toccata; the finale a sombre meditation on two simple ideas. Both concertos also build great variety from simple material (the Cello Concerto begins with single notes so precisely judged that a four-note rising phrase from the soloist has real lyrical eloquence), while the gripping Equivocations uses the Finnish national instrument, the kantele, to evoke an archaic folk world without ever quoting folk melody.

There is an improvisatory element to Nordgren's music, too, a feeling of ideas suggesting other ideas and dictating their own form. The Kwaidan Ballades, each prompted by one of Lafcadio Hearn's Japanese ghost stories, often give the impression of a tale told not in words but in formidably pianistic gestures.

Izumi Tateno plays them with great eloquence and resource; indeed all the performances here, by artists closely associated with the composer, are vividly communicative. Finely recorded.

Vítezslav Novák

Bohemian 1870-1949

GROVE

Novák studied with Jiránek and Dvořák at the Prague Conservatory (1889-92) and was powerfully influenced by the folk music of Moravia and Slovakia, which he began to collect and study in 1896. The result was an outpouring of symphonic poems and songs, culminating in the dramatic cantata The Storm (1910) and the large-scale tone poem Pan for piano (1910). In 1909 he began teaching at the Prague Conservatory, and this occupied him more than composition in his later years, though he wrote several operas, much choral music and a few late instrumental scores, of which the Autumn Symphony (1934) and the South Bohemian Suite are representative. A skilled melodist and contrapuntist, he retained an essentially late Romantic style, which was supported by a meticulous technique.

De profundis

Toman and the Wood Nymph, Op 40. Lady Godiva, Op 41. De profundis, Op 67
BBC Philharmonic Orchestra / Libor Pešek
Chandos CHAN9821 (66 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1999 ●

Vítězslav Novák was a keen walker and each piece on this absorbing CD testifies to his vivid sense of outdoors. He was also fascinated by the female psyche and two of the works programmed bring rival viragos to mind: Smetana's 'Sárka' (in the opening pages of Lady Godiva) and Strauss's Salome (the close of Toman and the Wood Nymph).

Yet for all their lustre, excitement and charm, even Godiva and Toman cannot rival the oppressive power of Novák's wartime masterpiece De profundis, a work that surely levels with Martinů's Lidice as being among the most poignant musical memorials of the period. Composed during the Nazi occupation of Czechoslovakia, De profundis finds Novák employing a significantly darkened palette, though the exultant closing section (track 7) bears little resemblance to the various politically motivated 'happy endings' that were surfacing elsewhere. Novák's use of the organ runs parallel with Scriabin's in The Poem of Ecstasy (albeit to very different effect).

Libor Pešek shows obvious sympathy for this repertoire and the playing of the BBC Philharmonic reaches formidable heights of passion, notably at the close of De profundis. Alternative discs of Novák's music are few and far between, the best of them hailing, in the main, from Brno – and not all of those are currently available.

Piano Quintet, Op 12

Piano Quintet in A minor, Op 12. 13 Slovak Folksongs. Songs of a Winter Night, Op 30
Magdalena Kožená mez Radoslav Kvapil pf
Kocian Quartet (Pavel Hůla, Jan Odstrčil vns Zbynek Padourek va Václav Bernášek vc)
ASV CDDCA998 (67 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1996

Novák's A minor Piano Quintet of 1896 was composed in the wake of his first fruitful study of the folk-song traditions of both Moravia and Slovakia. It is an accomplished creation, comprising a finely sustained Allegro molto moderato, an effective central theme and variations (based on a 15th-century Czech love-song) and a joyous finale. Seven years later, Novák produced his piano suite, Songs of a Winter Night. Its four movements make a charming set, ranging in mood from the wistful intimacy of 'Song of a moonlight night' to the gleeful merry-making of the last in the series ('Song of a carnival night'). Even during the ecstatic pealing that marks the climax of the memorable 'Song of a Christmas night', Novák's piano writing always remains wonderfully pellucid, a factor that also adds to the listener's enjoyment of his six volumes of Slovak songs, 13 of which are heard here.

Gems include the plaintive Sedla mucha ('A fly sat on a cornflower') with its bewitching piano traceries, the harmonically searching Svic, mila, mas komu ('Light the lamp, my love') and the tragic tale of Chodzila Mariska ('Mariska's walking along the bank').

Radoslav Kvapil and the Kocian Quartet form a thoroughly convincing alliance in the early Piano Quintet. The excellent Kvapil also shines in the solo suite (although the balance is slightly too close), and in the song sequence he provides some tenderly idiomatic support to the characterful mezzo, Magdalena Kožená.

Further listening

Suk Piano Quintet
Coupling: Piano Trio. Elegie. Piano Quartet
Štěpán pf Suk Quartet; Suk Trio
Supraphon 11 1532-2 (74 minutes: ADD: 2/94) Ⓜ

A collection of some of Suk's youthful works, offering enjoyable if undemanding listening. Fine performances.

Michael Nyman British 1944

Nyman studied at the Royal Academy of Music with Alan Bush and with Thurston Dart at King's College, London. He wrote the seminal book Experimental Music: Cage and Beyond (1974). In his compositions he aims to break down the barrier between popular culture and 'serious' composition. He is best known for his film scores, including The Draughtsman's Contract (1982), The Cook, the Thief, his Wife and her Lover (1989), Prospero's Books (1991) and The Piano (1993). He has also written five operas, among which The Man who Mistook his Wife for a Hat (1986) amply demonstrates his musical style in its use of variation and modular form, lyrical vocal lines over restless, repetitive phrases and repeated harmonic blocks.

The Piano Concerto

The Piano Concerto. MGV (Musique à Grande Vitesse)
Kathryn Stott pf
Royal Liverpool Philharmonic Orchestra; Michael Nyman Band; orchestra / Michael Nyman
Argo 443 382-2ZH (59 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1994

Considering the international success of Jane Campion's film The Piano, it seems quite logical that Nyman should adapt his celebrated score into a concert piece. Though performed uninterrupted, the 32-minute concerto is divided into four clear-cut sections. The Scottish folk-songs on which much of the score is based imbue the piece with a yearning, heartfelt quality not usually associated with this composer. Indeed, the whole concerto, as so convincingly advocated by Kathryn Stott and the RLPO, throbs with an unbridled Romantic fervency that may come as something of a shock to hardened Nymanites or those who appreciate the less grandiose scoring for the film. More recognizably Nymanesque is MGV, a sort of Pacific 231 for the 1990s, composed for the inauguration of the TGV North-European line in France. Here the composer's abstract style is eminently suited to describing a non-stop, imaginary railway journey through five regions between Paris and Lille; his repeated phrases and chugging, insistently propulsive rhythms create an effect that is totally spellbinding, with the strings adding an especially effective sense of speed and visual sweep. A rewarding disc that will appeal to Nyman fans old and new.

String Quartets Nos 1-3

String Quartets Nos 1-3
Balanescu Quartet (Alexander Balanescu, Johnathan Carney vns Kate Musker va Anthony Hinnigan vc)
Decca 473 091-2DM (63 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1991

So celebrated has Michael Nyman become as a composer for the screen that it's easy to underestimate the extent of his commitment to the concert hall. This recording helps to redress that balance. The Balanescu – dedicatees of the Second and Third, and clearly ardent chamions of the First String Quartet – play with enthusiasm and great vigour. The First in particular is immensely enjoyable, drawing heavily (and audibly) on a keyboard piece by the Elizabethan virginalist John Bull, manipulated (far less audibly) by ideas extracted from Schoenberg's Second Quartet, and subjected to typical Nymanesque principles of variation, ground bass, dismemberment and, when the time seems right, rude parody. Thus poetry and banality rub shoulders; the elation of the opening, and the ecstasies of track 12 give way to some marvellous kitsch in the centre, only to metamorphose into an ending which, within the curious terms of the piece, achieves a remarkable apotheosis of sorts. This is the Nyman one knows and loves.

Dance informs the Second Quartet, which was commissioned for and partly organised to match the choreography of Shobana Jeyasingh. Nyman's notes acknowledge a debt to Karnatic music, and though the piece is full of energy, and must make a marvellous ballet, it is thinner on ideas than its predecessor. The Third is something quite different. It functions as a chain of variations on Out of the Ruins, Nyman's hypnotic and startlingly beautiful soundtrack for the BBC documentary on the 1988 Armenian earthquake. Those who view Nyman as a lightweight need look no further than this piece to have their views put into disarray.

Johannes Ockeghem

Flanders c1410-1497

GROVE The earliest reference to Ockeghem as a singer shows that he was a vicaire-chanteur at Notre Dame, Antwerp, for a year from June 24, 1443. His déploration on Binchois' death (1460) suggests a connection with the Burgundian ducal chapel where Busnois and Dufay worked. He entered the service of Charles I, Duke of Bourbon, in Moulins in the mid-1440s and was a member of the chapel in 1446-48. In the year ending September 30, 1453 he is cited in the French court archives 'nouveau en 1451'. This service continued during Louis XI's reign, though he held other offices, including a canonry at Notre Dame, Paris (1463-70). In 1470 he visited Spain, in 1484 Bruges and Dammes. After Louis death he remained premier chapelain and was still on the payroll in 1488. He enjoyed an enviable personal and professional reputation.

His most imposing works are his mass settings. Several are based on pre-existing material, sacred or secular. One of the earliest is probably the Missa Caput which states the cantus firmus in the lowest voice, but in other (probably later) works, such as the Missa De plus en plus, he varied the treatment of the cantus firmus, assimilating it increasingly to the rhythmic and melodic character of the other voices; his two incomplete mass cycles are based on late chansons of his own, and his polyphonic Requiem is the earliest known setting. Others of his masses, including the Missa prolationum and the Missa Mi-mi, are freely composed. The former is perhaps the most extraordinary contrapuntal achievement of the 15th century, while the other clearly shows his own characteristic style, with its variations in mensuration, texture and sonority. His motets display even greater inventiveness, combining homophonic textures, skilful cantus firmus treatments, sweeping melodic lines, energetic rhythmic figures and frequent imitation. Most of his chansons use traditional formes fixes and feature treble-dominated textures, though some are canonic and occasionally anticipate early 16th-century chanson style. The level of contrapuntal skill and artistic excellence of his music laid a foundation for the achievements of Josquin's generation.

Missa prolationum

Ockeghem Missa prolationum.
Obrecht (attrib) Humilium decus. Busnois Gaude coelestis Domina. In hydraulis. Pullois Flos de spina.
Josquin Desprez Illibata Dei Virgo nutrix
The Clerks' Group / Edward Wickham
ASV Gaudeamus CDGAU143 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995

This recording focuses on one of the most astonishing compositional feats of the second half of the 15th century: Ockeghem's Missa prolationum. The successive movements of the Ordinary of the Mass are based on double canons that progress from the unison to the octave, while at the same time the composer also exploits the inherent ambiguity of the mensural system (and hence the work's title) of the later Middle Ages so that the rhythmic relationships between the voices are constantly being transformed. The astonishing thing is how effortlessly Ockeghem weaves his complex polyphonic web, and this is reinforced here by the unfettered, direct way in which The Clerks' Group approaches the music. Although there are only eight singers in the group, they bring a very satisfactory mix of the vocal agility one might expect from a small ensemble and the ability to sing through the long-breathed lines favoured by Ockeghem, without ever sounding strained or thin. The overall sound is closely recorded, but it never lacks richness or blend.

Although at first sight the five motets on the disc seem only loosely related to each other and to the Mass, there are potentially illuminating links: several of the composers appear to pay homage, whether directly or indirectly, to one another's pieces and in general they all opt for quite self-consciously complex structures yet create a musical idiom that is lucid and full of emotional responses to the texts they chose to set. No one could seriously doubt that is the Franco-Netherlandish school at its best.

Missa Ecce ancilla Domini

Ockeghem Missa Ecce ancilla Domini
Missa Dei mater. Ave Maria.
Josquin des Prez Déploration sur la mort de
Johannes Ockeghem Obrecht Salve regina
The Clerks' Group / Edward Wickham
ASV Gaudeamus CDGAU223 Ⓕ
(64 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1993

Ockeghem Missa travail suis. Mort tu as navré. S'elle m'amera/Petite Camusette. Permanent vierge/Pulchra es/Sancta Dei genetrix.
Missa sine nomine a 5. Intemerata Dei mater
Barbigant Au travail suis
The Clerks' Group / Edward Wickham
ASV Gaudeamus CDGAU215 Ⓕ
(55 minutes: DDD). Recorded 2000

The Clerks Group's recording of the Mass Ecce ancilla Domini remains one of their most satisfying achievements; how exciting it was to hear one of Ockeghem's most perfect Masses sung with such authority. Indeed, there are very few recordings of 15th-century polyphony to match this one. Their more recent disc is scarcely less impressive, and it, too, includes works that express Ockeghem's art in contrasted but typical ways. The five-voice Mass Sine nomine may seem slight on paper, but the Clerks' men make clear its effectiveness. And Au travail suis is one of the most strikingly distinctive of all 15th-century cycles, a study in contrasted, kaleidoscopic textures. Here, as elsewhere, the Clerks are mellifluous and slick: at times this is to the detriment of the music's delicious asperities (try the end of the Credo), but those who find the rival Pomerium Musices' account too mannered will welcome this more measured approach.

Lovers of vocal polyphony owe Edward Wickham and his singers a vote of thanks.

Missa 'l'homme armé'

Ockeghem Missa 'l'homme armé'. Ave Maria. Alma redemptoris mater
Josquin Desprez Memor esto verbi tui Plainchant Alma redemptoris mater. Immittet angelus Domini
Anonymous L'homme armé
Oxford Camerata / Jeremy Summerly
Naxos 8 554297 (57 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Texts and translations included ●

The centrepiece of this recording is Ockeghem's L'homme armé Mass. It may be one of Ockeghem's earliest Masses, dating perhaps from the early 1450s. It is also one of his most curious. For the most part it lies in a relatively high register, belying the composer's usual predilection for low bass ranges; but every now and again the basses descend in spectacular fashion. In the third Agnus, they hold down the tune in very long notes, with the other voices seeming to float above them. Seldom before in the history of music can the articulation of time have been so clear a feature of a piece's design: it seems almost to have been suspended altogether. It is an extraordinary moment, and extraordinarily difficult to pull off in performance, but here the singers seem to have got it right. Elsewhere, Summerly's approach is nicely varied, but on the whole more meditative than emphatic; one might say that the performance grows in stature with each movement, as though keeping pace with the cycle's ambition. In its details the reading is not without the odd glitch, but taken as a whole it is a fine achievement. The accompanying motets work very well but it is a shame that the choir's richness of sound is not quite matched by the acoustic. They deserve a more inspiring venue. But the overall impression is resoundingly positive: those new to Ockeghem should find this disc too good an opportunity to pass up.

Missa 'De plus en plus'

Missa 'De plus en plus'. Presque transi. Prenez sur moi vostre exemple. O rosa bella o dolce anima mia. Aultre Venus estés. Petite camusette. Tant fuz gentement. Mort tu as navré
Orlando Consort (Robert Harre-Jones counterten Charles Daniels, Angus Smith tens Donald Greig bar)
Archiv Produktion Blue 471 727-2ABL (73 minutes: Ⓜ DDD) Texts and translations included
Recorded 1996

This is a superb recording of Ockeghem's Mass, De plus en plus, by the Orlando Consort. The Orlandos' mixed programme of sacred and secular music offers a good, rounded picture of Ockeghem's art. In the Mass, the Orlandos are obvious first choice for those who prefer a soloistic approach, or for whom anything other than countertenors on top lines smacks of heresy. They are experienced singers with logical phrasing and breathing in solo passages, great interpretative acuteness, and a quality of ensemble that is of itself expressive. The Orlandos seem to achieve more with less: that is part of the magic of hearing Ockeghem sung this way. The accompanying songs certainly makes the case for Ockeghem's versatility as a song composer, a point emphasized by the differences of scoring to which they are especially sensitive. If this recording demonstrates anything, then it is that the sacred and the secular are very different worlds. If the Orlandos seem to experience trouble shifting gears between the two they are certainly not alone, either in England or abroad.

Requiem

Awards 1997

Ockeghem Requiem. Fors seulement. Missa 'Fors seulement'
Brumel Du tout plongiet/Fors seulement
La Rue Fors seulement
The Clerks' Group / Edward Wickham
ASV Gaudeamus CDGAU168 Ⓕ
(71 minutes: DDD). Texts and translations included. Recorded 1996 ●●●

Top billing goes to the Requiem, Ockeghem's most widely recorded work and perhaps his most enigmatic piece, stylistically very wide-ranging and diverse. Aesthetic judgement is hard to pass, since it may well be incomplete; but the surviving movements contain some of his most arresting inspirations. This is the first version of any quality to feature sopranos on the top lines. Incidentally, no recording of the Requiem is uniformly excellent; on the other hand, the words of the Mass for the dead conjure up many associations, and The Clerks deserve praise for the verve and imagination with which they respond to the work's interpretative challenges. The fillers are the works built on Ockeghem's song Fors seulement (which includes Antoine Brumel's Du tout plongiet). It is difficult to decide which to praise more highly: the pieces themselves, which are incomparable, or the singing, which represents The Clerks' finest achievement to date. Fors seulement inspired a flowering of astonishing pieces scored for very low voices (initiated, it appears, by the composer himself): in both the Mass and in Du tout plongiet, the basses descendto written low Cs. In addition, these pieces are exceptionally richly scored (the Mass and the La Rue song are five-voice works), creating polyphony as dense and as dark as a strong Trappist ale. The Clerks achieve almost miraculous linear definition here, without losing an iota of the music's sensuous appeal: that's quite a feat, given the low pitch and awesome contrapuntal complexity involved. This must be counted as a major achievement.

Jacques Offenbach

German/French 1819-1880

GROVE Offenbach's career began with a year's study at the Paris Conservatoire and several years experience as a solo and orchestral cellist; he became a theatre conductor in 1850, finally getting his own stage works performed in 1855. Writing mainly for the Bouffes Parisiens, he reached the peak of his international success in the 1860s; revivals and tours, as well as the score of his serious opera Les contes d'Hoffmann (unfinished, completed by Guiraud), dominated the 1870s.

With Johann Strauss II, Offenbach was one of the two outstanding composers in popular music of the 19th century and writer of some of the most exhilaratingly gay, tuneful music ever written. Les contes d'Hoffmann has retained a place in the international repertory for its fantasy and its strongly appealing music; but his most significant achievements lie in operetta: Orphée aux enfers (1858), La belle Hélène (1864), La vie parisienne (1866), La Grande-Duchesse de Gérolstein (1867) and La Périchole (1868) are striking examples. Moreover, it was through the success of Offenbach's works abroad that operetta became an established international genre, producing major national exponents in Strauss, Sullivan and Léhar and evolving into the 20th-century musical.

Offenbach's comic subjects, usually satirical treatments of familiar stories with a sharp glance at contemporary society and politics, are enhanced by none-too-subtle musical devices, including the quotation of well-known operatic music in incongruous settings: his tunes are often built upon a rising phrase in a major key and his finales are made exciting by gradual tempo acceleration and the use of brass at climaxes. He had a rare gift for catchy tunes, usually in dance rhythms, and telling harmonic touches. Through its famous overture (in fact composed by Carl Binder) and can-can, Orphée aux enfers has remained his best-known operetta.

Arias

Arias from Barbe-Bleue, La belle Hélène, Les contes d'Hoffmann[b], Fantasio[a], La fille du tambour-major, La Grande-Duchesse de Gérolstein[c], Lischen et Fritzchen[f], Madame l'archiduc[cdef], La Périchole, La vie parisienne[cef], Le carnaval des Revues[f]

Anne Sofie von Otter mez [a]Magali Léger, [b]Stéphanie d'Oustrac sops [c]Gilles Ragon, [d]Jean-Christophe Keck, [e]Jean-Christophe Henry tens [f]Laurent Naouri bar [d]Christophe Grapperon bass
Choeur des Musiciens du Louvre; Les Musiciens du Louvre / Marc Minkowski
DG 471 501-2GH (70 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included
Recorded live in 2001 ○○○

Anne Sofie von Otter immediately stamps her brilliance on this fascinating collection as Offenbach's voluptuous Grand-Duchess. Her commanding projection and phrasing in 'Ah, que j'aime les militaires' are followed by tender lyricism in 'Dites-lui'. Gilles Ragon trills irresistibly as a youthful and virile Lieutenant Fritz in the 'Chanson militaire', and there's a refreshing spring in the step of Minkowski's conducting. There follow two glorious numbers from Fantasio, a virtually forgotten pre-Hoffmann serious work. The beautiful ballad 'Voyez dans la nuit brune' especially shows the genuine feeling of which Offenbach was capable, as well as the sheer beauty of von Otter's singing. We scarcely needed another Hoffmann Barcarolle, and yet the image of the gondola floating along the Grand Canal has seldom been created as gracefully as here. The rest is conceived with intelligence and imagination, and performed with equal brilliance, with the range of supporting performers heightening the variety of the collection.

The collection encompasses all that is fascinating in Offenbach's output – tender and sparkling by turns, engaging throughout – and all quite wonderfully performed. Irresistible!

La belle Hélène

Felicity Lott sop Hélène; Yann Beuron ten Pâris; Michel Sénéchal ten Ménélas; Laurent Naouri bar Agamemnon; François Le Roux bar Calchas; Marie-Ange Todorovitch mez Oreste; Eric Huchet bar Achille; Alain Gabriel ten Ajax I; Laurent Alvaro bar Ajax II; Hjördis Thébault sop Bacchis P
Les Musiciens et Choeur des Musiciens du Louvre / Marc Minkowski
Virgin Classics ② 545477-2 (118 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 2000 ○○

From its very first bars, this recording strikes a chord of authenticity. Too often Offenbach's works are recorded with large orchestra, huge chorus and swimming-bath acoustics. Offenbach himself was perfectly happy to accept larger forces when available, but they do rather swamp the gossamer lightness and piquancy of what he actually composed. This newcomer derives from a stage production received enthusiastically at the Châtelet in Paris in September 2000. The feeling of a stage production pervades the recording in its integration of dialogue and music, as also in the uninhibited singing and playing of Orestes' opening couplets. Marie-Ange Todorovitch performs with appropriately boyish high spirits throughout, and Michel Sénéchal as Ménélas, Laurent Naouri as Agamemnon and François Le Roux as Calchas ensure this recording is cast from strength. Although Felicity Lott's Hélène lacks that distinctive French way of wrapping the voice round the words in her great arias, she succeeded in capturing Paris (the city as well as the Trojan prince). What appeals especially is her lightness of voice compared with the mezzo tones of many other interpreters. Yet the voice and interpretation that captivate the ear most here are those of Yann Beuron as Pâris. His honeyed tones are heard to absolute perfection throughout, but his pianissimo singing of the final verse of the 'Judgement of Paris' makes it an especially model interpretation. Moreover, Beuron has music to sing that is not in any previous recording – a lullaby, complete with dove cooing, preceding the Dream Duet. There's more, too. In the 1865 German version, the scene of the Game of Goose was longer than in the 1864 French original, and here it is longer still. But most importantly, this is a sparkling, beautifully paced recording and is now a clear first choice for what is surely Offenbach's most captivating operetta.

Les contes d'Hoffmann

Plácido Domingo ten Hoffmann; Dame Joan Sutherland sop Olympia, Giulietta, Antonia, Stella; Gabriel Bacquier bar Lindorf, Coppélius, Dapertutto, Dr Miracle; Huguette Tourangeau mez La Muse, Nicklausse; Jacques Charon ten Spalanzani; Hugues Cuénod ten Andrès, Cochenille, Pitichinaccio, Frantz; André Neury bar Schlemil; Paul Plishka bass Crespel; Margarita Lilowa mez Voice of Antonia's Mother;
Roland Jacques bar Luther
Lausanne Pro Arte Chorus; Du Brassus Chorus; Suisse Romande Chorus and Orchestra / Richard Bonynge
Decca ② 417 363-2DH2 (143 minutes: ADD). Notes, Ⓕ
text and translation included. Recorded 1968 ●●

This is a wonderfully refreshing set, made the more sparkling in the CD transfer. The story emerges crystal-clear, even the black ending to the Giulietta scene in Venice, which in Bonynge's text restores the original idea of the heroine dying from a draught of poison, while the dwarf, Pitichinaccio shrieks in delight. One also has to applaud his rather more controversial decision to put the Giulietta scene in the middle and leave the dramatically weighty Antonia scene till last. That also makes the role of Stella the more significant, giving extra point to the decision to have the same singer take all four heroine roles. With Dame Joan available it was a natural decision, and though in spoken dialogue she is less comfortable in the Giulietta scene than the rest, the contrasting portraits in each scene are all very convincing, with the voice brilliant in the doll scene, warmly sensuous in the Giulietta scene and powerfully dramatic as well as tender in the Antonia scene. Gabriel Bacquier gives sharply intense performances, firm and dark vocally, in the four villain roles, Hugues Cuénod contributes delightful vignettes in the four comprimario tenor roles, while Domingo establishes at the very start the distinctive bite in his portrait of Hoffmann; a powerful and a perceptive interpretation. The recording is vivid, and the listener is treated to some first-class playing from the Suisse Romande Orchestra.

Les contes d'Hoffmann
Raoul Jobin ten Hoffmann; Renée Doria sop Olympia; Vina Bovy sop Giulietta; Géori Boué sop Antonia; Fanély Revoil mez Nicklausse; Louis Musy bar Lindorf; André Pernet bass Coppélius; Charles Soix bass Dapertutto; Roger Bourdin bar Dr Miracle; René Lapelletrie ten Spalanzani; Camille Maurane bar Hermann 🄷
Chorus and Orchestra of the Opéra-Comique, Paris / André Cluytens
Naxos Historical ② 8110214/15 Ⓢ
(130 minutes: ADD). Notes and text included
Recorded 1948 ●

In the 1930s in Paris, Raoul Jobin and José Luccioni were the two great opera matinée-idols. Jobin was a French Canadian, made his début in 1930 and was soon singing at both the Opéra, as Faust, Lohengrin and Raoul in Les Huguenots, and at the Opéra-Comique, where he was a favourite Hoffmann and Don José. This recording may perhaps find him just a little late in his career. His years at the Metropolitan (throughout the German occupation) obviously took their toll, when he sang roles that were too heavy for him in such a huge theatre. However, the splendour of this set is the authenticity of the vocal style and the diction of such stalwarts of the Opéra-Comique ensemble as Louis Musy, Roger Bourdin, Fanély Revoil (better known as an operetta singer) and, luxurious casting, Camille Maurane in the small part of Hermann.

The three heroines are well inside their roles, but they are afflicted with a little strain in the higher-lying passages. Renée Doria sang all these parts later in her career – when this recording was made she was just at the outset, having made her début in Paris in 1944. Her Olympia is strong on the staccato notes but a bit fragile in the long phrases – this doll broke quite easily, one imagines. In the same act, André Pernet, a great figure from pre-war Paris is a superb Coppélius. In the Venice act, Vina Bovy is dramatically convincing as Giulietta, but hasn't much vocal sheen left (she made her début in 1919). Géori Boué, the Antonia, is one of the great figures from French post-war opera, but one feels that Giulietta would have been her role ideally. As for Jobin, despite some strain, he makes a convincing poet. Although there is such strong competition on CD where Hoffmann is concerned, this historic version is without doubt essential listening for a sense of style if the work absorbs you.

Additional recommendation
Les contes d'Hoffmann
Schicoff Hoffmann Murray Nicklausse Serra

Olympia Norman Giulietta Plowright Antonia Van Dam Lindorf, Coppélius, Dapertutto, Dr Miracle
Brussels National Opera Orchestra / Cambreling
EMI ③ 749641-2 (214 minutes: DDD: 12/88) Ⓕ

This is the version for Hoffmann completists – by far the longest edition, reaching almost Wagernian proportions. And to match such scholarly pretentions, the casting is suitably luxurious. The beautifully drawn characters portrayed by José Van Dam are a real highlight.

Gaîté parisienne

Offenbach Gaîté parisienne (arr M Rosenthal) 🄷
Rossini (arr/orch Respighi) La boutique fantasque
Boston Pops Orchestra / Arthur Fiedler
RCA Victor Living Stereo 09026 61847-2 Ⓜ
(64 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1954-56

Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops, for so long the guardians of traditional concert-hall light music in America, never made a better stereo recording than the amazing early (1954) complete Offenbach/Rosenthal Gaîté parisienne ballet score. It scintillates with effervescence and vitality, has just the right degree of brash vulgarity, yet the richly embracing acoustics of Symphony Hall ensure that the entry of the great 'Barcarolle' has warmth as well as allure. This transfer makes the very most of the outstanding mastertape. The coupling comprises some 27 minutes from the hardly less delectable Rossini/Respighi La boutique fantasque also brightly and atmospherically played and again given first-class sound from two years later. This release is a real collector's item, and not to be missed by anyone who cares about the history of stereo reproduction and also for the sheer joie de vivre of the music.

Gaîté Parisienne (arr Rosenthal). Offenbachiana (arr Rosenthal)
Monte Carlo Philharmonic Orchestra / Manuel Rosenthal Ⓢ
Naxos 8 554005 (68 minutes: DDD)

Manuel Rosenthal was 92 when he made this recording – his third – of Gaîté Parisienne, his ballet for Massine that had produced such a storm of applause in Monte Carlo back in 1938. He made very clear why he was anxious to do so: not only had there been poor recordings, cut versions and mauled arrangements of his score by others, but in his own previous recordings he had felt obliged to accommodate the dancers' wishes as regards tempos, and now he wanted to treat his work symphonically, with more spacious speeds that would enable details of the orchestration to emerge fully for the first time. So we can now accept this 45-minute version as authentic, and the more deliberate pace adopted in some places (beautifully and expressively so in the Barcarolle) in no way diminishes the brilliant impact of his treatment of Offenbach's heady tunes. The Monte Carlo orchestra, long familiar with the work, give their all to the aged maestro, with voluptuous string playing in lyrical sections; and the recording is exceptionally vivid. But the real joy of this disc is Offenbachiana, music drawn from a handful of the stage works arranged by Rosenthal while forced to kick his heels in Berlin for a fortnight owing to a recording equipment breakdown in 1953. This is a subtler, wittier and, if anything, even more scintillating score. Absolutely not to be missed!

Orphée aux enfers

(ed Minkowski/Pelly)
Yann Beuron ten Orphée; Natalie Dessay sop Eurydice; Jean-Paul Fouchécourt ten Aristée-Pluton; Laurent Naouri bar Jupiter; Lydie Pruvot sop Juno; Ewa Podles mez Public Opinion; Steven Cole ten John Styx; Véronique Gens sop Vénus; Patricia Petibon sop Cupid; Jennifer Smith sop Diane; Etienne Lescroart ten Mercury; Virginie Pochon sop Minerva Grenoble Chamber Orchestra; Chorus and Orchestra of the Opéra National de Lyon / Marc Minkowski
EMI ② 556725-2 (110 minutes: DDD). Notes, Ⓕ
text and translation included. Recorded 1997 ●

Orphée aux enfers may be Offenbach's best-known operetta, but it has had limited attention on disc. The lightly scored original 1858 version was in two acts and four scenes. The spectacular 1874 version had lots of extra songs and ballet numbers. Since this latter demands huge forces, it is scarcely viable on stage today. The usual solution in the theatre is thus to add selected numbers from the 1874 version to the 1858 text, and this is what was done for the performances at Geneva, Lyons and Grenoble that formed the basis of this recording. Home listeners may prefer to make their own selections of numbers, and musicologically questionable decisions such as the rescoring of 1874 pieces for 1858 orchestral resources become more exposed. What matters most, though, is the quality of performance, and the pleasures of this one are formidable.

Above all, Natalie Dessay's exchanges in the First Act with her despised violinist husband (the admirable Yann Beuron) are superbly done. So is her sighing over Jean-Paul Fouchécourt's Aristeus, whose two big solos show equal elegance. Later come Laurent Naouri's formidable Jupiter and cameos such as Etienne Lescroart's agile performance of Mercury's song and Patricia Petibon's deliciously winning account of Cupid's 'Couplets des baisers'. Ensemble numbers are extremely well done and throughout, Marc Minkowski provides thoughtful, lively direction.

What causes doubt is the tendency towards overstatement, from the opening monologue of Eva Podles's Public Opinion, where almost every word seems to be given exaggerated emphasis, through Aristeus's crude falsetto in his opening solo, to a curiously mechanical version of John Styx's 'Quand j'étais roi de Béotie' and some gratuitous vocal gymnastics in the 'Hymne à Bacchus'. Ultimately, however, those doubts are banished by the positive virtues. Whereas those who want virtually every note Offenbach composed for Orphée aux enfers must stick with the 1978 Plasson/EMI recording, Minkowski offers a more faithful impression of Offenbach's original compact creation, with selected 1874 additions as a bonus. It is a consistently imaginative performance, altogether livelier than its predecessor, and at its best a superbly musical version of Offenbach's sparkling creation.

Carl Orff

German 1895-1982

GROVE Orff studied at the Munich Academy and later, in 1920, with Kaminski. In 1924, with Dorothee Günther, he founded a school for gymnastics, music and dance, and out of this came his later activity in providing materials for young children to make music, using their voices and simple percussion instruments. His adult works also seek to make contact with primitive kinds of musical behaviour, as represented by ostinato, pulsation and direct vocal expression of emotion; in this he was influenced by Stravinsky (Oedipus rex, The Wedding), though the models are coarsened to produce music of a powerful pagan sensual appeal and physical excitement. All his major works, including the phenomenally successful Carmina burana (1937), were designed as pageants for the stage; they include several versions of Greek tragedies and Bavarian comedies.

Carmina Burana

Gundula Janowitz sop Gerhard Stolze ten
Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau bar Schönberg Boys' Choir; Chorus and Orchestra of the Deutsche Oper, Berlin / Eugen Jochum
DG The Originals 447 437-2GOR Ⓜ
(56 minutes: ADD). Text and translation included
Recorded 1967 ●●●

Since its original release, Jochum's performance has consistently been a prime recommendation for this much-recorded piece. Listening to it again in the superbly remastered sound, one can easily hear why. He pays great attention to detail – particularly with regard to tempo and articulation – yet the performance as a whole has a tremendous cogent sweep and the choruses have terrific power. The more reflective sections are not neglected, however, and movements such as 'Stetit Puella', with Janowitz sounding alluring and fey, have surely never been more sensitively handled. Stolze is ideal as the roasted swan and Fischer-Dieskau encompasses the very varied requirements of the baritone's music with ease. This distinguished performance, authorized by the composer and here sounding better than ever, retains its place at the head of the queue.

Carmina Burana
Beverly Hoch sop Stanford Olsen ten Mark Oswald bar F A C E Treble Choir; Montreal Symphony Chorus and Orchestra / Charles Dutoit
Decca 455 290-2DH (59 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1996

Dutoit's is the most satisfying and enjoyable modern performance of Carmina Burana to have appeared for some time. He is scrupulous in his attention to the many markings found in the score and ensures that details of articulation and orchestration are audible, without obtruding from the overall texture. His tempos feel just right, and he has conveyed his evident enthusiasm for the music to his performers, who respond accordingly. Stanford Olsen's roasted swan song is appropriately weird – helped by Orff's strange accompaniment being superbly pointed, whilst Beverly Hoch compensates for some thinness of tone with expressive phrasing, including a sensuous portamento in her 'In trutina' solo. Apart from his ponderous first number, Mark Oswald delivers the baritone's music with sensitivity and gusto. The choral singing is exceptionally fine. The recording, clear and full-bodied, makes this the most recommendable of digital versions.

Carmina Burana
Christiane Oelze sop David Kuebler ten
Simon Keenlyside bar Knabenchor Berlin; Chorus and Orchestra of the Deutsche Oper, Berlin / Christian Thielemann
DG 453 587-2GH (63 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included. Recorded 1998 ●●

Over the years there have been some impressive recordings of Carmina Burana from DG, starting with Jochum's electrifying version, recorded in 1967. Thielemann's harks directly back to that classic account, and not just because, like Jochum's, it has the chorus and orchestra of the Deutsche Oper, Berlin. The difference lies predominantly in the slow, lyrical sections. So, although with Thielemann the opening movement of the 'Primo vere' section is much longer, he loses nothing in tension, simply following the score's marking molto flessibile. Thielemann's speeds in fast sections come very close to those of Jochum and there is a similarly bright incisiveness, with rhythms clipped and well sprung, and with a comparably high voltage generated.

Although Thielemann's version has impressively full and brilliant sound, with fine inner clarity and wonderfully sharp definition of the many antiphonal contrasts, not only the chorus but more particularly the semi-chorus sound distant. The pianissimos are magical, but closer recording would have made the results even more involving. The choral singing is superb, warm and dramatic, reflecting the work of singers from the opera house, and the Knabenchor Berlin in the penultimate movement of the 'Court of Love' section adds an aptly earthy tang.

The soloists too, like Jochum's, are as near ideal as could be. David Kuebler is totally unfazed by the high tessitura of so much of the tenor writing: not just clean and precise and characterising superbly in the 'roast swan' sequence, but singing most beautifully in his equally taxing solo in the 'Court of Love' section. Christiane Oelze even matches the lovely Gundula Janowitz (for Jochum) in the soprano sections, ravishingly pure and true both in 'In trutina' and 'Dulcissime'. But it is Simon Keenlyside's singing which crowns this brilliant performance, at once clear, fresh and characterful. It is good to have this much-recorded work sounding as fresh as it did in that historic model.

Additional recommendation
Carmina Burana
Soloists; London Symphony Chorus and Orchestra / Previn
EMI Great Recordings of the Century
566899-2. (63 minutes: ADD: 10/86^R) Ⓜ
A classic reading, with a wonderful swagger and seductive rhythmic pointing. Splendid soloists, too.

Johann Pachelbel German 1653-1706

GROVE Pachelbel was taught by two local musicians, Heinrich Schwemmer and GC Wecker. In 1669 he entered the university at Altdorf and was organist of the Lorenzkirche there, but left after less than a year for lack of money and in 1670 enrolled in the Gymnasium Poeticum at Regensburg, where he continued musical studies with Kaspar Prentz.

After about five years as deputy organist at St Stephen's Cathedral, Vienna (1673-77), and a year as court organist at Eisenach, Pachelbel was appointed organist of the Predigerkirche at Erfurt in June 1678, where he remained for 12 years. During this time he was outstandingly successful as organist, composer and teacher (his pupils included JS Bach's elder brother, Johann Christoph) and was twice married. He left Erfurt in 1690 and, after short periods as organist in Stuttgart and Gotha, returned to Nuremberg, where he was organist at St Sebald until his death.

Pachelbel was a prolific composer. His organ music includes c70 chorales (mostly written at Erfurt), 95 Magnificat fugues (for Vespers at St Sebald) and non-liturgical works such as toccatas, preludes, fugues and fantasias. His preference for a lucid, uncomplicated style found fullest expression in his vocal music, which includes two masses and some important Vespers music as well as arias and sacred concertos. His modest contributions to chamber music include a canon that is now his best-known work.

Canon

Pachelbel Canon and Gigue Mozart Serenade No 13. Adagio and Fugue in C minor, K546 Anonymous (arr L Mozart) Cassation in G, 'Toy Symphony'
Academy of St Martin in the Fields / Sir Neville Marriner
Philips 416 386-2PH (52 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1984-85

Sir Neville Marriner here collects a miscellaneous group of popular classical and Baroque pieces in characteristically polished and elegant performances. Pachelbel's celebrated Canon – taken unsentimentally if sweetly at a flowing speed – is given a reprise after the fugue; unusual but why not? Warm, well-balanced recording.

Keyboard Suites

Keyboard Suites – C, S25; D minor, S26; E minor, S28; E minor, S29; F, S32; G minor, S33; G minor, S33b; G, S34; A, S36
Joseph Payne hpd
BIS CD809 (74 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

First-class recordings of fine organ music and motets by Pachelbel seem to have been unable to plant his name in the minds of the general musical public other than as the composer of that attractive but over-recorded canon. The present suites (definitely for harpsichord, not organ) are all printed in the Denkmaler der Tonkunst in Bayern series, but except for Nos 29, 32 and 33b their authorship is very questionable. Whoever wrote them, however, they contain some very impressive movements – for example the gigues in Nos 36 and 29 and the allemands in Nos 28, 29 and 26 – and Pachelbel displays some intriguing rhythmic quirks on occasion.

Each of the suites consists of an allemand, courant and saraband, plus a 'gyque' [sic] in all but two cases; No 33 includes a lively 'ballett', Nos. 25, 36 and 28 a gavotte (that in A major a very jolly one); there are doubles in Nos 29 and 36. Playing on a copy of a bright-toned early Flemish instrument, Joseph Payne offers clean and vital performances, with neat ornaments (less profuse, except for No 33b and the sarabands of No 28); now and then, in his desire for expressiveness or to draw attention to a point, he is a bit mannered, but in general his playing is most appealing and he is recorded with total fidelity.

Giovanni Pacini Italian 1796-1867

GROVE Pacini studied singing with Marchesi in Bologna, then turned to composition. Between 1813 and 1867 he wrote nearly 90 operas, first modelling them on Rossini and later, after contact with Bellini's works, giving more attention to harmonic and instrumental colour. He was gifted with melodic invention, used to effect in a variety of cabaletta types; his accompaniments and ensemble writing are weak by comparison. Among the earlier works, Alessandro nelle Indie (1824), L'ultimo giorno di Pompei (1825), Gli arabi nelle Gallie (1827) and Ivanhoe (1832) were notable successes.

In 1833 increased competition from Bellini and Donizetti caused his five-year withdrawal from the stage and he established a music school at his home in Viareggio and composed sacred works for the ducal chapel in Lucca, of which he was director from 1837. But with the immensely successful Saffo (1840), considered his masterpiece, he entered a period of more mature opera composition, producing La fidanzata corsa (1842), Maria, regina d'Inghilterra and Medea (1843). Though his success and reputation outside Italy were limited, his musical weaknesses can be attributed chiefly to the circumstances in which he worked. In the face of formidable competition within Italy, he satisfied a sophisticated public for half a century.

Carlo di Borgogna

Carlo di Borgogna

Bruce Ford ten Carlo; Elizabeth Futral sop Leonora di Jork; Roberto Frontali bar Arnoldo; Jennifer Larmore mez Estella; Helen Williams sop Amelia; Dominic Natoli ten Lord Athol; Gary Magee bar Gugliemo d'Erlach; Geoffrey Mitchell Choir; Academy of St Martin in the Fields / David Parry

Opera Rara ③ ORC21 (184 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Recorded in association with the Peter Moores Foundation. Notes, text and translation included

Recorded c2001 ●

Firstly, a word to enthusiasts: that is, to those with a special interest in early 19th-century opera, who may, perhaps, have acquired and enjoyed other operas of Giovanni Pacini that have appeared in recent years on records for the first time and who may look with some eagerness at this review. Don't read it! To borrow a well-known slogan of our time: just do it.

The one point which is well-known about Pacini's career is that it divides in two, with a four-year period of retirement for further thought and study. From this he emerged with his masterpiece Saffo (1840), and the general assumption has been that the operas from before the divide are inferior. In particular, it is understood that Pacini himself recognised this, his shortcomings being brought home to him by the relative failure of the last opera he wrote before 'resting'. That opera was Carlo di Borgogna. It is an opera well set-up with characters and situations; more importantly, one in which the forms themselves almost guarantee satisfaction if they are handled by such a master as Pacini was. We are not necessarily looking here for originality but (in no debased sense) for entertainment. As a matter of fact, originality is to be found as well: it's a curious feature of Pacini's writing that, while he can at one moment follow his stated theme with a sequential phrase of disheartening banality, he may also at any moment provide a harmonic or rhythmic lift that delights as it surprises.

The dominant character is Estella, Charles's true-love who turns savage on being dropped in favour of an arranged marriage but changes tack again as she tries to warn him that he is going to his death. Jennifer Larmore takes full advantage of her opportunities, sings the difficult role with some depth of vocal colour, is the assured mistress of technique and gives her words a vivid intensity of expression. The lower men's voices are strongly cast, with Gary Magee wasted in a role with little to sing. Bruce Ford takes the name-part, his tone virile, runs and gruppetti delivered with fluency we used to be told had disappeared with singers of the golden age.

As ever, David Parry conducts with a conviction to which his players respond, and the Mitchell Choir sing with precision and fresh tone. As to recorded sound, slightly closer contact with the soloists might be preferable, but for many this will be just about the right balance.

Maria, Regina d'Inghilterra

Nelly Miricioiu sop Mary Tudor; Bruce Ford ten Riccardo Fenimoore; José Fardilha bass Ernesto Malcolm; Mary Plazas sop Clotilde Talbot; Alastair Miles bass Gualtiero Churchill; Susan Bickley mez Page; Benjamin Bland bass Raoul Geoffrey Mitchell Choir; Philharmonia Orch / David Parry

Opera Rara ③ ORC15 (172 minutes: DDD). Notes, Ⓕ text and translation included. Recorded 1995-96

Pacini wrote happily within the formal conventions of Italian opera in his time. Opening chorus, aria and cabaletta, duet likewise in two 'movements', big ensemble as finale of the middle act, 'brilliant' solo for prima donna just before the final curtain.

A great point about the plot is the scope it provides for duets, and these are both plentiful and good. There are choruses of merrymakers, soldiers and Londoners out for blood. The ensemble, an excellent example of its kind, comes at the point when Fenimoore is cornered and feelings run high. So do the voices. We are lucky to have Bruce Ford. At a fortissimo he may sound underpowered, and he does not play imaginatively with mezza voce effects, but he much more than copes: in florid passages he moves swiftly and gracefully, he appears to be comfortable with the tessitura, and in the Prison scene, which provided Ivanov with his greatest success, he sings with feeling and a sense of style.

The women have suitably contrasting voices, Mary Plazas's fresh and high, Nelly Miricioiu's older in tone, more dramatic in timbre. Both are expressive singers, and though Miricioiu too habitually resorts to the imperious glottal emphasis associated with Callas and Caballé, she brings conviction to all she does. The baritone, José Fardilha, has a touch of the flicker-vibrato that can give distinctive character, and Alastair Miles confers nobility of utterance upon the vindictive Chancellor. The cast, in fact, is worthy of the opera, which in this recording has probably its most important performance since the première of 1843. There is fine work from the Philharmonia under Parry. Recorded sound is well balanced, and the production handles the drama well. You are likely to play it straight through from start to finish, chafing at any interruption; and that says something for both the music and the drama.

Ignacy Paderewski Polish 1860-1941

GROVE Pianist, composer and statesman Paderewski studied at the Warsaw Music Institute, in Berlin and with Leschetizky in Vienna, his career as a pianist beginning in 1888 with an exhausting international concert schedule; as a performer he was noted for his individual treatment of rubato. Meanwhile he composed during the summers, producing the opera Manru (1892-1901), the Symphony Op 24 and the Fantaisie polonaise Op 19 for piano and orchestra, typical products of the late Romantic Polish national school; perhaps better known are his programmatic piano miniatures and the Piano Concerto (1888). Between 1910 and 1921 he was active on behalf of Poland, making speeches, assisting victims of oppression and eventually becoming prime minister (1919). He also supported young Polish composers and worked on a new Chopin edition. He received numerous musical and national honours including a state burial in Arlington National Cemetery.

'Polonia' Symphony

Symphony in B minor, Op 24, 'Polonia'
BBC Scottish Symphony Orchestra / Jerzy Maksymiuk
Hyperion CDA67056 (74 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1998

Best-known as a legendary concert pianist and appointed first Prime Minister of Poland in 1919, Ignacy Jan Paderewski also found time to compose. In 1903 he embarked on his vast Polonia Symphony, which cost him some five years of labour and was to be his final major creation. In its unashamedly epic countenance and theatrical sense of rhetoric, Polonia most closely resembles the two symphonies of Liszt as well as Tchaikovsky's Manfred, though it perhaps lacks the distinctive thematic profile of those masterworks. That said, the mighty opening movement (some half-an-hour in duration) is an impressive achievement, its stately introductory material sowing the seeds for much of what is to follow as well as acting as a most effective foil to the rousingly patriotic, defiant Allegro vivace proper. At first, the central Andante con moto meanders along moodily in an introspective, Rachmaninovian manner, but, about half-way through, the skies darken further and the music acquires a troubled, sombre flavour that cannot be dispelled (the bleak coda offers no consolation). The finale's truculent battle-cries (which manage to incorporate a cleverly disguised motif based on the first two bars of the Polish national anthem) are temporarily assuaged by two tranquil episodes. The BBC Scottish SO and its longstanding Polish chief Jerzy Maksymiuk mastermind a performance of eloquence and dashing commitment (only in the closing minutes does any hint of raggedness creep into the violins' bustling – and, by the sound of it, none-too-rewarding – passagework). The recording, too, is pretty resplendent, and collectors with a sweet tooth for this sort of heady, late-Romantic 'spectacular' shouldn't hesitate for a moment.

Annibale Padovano Italian 1527-65

GROVE Padovano was organist at St Mark's, Venice (1552-65), then at the Graz court (from 1566, director of music 1567). Though important chiefly for his distinctive ricercares and improvisatory toccatas for organ (1556, 1604), he also published sacred works (1567, 1573) and madrigals (1561, 1564).

Mass for 24 voices – Versions 1 and 2

Huelgas Ensemble / Paul van Nevel
Harmonia Mundi HMC90 1727 (54 minutes: DDD)
Text and translation included. Recorded 2000 Ⓕ

Among other things, the Huelgas Ensemble do a nice line in lavishly scored Renaissance behemoths; here they present two performances of a Mass by Annibale Padovano, a prolific composer most often represented on disc by his instrumental music.

Padovano spent his career in Venice and in Graz, where he died in 1575 soon after the publication of a book of Masses. This wasn't one of them (perhaps unsurprisingly given the logistics involved); it survives instead in three choirbooks, now housed in the National Library in Vienna, from which Paul van Nevel made his transcription. In many ways it is a typical example of polychoral writing, although the disposition of the forces into three choirs of eight voices is rather unusual. Van Nevel underscores this by presenting the Mass first with a predominance of instruments and three voices in different ranges, one from each choir. The second reading is a mirror-image of the first, with about two dozen singers and three instruments: two cornets for the texture's higher reaches (a bit too high for singers' comfort) and a contrabass sackbut for reinforcement. (Incidentally, the insert-booklet gives the two versions in the wrong order.) Which of the two you prefer is a matter of taste, but you may find the choral one more involving: the individual lines receive much clearer definition, and aside from providing further touches of colour, the cornets are freer to ornament their lines imaginatively. As to the work itself, it may be pointless to introduce notions of 'quality' here: it is perhaps best considered as the support for an exceptional performance.

The sound is what mattered to the composer and the congregation, and presumably also to van Nevel and Harmonia Mundi. So there is no need to expect tours de force of contrapuntal brilliance à la Tallis (although for what it's worth there is an apparent reference to Josquin's Pange lingua Mass at the words 'per quem omnia facta sunt. Qui propter nos homines...'); similarly, the performances are as workmanlike as one might expect from these musicians, and not without charm, but they don't truly catch fire. Still, aficionados of renaissance instruments will want to experience those two dozen massed sackbuts and cornets; and one wouldn't want to argue with them.

Nicolò Paganini Italian 1782-1840

GROVE Through his technique and extreme personal magnetism Paganini was not only the most famous violin virtuoso but drew attention to the significance of virtuosity as an element in art. He studied with his father, Antonio Cervetto and Giacomo Costa and composition with Ghiretti and Paer in Parma. From 1810 to 1828 he developed a career as a 'free artist' throughout Italy, mesmerising audiences and critics with his showmanship; notable compositions were the bravura variations Le streghe (1813), the imaginative 24 Caprices Op. 1 and the second and third violin concertos, surpassing in brilliance any that had been written before. After conquering Vienna in 1828 he was equally successful in Germany (Goethe, Heine and Schumann admired him), Paris and London (1831-4). His hectic international career finally shattered his health in 1834, when he returned to Parma. Apart from his unparalleled technical wizardry on the instrument, including the use of left-hand pizzicato, double-stop harmonics, 'ricochet' bowings and a generally daredevil approach to performance – all of which influenced successive violinists – he is most important for his artistic impact on Liszt, Chopin, Schumann and Berlioz, who took up his technical challenge in the search for greater expression in their own works.

Violin Concertos

No 1 in E flat, Op 6; No 2 in B minor, Op 7, 'La campanella'

Violin Concertos Nos 1 and 2
Salvatore Accardo vn
London Philharmonic Orchestra / Charles Dutoit
DG 415 378-2GH (69 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1975

Paganini's violin music was at one time thought quite inaccessible to lesser mortals among the violin-playing fraternity, but as standards of technique have improved master technicians are now able to do justice to such works as these concertos. Salvatore Accardo is certainly among them, and we can judge his skill as early as the opening violin solo of the First Concerto. This is typical of the style, with its authoritative and rhetorical gestures and use of the whole instrumental compass, but so is the second theme which in its refinement and songlike nature demands (and here receives) another kind of virtuosity expressed through a command of tone, texture and articulation. Dutoit and the London Philharmonic Orchestra have a mainly subordinate role, certainly when the soloist is playing, but they fulfil it well and follow Accardo through the rhythmic flexibilities which are accepted performing style in this music and which for all we know were used by the virtuoso performer-composer himself. The recording is faithful and does justice to the all-important soloist.

Violin Concertos Nos 1 and 2
Ilya Kaler vn
Polish National Radio Symphony Orchestra / Stephen Gunzenhauser
Naxos 8 550649 (67 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1992

Ilya Kaler is a Russian virtuoso, a pupil of Leonid Kogan. He is a first-rate fiddler and an excellent musician. Paganini's once fiendish pyrotechnics hold no terrors for him, not even the whistling harmonics, and how nicely he can turn an Italianate lyrical phrase, as in the secondary theme of the first movement of the First Concerto. Then he can set off with panache into a flying staccato, bouncing his bow neatly on the strings when articulating the delicious spiccato finales of both works. Stephen Gunzenhauser launches into the opening movements with plenty of energy and aplomb and is a sympathetic accompanist throughout. How nicely the violins shape the lyrical ritornello introducing the first movement of the Second, and there is some sensitive horn playing in the Adagio. Kaler's intonation is above suspicion and he is naturally balanced: there is none of the scratchiness that can ruin one's pleasure in Paganinian pyrotechnics. With excellent notes, this is a superior product at super-bargain price. The recordings were made in the Concert Hall of Polish Radio in Katowice. It has an ideal ambience for this music: nicely warm, not clouded. Great value on all counts.

Paganini Violin Concerto No 1
Saint-Saëns Havanaise in E, Op 83. Introduction and Rondo capriccioso in A minor, Op 28
Sarah Chang vn
Philadelphia Orchestra / Wolfgang Sawallisch
EMI 555026-2 (55 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1993-94 ●

Paganini would surely have been astonished at Sarah Chang's version of his No 1. She made her début with the piece in the Avery Fisher Hall at the age of eight(!), but had reached more advanced years (12) when she recorded it in Philadelphia for EMI. The performance is dazzling, particularly the finale where her light rhythmic touch and deliciously pert sliding 'harmonized harmonics' are a wonder of technical assurance. Note too, in the first movement, the relaxed ease of the decorated bouncing bow passages and the gently tender reprise of the second subject. The slow movement is not overtly romantic, but the freshness is never in doubt. One does not expect her to sound maturely sophisticated like Perlman and she understates the sultry atmosphere of the Saint-Saëns Havanaise to pleasing effect, yet manages the coda with spruce flexibility of phrase and the most subtle graduations of timbre. The Introduction and Rondo capriccioso has plenty of dash and she catches the Spanish sunlight in the Introduction without an overtly sensuous response. The recording is a little too closely balanced. Sawallisch directs with verve and supports his soloist admirably.

Cantabile in D, Op 17[a]. Violin Concerto Nos 1[b] and 2 (arr vn/pf)[a]. Introduction and Variations on 'Nel cor più non mi sento' from Paisiello's 'La Molinara', Op 38. Moses-Fantasie[a]
Ilya Gringolts vn [a]Irina Ryumina pf [b]Lahti Symphony Orchestra / Osmo Vänskä Ⓕ
BIS CD999 (72 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1999

Ilya Gringolts (*b*1982 in St Petersburg) is an outstanding young Russian violinist; with this Paganini programme he began his recording career at the deep end. He's able to surmount the ferocious technical demands, and has, too, a notably rich, beautiful, unforced tone. In the unaccompanied Nel cor più non mi sento Variations, he seems rather careful – missing the passionate directness that Leila Josefowicz brings to this piece. But Gringolts's more expansive and delicate account is equally valid, the theme, with its freely expressive ornamentation, especially appealing. The other shorter items work well, too, in particular the elegant Cantabile – originally for violin and guitar. Only La campanella is a bit disappointing: one feels the need for a more vigorous approach, and despite the finesse of the playing it's difficult not to regret the absence of the orchestra. The First Concerto benefits from a truly outstanding accompaniment, performed (and recorded) with a wonderful sense of space and balance. Even the bass drum and cymbal parts are played with sensitivity – what can sound like a crudely overloaded score emerges here full of colour and grandeur. With such fine orchestral sonority, one might wonder what the concerto would sound like in its original key. Paganini played it in E flat, by tuning his strings a semitone higher, and wrote the orchestral parts in the higher key; his aim was to produce a more brilliant, penetrating sound. Present-day soloists, understandably, prefer the standard tuning for such a demanding work.

Gringolts plays with sweetness or brilliance as required, though one might wish the first movement hadn't had so many or such extreme tempo changes and that he had managed to give the Adagio a more dramatic tone, to match the darkly romantic orchestration. But the finale is terrific, with all the verve and high spirits one could want.

Centone di sonate

Centone di sonate Nos 7-12
Moshe Hammer vn Norbert Kraft gtr Ⓢ
Naxos 8 553142 (72 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1994

The Centone di sonate (a 'hotchpotch of sonatas') consists of 18 'sonatas' which are really salon works with a variety of movements – none of them in sonata form. Whether Paganini, who wrote them sometime after 1828, intended these pieces for public performance or merely for the use of the then abundant amateur musicians is not known. As usual in his works of this genre, it is the violin which hogs the limelight while the guitar remains a humble bag-carrier. The guitar parts are indeed so simple that they would have been within the reach of any amateur who was capable of keeping his end up with another musician; Segovia considered them beneath his dignity and refused many invitations to play them with famous partners! Nothing is harder than to be 'simple': Mozart managed it whilst at the same time being deceptively complex; Paganini did it at a far less sublime level, with sentimental, cheerful and pert tunes. Truth to tell, they are not the kind of works which impel one to listen to them at one sitting except for the most devoted aficionado of Paganini's violinistic voice or of hearing the guitar in an unremittingly subservient but genuinely complementary role.

These splendid performances on modern instruments make no claim to 'authentic' status, but they are no less appealing for that. They squeeze every last drop from the music with (inauthentically) full sound, and a Siamese-twin tightness of ensemble that was probably rare amongst those who played these works in Paganini's own time. In the end, these works have a charm that is hard for any but the most straitlaced to resist. It is unlikely that the Centone will ever be better played and/or recorded.

Violin and Guitar Duos

Six Sonatas for Guitar and Violin, Op 3. Sonata concertata in A, Op 61. 60 Variations on 'Barucabà', Op 14. Cantabile in D, Op 17
Scott St John vn Simon Wynberg gtr Ⓢ
Naxos 8 550690 (54 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1993

Six Sonatas for Guitar and Violin, Op 2. Cantabile e Valtz, Op 19. Variazioni di bravura on Caprice No 24. Duetto amoroso. Sonata per le gran viola e chitarra
Scott St John vn Simon Wynberg gtr Ⓢ
Naxos 8 550759 (59 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1993

Several of the violin/guitar duos testify to Paganini's amorous inclinations: the sections of the Duetto amoroso spell out the course of an affair, from beginning to separation, and may have been aimed (unsuccessfully, one imagines) at the Princess Elisa Baciocchi in Lucca. His conservative harmonic vocabulary springs few surprises and his melodies sometimes verge on banality, but by dint of sheer charm and technical ingenuity he somehow gets away with it; only the po-faced could resist an admiring smile at his effrontery. Collectively, these works present the full range of Paganini's technical armoury – the left-hand pizzicatos, high harmonics, double-stopping, 'sneaky' chromatic runs and the rest, and Scott St John betrays no difficulty in dealing with every googly that comes his way. More than that, in the daunting Sonata per le gran viola e chitarra (celebrating Paganini's acquisition of a Stradivarius instrument) cocks a snook at every viola joke that ever was. Wynberg proves as well matched a partner as St John could have wished for. Violinists, guitarists and lovers of winsomeness for its own sake should revel in these very well recorded discs.

24 Caprices, Op 1

Itzhak Perlman vn
EMI Great Recordings of the Century Ⓜ
567237-2 (72 minutes: ADD) ●

This electrifying music with its dare-devil virtuosity has long remained the pinnacle of violin technique, and the Caprices encapsulate the essence of the composer's style. For a long time it was considered virtually unthinkable that a violinist should be able to play the complete set; even in recent years only a handful have produced truly successful results. Itzhak Perlman has one strength in this music that is all-important, other than a sovereign technique – he is incapable of playing with an ugly tone. He has such variety in his bowing that the timbre of the instrument is never monotonous. The notes of the music are dispatched with a forthright confidence and fearless abandon. The frequent double-stopping passages hold no fear for him. Listen to the fire of No 5 in A minor and the way in which Perlman copes with the extremely difficult turns in No 14 in E flat; this is a master at work. The set rounds off with the famous A minor Caprice, which inspired Liszt, Brahms and Rachmaninov, amongst others, to adapt it in various guises for the piano.

---

24 Caprices
Leonidas Kavakos vn
Dynamic CDS66 (77 minutes: DDD). Ⓕ
Recorded 1989-90 ●

The Greek Leonidas Kavakos, who won first prize at the 1988 Paganini Competition in Genoa, as well as taking the 1991 Gramophone Concerto Award for the Sibelius Violin Concerto, is given a recorded sound that favours the lower strings of the violin, so much so that the sonority resembles a viola. He takes a truly intelligent view of the musical potential of Paganini's frequently tortuous-sounding Caprices. He also has a pretty formidable playing equipment and captures the mysterious and obsessive side of the music. The acoustic is spacious and affords an objective and balanced view of the music. He does not treat the Caprices as if they were merely études, but follows the composer's tempo markings with fidelity, notably in the Sixth Caprice. Kavakos saves his best playing for last: the final, and best-known, Caprice is quite superb.

---

24 Caprices H
Michael Rabin vn
EMI 764560-2 (69 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1958 ●●

The almost legendary American, Michael Rabin, who died in 1972 at the age of 35 after slipping on a parquet floor, was a stupendous technician not greatly concerned with stylistic considerations. He is so close to the microphone that one hears every detail with razor-sharp clarity. This closeness has the undesirable effect of ironing-out virtually all the dynamic shadings of his bowing, so that the playing has an unnatural evenness. The Eighth Caprice, in E flat, is excruciating on an aural level. For technical finesse and sheer dexterity, however, Rabin is utterly brilliant, and in the immense number of passages where double-stopping raises its ugly head, his control of pitch is stunning. In the final Caprice, Rabin is notable for his wonderful singing quality in the highest register, where his controlled use of vibrato reigns supreme.

Giovanni Palestrina

Italian c1525/6-1594

GROVE Palestrina was a pupil of Mallapert and Firmin Lebel at S Maria Maggiore, Rome, where he was a choirboy from at least 1537. He became organist of S Agapito, Palestrina, in 1544 and in 1547 married Lucrezia Gori there; they had three children. After the Bishop of Palestrina's election as pope (Julius III) he was appointed maestro di cappella of the Cappella Giulia in Rome (1551), where he issued his first works (masses, 1554); during 1555 he also sang in the Cappella Sistina. Two of Rome's greatest churches then procured him as maestro di cappella, St John Lateran (1555-60) and S Maria Maggiore (1561-6), and in 1564 Cardinal Ippolito d'Este engaged him to oversee the music at his Tivoli estate. From 1566 he also taught music at the Seminario Romano, before returning to the Cappella Giulia as maestro in 1571.

During the 1560s and 1570s Palestrina's fame and influence rapidly increased through the wide diffusion of his published works. So great was his reputation that in 1577 he was asked to rewrite the church's main plainchant books, following the Council of Trent's guidelines. His most famous mass, Missa Papae Marcelli, may have been composed to satisfy the council's requirements for musical cogency and textual intelligibility. He was always in tune with the Counter-Reformation spirit; after his wife's death in 1580 he considered taking holy orders, but instead he remarried (1581). His wife, Virginia Dormoli, was a wealthy fur merchant's widow; his investments in her business eased his financial strains, and his last years at St Peter's were among his most productive.

Palestrina ranks with Lassus and Byrd as one of the greatest Renaissance masters. A prolific composer of masses, motets and other sacred works, as well as madrigals, he was (unlike Lassus) basically conservative. In his sacred music he assimilated and refined his predecessors' polyphonic techniques to produce a 'seamless' texture, with all voices perfectly balanced. The nobility and restraint of his most expressive works established the almost legendary reverence that has surrounded his name and helped set him up as the classic model of Renaissance polyphony.

Motets

Ave Maria. Alma Redemptoris mater a IV. Veni sponsa Christi. Surge, propera amica mea. Quae est ista. Magnificat IV toni. Hodie beata virgo. Ave regina coelorum a IV. Magnificat VII toni. Ave Maria a V. Ave maris stella

Camerata Nova / Luigi Taglioni

Stradivarius STR33375 (59 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Texts and translations included. Recorded 1996

This is the new Italian sound of renaissance church music: a gentle vibrato, but a wonderfully loose and relaxed sound with a kind of breathy production. In the normal four-voice Palestrina texture both the two top voices are taken by women; but the sopranos are extremely light in their sound so they never dominate the texture, and the altos are of that wonderful variety that one usually only hears from Italians, with a firm and infinitely attractive chest register that goes confidently down to a low F. If the texture here is quite unlike what we are used to hearing from the best British ensembles, that is partly because there is an emphasis on line rather than on sonority. It's a sound of tremendous restraint. If one can say with confidence that this was not the sound Palestrina was expecting (any more than he was expecting the sound of The Tallis Scholars and their like), one can say with equal confidence that the Camerata Nova brings across the spirit and the polyphonic vitality of his music with astonishing power. Much credit must go to Luigi Taglioni for producing such a gentle and controlled ensemble. The music is also nicely chosen: a group of Marian motets, two Magnificat settings and a Marian hymn to form a neatly contrasted programme, with several pieces gloriously sung by four solo women's voices. If you thought that Palestrina was a composer of seamless and immaculate textures with just a touch too much surface gloss for comfort, this may be a record to help you to hear one of the world's most influential composers in a different light.

Masses

Missa Dum complerentur. Dum complerentur. Magnificat VI toni. Motets, Book 3 – Alleluia: Veni Sancte Spiritus. Veni sancte spiritus (plainchant). Spiritus sanctus replevit totam domum. Veni Creator Spiritus

Westminster Cathedral Choir / Martin Baker

Hyperion CDA67353 (71 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Texts and translations included

Recorded c2002 ●

The opening six-part motet, Dum complerentur, a vivid description of the coming of the Holy Spirit as a 'mighty rushing wind', has a text calculated to stimulate any composer. Palestrina's stirring motet reappears completely transformed in his Mass, quiet and pleading in the Kyrie, exuberant in the Gloria. The choir catches the spirit of each movement with remarkable flexibility.

The choir's renowned, so-called Continental, vocal quality has persisted throughout its existence, even with a succession of very different choir directors. Due in part to the building's acoustic, this factor almost certainly affects their singing of the chant. The beautiful Carolingian Alleluia: Veni Sancte Spiritus, with its melisma on the word 'amoris', is an excellent illustration of the trebles in full flight, singing with enormous confidence in the vast cathedral. In alternation with the low voices in the sequence Veni Sancte Spiritus, they have the edge over the men who sound a trifle strained on their top notes.

Palestrina's double choir version of this text shows the whole choir in top form, revelling in the composer's exciting rhythmic acrobatics: while never departing from the noble majesty of his style, Palestrina describes with thrilling realism the many-voiced confusion when 'they all began to speak in a multitude of different tongues'. Highly recommended.

Missa Viri Galilaei. Missa O Rex gloriae. Motets – Viri Galilaei; O Rex gloriae

Westminster Cathedral Choir / James O'Donnell

Hyperion CDA66316 (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Texts and translations included. Recorded 1988 ●

This is music in which Westminster Cathedral Choir excels: its response to the richly reverberant acoustic is warm and generous; it performs with the ease and freedom of kinship – a far cry from the studied perfection of many other choirs. Each motet is heard before its reworking as a Mass. The six-part scoring of Viri Galilaei (two trebles, alto, two tenors and bass) invites a variety of combinations and textures, culminating in the joyful cascading Alleluias at the end of Part I and the jubilant ascending series in Part II. In the Mass the mood changes from triumph to quiet pleading – a change partly due to revised scoring: the two alto parts beneath the single treble produce a more subdued sound.

The Choir clearly relishes this exploration of the deeper sonorities: in the Creed one entire section is entrusted to the four lowest voices. The four-part motet O Rex gloriae is lithe and fast-moving. The corresponding Mass, largely syllabic in style, gives the Choir the chance to show its superb command of phrasing and accentuation: the Latin comes over with intelligibility and subtlety. Listen, also, to the wonderful solo boys' trio in the 'Crucifixus', and for the carefully crafted canons in the Benedictus and Agnus Dei.

Missa ecce ego Johannes. Cantantibus organis. Laudate pueri. Magnificat IV toni. Peccantem me quotidie. Tribulationes civitatum. Tu es Petrus
Westminster Cathedral Choir / James O'Donnell
Hyperion CDA67099 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1999 ●

For sheer beauty of sound, this recording is unsurpassed. The choice of a programme of music by Palestrina, the one composer ever to have been honoured by official ecclesiastical recognition, was inspired. This CD represents several high points of solemn liturgy; a six-part polyphonic Mass, Ecce ego Johannes, and two groups of motets, including a festal psalm, two penitential pieces, antiphons for the feasts of St Peter and St Cecilia and a solemn alternatim Magnificat. What is very admirable about the whole performance is the excellent integration of the choir. Ivan Moody underlines in his notes Palestrina's skill in the seamless interweaving of homophony and flowing counterpoint; the choir, in its turn, moves from one to the other with the utmost ease and art. In particular, the give-and-take of dovetailing produces a perfect balance. In this respect, top praise for the trebles, with a firm, mature tone and assured flexibility.

Missa Assumpta est Maria. Missa Sicut lilium inter spinas. Motets – Assumpta est Maria a 6; Sicut lilium inter spinas I. Plainchant: Assumpta est Maria
The Tallis Scholars / Peter Phillips
Gimell CDGIM020 (72 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1989

In this recording of Palestrina's Missa Assumpta est Maria Peter Phillips has included the motet on which this work is based, together with another parody mass, the Sicut lilium with its corresponding motet. It is illuminating to hear how the larger-scale compositions unfold with reference to the original motets: close study, of course, would reveal much about the compositional processes of the High Renaissance, but any listener will be able to appreciate the organic relationship between motet and Mass.

In addition, Peter Phillips has deliberately paired two sharply contrasted parody Masses: Assumpta est Maria, the better known, is thought to be one of Palestrina's last masses, while Sicut lilium dates from relatively early in his career. The former, with its major tonality and divisi high voices, is marvellously bright and open and is given an outgoing performance, while the latter, inflected with chromaticism and melodic intervals that constantly fall back on themselves, is darker-hued and more plaintive, a mood well captured here in the intensity of the singing.

However, what is perhaps most striking is the difference in compositional technique between the two works: Sicut lilium relies largely on imitative textures for the unfolding of its structure (though there are the customary block chords on phrases such as 'et homo factus est', performed here with magical effect), while Assumpta est Maria makes far greater use of vocal scoring as a formal device and thus looks forward to the contrast principle of the Baroque.

The Tallis Scholars make the most of the contrasted blocks of sound here, achieving an impressive vocal blend and balance. The phrasing, particularly in the Kyrie, is perhaps a little too mannered and the very beautiful Agnus Dei verges on the narcissistic and therefore becomes too static. The flow in the Missa Sicut lilium, though, is excellent throughout.

Music for Holy Saturday

Music for Holy Saturday 🅿
Lamentations, Book III – I-III. Stabat mater. Benedictus for Holy Week. Sicut cervus. Responsories and Antiphons
Musica Contexta / Simon Ravens
Chaconne CHAN0679 (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, texts and translations included ●

This outstanding recording of 'Music for Holy Saturday' opens with two lessons from the third of Palestrina's four settings of texts from Lamentations, passages chanted during the Office of Tenebrae on the last three days of Holy Week. The third lesson is Palestrina's superb setting of the Prayer of Jeremiah.

The performance is objectively straightforward, allowing the music, in its utter poignancy expressed with marked restraint, to speak for itself. The clarity of the individual voices is remarkable and the acoustic clear, yet warm: even the six-part final cry, 'Jerusalem…convertere ad Dominum Deum tuum', comes across with perfect intelligibility. In the chanted liturgy each lesson is followed by a florid reponsory, and full marks should go to Musica Contexta for transcribing these chants from Giovanni Guidetti's edition of 1587, which naturally comes from the right place and is of the right date.

Though the responsories might have been better in a slower, more determinedly solemn style, these singers are well on the way to achieving perfection here. It is particularly interesting to hear them sing Palestrina's wonderful Sicut cervus, with its surging phrases, and also his famous Stabat mater for double choir, displaying that dramatic alternation between antiphonal choir and combined choral sections. For maximum effect, more antiphonal distinction might have helped in the choir – versus – choir sections; but overall this is a well-thought-out and moving performance.

Giovanni Antonio Pandolfi

Italian fl1660-1669

Italian composer and violinist Pandolfi is a shadowy figure known only for handful of violin sonatas. He was among the instrumentalists of Archduke Ferdinand of Austria at Innsbruck when his opp 3 and 4 violin sonatas were published in 1660 and there is little doubt a 1669 volume of sonatas attributed to 'D. Gio. Antonio Pandolfi' is by the same composer.

Violin Sonatas

Awards 2000

Six Sonatas per chiesa e camera, Op 3. 🅿
Six Sonatas for Violin and Continuo, Op 4
Andrew Manze vn Richard Egarr hpd
Harmonia Mundi HMU907241 Ⓕ
(80 minutes: DDD) ○○○

These are virtuoso performances of some quite extraordinary music. Each sonata has its own descriptive subtitle and a movement layout which seems reluctant to conform to any set pattern. Presumably the sections have their own tempo indications, though these are not disclosed either in the booklet or in the listing on the reverse side of the box. A pity, since there are lots of interesting and unusual juxtapositions of a strikingly non-conformist nature. Much of the writing is characterised by virtuoso figurations which, especially in faster movements, might become a little wearisome in the hands of a lesser player. But Manze seems to sense this danger and averts it with panache and a highly developed sense of fantasy. Slow movements, on balance, are more interesting and there is an especially memorable one in La Clemente, the Fifth Sonata of Op 3, whose aria-like character is pathos-laden. Manze plays it sensitively and the result is touching. Several movements have a strong ostinato element and, in La Monella Romanesca, the third piece from Op 4, we have a set of variations on a melody contained in the bass. Harpsichordist Richard Egarr is a lively and an imaginative accompanist throughout. In short, an exhilarating recital of music whose exoticism, melancholy and wild, passionate outbursts resist categorization and convenient definition. Strongly recommended.

Sir Hubert Parry

British 1848-1918

GROVE Parry studied at Oxford and with Pierson and Dannreuther, publishing songs, church music and piano works from the 1860s. He taught at the Royal College of Music from 1883 (succeeding Grove as director in 1894), also becoming professor at Oxford (1900-08) and president of the Musical Association (1901-8). Among his scholarly interests were Bach and the history of musical style, on which he wrote perceptively. His cantatas Scenes from Prometheus Unbound (1880), Blest Pair of Sirens (1887) and L'allegro ed il penseroso (1890) made a decisive impact for their poetic merit and advanced (Wagnerian) idiom. The anthem I was glad (1902), the choral Songs of Farewell (1916) and many of the unison songs including The Lover's Garland and Jerusalem show a similar regard for text and a fresh lyricism. His forceful personality and social position, together with his ethical views and intellectual vigour, enabled him to exercise a revitalising influence on English musical life in the late 19th century.

Complete Organ Works

Fantasia and Fugue in G (1882 and 1913 vers)^{a}. Three Chorale Fantasias^{a}. Chorale Preludes, Sets 1^{a} and 2^{b}. Elegy in A flat^{a}. Toccata and Fugue in G^{a}. Elégie^{b} Various A Little Organ Book in Memory of Sir Hubert Parry^{b}
James Lancelot org
Priory ② PRCD682AB (135 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded ^{a}1997 and ^{b}2000 ○○○

It's all too easy to dismiss Parry's music as being workmanlike and living in the shadow of Bach and Brahms. Yet there is real beauty and passion here, and at his best Parry can match the intensity of his contemporary Max Reger.

The appeal of this recording is enhanced by the inclusion of both the published and unpublished versions of the C major Fantasia and Fugue, and also by A Little Organ Book. This latter collection is an intensely moving tribute to Parry by 13 of his friends, colleagues and pupils (including Stanford, Bridge and Thalben-Ball).

This recording presents the best possible advocacy for Parry, and the combination of Lancelot and the Durham Willis/Harrison organ is, to coin a phrase, a 'dream ticket'. The greatness of Lancelot's playing lies in the perfect fusion of meticulously honed detail with an effortless flow to the whole performance. He fully exploits the beauty and grandeur of Durham's magical organ, and of all the available CDs, this one is the finest showcase for this most charismatic of cathedral instruments. The excellence of the playing is matched by the recording. Quite simply, this is a definitive, outstanding, glorious recording.

Songs

Parry English Lyrics: Set 2 – O mistress mine; Take, O take those lips away; No longer mourn for me; Blow, blow, thou winter wind; When icicles hang by the wall. Set 4 – Thine eyes still shine for me; When lovers meet again; When we two parted; Weep you no more; There be none of beauty's daughters;

Bright star. Set 5 – A Welsh lullaby. Set 6 – When comes my Gwen; And yet I love her till I die; Love is a bable. Set 7 – On a time the amorous Silvy. Set 8 – Marian; Looking backward. Set 9 – There. Set 10 – From a city window Vaughan Williams Songs of Travel. Linden Lea Robert Tear ten Philip Ledger pf
Belart 461 493-2 (77 minutes: ADD) Ⓑ
Recorded c1979

This selection of Parry's songs is very welcome in these fine and intelligent performances by Robert Tear and Philip Ledger. Parry does not always measure up to his texts (in the sonnets of Keats and Shakespeare especially), and is best when renouncing his teatime-Brahms style in favour of a more personal and imaginative idiom, as in 'When icicles hang by the wall' and 'From a city window'.

Vaughan Williams's great song-cycle, Songs of Travel, has a freshness partly deriving from the comparative rarity of hearing it in higher keys for the tenor voice. Both artists give the impression of having studied the songs as it were 'from scratch'. Tear's phrasing is a delight, showing exceptional sensitivity to the words, and Ledger's playing, with very sparing use of pedal, is scrupulously clean and careful over detail. The recorded sound is fine. No texts are included but it hardly matters: the diction is so clear you are unlikely to miss a word.

I was glad ... / Jerusalem

I was glad when they said unto me. Evening Service in D, 'Great'. Songs of Farewell. Hear my words, ye people. Jerusalem
Timothy Woodford, Richard Murray-Bruce trebs Andrew Wickens, Colin Cartwright countertens David Lowe, Martin Pickering tens Bruce Russell, Paul Rickard bars John Heighway bass Roger Judd org Choir of St George's Chapel, Windsor / Christopher Robinson
Hyperion CDA66273 (58 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts included. Recorded 1987

The more of Parry's music one comes to know, the more apparent it becomes that the 'received opinion' of him is askew. Take the 1882 settings of the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, for instance. These, amazingly, were not published until 1982. This recording – another example of Hyperion's courageous policy – shows how un-Victorian in the accepted sense they are. In other words, they are bold, unconventional and unsanctimonious – like quite a lot of Victorian church music, one may add. Perhaps the big anthem, Hear my words (1894) shows more signs of conventionality, but it has an attractive part for solo soprano (treble here) and ends with the hymn 'O praise ye the Lord'. The St George's Chapel Choir, conducted by Christopher Robinson, sings these works with more ease than it can muster for the famous and magnificent Coronation anthem I was glad, ceremonial music that not even Elgar surpassed. A sense of strain among the trebles is always evident. Although a wholly adult choir in the Songs of Farewell might be preferable, these are assured and often beautiful performances – excellent diction – of these extraordinarily affecting motets. English music does not possess much that is more perfect in the matching of words and music than the settings of 'There is an old belief' and 'Lord, let me know mine end', invidious as it is to select only two for mention. A stirring Jerusalem completes this enterprising recording, which brings the sound of a great building into our homes with absolute fidelity.

Arvo Pärt

Estonian 1935

Pärt was a pupil of Eller at the Tallinn Conservatory until 1963 while working as a sound producer for Estonian radio (1957-67); in 1962 he won a prize for a children's cantata (Our Garden) and an oratorio (Stride of the World). Early works followed standard Soviet models, but later he turned to strict serial writing, in rhythm as well as pitch (Perpetuum mobile, 1963) and then collage techniques (Symphony no.2, 1966; Pro et contra for cello and orchestra, 1966). In the 1970s he came into contact with plainchant and the music of the Orthodox Church, which affected his music both technically and spiritually. This is seen in, for example, Symphony no.3 (1971) and the cantata Song for the Beloved (1973) as well as Tabula rasa for three violins, strings and prepared piano (1977). The music of other composers is evoked, drawing on minimalist techniques of repetition, in such works as Arbos for chamber ensemble (1977, Janácek), Summa for tenor, baritone and ensemble (1980, Stravinsky), Cantus in Memory of Benjamin Britten for bell and strings (1980, Britten). Of more recent works, Pari intervalli echoes Bach chorale preludes, An den Wassern zu Babylon calls on 13th-century music and the St John Passion (1981) uses choral and instrumental heterophony recalling ancient incantation, always intense yet pure and ritualistic in effect.

Symphony No 3 / Tabula rasa

Symphony No 3. Tabula rasa[a]. Fratres[b]
[ab]Gil Shaham, [a]Adele Anthony vns [a]Erik Risberg prepared pf [b]Roger Carlsson perc Gothenburg Symphony Orchestra / Neeme Järvi Ⓕ
DG 20/21 457 647-2GH (59 minutes: DDD)

Pärt's panoramic, occasionally fragmented Third Symphony of 1971 contrasts with his gaunt but entrancing tintinnabulation works of the late 1970s. There are beautiful things in the symphony – ancient modes imaginatively redeployed, sensitive orchestration (especially for strings and tuned percussion), striking musical development and a fair quota of aural drama. There are occasional anticipations of the Cantus in memory of Benjamin Britten, and the 'breathing' spaces between episodes are characteristic of Pärt's later work. It's the voice of someone stretching his musical wings, edging into areas of harmonic invention that would help inform his future style – a youthful late-romantic poised on the brink of greater things. One might wonder how Gil Shaham might tackle a style of music in which, in terms of overt expression, 'less' most definitely means 'more'. In the event, his firm, silvery tone is ideal and his pin-sharp arpeggios at the beginning of Fratres are extraordinarily exciting. When Pärt drops the pace and switches to a slow, gradual crescendo, Shaham plays with a mesmerizing combination of control and reserved expressiveness.

The more expansive Tabula rasa is given a full-bodied and unexpectedly dynamic performance, especially in the opening movement, which sounds like a cross between a jig and a quick march. The long second movement conjures up immeasurable spaces and the spasmodic interjections of a prepared piano – an incredible effect, musically – is balanced virtually to perfection by the engineers. Kremer's ECM disc (with Schnittke, no less, on prepared piano) is sparer and marginally more ethereal, but the sheer sense of presence on this disc adds a new perspective to our experience of the piece. Strongly recommended, even if you already own alternative versions.

Symphony No 3. Summa. Fratres. Trisagion.
Cantus in memory of Benjamin Britten.
Silouans Song. Festina lente
Estonian National Symphony Orchestra / Paavo Järvi
Virgin Classics 545501-2 (73 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded c2001 ●

With Arvo Pärt the terms of comparison normally used for focusing differences between this or that recording tend to fall redundant. Pärt's mature music responds most readily to luminous textures, carefully timed silences and mastery of line, and only rarely to the more subjective impulses of dramatic conducting.

Paavo's performance of the first movement suggests urgent parallels with the fraught confrontations in Nielsen's Fifth. And there is more than a hint of 'the spring water purity of Sibelius's Sixth Symphony' in the finale. Everywhere one senses the hovering spectre of early music, but this Third Symphony is the ideal stepping stone for first-timers who wish to journey from standard symphonic fare to Pärt's cloistered tintinnabulation.

The more familiar tintinnabulation pieces work very well, with Järvi opting in the Cantus and Festina lente for warmer textures than some rivals, which usefully underlines Pärt's quietly cascading harmonies. There are those who will still prefer a more chaste sonority, the sort favoured on virtually all the ECM productions. But Paavo Järvi's more central approach will appeal to those who until now have heard in Pärt's music ascetic denial rather than quiet affirmation. Virgin's sound canvas is well judged, especially at the lower end of the spectrum. Recommended.

Additional recommendation
Symphony No 3
Couplings: Tabula rasa[a]. Collage on B-A-C-H.
[a]Hatfield, [a]Hirsch vns Ulster Orchestra / Yuasa
Naxos 8 554591 (52 minutes: DDD:
recorded 1999) Ⓢ

Yuasa's reading is somewhat akin to Järvi's first (BIS) recording – certainly for tempo. The Ulster brass are excellent and if the Orchestra's strings aren't quite on a par with those in Bamberg and Gothenburg, they're still pretty good. Quality samplings of Pärt don't come any cheaper.

Fratres / Summa

Fratres (seven versions). Summa. Festina Lente.
Cantus in Memory of Benjamin Britten.
Peter Manning vn France Springuel vc Mireille Gleizes pf I Fiamminghi
Telarc CD80387 (79 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1994

Telarc's Fratres-Fest proves beyond doubt that good basic material can be reworked almost ad infinitum – if the manner of its arrangement is sufficiently colourful. This sequence is particularly imaginative in that it alternates two varied pairs of Fratres with atmospheric original string pieces, then separates the last two versions with the sombre pealing of Festina Lente. The first Fratres opens to a low bass drone and chaste, ethereal strings: the suggested image is of a slow oncoming processional – mourners, perhaps, or members of some ancient religious sect – with drum and xylophone gradually intensifying until the percussive element is so loud that it resembles Copland's Fanfare for the Common Man. One envisages aged protagonists who have been treading the same ground since time immemorial, whereas the frantically propelled, arpeggiated opening to the version for violin, strings and percussion leaves a quite different impression. Still, even here the music does eventually calm and Peter Manning provides an expressive solo commentary.

Next comes the gentle cascading of Pärt's Cantus in Memory of Benjamin Britten, with its weeping sequences and lone, tolling bell. The eight-cello Fratres uses eerie harmonics (as does the cello and piano version that ends the programme), whereas Fratres for wind octet and percussion is cold, baleful, notably Slavonic-sounding and occasionally reminiscent of Stravinsky. The alternation of Summa (for strings) and the quartet version of Fratres works nicely, the former more animated than anything else on the disc; the latter, more intimate. The performances are consistently sympathetic, and the recordings are excellent.

Berliner Messe

Berliner Messe. The Beatitudes. Annum per Annum.
Magnificat. Seven Magnificat Antiphons.
De profundis

Polyphony / Stephen Layton with Andrew Lucas org
Hyperion CDA66960 (74 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1997

Pärt's music is about equilibrium and balance – balance between consonance and dissonance, between converging voices and, in the context of a CD such as this, between the individual works programmed. Stephen Layton has chosen well, starting with the variegated Berliner Messe and closing with the starkly ritualistic De profundis, a memorable and ultimately dramatic setting of Psalm 130 for male voices, organ, bass drum and tam-tam, dedicated to Gottfried von Einem. The Mass features two of Pärt's most powerful individual movements, a gently rocking 'Veni Sancte Spiritus' and a Credo which, as Meurig Bowen's unusually perceptive notes remind us, is in essence a major-key transformation of the better-known – and more frequently recorded – Summa. Everything here chimes to Pärt's tintinnabulation style, even the brief but fetching organ suite Annum per Annum, where the opening movement thunders an alarm then tapers to a gradual diminuendo, while the closing coda shoulders an equally well-calculated crescendo. The five movements in between are mostly quiet, whereas The Beatitudes flies back to its opening tonality on 'a flurry of quintuplet broken chords'. It is also the one place that witnesses a momentary – and minor – blemish on the vocal line, but otherwise Layton directs a fine sequence of warmly blended performances. If you are new to Pärt's music, then this disc would provide an excellent starting-point. We would suggest playing the individually shaded Seven Magnificat Antiphons first, then tackling the Berliner Messe, followed, perhaps, by the Magnificat.

Polyphony employs what one might roughly term an 'early music' singing style, being remarkably even in tone, largely free of vibrato and alive to phrasal inflexions. As to rival discs, none is significantly better performed; but as each Pärt programme is, in a sense, a concept in itself, we would recommend listening as widely as possible. We would also suggest experimenting with playing sequences: by so doing you will maximise the subtle differences between individual pieces.

Berliner Messe[a]. Bogoróditse Djévo. I am the True Vine. Kanon pokajanen – Ode IX. The Woman with the Alabaster Box. Tribute to Caesar.
Pro Arte Singers, [a]Theatre of Voices / Paul Hillier bar with [a]Christopher Bowers-Broadbent org
Harmonia Mundi HMU90 7242 (58 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1998 ●

I am the True Vine was composed in 1996 for the 900th anniversary of Norwich Cathedral, whereas Tribute to Caesar and The Woman with the Alabaster Box were commissioned in 1997 for the 350th Anniversary of the Karlstad Diocese in Sweden. Both works bear witness to a widened expressive vocabulary and, like I am the True Vine, take their creative nourishment from the power of words.

The remaining items can also be heard, in one form or another, on alternative recordings. Hillier's reading of the beautiful Ninth Ode from Kanon pokajanen is slower by some two minutes than Toñu Kaljuste's première recording of the parent work on ECM (an absolute must for Pärt devotees), which is surprising given the less reverberant acoustic on the new CD. Both here and in the Berliner Messe, ECM's sound-frame suggests greater space and tonal weight, though this latest production is equally effective in its own quite different way. Pärt's 'revision' of the Messe is an update of his original score (which is warmly represented in its full-choir guise on Hyperion). In a second version (the one featured on ECM), the organ part was replaced by a string orchestra, whereas a third version (the one offered here) features an organ revision of the string score. Comparing Hillier's vocal quartet recording with Kaljuste's string version with choir inclines one towards the silvery organ registrations in the Credo and depth of organ tone in the Agnus Dei. As for the rest, there's sufficient contrast between the two to warrant owning – or at least hearing – both. With fine sound quality, first-rate singing and concisely worded annotation (by Paul Hillier) this should prove a popular, indeed an essential, addition to Pärt's ever-growing discography.

Como cierva sedienta

'Orient and Occident' (CD title)
Como cierva sedienta[a]. Orient and Occident.
Ein Wallfahrtslied[a] Swedish Radio [a]Choir and Symphony Orchestra / Tonu Kaljuste
ECM New Series 472 080-2 Ⓕ
(47 minutes: DDD). Recorded c2002 ●●●

This programme represents a retreat from the remote cloister where for so long Arvo Pärt invited us to join him, a definite shift from the aerated tintinabuli. The purity remains, so do the spare textures and, to a limited extent, earlier stylistic traits. Pärt's voice is always recognisable. And yet who, years ago, could have anticipated the tempered tumult that erupts in the third movement of Como cierva sedienta, a half-hour choral drama commissioned by the Festival de Música de Canarias?

This recording subscribes to ECM's well-tried aesthetic in which clarity, fine-tipped detail and carefully gauged perspectives are familiar priorities. The texts come from the 42nd and 43rd Psalms, opening with 'As the hart panteth...' (Psalm 42). Even in the first few seconds, after chorus and bell have registered, vivid instrumental colour signals a fresh departure. It's almost as if Pärt is relishing textures previously denied him, like a penitent released from fasting. Take the second movement, 'Why art thou cast down, my soul?', which opens among lower strings then switches to tactile pizzicati and woodwinds that are almost Tchaikovskian in their post-Classical delicacy. The long closing section is pensive but conclusive: a dramatic opening, drum taps that recall Shostakovich 11, expressively varied instrumental commentary, quiet string chords later on and a closing episode filled with equivocal tranquillity.

The two shorter works are also significant. Wallfahrtslied (1984, 'Song of Pilgrimage'), a memorial to a friend, is presented in the revised version for strings and men's choir. Again Pärt engages a lyrical muse, particularly for the emotionally weighted prelude and postlude whereas the accompaniment to the main text (Psalm 121, 'I lift up mine eyes unto the hills…'), a combination of pizzicato and shuddering bowed phrases, suggests a lament tinged with anger.

The seven-minute string piece Orient and Occident has 'a monophonic line which runs resolutely through [it]', to quote Pärt's wife. Snake-like oriental gestures, coiled with prominent portamenti (the sort used by Indian orchestras) sound like an Eastern variant of Pärt's earlier string works.

The choral pieces, though, are the prime reasons for investing in this exceptional and musically important release.

De profundis

Statuit et Dominus. Missa Sillabica. Beatus Petronius. Seven Magnificat Antiphons. De profundis. Memento mori. Cantate Domino Solfeggio
Estonian Philharmonic Chamber Choir / Tõnu Kaljuste with Christopher Bowers-Broadbent org
Virgin Classics 545276-2 (61 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1995-96

Pärt's demands on the organ as an accompaniment to voices are neither particularly complex nor technically demanding but do require exceptional sensitivity from the player. It is largely through skilful use of registration that Bowers-Broadbent displays his profound understanding of the music. He balances his role admirably, keeping a discreet distance from the singers for the most part and measuring the long drawn-out crescendo of De profundis to perfection. However, this is, of course, a disc devoted to Pärt's choral music and it is the choir, rather than the organist, who are the real heroes. The Choir doesn't sound as if it's studied the music long and hard, but these performances feel as if they come from the heart; there is a tangible sense of spiritual empathy. Listen to the magical, ethereal quality of the singing in the Gloria from the Missa Sillabica which Tõnu Kaljuste draws from his singers. And in the magical Magnificat Antiphons the Estonian choir reveal an even greater depth of feeling. The recording is gloriously atmospheric.

Passio

Passio Domini nostri Jesu Christi
secundum Johannem
Mark Anderson ten Robert Macdonald bass Tonus Peregrinus / Antony Pitts
Naxos 8 555860 (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ ●●

Arvo Pärt's Passio is a shining beacon among countless late-20th century religious works that confronted the formidable prospect of a new millennium. Put briefly, Passio sets St John's gospel to a simple but powerful triadic musical language, its prescribed forces limited to a small chorus, a handful of solo voices and a chamber-size instrumental line-up consisting of organ, violin, oboe, cello and bassoon. Pärt treats the text as paramount and yet there is scarcely a hint of word painting in the accepted sense of the term. Spiritual underlining, yes, with telling support from the solo instruments. There are no written dynamics save for the opening, marked Langsam and forte, and the close, a Largo that blossoms from pianissimo to triple forte. Which doesn't mean that the singers are expected to deliver monotonously uninflected lines. Thankfully, none of them does.

Tonus Peregrinus shape phrases with a certain degree of freedom, just as choirs on rival versions have done before them. And Antony Pitts comes up trumps in his ability to keep lines lively and fluid, blending or clarifying as the text dictates. His is an excellent reading, always alert to Pärt's shifting harmonic plane and with consistently fresh voices, the women especially. Robert Macdonald's 'inward' portrayal of Jesus is preferable to the vocally commanding but inappropriately operatic Jorma Hynninen on Finlandia, though the Hilliards' Michael George perhaps remains the most impressive of all. And if the rival instrumentalists have the edge, Pitts's group is more than adequate.

Viewed overall, Tonus Peregrinus and Naxos have done Pärt proud. If this is your first Passio, rest assured that all the essentials are there. And if you want a top-grade specimen of quality music from the past 40 years, you won't find better. Passio truly is a wonderful work.

Te Deum

Te Deum. Silouans Song, 'My soul yearns after the Lord … . Magnificat. Berliner Messe
Estonian Philharmonic Chamber Choir; Tallinn Chamber Orchestra / Tõnu Kaljuste
ECM New Series 439 162-2 (66 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1993 ●●

Pärt's Te Deum sets the standard liturgical text to a wide range of nuances, shades and dynamics; brief string interludes provide heart-rending wordless commentaries, and the work's closing pages provide a serenely moving affirmation of holiness. Although relatively static in its musical narrative, Pärt's Te Deum is both mesmerizing and enriching. Silouans Song (1991), an eloquent study for strings, is as reliant on silence as on sonority. It is again austere and chant-like, although its dramatic interpolations approximate a sort of sacral protest. The brief Magnificat for a cappella choir (1989) positively showers multi-coloured resonances. However, the Te Deum's closest rival – in terms of substance and appeal – is surely the 25-minute Berliner Messe (1990-92). Here again Pärt employs the simplest means to achieve the most magical ends: 'Veni Sancte Spiritus' weaves a luminous thread of melodic activity either side of a constant, mid-voice drone, while the weighted phrases of the 'Sanctus' take breath among seraphic string chords. And how wonderful the gradual darkening of the closing 'Agnus Dei', where tenors initially answer sopranos and an almost imperceptible mellowing softens the work's final moments.

Beautiful sounds, these – gripping yet remote, communicative yet deeply personal in their contemplative aura, while the all-round standard of presentation – performance, engineering etc – serves Pärt as devotedly as Pärt serves the Divine Image.

Krzysztof Penderecki Polish 1933

GROVE Penderecki was a pupil of Malawski at the Kraków Conservatory (1955-58), where he has also taught. He gained international fame with such works as Threnody for the Victims of Hiroshima for 52 strings (1960), exploiting the fierce expressive effects of new sonorities, but in the mid-1970s there came a change to large symphonic forms based on rudimentary chromatic motifs. Central to his work is the St Luke Passion (1965), with its combination of intense expressive force with a severe style with archaic elements alluding to Bach, and its sequel Utrenia, in which Orthodox chant provides musical material and at the same time a sense of mystery. His operas have been admired for their dynamic expression even if their discrete vignettes offer more opportunity for characterisation than development.

St Luke Passion

Franziska Hirzel sop François Le Roux bar
Jean-Philippe Courtis bass Manfred Jung narr
West German Radio Chorus; North German Radio Chorus; Mainz Cathedral Choir; Orchestra of the Beethovenhalle, Bonn / Marc Soustrot
Dabringhaus und Grimm MDG337 0981-2 Ⓕ
(70 minutes: DDD)
Text and German translation only included
Recorded 1999

The West German Radio Chorus, a powerful presence in this performance, were also involved in one of two recordings of Penderecki's St Luke Passion made in 1967, a year after its completion. That Harmonia Mundi LP wasn't released until 12 years later, probably because the solo singers and conductor were identical to those on the Philips LP. More recently, the composer himself conducted a well-received account, resonantly recorded in Katowice Cathedral (Argo). Since then, Penderecki's blend of concentrated melodrama and expansive lamentation has lost ground to the more restrained, intimate spirituality of Pärt's Passio (St John Passion). But Penderecki's earlier style still has its advocates, as certain works by James MacMillan prove, and this new recording makes a strong case for it.

While Marc Soustrot can't erase the disparity between the brief Passion narrative and the drifting choral meditations, he maintains plenty of ongoing tension: as a result, the performance is about six minutes shorter than Penderecki's.

Not inappropriately, the sound has a raw edge with a touch of glare at climaxes. The booklet presentation is less than ideal, though, offering only a German translation alongside the Latin text. But it's the performance which matters most, and this one is consistently excellent – a genuine team effort.

St Luke Passion (Passio et mors Domini nostri Jesu Christi secundam Lucam)
Sigune von Osten sop Stephen Roberts bar
Kurt Rydl bass Edward Lubaszenko narr
Cracow Boys' Choir; Warsaw National Philharmonic Chorus; Polish Radio National Symphony Orchestra / Krzysztof Penderecki
Argo 430 328-2ZH (76 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included. Recorded 1989

The first performance in Münster Cathedral in 1966 of Penderecki's Passio et mors Domini nostri Jesu Christi secundum Lucam brought overnight fame and world recognition to the then 33-year-old composer, and succeeded, where many others had failed, in bringing the methods and language of the avant-garde to a much wider audience. Part of its immediate success must surely lie in his skilful fusion of past musical techniques (Renaissance-like polyphony, Gregorian melismata and Venetian cori spezzati) with the colouristic avant-garde devices that he had been developing in the years preceding its composition. Mind you, it was not without its detractors. Some critics, for the very reasons stated above, accused Penderecki of 'courting the masses' and of 'pure sensation-seeking', not to mention the fact that here was a young composer who had the audacity to court comparison with the sublime creations of Bach. Time, however, has proved some justification for the initial enthusiasm as the many hundreds (yes, hundreds!) of performances since its première testify.

It unfailingly creates an impressive impact on the listener with its dramatic energy and waves of tension, even if some of its language does sound a little dated.

The performance, under the guiding hand of the composer, is all one could wish for with splendid performances from orchestra, chorus and soloists alike, while the recording, made in the Cathedral of Christ the King, Katowice, has a beautifully spacious and resonant sound that gives the work a somewhat timeless quality.

St Luke Passion – In pulverem mortis; Vulgata. Magnificat – Sicut locutus est. Agnus Dei. Song of Cherubim. Veni creator. Benedicamus Domino. Benedictus. Symphony No 2 – Finale; Allegro moderato
Tapiola Chamber Choir / Juha Kuivanen
Warner Apex 8573-88433-2 (52 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1993

There is a neat correspondence in the way the earliest and most recent pieces included here – Stabat mater (1962) and Benedictus (1992) – both move to resolutions on simple major triads. The difference is in the extent to which the triads in the later work govern the musical fabric throughout. In the 1960s such common chords had to be fought for, and could even seem tacked on arbitrarily. In general, however, it is another kind of consistency that makes this disc musically worthwhile. Although all the works tend to be reflective and devotional, the contrapuntal medium of the unaccompanied chorus inspires the composer to an economical intensity all too often absent from his later instrumental works. Indeed, it is as part of that intensity that elements of his early, much more dissonant style, so powerfully represented in the three extracts from the St Luke Passion and the fragment from the Magnificat, re-emerge in the more traditional harmonic world of the later pieces – especially the Veni creator. Yet it should also be said that Penderecki's austere response to this celebratory text seems more than a little strange. Of the later works Song of Cherubim is the most powerful, ending with remarkably rapt 'Alleluias'. A note tells us that the composer regards the Benedictus as a draft to be reworked at a later stage. These performances are on the whole models of pure-toned clarity. Recordings are full of atmosphere but well balanced.

Hiroshima Threnody

Anaklasisa. Threnody for the victims of Hiroshima. Fonogrammi. De natura sonoris I. Capriccio. Canticum canticorum Salomonis. De natura sonoris II. Dream of Jacob
Wanda Wilkomirska vn Cracow Philharmonic Chorus; Polish National Radio Symphony Orchestra; aLondon Symphony Orchestra / Krzysztof Penderecki
EMI Matrix 565077-2 (75 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1972-75

Works such as the Threnody for the victims of Hiroshima delve deep within the recesses of collective memory, often triggering disturbing images. Even that master musical psychologist Alban Berg could hardly have approximated the Threnody's chamber of horror – the blinding light of its opening bars, the aural swerve as trees bend and houses shatter, the jittery aftermath as fall-out spreads its poisonous message, and the myriad gestures and effects that amount to a terrifying experience. No other 20th-century instrumental work quite equals the Threnody for graphic impact and no other composer has provided the victims of Hiroshima and Nagasaki with such a dramatic or telling memorial.

What of the rest? Penderecki's invariable preference for slow motion, dense tonal clusters, roaring sonorities (De natura sonoris II rises to a deafening primeval groan), wailing vocalizations and sundry instrumental effects (tapping and screeching), not to mention a virtual absence of melody and definable rhythm, make for a pretty draining listening session. Yet it is a fascinating sound world for all that, and the Threnody is surely its most profound justification. The recordings report all with merciless clarity.

Giovanni Pergolesi Italian 1710-1736

GROVE While studying with Durante in Naples Pergolesi worked as a violinist, and in 1731 he presented his first stage work, a dramma sacro. He became maestro di cappella to the Prince of Stigliano in 1732 and to the Duke of Maddaloni in 1734. Several more stage works followed for Naples and an opera seria, L'Olimpiade (1735), for Rome.

Only moderately popular in his lifetime, Pergolesi posthumously attained international fame as a leading figure in the rise of Italian comic opera. He wrote two commedie musicali, with both buffo and seria elements, and three comic intermezzos, each staged with an opera seria by him. The intermezzo La serva padrona (1733, Naples) is a miniature masterpiece of buffo style, spirited, with touches of sentiment and with clear, lively characterisation; it was widely performed and in 1752 initiated the Parisian Querelle des Bouffons. Livietta e Tracollo, also known as La contadina astuta (1734, Naples), became popular too. His other works include sacred music (notably a Stabat mater of1736), chamber cantatas and duets, and a few instrumental pieces.

Stabat mater

Stabat mater. Salve regina in C minor P
Emma Kirkby sop James Bowman counterten
Academy of Ancient Music / Christopher Hogwood
L'Oiseau-Lyre Florilegium 425 692-2OH Ⓕ
(52 minutes: DDD). Texts and translations included
Recorded 1988

Pergolesi's Stabat mater, written in the last few months of his brief life, enjoyed a huge popularity throughout the 18th century. But modern performances often misrepresent its nature, either through over-romanticizing it or by transforming it into a choral work. None of these are qualities overlooked in this affecting performance, for Emma Kirkby and James Bowman are well versed in the stylistic conventions of Baroque and early classical music – and their voices afford a pleasing partnership. Both revel in Pergolesi's sensuous vocal writing, phrasing the music effectively and executing the ornaments with an easy grace. Singers and instrumentalists alike attach importance to sonority, discovering a wealth of beguiling effects in Pergolesi's part writing. In the Salve regina in C minor Emma Kirkby gives a compelling performance, pure in tone, expressive and poignant, and she is sympathetically supported by the string ensemble. The recording is pleasantly resonant.

Pergolesi Stabat mater 🅿
A Scarlatti Stabat mater
Gemma Bertagnolli sop Sara Mingardo contr
Concerto Italiano / Rinaldo Alessandrini org
Opus 111 OPS30-160 (70 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included. Recorded 1998 ●

